THEOLOGICAL DICTIONARY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT
edited by Gerhard Kittel and Gerhard Friedrich translated by Geoffrey W. Bromiley

ABRIDGED IN ONE VOLUME
by

GEOFFREY W. BROMILEY

WILLIAM B. EERDMANS PUBLISHING COMPANY
THE PATERNOSTER PRESS

First published 1985 by William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company
255 Jefferson Ave. SE, Grand Rapids, Mich. 49503 and
The Paternoster Press Ltd.
3 Mount Radford Crescent, Exeter, Devon, UK EX24JW

Abridged from THEOLOGICAL DICTIONARY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, Copyright © 1964, 1964, 1965, 1967, 1967, 1968, 1971, 1972, and 1974 by Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company
Vols. I (Α–Γ), II (Δ–Η), III (Θ–Κ), IV (Λ–Ν), edited by Gerhard Kittel Vols. V (Ξ–Πa), VI (Πe–Ρ), VII (Σ), VII (ΤΥ), IX (ΦΩ), edited by Gerhard Friedrich
Originally translated from
THEOLOGISCHES WÖRTERBUCH ZUM NEUEN TESTAMENT
Published in nine volumes (1933–1973) by
W. KOHLHAMMER VERLAG
Stutgart, Germany

PREFACE

THEOLOGICAL DICTIONARY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

Abridged in One Volume

Many years of use have confirmed the value of the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament in both the German and the English versions. At the same time its size and the technical nature of much of the material have inhibited many Bible students who might have profited from its essential insights. To overcome these difficulties this single-volume condensation of the nine volumes, this “little Kittel,” has been prepared and is being offered to what it is hoped will be a much wider Christian public.

The purpose of TDNT is to mediate between ordinary lexicography and the specific task of exposition, particularly at the theological level. The discussion of each New Testament word of religious or theological significance includes comments on the word’s secular Greek background; its role in the Old Testament, both in the Hebrew and the Septuagint texts; its usage in such sources as Philo, Josephus, the pseudepigraphal and rabbinical literature; and finally its varied uses in the New Testament and, where pertinent, in the Apostolic Fathers.

In preparing this summary, which amounts to roughly one-sixth of the original, the following changes have been made. All Greek words, including those in the main entries, have been transliterated. And while the order of the entries is the same as in the original (and thus not strictly alphabetical in English), their more prominent (and especially New Testament) meanings have been added in brackets for ready reference. These meanings have also been placed in the running heads at the tops of the pages and in the alphabetized Table of English keywords. An alphabetized Table of Greek keywords replaces the Tables of Contents found at the beginnings of each of the original volumes.

Philological, archeological, and other supporting materials have been drastically reduced, as well as references when fewer are sufficient. Footnotes and bibliographies have both been excluded; interested students can find what they require in the original articles. The focus is on the biblical and especially the New Testament usage, so that the related classical, Hellenistic, apocalyptic, rabbinic, and patristic fields receive more cursory attention. In the biblical sphere itself the emphasis falls on the theological meaning in accordance with the main purpose of the enterprise.

So as to facilitate easy transition for those who might desire more detailed information, the relevant volume and page numbers in the full set are found at the end of each article or section. The names of the authors are also given in recognition that this is not an original work but a condensation of the work of others. But their names are put in brackets (with page references) so as to indicate that these scholars, many of whom are now deceased, bear no direct responsibility for the summarized version. Students might bear this in mind should they wish to refer to this version or to quote from it. Every effort has been made, of course, to reflect the contributors’ materials and interpretations as faithfully as the circumstances of condensation permit.

This shorter version is being released in the confidence that these materials can both extend and deepen our understanding of the theology and message of the New Testament, and in this way contribute to the proclamation of the gospel and the edification of the church.

Pasadena, California GEOFFREY W. BROMILEY

α a

AŌ [Alpha and Omega]

Peculiar to Revelation, this expression is used by God for himself in 21:6 (cf. 22:13), and by Christ in 1:17 (cf. 2:8). Its use with “first and last” fixes its meaning: God begins and ends all things. While probably taken from Hellenistic speculation, perhaps by way of Palestinian Judaism, it derives its content from the OT. The link with “who is to come” gives it a new dynamic quality. “First and last” occurs in Is. 41:4 LXX; 44:6 MT; 48:12 MT; there are also Mandaean parallels. Number symbolism occurs in both rabbinic Judaism and Hellenism. The former uses the first and last letters of the alphabet to denote completeness, or with numbers for the sake of secrecy. The first letter alone stands for what is best. Truth has God’s seal because it consists of the first, middle, and last letters. In view of the link with “first and last” and the reference to Is. 44:6 (in the Hebrew rather than Greek text), Revelation probably took the expression from Palestinian Judaism. [G. KITTEL, I, 1-3]

→ prṓtos, éschatos

Aarṓn [Aaron]

1. Heb. 5:1-9. Christ’s high priesthood is compared and contrasted with Aaron’s. While Aaron is called by God, he has only a partial and transitory ministry, Christ’s being of a different order.

2. Heb. 9:4. This verse refers to Aaron’s rod, which lay beside the pot with manna and the tables of the law and which miraculously budded (Num. 17:16-26).

3. Lk. 1:5. Elizabeth is of priestly descent; while “daughters of Aaron” is not a Jewish expression, it is formed after the analogy of Lev. 1:5. [K. G. KUHN, I, 3-4]

Abaddṓn [Abaddon]

Equivalent to Apollyṓn, this name is used in Rev. 9:11 for the king of the scorpions that plague the human race. It is taken from the OT (e.g., Job 28:22), and is a personification of the place of destruction (Job 26:6 etc.). The Gk. Apollyṓn is influenced by the LXX use of apṓleia and the idea of Apollyon as the god of plague and destruction (Aeschylus Agamemnon 1082). [J. JEREMIAS, I, 4]

abbá [father]

A. In Judaism. This Aramaic word is a familiar term for “father”; it is also a title for rabbis and a proper name, but is almost never used for God.

B. In Christianity. Jesus probably used abbá for God not only in Mk. 14:36 but also whenever the Gk. patḗr occurs. It denotes childlike intimacy and trust, not disrespect. In Paul (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6) it may be a liturgical reminiscence, possibly of the opening of the Lord’s Prayer. It undoubtedly expresses the new relationship with God proclaimed and lived out by Jesus and then experienced by believers in him.

→ patḗr [G. KITTEL, I, 5-6]

---

cf. confer, compare

OT Old Testament

LXX Septuagint

MT Masoretic Text

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

Ábel—Káin [Abel-Cain]

A. The Tradition in Judaism. The OT does not say why God accepted Abel's sacrifice but rejected Cain's. Josephus and Philo, however, suggest that Abel was religious while Cain was not, so that the former brought an offering of greater value.

B. Cain and Abel in the NT. Mt. 23:35 and Jude 11 reflect the Jewish view when they contrast righteous Abel and wicked Cain. Heb. finds faith in Abel (as distinct from Cain). Also in Heb. 11:4 on the basis of Gen. 4:10, the blood of righteous Abel appeals to God for full redress in the consummated kingdom (cf. Rev. 6:9-11). In Heb. 12:24 Abel's blood serves as a type for that of Jesus-the one demanding expiation, the other making it. [K. G. KUHN, I, 6-8]

Abraám [Abraham]

A. Abraham in Judaism. Abraham is the national and religious hero of the Jews; his tomb is revered and legends cluster around him. He is significant as a. the first proselyte and missionary; b. an observer of the unwritten Torah; c. a model of trust in ten temptations; d. the recipient of the covenant promise that is Israel's basis. His merit avails representatively for Israel, and descent from him is of decisive importance.

B. Abraham in the NT. Abraham's significance is conceded (Mt. 8:11; Mk. 12:26, etc.), but Jesus is superior to him (Jn. 8:52ff.), Peter replaces him as the rock (Mt. 16:18), and mere descent from him cannot help the unrepentant (Mt. 3:9; Jn. 8:33ff.). Though he is still an example of obedience (Jms. 2:21ff.), he is justified by faith (Rom. 4:1ff.) and is thus the father of all who believe, Gentiles as well as Jews (Gal. 3:7, 9; 4:22ff.; Rom. 4:12; Heb. 6:13ff.). Spiritual descent, not physical, is decisive. [J. JEREMIAS, I, 8-9]

ábyssos [abyss]

A term for the underworld as a. the prison of the disobedient (Lk. 8:31; Rev. 9:1) and b. the realm of the dead (Rom. 10:7).

Originally an adjective for an implied "earth," ábyssos is used in Greek for the depths of original time, the primal ocean, and the world of the dead. In the LXX it denotes the original flood, then the realm of the dead (e.g., Ps. 71:20).

In the NT it is a prison for antichrist (Rev. 11:7), demons (Lk. 8:31), scorpions (Rev. 9:3ff.), and spirits (Rev. 9:1; 20:1, 3). It is a well-like abyss from which smoke ascends (Rev. 9:1). Satan will be shut up there for a thousand-year period (Rev. 20:1, 3). In Rom. 10:7 it simply denotes the realm of the dead. Descending into the abyss is contrasted with ascending into heaven, but we can do neither to bring Christ to us.

→ hádēs [J. JEREMIAS, I, 9-10]

agathós [good], agathoergéō [to do good], agathopoiéō [to do good], agathopiós [doer of good], agathopoiía [doing good], agathōsýnē [goodness], philágathos [lover of goodness], aphilágathos [despiser of the good]

NT New Testament

Heb. Hebrew

agathós. As both adjective and noun, agathós denotes excellence (Plato Cratylus 412c). As an adjective it is given specific content by the word it qualifies, e.g., status or quality (cf. Mt. 25:21; 7:17). As a noun it can mean "the good" or "goods," whether material or spiritual.

A. In Greek Philosophy. The good is what gives meaning, e.g., what is pleasant (Sophists), the central idea (Plato), or such things as reason, virtue, the golden mean, and the necessary (Aristotle). People become good through instruction in the good (Plato Gorgias 470c).

B. In Hellenism. Being less humanistic, Hellenism gave agathós a religious flavor. "The good" is salvation, while "good" is "pleasing to God" in our case and "kind" in God's. In the Hermetic writings God alone is truly good; we humans become good by mortification of material things and by divinization. In Philo the divinity who is the supreme good is the personal God (Allegorical Interpretation of Laws 1.47). Piety, faith, and wisdom are goods whereby, with God's help, we may know and serve God (On the Special Laws 4.147; On Abraham 268; Who Is the Heir? 98).

C. In the OT and Judaism. The approach here is religious, as in Hellenism, but the self-revelation of the personal God is now determinative. "God is good" is the basic confession (cf. 1 Chr. 16:34). This God does "good" (cf. Ex. 18:9) in his work in history, which aims at final salvation and gives direction for life through the law. "Good" has already been done but is also awaited (Jer. 32:39, 42). Meanwhile we are shown what is "good" by the revelation of God's will in the law. Those who do good are good, but whether this is possible without God's help is debatable (Josephus The Jewish War 2.163ff.). Qoheleth thinks not (7:20). The rabbis see a struggle between good and evil impulses, works of love being the true good works.

D. In the NT.

a. The basic approach is again religious. Only God is truly good (Mt. 19:17). His goodness is the "kindness" which through Christ confers the "good things" of salvation (Heb. 9:11). Apostles are thus preachers of "good news" (Rom. 10:15; cf. Is. 52:7). Rightly, Matthew sees that God's exclusive goodness does not rule out Christ's sinlessness (Mt. 19:17 and par.).

b. Nothing in this world deserves to be called good (Rom. 7:18-19). The law is good, but even through the law sin works death (7:12-13). Distinctions can be made between good and bad people (Mt. 5:45), or speaking good and being evil (Mt. 12:34). Government can also be called a servant for good (Rom. 13:4). Yet these distinctions are only relative before God.

c. Salvation in Christ introduces a new possibility of knowing and doing the good (Rom. 12:2; Eph. 2:10; Col. 1:10). Christians must actualize this possibility (1 Th. 5:15). Its supreme content is love, which is the purpose of the law and the meaning of the Christian life. Grasping this new possibility gives a "good conscience" (Acts 23:1; 1 Tim. 1:5, 19). Yet the good of salvation is still the determinative goal (Rom. 8:28). The "good work" that God has begun will come to "completion at the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1:6).

agathoergéō. This rare word refers to God's kindly action (Acts 14:17) but also to the loving liberality that is required of the rich (1 Tim. 6:18).

agathopoiéō, agathopoiós, agathopoiía. The verb and adjective are used in astrology for stars of benign influence. In the LXX the verb denotes the good in action. It is common in 1 Peter (2:15, 20; 3:6, 17) in the same sense; cf. the "doer of good" who is "of God" (3 Jn. 11). agathopoiós in 1 Pet. 2:14 is contrasted with the wrongdoer; the Christian is to be a "doer of right." agathopoiía (1 Pet. 4:19) is the right action that alone is the proper preparation for final deliverance.

---

par. paragraph

agathōsýnē. This is the quality, or moral excellence, of the good person. It is the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22) or of light (Eph. 5:9), the content of the Christian life (Rom. 15:14).

philágathos. This word, found in Aristotle and Philo and used as a title of honor in Hellenistic societies, constitutes one of the qualifications of a bishop: he is to be a "lover of goodness" (Tit. 1:8).

aphilágathos. According to 2 Tim. 3:1ff. the attitude of people in the last time shows how serious this time is. Many of them, as "lovers of self," will be "haters of good[ness]." In that false love, lovelessness will celebrate its triumph. [W. GRUNDMANN, I, 10-18]

agalliáomai [to rejoice], agallásis [joy]

A. agállō in Greek Literature. The underlaying term agállō is common in Greek prose and poetry. It means "to adorn"; hence the middle agálliaomai means "to plume oneself," expressing joyful pride. Occasionally the reference may be to cultic joy (Euripides Trojan Women 452).

B. agalliáomai in the LXX and Judaism. This is a new biblical construct. Used mostly for Heb. gîl, it denotes cultic joy in God's help and acts, then joy in or before God, and (rarely) God's own joy (Is. 65:19). The cosmos itself is summoned to participate in this rejoicing, which will characterize the last day (e.g., Is. 12:6).

C. agalliáomai in the NT. Jn. 5:35 has a more secular joy in view, but the main use is for exulting in God's acts (Rev. 19:7). This joy is eschatological (cf. 1 Pet. 4:13; Jude 24). It is anticipated here and now in faith (cf. 1 Pet. 1:6, 8; Mt. 5:12). The Baptist's joy in the womb, and his parents' joy in him (Lk. 1:44, 58), look ahead to God's saving work in Christ. The community rejoices because it senses that it is the community of the end-time established by God's saving act. Paul does not have the term, but for a parallel cf. 1 Cor. 11:26. The cultic meaning is still present in the NT (cf. Acts 2:46). Christ himself shares the joy (cf. Heb. 1:9; Lk. 10:21 [rejoicing in the Holy Spirit]).

D. agalliáomai in the Early Church. Ignatius of Antioch uses the word eschatologically (Ephesians 9.2). The Shepherd of Hermas speaks of the devout rejoicing in spirit (Mandates 5.1.2). The Martyrdom of Polycarp gives us the eschatological sense (18.3), while a more general use occurs in Clement of Alexandria (Paedagogus 1.8.70.1). [R. BULTMANN, I, 19-21]

agapáō [to love], agápē [love], agapētós [beloved]

A. Love in the OT.

1. In the OT the main Hebrew root for love ('hb) can refer to both persons and things in a religious as well as a secular sense. Another fairly common root is rḥm, but since this carries the sense of mercy, eleeín is more usual for it. Love in the OT is a spontaneous feeling which impels to self-giving, to grasping that which causes it, or to pleasurable activity. It involves the inner person. Since it has a sexual basis, it is directed supremely to persons; love for things or acts has a metaphorical aspect. God's love is correlative to his personal nature, and love for God is love first for his person and only then for his word or law. Yet even in the extended sense love has an element of fervor or passion except in the case of lesser objects. In the secular sphere love is for husband or wife, parents or children, friends, masters, servants, and social groups. This use is more common than the religious use and may thus be taken as the basis of interpretation.

2. The Secular and Immanent Conception.

a. Here sexual love comes first and brings the element of impulsion to light. Sexuality can be given a heavy stress, as in Ezekiel (and cf. Hosea and Jeremiah). It is a given factor and contributes to the ennobling of life, as shown by its glorification in poetry (cf. Song of Songs 8:5). Both this love and its opposite can have brutal force, as in the story of Amnon and Tamar, or the saying of Samson's bride in Judg. 14:16. The law takes note of these erotic symptoms (Dt. 21:15ff. etc.).

b. Love in other relationships (e.g., parents and children) takes a different form, but the Hebrews must have felt some kinship, since they used the same term. Perhaps the link lies in love's spontaneous and irrational character, as in the case of Jonathan and David (1 Sam. 18:1, 3; 20:17). David himself expresses something of this in his lament in 2 Sam. 1:26. He is as closely related to Jonathan as to his own soul (1 Sam. 20:17).

c. The same intensity is not always present with more distant relatives and friends, but under the protection of theonomic law love is still the inalienable human element and the norm of social dealings. Relationships need legal definition, but a demand like Lev. 19:18 transcends all law, for it involves an attitude and not mere acts (cf. its opposite in Lev. 19:17). The final concern of the injunction is to foster neighborly feeling as the true basis of legal relations. Purely legal statutes will be only half measures unless informed and empowered by the paradoxical law of love. To interpret love here as mere favoring will not do, for it extends to the resident alien too (Lev. 19:34). This rules out narrow particularism; the neighbor is anyone in the immediate vicinity. Ultimately this means love even for those who from a human standpoint might seem to be enemies, for if Dt. 22:1-4 imposes a duty to help fellow nationals, Ex. 23:4-5 specifically applies this obligation to those who might be hostile. Since the neighbor can thus be foe as well as friend, the human person is set above the legal person as the object of love and consequently as the object of legal action. Joseph offers an example of the love which in obedience to God embraces even those who wrong us (Gen. 50:19). In the OT, of course, there are limits to this love of enemies. Ps. 109 and Prov. 14:20 illustrate this, as does the general attitude to hostile nations. Nevertheless, the nobility of the divinely imposed ethical requirement remains.

3. The Religious Conception.

a. In the light of secular usage, love obviously will have high theological value in the religious realm. The concept of the covenant limits its development, for if the covenant itself is a juridical expression of God's love, its relationship to love is only tacitly recognized. Love runs both ways, embracing both our love for God and God's love for us, but only Deuteronomy seems to link the two (7:9; 10:14ff.).

b. Our love for God is accepted without any attempt at closer definition. It is sometimes connected with fear (Dt. 10:12), but more often it involves delight and striving, a seeking of God for himself (cf. Abraham). Those who love God trust in him and find salvation and assurance. Hence they keep his commandments (Dt. 5:10), serve him (Dt. 10:12), and walk in his ways (Dt. 10:12; 11:22). Yet love itself is no mere externality. It is deeply inward and God-given, a circumcising of the heart (Jer. 31:33). It is certainly made the object of a command (cf. Dt. 6:5), but the law that results transcends law, though those who take it legally might not see this. The aim of the command is to make the most positive force in religion fruitful for covenant faithfulness. In the long run, however, everything depends on the free impulsion of love itself.

c. God's love for us is primarily national rather than individual. Within the nation, however, God loves certain groups such as the pure in heart, the poor, and even resident aliens (Dt. 10:18). God loves us as a father loves his son (Prov. 3:12), but didactic views of the parent-child relation, at least in this context, prevented the development of any deep sense of divine fatherhood.

d. Hosea gives very strong expression to God's love for his people. Official religion has disintegrated, but God's unfathomable love remains, illustrated by Hosea's nonsensical marriage. God's love is thus shown to be the enduring basis of the covenant. This love takes precedence over our love for God, for even when the latter fades (Hos. 6:4), the former does not let go (11:8-9). The threat "I will love them no more" (9:15) would amount, then, almost to God's ceasing to be God; in this light ch. 14 (cf. vv. 4-5) is the appropriate conclusion to Hosea. God is similarly torn between holiness and love in Jeremiah. He hates the rebellion of his people, but he loves Israel with "an everlasting love," and this underlies his faithfulness (Jer. 31:3). In Isaiah God has left Israel for a moment in wrath, but again, although a mother may forget her child, God will never forget or abandon Zion his bride (Is. 49:15). Deuteronomy applies all this pedagogically. God's gracious love is the reason for Israel's election (Dt. 7:7). He has confirmed it by a legal guarantee (7:8), and Israel may thus count on it, but the covenant imposes a demand for faithfulness on Israel's part, so that love can be related to the blessing which is the reward of obedience (Dt. 7:13) in what is close to a contractual sense. Yet the initiative of God's love is strongly stated (Dt. 10: 14ff.), and inner circumcision, not just external performance, is necessary for a proper response to it (Dt. 10:16). The legal implications of God's love are expressly worked out in Malachi relative to the particular problems of that later time (cf. Mal. 1:2).

---

vv. verses

e. God's love for other nations does not find direct expression in the OT. The presentation certainly bears a tendency toward universality, and this comes out clearly in some messianic passages, e.g., Is. 42:5. In context, however, Dt. 33:3 ("all those consecrated to him") does not have a universal sense, while Mal. 2:10 refers to God's creative work rather than his fatherly love. Even messianic universalism is too little developed to affect the main emphasis of God's love in the OT, namely, God's specific love for his people Israel. [G. QUELL, I, 21-35]

B. The Words for Love in Prebiblical Greek.

l. erán. This is the passionate love that desires the other for itself. The god Eros compels all but is compelled by none. In Plato érōs symbolizes fulfilment, in Plotinus desire for union with the one. What is sought in érōs is intoxication or ecstasy. Reflection is good, but ecstatic frenzy, while sometimes viewed with horror, is greater. érōs masters us and confers supreme bliss thereby. Religion seeks the climax of experience in transmuted eroticism (cf. the fertility cults). But érōs can transcend the sensory world. In Plato it issues in creative inspiration. In Aristotle it has (or is) a cosmic function as the force of attraction that maintains orderly movement. In Plotinus it is an impulsion beyond the senses toward the point of coincidence. Even in these forms, however, the original idea is that of erotic intoxication.

*2. phileín. This signifies solicitous love, e.g., of the gods, or of friends. It embraces all humanity and entails obligation.

*3. agapán. This term has neither the magic of erán nor the warmth of phileín. It has first the weak sense "to be satisfied," "to receive," "to greet," "to honor," or, more inwardly, "to seek after." It can carry an element of sympathy, but also denotes "to prefer," especially with reference to the gods. Here is a love that makes distinctions, choosing its objects freely. Hence it is especially the love of a higher for a lower. It is active, not self-seeking love. Yet in the Greek writers the word is colorless. It is often used as a variation for erán or phileín and commands no special discussion. The noun agápē occurs very seldom.

C. Love in Judaism.

1. The Background. The normative Hebrew term 'hb (see A.) covers all three Greek words. But it lacks the element of religious eroticism and denotes a particular, not a universal love. OT love is a jealous love (cf. Song of Songs 8:6). Thus Jacob's love focuses on Rachel and Joseph (Gen. 29; 37:3). Similarly, God loves Israel, but jealously insists on love and loyalty in return. Again, love of neighbor is not cosmopolitan. It does not embrace millions but is love within the nation. The LXX uses agapán almost exclusively for the Hebrew term. This word was best adapted to express what was meant, and received a rich new content from the association.

2. Hellenistic Judaism.

a. The OT influence intermingled here with Greek and Near Eastern thought and language. God loves his creation, his people, and those who are righteous, obedient, and merciful. Love is supremely a relationship of faithfulness (as displayed by martyrs). God is the source of love. Love of God includes love of wisdom (Sir. 4:12). In love we turn to true being, overcome fear, and attain to true life (Philo On the Migration of Abraham 169).

b. Love of neighbor derives from God and leads to life (unlike hatred, which is of the devil and leads to death). In Philo a more general philanthropy is read into the OT; love extends finally to all creation (On Virtues 51ff.). But the movement is still concentric from the compatriot outward by way of the resident alien and proselyte. érōs is unfavorably contrasted with agápē (Sibylline Oracles 3.171).

3. Rabbinic Judaism.

a. Here love is still primarily volitional and religious. It pinpoints the relation between God and humanity, especially Israel. God loves his people with fidelity and mercy. The gift of the law proves this. God's love imposes the obligation of reciprocal love and the related obedience and loyalty. Suffering in particular manifests the mutual love of God and his people. In it God is loved for his own sake. The main stress, however, falls on God's own love. Concealed during suffering, in which it is truly as strong as death, it will finally be gloriously manifest. No one can pluck Israel away from it.

b. Love of neighbor comes to expression in works of mercy. The neighbor is the fellow citizen or proselyte, whether friend or foe. Some, like Hillel, included foreigners, discerning love's missionary force, but others contested this (except for resident aliens). With law and the service of God, love is a foundation of the world. It is the sum of the law as formulated in the negative statement of the Golden Rule (Hillel). Yet it is more than a discharge of duties. It is the power behind all acts of love, and hence it cannot be enforced by legislation.

c. For the rabbis love is the basic principle of the threefold relationship of God, the I, and the Thou. It must determine all dealings within this relationship, or the relationship is broken. As God acts with love, so must we, and by the same token, as we act with love, so will God. A basis is perceived here for assurance of the divine mercy, though not at the expense of the divine righteousness.

D. Jesus.

1. The New Demand.

a. In his demand for love Jesus took up previous sayings: Love God; love neighbor; do unto others as you would have them do unto you. But he did so in a startlingly exclusive and unconditional way. Love of God means total commitment and total trust (Mt. 5:29-30; 6:24ff.). In particular, it involves a renunciation of mammon and of vainglory (Mt. 6:24b, 30ff.). It also calls for resistance to persecution, which is a fiery test of the loyalty of love (Mt. 10:17ff.; 5:10ff.).

b. Love of neighbor accompanies love of God (Mt. 22:39). This is no abstract love of humanity. Nevertheless, it transcends any restriction to compatriots; the neighbor is simply the person in need (Lk. 10:29-30), or rather, the neighbor is the person close at hand who acts in neighborly fashion to the one in need. This action derives from a response of the heart and consists of doing in all sobriety what the occasion requires.

c. Love of neighbor definitely includes love of enemies (Mt. 5:43-44). This love is the demand of a new age pointing to grace and applying to "hearers." It is the love of God's new people which they show not merely to one another but even to those of the present age who persecute them. It is thus totally sacrificial. The martyr becomes an intercessor for the hostile world that imposes martyrdom. Jesus makes this demand with full realism but also with full seriousness.

2. The New Situation.

a. The demand of Jesus is self-evident because he creates a new situation. He proclaims God's mercy as a new event that changes everything. The forgiveness of sins that he brings releases a new and overflowing love (Lk. 7:47) which fills and directs all life and action. God's new relationship to us puts us in a new relationship to him and to one another (cf. Lk. 6:36ff.). This is a relationship of mercy and reconciliation. (In the Synoptics Jesus usually speaks about God's forgiveness or mercy and rarely employs either nouns or verbs for love in relation to God.)

b. In regard to us, God's love is a pardoning love. In regard to Jesus, however, it is the preferential love of election and calling. Jesus is the beloved Son (Mt. 12:5) whose death is an exercise of judgment and the establishment of a new order (12:8ff.). Jesus founds the new community into which we enter through relationship with him. Hence love for others is love for him (Mt. 25:31ff.), and he can call for radical commitment to himself (Mt. 10:37ff.). The Son brings remission, calls for an unconditional decision for God, and thus creates a new people who will tread the way of self-sacrificing love that he himself took. A point of interest is that Mark calls Jesus the beloved Son at the beginning of both his ministry (1:11) and his passion (9:7).

E. The Apostolic Period.

1. Paul.

a. Paul sees the new situation clearly. Thus his argument in Rom. 1ff. climaxes in a hymn which moves on from our love for God to Christ's love for us and then to the assurance of God's love in Christ (8:28, 31ff.). He makes three main points: (1) God sent his Son even to the cross in love; (2) God calls his elect in love; (3) God sheds his love abroad in their hearts. God's eternal love is indistinguishable from Christ's love (Rom. 5:8; 8:37), in which it becomes a world-changing event. This love implies election, which includes both pretemporal ordination and temporal calling. The elect community is in fellowship with God, and he endows it with the active and compelling power of love (Rom. 5:5) in fulfilment of his own primary purpose of love.

b. A new humanity is the goal of God's loving action, and he uses acts of human love to attain this end. God is the source of these acts (cf. 1 Cor. 8:3). He awakens the faith which comes into action in love (Gal. 5:6). He pours forth the Spirit who frees us for loving activity (Gal. 5:22). For Paul this new love is supremely brotherly and sisterly love (Gal. 6:10) in a fellowship that is based on Christ's mercy and Christ's death. Love builds up (1 Cor. 8:1); it builds the work of the future. In it the power of the new age breaks into the present form of the world. This is why it is always central when linked with faith and hope (cf. 1 Th. 1:3; Col. 1:4-5). Love is the greatest of the three because it alone stretches into the future aeon (1 Cor. 13:13).

2. James. James shows in practical fashion what it means that faith works by love, e.g., not despising the poor (2:14), or not withholding rights (5:1ff.). Love is the law of the new kingdom (2:8), demanded and made possible by faith. It holds fast to God in trial and is strong in perseverance (1:2ff.).

3. John. John stresses the love of the Father for the Son (Jn. 3:35). The love of God reaches us through him (Jn. 17:23ff.). The death of the Son crowns and releases it. This is a condescending love, yet it achieves victory in moral action. Our own love is here again supremely a love of the brethren. Love of God is the final reality for the fellowship, and abiding in this love is the law of its life (Jn. 15:9-10). The one law of love is constantly repeated in the Epistles of John with no particular specifications except that it be in deed and not in word only (1 Jn. 3:18). In Revelation the main demand is for a love for God that will not be overthrown by persecution (cf. 2:4; 12:11).

F. The Post-Apostolic Period. Early formulas are handed down here with some infusion of new ideals. 1 Clem. 49-50 demonstrates an ongoing awareness of the supremacy of love and its practical significance for the community and the world. Agápē and agapán have become stock terms for God's work and for Christian piety, sometimes as asceticism, more commonly as community love. In a world perishing through érōs, and vainly trying to transcend itself by sublimations of érōs, the church, being itself totally dependent on the merciful love of God, practices a love that does not desire but gives. [E. STAUFFER, I, 35-55]

→ philéō

Hágar [Hagar]

Hagar, Sarah's maid, is the bondwoman who paradoxically typifies external Judaism (Gal. 4:24-25) in contrast to the freewoman Sarah who typifies the pure Judaism represented by the community. Some rabbis esteemed Hagar for the revelation that God gave her according to Gen. 16:13. She is equated with Sinai either because this is in the land of Ishmael or because of the similarity to the word hajar found in some Sinaitic place names.

angelía [message], angéllō [to announce], anangéllō [to tell], apangéllō [to report], diangéllō [to proclaim], exangéllō [to publish abroad], katangéllō [to proclaim], prokatangéllō [to foretell], katangeleús [herald]

"Message" is an important concept in the NT, and the terms for "to tell," "declare", "proclaim," help us to understand the main word euangelízesthai. They come from public life (the games and government); this suggests already that the gospel proclaims the rule of God. Respect for government results in a sacral evaluation of the messenger. The cult of the human ruler provides a direct antithesis to the divine lordship. A parallel also exists in the sense of mission (Socrates) and in the missionary word of aretalogies.

Expectation of one coming divine messenger may also be found in Hellenism, though Jesus himself will not be called ángelos, since he is above all angels. This expectation is richest in the Mandaean writings, but these are probably post-Christian. Mission is important in the OT too (cf. Isaiah and also the hope of the coming prophet). The difference lies in the content, namely, who sends whom, with what message, and to what end. The NT sums all this up in the name of Jesus. Its emphasis also falls on the act, so that the verbs of sending and telling are more prominent.

angelía.

A. In the NT. This word, rare in the NT, occurs twice in 1 John (John avoids the euangel- group). The reference in 1:5 is to the word of Jesus (the reading epangelía is a mistaken commentary), while 3:11 has in view the command implied in proclamation (epangelía has some support here).

B. Linguistic History. In classical usage the term can mean both "announcement" and "order." The former can cover both the act and the content. In the LXX the reference may be to both good news and bad (Prov. 12:25; 1 Sam. 4:19). Is. 28:9, referring to the prophets, might have influenced 1 Jn. 1:5.

angéllō. The only sure attestation of this in the NT is in Jn. 20:18, where it perhaps has a sacral nuance in the Easter context. Resurrection and proclamation are closely related (Rom. 1:3-4). "Running" is a common feature in secular euangel-, and the word has a religious tone in an ancient Eleusis document announcing the approach of a sacred procession.

anangéllō.

A. Outside the NT. This word is common in the Koine for angéllein (interchangeably with apangéllein). It is used for proclamations of kings, reports of envoys, messages of sorrow, communications of various kinds, and, more weakly, letters, the sense being "to tell." It has a sacral tone in connection with divine festivals and the honoring of divine rulers. It is common in the LXX, often with a religious sense: a. The Lord declares what is to come (Is. 42:9); b. God declares his righteousness, his works, his mercy, and his name to the nations (cf. Pss. 29:10; 63:10; 70:15; 91:3; 95:3; 101:22). In distinction from Hellenism, the OT relates this declaring to God’s action and command, as well as to such specifically Hebrew concepts as righteousness and mercy. The same thoughts occur in Judaism.

B. In the NT. The usage is secular in Mt. 28:11 but religious in Jn. 5:15 and Acts 16:38.

1. Mk. 5:14. The category here is that of miracle stories (cf. Mt. 28:11; Jn. 5:15).

2. Acts 14:27, 15:4 The use here resembles that of the Psalms: the recounting of what God has done. Cf. 2 Cor. 7:7; 1 Pet. 1:12; Rom. 15:21.

3. Acts 19:18. There is a rare use here for the confession of sins.

4. 1 Jn. 1:5. In this verse it is the verb for angelía, which declares the perceptible word of life. In Jn. 16:13-15 the Paraclete declares things to come. In 16:25 Christ in that hour will “tell” plainly of the Father. According to Jn. 4:25 (a reminiscence of Dt. 18:18? or a reference to the coming prophet?) the Messiah will “tell” all things.

apangéllō.

A. Outside the NT. This word has much the same range of meaning as anangéllō, but tends to be more official. Religiously it is used for Hermes, in honors lists, in aretalogies, and with reference to divine mission (Epictetus). It is common in the LXX. Mainly secular, it can also denote God’s message (Is. 44:8) and cultic proclamation, e.g., of God’s might (Pss. 145:4; 71:18).

B. In the NT. Used 25 times in the Lucan writings and 14 times elsewhere, this word occurs

1. in accounts of miracles (e.g., Lk. 8:34, 36, 47; Acts 11:13; 12:14, 17);
2. for God’s message in the narrowest sense (Lk. 7:22; Acts 26:20; 17:30);
3. with reference to Jesus as God’s Messenger (Mt. 12:18; Heb. 2:12).

diangéllō.

A. Outside the NT. Rare in Hellenism, this word can be used for a military pronouncement (Josephus Life 98) or imperial proclamation (Josephus The Jewish War 6.96), or religiously with reference to Hermes and the Pythia. Its use in the LXX is sacral: reporting a miracle (2 Macc. 1:33), announcing the sabbatical year (Lev. 25:9), and demonstrating God’s power (Ex. 9:16).

B. In the NT. Cultic announcement is denoted in Acts 21:26, while declaration of God’s acts is the issue in Rom. 9:17 (quoting Ex. 9:16) and Mk. 5:19. In Lk. 9:60 the disciples are to proclaim God’s eschatological lordship, which begins with the proclamation (cf. Mt. 11:5-6; Lk. 9:26; Mk. 4:2ff.).

exangéllō. This word occurs only in 1 Pet. 2:9 in the sense of “publishing abroad”;, the style is that of aretalogy and there is allusion to Is. 43:21. Historically the word was used in tragedy for imparting something concealed. Religiously it carried the senses of a. publishing conspiracies; b. declaring what is secret (Socrates, Epictetus); c. extolling mighty works (Aesculapius); and d. making official announcements. In the Psalms it has the same sense of cultic declaration as anang- and apangéllō.

kat-*, *prokatangéllō, katangeleús.

A. katangéllō outside the NT. In the secular sphere the term is used for official reports, while in the religious area it announces games and proclaims festivals. Plato has it for philosophical proclamation. The LXX makes no contribution, but Josephus has the word for God’s promise to Abraham and through the prophets.

B. katangéllō in the NT. The word occurs six times in Paul and eleven in Acts. It is always sacral. There is a hint of promise in Acts 3:24, but normally “proclamation” is the meaning. The proclamation is more of acts than of ideas; Jesus has fulfilled what was expected (cf. Acts 4:2; 17:3; 13:38). The language of Acts 26:26 is liturgical. Sometimes there is a missionary thrust, as in Rom. 1:4. Teaching is included (cf.

1 Cor. 11:23; Col. 1:28). This is taken up into the word of the Kýrios and shares the dramatic and eschatological character of the message.

C. prokatangéllō, katangeleús. The verb occurs in the NT only in Acts 3:18 and 7:52. It describes the word of the prophets through whom God himself gives prior intimation. Josephus uses the term with reference to the birth of Moses, the message to Hagar, and Joseph's prediction to the cupbearer. The noun is found in the NT only in Acts 17:18 and carries the sense of "one who proclaims," more as a herald than a teacher. It thus conforms to the general employment of the group. [J. SCHNIEWIND, I, 56-73]

ángelos [messenger, angel], archángelos [archangel], isángelos [like an angel]

ángelos.

A. In the Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. The ángelos is a "messenger." His role is sacral and he is protected by the gods. He delivers the message, answers questions, and asks for a reward (cf. Homer, Sophocles). He may also be an envoy, making treaties and delivering official messages. Birds are often messengers of the gods. So, too, are philosophers (Epictetus).

2. Alongside human messengers are heavenly messengers; Hermes is the most prominent. The underworld, too, has its messengers, e.g., Nemesis, Hecate, and lesser beings.

3. Philosophical religion developed the idea of the lógos, with which Greek thought linked Hermes and Philo the OT angels.

4. Josephus used the word for the ordinary messenger (Antiquities 7.249) but also for the OT angels. He called the angel that met Balaam a "divine spirit" (Antiquities 4.108). But he avoided Essene speculations about angels (The Jewish War 2.142). [W. GRUNDMANN, I, 74-76]

B. mal'āḵ in the OT.

1. Used for both human and angelic messengers, mal'āḵ is often combined with Yahweh to denote a special angelic being: the "angel of the Lord." This angel has a special commission to help and guide Israel or individual Israelites (cf. Ex. 14:19; Num. 22:22; 1 Kgs. 19:7). He is not so much a mere messenger as an instrument of the covenant and personification of divine aid, turning against Israel only in exceptional circumstances (cf. 2 Sam. 24:17). Sometimes (e.g., Gen. 16:7ff.; Ex. 3:2ff.) he is so closely identified with God as to be almost indistinguishable. He is God, as it were, entering human apperception (cf. the alternation in Gen. 21: 17ff.).

2. With the angel of the Lord are other heavenly beings, though these are seldom called angels. Forming God's entourage, they seem to have no autonomous functions and are in no sense objects of worship.

3. Angelology increased after the exile, perhaps under outside influences, or to maintain the divine transcendence. In Job the angels, who are not wholly pure (4:17-18), witness creation (38:7), and help in time of need (5:1). In Ezekiel and Zechariah they are interpreters (Ezek. 40:3ff.). Daniel depicts opposing heavenly forces; Michael is the angel of Israel (Dan. 10:13, 20). Myriads of angels surround God's throne (Dan. 7:10). They are depicted in human form and without wings. Strictly the seraphim and cherubim are not angels (though cf. Is. 6). Demons are not presented as heavenly beings and in view of God's omnipotence have no ultimate religious significance. [G. VON RAD, I, 76-80]

C. The Doctrine of Angels in Judaism.

1. We see here two conflicting trends as developing angelology is opposed by Greek rationalism. The Apocrypha for the most part stays within OT limits. In apocalyptic literature, however, angels mediate the secrets of nature, converse with figures like Enoch, and are grouped more firmly as good and bad angels.

The new teaching became part of popular piety (cf. Tobit), and the rabbis accepted it as an outworking of OT belief.

2. The rabbis could accept angels because angels are not themselves divine but serve to represent God's word and will. They are often introduced to give color to OT stories but without modifying the sense, e.g., at creation or at the giving of the law. They are created and are fully subordinate to God. While they speak for God, and present prayers to him, they do not interfere with the direct relation between the righteous and God.

D. ángelos in the NT.

1. The meaning "human messenger" has only a small role in the NT, being applied to the scouts sent by Joshua (Jms. 2:25), the men sent to Jesus by John (Lk. 7:24), those sent ahead by Jesus (Lk. 9:52), and the Baptist as the messenger of the covenant sent by God (Mt. 11:10 and par.).

2. a. The main NT reference is to angels as divine messengers and heavenly representatives (Heb. 12:22; Acts 6:15; Gal. 4:14). As such, angels appeared to Abraham (Heb. 12:2 and Moses (Acts 7:30) and mediated the law (Acts 7:53); perhaps this showed its inferiority (Gal. 3:19).

b. Since God is directly present in Jesus, it is natural that angels should accompany him at high points in his life and ministry: his birth, temptation, passion, and resurrection (Lk. 2:9ff.; Mk. 1:13; Lk. 22:43; Mt. 28:2). But the angels have no independent role, nor do they command interest for their own sakes. Angels will also come with Christ when he returns as Judge (Lk. 12:8-9; cf. 2 Th. 1:7). In Revelation they figure prominently in the events of the end-time. (Among the rabbis Israel rather than the angels will assist God in the judgment.) Thus the angels take a dynamic part in all the processes of salvation history, and show an interest in individual development within it (Lk. 15:10). Similarly the angel of God, or of the Lord, accompanies the church of God in its mission, acting on the apostles' behalf (Acts 5:19; 12:7ff.), showing them God's will (8:26; 10:3ff.), and punishing their enemies (12:23).

c. In the NT Christ is plainly not one of the angels but is superior to them (Mk. 13:32; Heb. 1:4ff.). If he was made lower than the angels, this merely emphasizes the superiority of his commission (Heb. 2:5ff). In the same vein Paul attaches little importance to angels. As an apostle he is not under orders from angels (Gal. 1:8). Even the tongues of angels are nothing without love (1 Cor. 13:1). As 1 Pet. 1:12 puts it, angels long to look into the gospel; it was not for them but for us that Christ died (Heb. 2:16).

3. In Col. 2:18 there is a strong condemnation of any cult of angels. When angels are divorced from God, they must be reckoned among the hostile forces that threaten us (Rom. 8:38), i.e., as elemental or natural angels that might become demonic. Paul does not contest the reality of these but insists on their subjection to Christ (1 Cor. 15:24) and claims the believer's participation in his eschatological victory (Rom. 8:38).

4. Fallen angels → daímōn.

5. The idea of guardian angels is taken over from Judaism. Acts 12:15 assumes a resemblance between the angel and the person. In Mt. 18:10 the angels remind us that little ones are important to God and should be to us. The reference in 1 Cor. 11:10 might be to erotic desires of angels but is more probably to the propriety they require. In Rev. 1:20 and 2-3 the angels of the churches could be bishops but in context are more likely supporting angels, especially since bishops were not exalted above the churches in NT days.

archángelos. The idea of archangels is connected with the singling out of individual angels. Josh. 5:14 mentions a captain or commander of the Lord's army. Michael is a chief prince or angel in Dan. 10:13; 12:1. Later we read of four, six, or seven special angels. The LXX does not use the term archángelos but

---

i.e. id est, that is

Philo has it for the lógos. The NT shows no great interest in the theme. 1 Th. 4:16 says that the call of the archangel will ring out at Christ's coming, and Jude 9 identifies Michael as an archangel.

isángelos. This rare word occurs in the NT only in Lk. 20:36. In the resurrection we shall be "like the angels," knowing neither mortality nor marriage (cf. Mt. 22:30; Mk. 12:25). [G. KITTEL, I, 80-87]

agenealógētos → geneá

hágios [holy], hagiázō [to make holy, sanctify], hagiasmós [sanctification], hagiótēs [sanctification], hagiōsýnē [sanctification]

In biblical Greek the hag- family, which embraces the hagnós group, is most extensive and enjoys a very significant history.

hágios.

A. In Greek and Hellenlstic Writings. The old Greek term hágos denotes an object of awe, the adjective hagḗs means "clean," and the verb házō has the sense "to shrink from." hágios is used of sanctuaries ("sacred") and later of gods and religious practices, though it becomes common only in the Hellenistic period.

B. The Use of Holiness in the OT. Originally Canaanitic, the root qds has a basic cultic reference. The ground around the burning bush is holy (Ex. 3:5), as are Gilgal (Josh. 5:15), the temple (Is. 64:10), days (Is. 58:13), offerings (1 Sam. 21:5-7), and tithes (Dt. 26:13). The adjective may be applied to persons and even to God; this produces an ethical association. The verb is versatile, denoting the expressing of a state of holiness (Is. 5:16), or setting in a state of holiness (Ezek. 36:23), or declaring holy (Ex. 19:10), or entering a state of holiness (Josh. 3:5), or being dedicated.

C. The History of the Term in the OT.

1. Preprophetic Period. The word comes to be connected with God's name, which is the expression of his nature, and thus takes on a moral meaning (cf. Am. 4:2). Profaning God's name even cultically is a sin (cf. Lev. 20:3; Am. 2:7). The name, which cultic invocation acknowledges, gives holiness a personal dimension. But it also fuses it with divinity in contrast to creatureliness. God's holiness expresses his divine perfection. His self-revelation is his self-sanctification (Lev. 10:3 etc.). As God, however, dwells among his people through the covenant at Sinai (Ex. 24:4ff.), Israel is to be a people holy to him (Dt. 7:6). She must shun other cults and worship God alone (Dt. 6:4), allowing no place for pagan shrines and their cultic licentiousness (Dt. 23:18). Cultic purity demands personal purity. The ark as the place of God's presence fills the sanctuary with holiness; in connection with it God is called the "holy God" (1 Sam. 6:20). War and warriors are sanctified through the ark's presence (Num. 10:35-36), as is the camp (Dt. 23:15).

2. Prophetic Theology.

a. The prophet Hosea develops a contrast between the holy God and sinful humanity (cf. Hos. 11:9). Israel has followed pagan cults and thus come into collision with the holy God (14:1). But by destroying false holiness the holy God gives new life (14:8) in his inconceivable love; thus love is incorporated into the divine holiness even in its opposition to unholy human nature.

b. For Isaiah the holiness of God is his secret essence. This evokes holy awe (Is. 6), a sense of moral uncleanness which must be purged (6:7). God himself effects the atonement. Its goal is that the redeemed, too, will be holy (4:3). Though Israel is in herself unholy, God has bound himself to her. He may thus be called the "Holy One of Israel." His holiness consumes what is unholy, but in grace he establishes a remnant as his holy people.

c. In the later chapters of Isaiah the Holy One of Israel is more fully manifested as the God of redemption rather than judgment. God is incomparable (40:25). In his holiness lies his mystery (45:15). This mystery is redemption; hence salvation and holiness are now firmly related (45:18ff. etc.). God's holy ways differ from ours, but for this very reason his holiness issues in a new creation.

3. The Postexilic Period.

a. Two intermingling streams may be seen here, the priestly-cultic and the prophetic-ethical. The law enshrines the former; it endows priests and people with cultic holiness. The Psalms belong to this sphere, but show that it could include a strong spiritual element. Israel is holy because the Holy Spirit is present within her (cf. Ps. 51:11).

b. The apocryphal writings maintain the cultic tradition with frequent references to the holy city, temple, altar, sabbath, garments, candlestick, oil, swords, books, priesthood, people, and covenant. But God, heaven, the angels, and the Spirit are also holy. The LXX translators, in choosing the Gk. hágios for the Hebrew term, seem to have tried to give it a distinctive Hebrew nuance, e.g., by using tó hágion or tá hágia for the temple and avoiding hierón.

4. Philo and Josephus. Philo adopts the cultic usage of the OT but allegorizes it. In so doing he relates holiness to alien philosophical concepts, e.g., when he calls heaven (the macrocosm), or the mind (the microcosm), or the soul "holy" (largely in the sense of "lofty"). Josephus uses hágios sparingly (e.g., in describing the cultus), applying it most often to the temple (also the land). He adopts this course out of consideration for readers to whom hágios etc. must have sounded strange. [D. PROCKSCH, I, 88-97]

D. The Concept of Holiness in Rabbinic Judaism.

a. The rabbis follow OT usage in calling the temple, priests, sacrifices, etc. holy, but with no precise definition. Sometimes systematization is attempted. In a new use the hair of Nazirites and the body can be called holy. "To dedicate to oneself a wife" is a phrase for "to marry."

b. God is holy as Judge and King. But he is known as such by those who draw near in a trust sustained by fear. He is thus the Holy One in Sirach, Enoch, and later rabbinic texts. God's Spirit is also called holy, but above all his name, which led to the replacement of the proper name as well as to the expression "to hallow the name" with God or Israel as subject. Hallowing the name by keeping the law became a chief motive of ethical action.

c. Scripture is holy as God's word, especially the law, though the phrase "Holy Scripture" is infrequent. Reading Scripture is a sacred action. The scrolls, too, are sacred, and writing them is a holy task. The hands must be washed after touching the scrolls.

d. Those who keep the law, and the righteous of the OT, are also holy. Holiness consists negatively of separation, i.e., from the Gentiles, from sin, and especially from licentiousness, so that holy and chaste came to be largely synonymous. [K. G. KUHN, I, 97-100]

E. hágios in the NT.

l. The Holiness of God. On an OT basis, holiness is here seen to be God's innermost nature (Rev. 4:8). It embraces omnipotence, eternity, and glory, and evokes awe. In John, God is the holy Father (17:11). The holy God calls for holy people (1 Pet. 1:15-16). God's name, i.e., his revealed but distinct person, is to be hallowed (Mt. 6:9; Lk. 11:12).

*2. Jesus Christ as hágios. Jesus is seldom called holy (cf. Mk. 1:24; Lk. 1:35; Jn. 6:69; Rev. 3:7; Acts 3:14). But the description is ancient and significant. In Luke it rests on the virgin birth and his being a bearer of the Spirit, confronting evil spirits and inaugurating the pneumatic age. He is confessed as the holy one in Jn. 6:69, sanctified by God and dispensing anointing with the Spirit. In Revelation he has the same predicates of holiness and truth as God. As the holy servant in Acts he has a cultic mission as the holy sacrifice offered vicariously for others. In Hebrews he is priest as well as victim, going into the antitype of the holy of holies for us and achieving our expiatory sanctification (hagiázein) (9:25ff.; 2:11; 9:13).

3. The Holy Spirit.

a. The Spirit's holiness is inseparable from Christ's.

b. The Spirit is active at the birth and especially the baptism of Christ, which initiates the age of the Spirit. After the resurrection Christ imparts the Spirit to the disciples (Pentecost). The Spirit is now manifest, so that resistance is unforgivable. Baptism is now in the Spirit's name as well as the Father's and the Son's.

c. Luke especially likes the phrase "holy Spirit" in both the definite and indefinite form. He wants to distinguish God's Spirit from other spirits and stresses the charismatic rather than the cultic element.

d. Paul has a more personal emphasis and maintains but spiritualizes the cultic aspect, e.g., the church or Christians as a holy temple indwelt by the Spirit (Eph. 2:21; 1 Cor. 6:19; cf. Rom. 15:16; 2 Cor. 13:13; 1 Th. 4:8). Baptism and the eucharist (1 Cor. 12:13) are signs of the cultic community denoting its fellowship with Christ's death and resurrection.

4. The Holiness of the ekklēsía. Again on an OT basis, the Christian fellowship is holy as a temple of the Spirit centered on Christ as the holy servant. As a holy people, Christians are to be holy (1 Pet. 2:9; 1:16). They are sanctified by Christ (1 Cor. 1:2). In him Gentiles are now numbered among the saints (Eph. 2:19). The churches as well as the church are holy (1 Cor. 14:33). Holiness is by the calling of grace in Christ (Rom. 1:6; 1 Cor. 1:24; Phil. 1:1), not by nature. The holy people has a divine inheritance (Eph. 1:18; Col. 1:12; cf. Deuteronomy).

5. The Holy Life of Christians. Christians are to offer themselves as holy sacrifices (Rom. 12:1). As a result the cultic impinges on the ethical, and purity is stressed (cf. Mt. 5:8). The mutual service of love gives expression to this (Gal. 5:13; Rom. 15:25; 16:2). The holy kiss seals it (1 Cor. 16:20). Those sanctified in Christ sanctify their family circles (1 Cor. 7:14). Holiness here has a moral content and stands opposed to impurity, especially in Gentile sexuality (Acts 10:14; Eph. 5:5). Its cultic reference keeps it from being mere morality. Holiness in this sense is a principle of judgment (1 Cor. 6:2). Believers will judge—hence faith may itself be called holy (Jude 20).

6. The Ecclesia triumphans.

a. The holy angels belong to the church triumphant (Mk. 8:38 etc.); they will return with Christ (cf. 1 Th. 3:13, though this verse may refer to, or include, departed saints, cf. 2 Th. 1:10).

b. Christians also belong to it as the saints (Rev. 14:12; 17:6). The holy will be holy still (Rev. 22:11)—not self-sanctified, but sanctified by God. Holiness is a central determination of Christians as already they worship God, reconciled by Christ's holy offering and constituted the temples of the Holy Spirit.

hagiázō. This is mostly a biblical term and means "to consecrate" or "to sanctify." God is asked to sanctify his name (Mt. 6:9). Jesus sanctifies himself (Jn. 17:19) and his church (Eph. 5:26)—a divine work. The Father sanctifies Christ (Jn. 10:36; cf. 17:19) with a view to sanctifying the disciples (17:19). The latter takes place through Christ's reconciling work (Heb. 2:11; 10:10). For Paul we are thus "the sanctified" (1 Cor. 1:2), and this is a state (1 Cor. 6:11). The sanctified have an inheritance (Acts 20:32). They are to sanctify Christ in their hearts (1 Pet. 3:15), being holy in conduct as Christ makes them holy by indwelling them (1:16).

hagiasmós. Deriving from the verb, this term means "sanctifying." It is rare in the LXX and occurs in the NT only in the epistles. Only a holy person can "sanctify," so divine sanctifying precedes any process of sanctifying (cf. Rev. 22:11). It is God's will (1 Th. 4:3) and finds expression in life (4:4). The body must be yielded to sanctification (Rom. 6:19). Christ and the Spirit effect it (1 Cor. 1:30; 2 Th. 2:13; 1 Pet. 1:2).

It implies conduct in 1 Tim. 2:15 and is a moral goal in Heb. 12:14. It is thus the moral result of Christ's atoning work.

hagiótēs. This word denotes "sanctification." It is an essential attribute of God that we are to share (Heb. 12:10; cf. 1 Pet. 1:15). In 2 Cor. 1:12 the link with "sincerity" causes difficulty if both refer to God; hence some prefer the reading "simplicity and sincerity," which would confine hagiótēs to Hebrews.

hagiōsýnē. This rare word denotes sanctifying as a quality. In the NT only Paul uses it (Rom. 1:4; 2 Cor. 7:1; 1 Th. 3:13). In Rom. 1:4 it refers to a different principle of life from that of "the flesh" (v. 3), i.e., divine, not natural. In 2 Cor. 7:1 and 1 Th. 3:13 the divinely effected condition is to find completion in moral dedication in the form of purity. [O. PROCKSCH, I, 100-115]

agnoéō [to be ignorant], agnóēma [ignorance, error], ágnoia [ignorance], agnōsía [ignorance], ágnōstos [unknown]

agnoéō, agnóēma. Used with all the nuances of knowledge, these words denote "being mistaken" or "in error" as the character of action (cf. 1 Tim. 1:13). Ignorance of self is meant in Heb. 5:2. "Not recognizing" in 1 Cor. 14:38 means rejection ("not being recognized" by God). Not knowing God is meant in Rom. 10:3, and Christ in 1 Tim. 1:13. This ignorance entails disobedience (Rom. 10:3); hence it is not just pardonable lack of information but a failure to understand that needs forgiveness.

ágnoia, agnōsía.

1. Philosophical and Legal Usage. ágnoia, while used of specific ignorance, could also denote ignorance in general as the opposite of wisdom as well as knowledge (cf. Stoicism). Ignorance of self and of God (also of evil) would be included, so that ignorance itself would then be the true evil. In legal usage ignorance of the law is the main point; cf. Lev. 22:14 in the LXX (extended to "unintentional sin" in Lev. 5:18). Philo opposes ágnoia to epistēmē (cf., e.g., On Drunkenness 154-61). ágnoia can also be equated with heathenism (Wis. 14:22; Josephus Antiquities 10.142). Among the rabbis knowledge of the law is a presupposition of piety. The legal use recurs in Hermas Similitudes 5.7.3. "In ignorance" is used in the NT only in Acts 3:17; the idea of ignorance of God may be found in Acts 17:30; cf. Eph. 4:17-18; Ignatius Ephesians 19.3; Justin Apology 61.10. ágnōsía (Job 35:16 LXX; 1 Pet. 2:15) has the same force as ágnoia.

2. The Dualistic Usage of Hellenism. Both words occur in Gnosticism for lack of the knowledge essential to salvation. We suffer from this prior to revelation and through bondage to the senses. The NT adopts this usage (cf. Acts 17:30 etc.) but with different ideas of sin and grace.

ágnōstos. Found in the NT only in Acts 17:23, this word denotes "unknown" or "unrecognized." The phrase "unknown God" does not occur in the OT, though the heathen do not know God (Ps. 79:6) and Israel does not know other gods (Hos. 13:4). The rabbis think the Gentiles have some knowledge of God but call God's ways unknown. Neither the Greek nor the Jewish world believes God is unknowable, though Plato thinks he is inaccessible to the senses. An altar to the unknown God would simply imply uncertainty as to the god to which it should apply. Scepticism, of course, questions all knowledge, and Gnosticism thinks God can be known only supernaturally, but Socrates, Aristotle, and the Stoics accept God's knowability. [R. BULTMANN, I, 115-21] hagnós [pure], hagnízō [to purify], hagneía [purity], hagnótēs [purity], hagnismós [purification]

---

v. verse

hagnós. Originally meaning "what awakens awe," this word for "pure" is used cultically in the LXX (2 Macc. 13:8), though also for the inner disposition (Prov. 20:9) and for chastity (4 Macc. 18:7-8). Uncommon in the NT, it signifies "moral purity" (1 Jn. 3:3; 1 Tim. 5:22; Jms. 3:17), "innocence" (2 Cor. 7:11), and "chastity" (2 Cor. 11:2).

hagnízō. Used in the LXX for "cultic qualification," this term occurs in Jn. 11:55 and Acts 21:24; 24:18 for cultic purifying as practiced by Jews and Jewish Christians. It can then relate to moral purifying, as in Jms. 4:8; 1 Pet. 1:22; 1 Jn. 3:3.

hagneía. This denotes cultic purity in the OT, moral purity in 1 Tim. 4:12; 5:2.

hagnótēs. This term, not used in classical Greek or the LXX, denotes moral purity in 2 Cor. 6:6.

hagnismós. This word signifies cultic purification (Num. 8:7) or dedication (Num. 5:5) in connection with a vow (Acts 21:26). [F. HAUCK, I, 122-24]

agorázō [to buy, redeem], exagorázō [to redeem]

A. The Sacral Manumission of Slaves. As on Delphic inscriptions, this is a legal form of self-manumission whereby the god purchases the slave, using the slave's own money for the transaction. There was no sacral redemption in the OT temple, but manumission took place in the synagogue and church, and the Jewish world applied the idea of redemption religiously.

B. agorázō.

1. Meaning "to buy," this word is used by Paul in 1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23 to signify our being redeemed (and therefore free except in relation to God). In Rev. 5:9 the Lamb has bought us for God with his blood.

2. According to Rev. 3:18 real instead of sham gold is to be bought, i.e., from Christ.

C. exagorázō.

1. Not used in the LXX, this term refers in the NT to Christ's redeeming work, the stress now being on purchase to freedom from the law (Gal. 4:1ff.). God, of course, pays the price himself in Christ, meeting the law's claim and thus giving true freedom through justification by faith (Gal. 3:24-25). Redemption is needed because the law is God's holy ordinance and eternally valid. Hence in the transition to freedom sinfulness is exposed and forgiveness is experienced in Christ. Yet redemption is not a transactional "buying" of God's favor. While Christ undoubtedly obeys and serves God, God himself acts in him on our behalf and toward us. Hence redemption is not to be severed from the "we" who by it are put back in fellowship with God by faith.

2. The word means "to buy up" in Eph. 5:16; Col. 4:5, i.e., "make the most" of the time (kairós), or the opportunities it offers. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 124-28]

agrypnéō → egeírō, grēgoréō

agōgḗ [manner of life], parágō [to pass by], proágō [to precede], proságō [to approach], prosagōgé [access] agōgḗ. Used only in 2 Tim. 3:10, this word denotes "orientation," hence "manner of life." In ordinary parlance the word came to have special reference to education or its results, i.e., breeding, behavior. This may well be the background of the use in 2 Tim. 3:10 (cf. "ways" in I Cor. 4:17).

parágō. This is found only intransitively in the NT, e.g., in Mt. 9:9, mostly with reference to Jesus "passing by" (perhaps sometimes introductory, e.g., in Mk. 1:16). The sense in 1 Cor. 7:31 (cf. 1 Jn. 2:17) is “to pass away” (cf. Mt. 5:18). The present tense shows that the great eschatological change is already taking place. If schḗma means “role,” the idea would be that its “part” is played.

proágō. Used both transitively and intransitively, this refers to Christ’s “preceding” (Mk. 10:32) and to the preceding of prophecy (1 Tim. 1:18) and the commandment (Heb. 7:18. The sense may just be chronological in the two latter cases, while Christ obviously demands “following” or discipleship. In 2 Jn. 9 “going astray” is a suggested alternative, but perhaps the opponents thought of themselves as “go-aheads” or progressives (cf. 1 Cor. 4:6).

proságō. This is used transitively three times and intransitively once. The main interest arises with the cultic use in 1 Pet. 3:18. a. A general meaning is “to offer,” “to sacrifice,” in both secular Greek and the LXX (cf. Ex. 29:20). Yet Num 8:9-10 etc. suggest the more specific sense of “presenting for dedication.” b. There is also a legal use, e.g., in Ex. 21:6; Acts 16:20 (bringing for judgment); the suggestion here is that Christ leads us to the judgment which is also grace. This merges into the ceremonial sense of “presenting” at court. c. Since God takes the initiative in all this, another idea is that God “brings” us to his side, i.e., reconciles us (cf. Num. 16:5). d. These meanings are not contradictory or artificially read in, but point to the richness of God’s saving work, which can be grasped only as different aspects are set alongside or superimposed.

prosagōgḗ. Found three times (Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:18; 3:12), this word has the same range as proságein, but some take it transitively as “introduction,” others intransitively as “approach.” In Christ, however, this is immaterial, since we “move toward” God as we are “led.” “access” is perhaps the best rendering so long as we recall that Christ himself is our access (the door, Jn. 10). [K. L. SCHMIDT, I, 128-34]

agṓn [conflict, fight], agōnízomai [to fight], antagōnízomai [to strive against], epagōnízomai [to contend], katagōnízomai [to subdue], agōnía [conflict]

This group, rare in the LXX and NT, is used frequently in relation to the stadium.

agṓn, agōnizomai, etc.

A. Hellenistic Usage.

a. agṓn means place of assembly, then place of contest, then contest, then conflict. It is often applied figuratively to life as a struggle with a prize (Plutarch, Philo; Wis. 4:2). agōnízomai means “to carry on a conflict, contest, debate, or legal suit,” and can also be figurative.

b. The imagery of the contest also occurs in Hellenistic Judaism, e.g., in Philo On Husbandry 112; cf. the martyrs in 4 Macc. 17:10ff. and Job in Test. Job 4 and 27.

B. agṓn, agōnízomai in the NT.

a. Striving for the goal is the first thought here (Lk. 13:24). Exertion (1 Th. 2:2) and a concentration of forces (Col. 1:29; cf. 2 Tim. 4:7-8) are both necessary.

b. Striving also calls for denial (1 Cor. 9:25), the setting aside of provisional ends (1 Cor. 9:27). This is not asceticism but athletic discipline (2 Tim. 4:5). It is not contempt for the world but a right ordering of priorities.

c. Little reference is made to antagonists, but obstacles and dangers have to be faced (cf. 1 Th. 2:2; 2 Cor. 7:5; Jude 3).

d. Martyrdom is the final conflict (cf. 2 Tim. 4:6; Heb. 10ff.)

e. The goal is not just our salvation but that of others too (Col. 1:29-30). Paul struggles “for” the church (Col. 2:1-2; cf. 4:12-13). Prayer is crucial here (Col. 4; Rom. 15). So is unity in the Spirit (Phil. 1:27ff.).

The gospel brings conflict to the entire Christian life, but as we pray and stand together the sign of the cross is a sign of victory.

C. agṓn, agōnízomai in the Early Church. Pauline ideas recur in 1 Clement. Barnabas summons us to conflict (4.11). 2 Clement depicts the contest in the arena (7). Martyrdom and asceticism are later the leading forms of conflict, especially martyrdom (Tertullian To the Martyrs 3).

agōnía. This word means "conflict," "tension," "focusing of powers." In Lk. 22:44 it denotes concern for victory before the decisive struggle (cf. Lk. 12:49-50).

→ athléō [E. STAUFFER, I, 134-40]

Adám [Adam]

A. Early Christian Usage.

I. Adam as the First Man. 1 Tim. 2:13-14 appeals to Adam as the first man when arguing for a right man/woman relation on the grounds that Adam was made first and Eve was deceived first.

2. The NT typology Adam/Christ. Adam is Christ's antitype in Mk. 1:13; Rom. 5:12-21; 1 Cor. 15:22, 45-49. In Mk. 1:13 Christ reverses Adam's fall and reopens paradise (cf. the genealogy in Lk. 3:38). Paul uses the typology to show the universality of grace (Rom. 5:12-21), to establish the certainty of resurrection (1 Cor. 15:22), and to indicate that we will have spiritual bodies (1 Cor. 15:44ff.; cf. Gen. 2:7 LXX). With respect to our earthly bodies we are like the first Adam, with respect to our resurrection bodies we will be like the last Adam (1 Cor. 15:48).

B. The Origin of the Typology Adam/Christ. The rabbis do not call the Redeemer the last Adam, but the ideas occur that the first man was ideal, that the Messiah will restore the glory lost at the fall, and that the Messiah is preexistent (cf. Philo). Paul adopts these ideas but gives them an eschatological thrust: Adam is the head of this aeon, but Christ is at the head of the new aeon of God's perfect and redeemed creation.

→ huiós toú anthrṓpou [J. JEREMIAS, I, 141-43]

adelphós [brother], adelphḗ [sister], adelphótēs [brotherhood], philádelphos [love of the brethren], philadelphía [brotherly love], pseudádelphos [false brethren]

1. Physical Brotherhood. There are references to the physical brothers of Judah in Mt. 1:2, to brothers among the disciples in Mk. 1:16, 19, to the brother of Mary and Martha in Jn. 11:2ff., to Paul's sister in Acts 23:16, to brothers of Jesus in Mk. 3:31ff., and to various other brothers, e.g., in Mk. 12:19-20; Lk. 15:27; Lk. 16:28; Lk. 12:13; and Mk. 10:29-30.

*2. Spiritual Brotherhood. adelphós also refers to fellow believers some 30 times in Acts and 130 in Paul. This usage has an OT and Jewish basis (cf. Acts 3:22; Mt. 5:22-23; Acts 2:29; 3:17, etc.). Jesus uses the term in Mt. 23:8; 25:40. Christians are his brethren (Rom. 8:29) and are to love one another as such (1 Jn. 2-3). adelphótēs denotes the brotherhood (1 Pet. 2:17) and means brotherly disposition in Hermas (Mandates 8.10). [H. VON SODEN, I, 144-46]

hádēs [Hades]

A. hádēs in Later Judaism.

a. Used for the Hebrew Sheol, the realm of the dead, this term came to denote the place of temporary sojourn prior to resurrection (cf. Is. 26:19).

b. In this place the good were then seen to be separated from the bad (Eth. En. 22; cf. Lk. 16:23, 26).

c. The good were finally thought to be already in bliss (Lk. 16:9, 23ff.).

B. hádēs in the NT.

1. The Link with Judaism. The NT view is close to that of Judaism (cf. Lk. 16). a. There is no soul-sleep. b. One goes down into Hades (Mt. 11:23; 12:40). c. The stay is limited (Rev. 20:13). Sometimes all the dead seem to be in Hades (Acts 2:27), but elsewhere believers are in paradise (Lk. 16:9, 23ff.), or with the Lord (2 Cor. 5:8), or under the altar (Rev. 7:9). Hence Hades is sometimes just the abode of the wicked (Lk. 16:23; Rev. 20:13-14).

2. The Early Christian Reconstruction. Faith in the risen Lord gives assurance that believers are secure from Hades (Mt. 16:18) and go to be with Christ (Lk. 23:43). Jesus is the Lord of Hades (Mt. 16:18; Acts 2:31). The descent shows this. Distinctive here is that Christ preaches in Hades (1 Pet. 3: 19ff.) and that he has the keys of death and Hades (Rev. 1:18).

→ ábyssos [J. JEREMIAS, I, 146-49]

adiákritos* → *krínō

ádikos [unrighteous], adikía [unrighteousness], adikéō [to do wrong], adíkēma [wrongdoing]

ádikos.

A. The Development of the Concept ádikos.

1. The term means "violator of the law." What is against custom is usually distinguished from what is impious. The rootage in law forms a link with the LXX.

2. Yet ádikos can have a religious connotation, too (Plato Laws 4.716d). The OT strengthens this aspect in the Jewish and Christian spheres (cf. Job 16:12 LXX), which makes ádikos a synonym of asebḗs.

B. The Special Use of ádikos, especially in the NT.

1. The NT adopts the OT reference to the "violation of divine law," opposing the wicked to the righteous (cf. Mt. 5:45; Acts 24:15; 1 Cor. 6:1, 9; 2 Pet. 2:9).

2. The word can also mean "unjust" (rulers; God is not unjust [Rom. 3:5]), and "dishonest" (Lk. 16:10), i.e., unfaithful.

3. The reference can be to what is unlawfully gained (Lk. 16:9), or what is of purely illusory value (Lk. 16:11; used with mammon).

4. ádikos in 1 Pet. 2:19 means "unjustly".

5. tó ádikon in the neuter is the opposite of tó díkaion or alētheia.

adikía.

A. adikía outside the NT.

1. The meaning is "unrighteous action," then "unjust act."

2. Further definition is given by the element of lawlessness, the opposing to righteousness, and the opposing to truth or truthfulness.

3. Distinction is made from what is impious, but there is an association, and in the OT adikía is primarily "sin against God" (cf. Is. 43:24-25; Jer. 31:33), though it may be "dishonesty," "injustice," "unreliability," or "apostasy."

4. In apocalyptic the last time will be one of general adikía, "unrighteousness."

5. adikía may be used in the genitive for an adjective (cf. Lk. 16:8; 18:6).

B. adikía in the NT.

1. Apart from 2 Cor. 12:13, the instances all give the term basic significance.

a. As the opposite of dikaiosýnē, it denotes "violation of the divine law," heading the list of vices in Rom. 1:29. It also means "legal injustice" (Rom. 9:14). It can have, too, the nuance of "unfaithfulness" (Rom. 3:5). In Rom. 6:13 it is a controlling force.

b. As the opposite of alḗtheia, it is linked with self-glory in Jn. 7:18. Delight in it is contrasted with believing the gospel (2 Th. 2:12). Love obeys the truth and hence finds no joy in adikía (1 Cor. 13:6). In it the truth is suppressed (Rom. 1:18). It involves a denial of correct doctrine (2 Tim. 2:19).

2. a. adikía is connected with asébeia in Rom. 1; it arises out of false worship, the distinction between law and religion being thus transcended.

b. It is defined as sin against God (cf. Acts 8:23; 1 Jn. 1:9; 5:17).

3. An eschatological reference may be seen in 2 Th. 2:10 and possibly Jms. 3:6; Acts 1:18; 2 Pet. 2:13, 15.

4. The genitive occurs for an adjective in Lk. 16:8; 18:6. Lk. 16:9 perhaps means, not that possessions as such are evil, but that they are gained by trickery (cf. the publicans), or that they are illusory and deceitful.

adikéō.

A. adikéō outside the NT.

1. "To do wrong," "to be in the wrong, or mistaken," is the general sense.

2. Relationship to God or the gods may be in view. In the LXX, then, it means "to sin against God" (e.g., 2 Sam. 24:17; 2 Chr. 26:16), sometimes synonymous with hamartánein and anomeín. Josephus has a similar usage (Antiquities 4.150; 6.151); so does Philo (On the Confusion of Tongues 9-10, 27).

3. The wrongdoing may also be toward others (cf. Gen. 42:22), but in the LXX it is still a breaking of God's command.

4. It may be used with an accusative of object, or person, or both, or passively for suffering wrong or injury or damage.

B. adikéō in the NT.

a. The absolute use in the active occurs in 2 Cor. 7:12 ("to do wrong") and in Acts 25:11 ("to be in the wrong"). Judgment for it is held up to view in Col. 3:25.

b. The accusative of person may be seen in Mt. 20:13 and Lk. 10:19. Acts 7:26 echoes Ex. 2:13. In 2 Cor. 7:2 it is a question of hurting in some way; cf. the power of locusts to inflict injury in Rev. 9:10.

c. Revelation often has the accusative of object for judgments on the cosmos (e.g., 7:2-3; 9:4, 19).

d. For the double accusative cf. Acts 25:10; Gal. 4:12; Phlm. 18, and perhaps Lk. 10:19.

e. Examples of the passive are Acts 7:24; 1 Cor. 6:7.

In general adikeín is not a strongly nuanced term in the NT, being largely replaced by hamartánein.

adíkēma.

A. adíkēma outside the NT. The meaning is "act of wrongdoing." Not common in the LXX, it most frequently means "breach of the law" or "sin against God" (cf. Is. 59:12; Jer. 16:17). It is more common in Josephus and Philo, usually with a sense of action against divine as well as human law.

B. adíkēma in the NT. The three examples in the NT conform to the use of adikéō. In Rev. 18:5 the plural stresses the abundance of wicked deeds. Violation of the Jewish law is meant in Acts 24:20, criminal violation of Roman law in Acts 18:14. [G. SCHRENK, I, 149-63]

adókimos* → dókimos; adýnatos, adynatéō → *dýnamai

ádō [to sing], ōdḗ [song]

ádō. "To sing" is either transitive or intransitive; thus in the NT Rev. 5:9 has "sing a song" and Eph. 5:19 "sing to the Lord." Parallels are légein in Rev. 5:13 and psállèn in Eph. 5:19.

ōdḗ (→ psalmós, hýmnos). a. "Song," or b. "a song," not distinguished precisely in the NT (as later) from psalmós or hýmnos.

The ode is a cultic song of the community sung in worship. It is "spiritual," i.e., has a measure of inspiration (Eph. 5:19). Hence it is not an expression of personal feeling or experience but a "word of Christ" (Col. 3:16). It thus speaks about Christ or God's saving acts in him. It does so for edification rather than evangelism. The "new song" of Revelation (e.g., 5:9) suggests eschatological fulfilment: God's new work is the theme. [H. SCHLIER, I, 163-65]

ázymos* → *zýmē

aḗr [air]

For the Greeks the impure air extended to the moon, being then replaced by the pure ether of the starry regions. Spirits inhabited the air. Later Judaism located demons in it, and Paul could thus refer to a prince of the power of the air (Eph. 2:2). Believers will meet Christ in this middle sphere (1 Th. 4:17). "Speaking into the air" in 1 Cor. 14:9 is a proverbial expression, while "beating the air" in 1 Cor. 9:26 is either engaging in a sham fight or striking aimlessly. [W. FOERSTER, I, 165-66]

athanasía* → *thánatos

athémitos [unlawful]

In extra- and post-Attic Greek, "contrary to statute," either cultic or moral and religious. "Lawless" idolatry is a pagan evil in 1 Pet. 4:3. In Acts 10:28 Peter is shown that it is right to do what was previously "unlawful" for him as a Jew, i.e., associate with Gentiles. [A. OEPKE, I, 166]

átheos* → *theós

áthesmos [lawless]

Originally "illegal" or "impious," of acts, foods, persons. In the NT it is used only as a noun and only in 2 Pet. 2:7 (the Sodomites); 3:17 (heretical leaders). [A. OEPKE, I, 167]

athetéō* → *títhēmi athléō [to strive], synathléō [to strive side by side], áthlēsis [fight] athléō means literally "to engage in competition or conflict"; it is also used figuratively in 4 Maccabees. athléō in 2 Tim. 2:5 suggests the need for exertion, sacrifice, and discipline. synathléō in Phil. 1:27; 4:3 carries the idea of striving, suffering, and working together. áthlēsis in Heb. 10:32-33 evokes the image of public struggle in the arena. athlētēs is used by Ignatius (To Polycarp 1.3) and 1 Clement (5.1) for leaders and the apostles, while Christ is the supreme athlētḗs in Acts of Thomas 39.

→ agón [E. STAUFFER, I, 167-68]

aídios [eternal]

aídios as “everlasting” or “eternal” was common in Aristotle and important to Philo (for God). Rom. 1:20 recalls Philo (and Stoicism) when speaking of God’s “eternal” power. Jude 6 (“eternal chains”) is the only other instance in the NT. Josephus has the same word for John’s imprisonment “for life” (The Jewish War 6.434). [H. SASSE, I, 168]

aidṓs [modesty]

A. The Greek Terms for Shame and Disgrace.

a. aidós was an old term, rare in Hellenism, revived by Stoicism. It denoted reverence, e.g., for God, divine things, rulers, and parents, as well as respect for laws of hospitality, marriage and family, the state and its laws. Applied inwardly, it could then suggest a “sense of shame” but also a “sense of honor” in contrast to shamelessness or insolence.

b. Early on, it was linked with the distinct word aischýnē, “shame” at an act, or lowly birth, or humiliation, though also “disgrace” and even perhaps “ignominy.”

B. The Hellenistic Use of aidṓs. Philo has aidṓs in the Greek and later Stoic sense, but in the LXX we find it only in 3 Macc. 1:19; 4:5, though the verb aideísthai is more common (e.g., Prov. 24:38), and anaidḗs is often used for “insolent,” e.g., with face, eye, or mind.

C. The Early Christian Use of aidṓs. The only sure instance in the NT is “modest demeanor” in 1 Tim. 2:9. adeísthai does not occur at all, nor do the apostolic fathers use aidṓs. The reason for this absence of the group is that a Christian’s being is not defined by his relation to himself but by his relation to God and neighbor, and the relation to neighbor rests on the neighbor’s claim rather than a sense of the state or cosmos. [R. BULTMANN, I, 169-71]

→ aischýnē

haíma [blood], haimatekchysía [shedding of blood]

1. The word haíma means physical “blood” (Jn. 19:34). We are made of “flesh and blood” and as such are frail (Mt. 16:17; Gal. 1:16; 1 Cor. 15:50; Eph. 6:12; Heb. 2:14. The phrase “flesh and blood” is an established Jewish one (though not OT) for humanity. Blood carries the ongoing life of the species (cf. Jn. 1:13; Acts 17:26). Its use for “descent” or “family” was ancient and widespread.

2. The OT belief in the sanctity of blood underlies the ban on eating it. In sacrifice the life-bearing blood is a means of expiation (Lev. 17:11).

3. “To shed blood” is to destroy life, and the phrase can thus be used for killing (cf. Mt. 27:4, 24; Acts 5:28 [Jesus] and Mt. 23:30, 35; Lk. 11:50-51; Rev. 16:6; 17:6 [prophets, saints, witnesses]). God avenges blood (Rev. 6:10). The Western version of the apostolic decree (Acts 15:9) prohibits murder. Resisting to blood in Heb. 12:4 probably means incurring wounds rather than suffering martyrdom. According to Hebrews blood is shed to ward off the destroying angel (11:28), to institute the divine order (9:18), to consecrate the tent and cultic vessels (9:21), and to effect atonement and purification (13:11).

4. The blood of Christ is supremely significant in the NT (1 Cor. 10:16; Eph. 2:13)—not his material blood, but its shedding in violent death. This guarantees the new order (1 Cor. 11:25). This order includes forgiveness of sin (Rom. 3:25; Col. 1:20; Eph. 1:7; 1 Pet. 1:2; 1 Jn. 1:7; Rev. 1:5). Legal and sacrificial images are used in this connection but should not be pressed too strongly. Thus Christ’s self-offering is expressed by the idea of his sacrificial blood. Hebrews compares this blood with that of animals (9:12 etc.), but the effect of Christ's blood is ethical (9:14). Fellowship with Christ's blood in the eucharist (1 Cor. 10:16) means union with him who died for us and does not involve blood mysticism, though there is some hint of this in Clement of Alexandria Paedagogus 2.2.19.4.

5. In apocalyptic, blood may be used for the color red, indicating eschatological terrors such as war (Acts 2:19), hail and fire (Rev. 8:7), and judgment (Rev. 14:20). Ex. 7:17ff. underlies this use. Wine is the blood of grapes in Gen. 49:11; Dt. 32:14, etc., and the wine harvest is an eschatological image in Is. 63:3; cf. Rev. 14:19-20.

haimatekchysía. This word occurs only in Heb. 9:22 (the first instance) and refers to the shedding of blood in sacrifices, though not specifically to pouring or sprinkling. The point is that the giving of life is the necessary presupposition of forgiveness. Only prefigured in the OT, this has now been effected by Christ. Elsewhere the term occurs only in the fathers, e.g., Tatian Address to the Greeks 23.2. [J. BEHM, I, 172-77]

ainéō [to praise], aínos [praise]

ainéō. Of the two main senses, "to praise" and "to tell," the former alone is important. The eight instances in the NT refer to joyful praise of God in hymn or prayer by individuals (Lk. 2:20; Acts 3:8-9), a group (Lk. 19:37), the community (Acts 2:47; Rev. 19:5), or angels (Lk. 2:13).

aínos. Meaning "story," "resolve," or "praise," this word occurs twice in the NT (Mt. 21:16; Lk. 18:43) for praise in the religious sense. [H. SCHLIER, I, 177-78]

aínigma [riddle], ésoptron [mirror]

aínigma occurs only in 1 Cor. 13:12, which contrasts present and future seeing. It means "riddle" and suggests oracular utterances: God speaks to his prophets (except Moses) in riddles (Num. 12:8), which are equated with visions (12:6). ésoptron means "to see in a glass." The rabbis speak of the prophets seeing God in nine clouded mirrors, Moses in one clear one. The point here is not that mirrors in antiquity are necessarily indistinct nor that they give only the reflection, but that this is the form of prophetic revelation. Thus aínigma and ésoptron both refer to prophetic vision but are not tautological; the former stresses its obscure nature, the latter its general form. We see in a mirror, but only indistinctly as in a riddle. Paul here seems to be following the Hebrew text of Num. 12:8 and rabbinic exegesis. [G. KITTEL, I, 178-80]

hairéamai [to choose], haíresis [sect, school], hairetikós [heretical], hairetízō [to choose], diairéō [to distribute], diáresis [distribution] hairéomai. hairéō means "to take," "to win," "to comprehend," "to select" (middle). The last is the sense in the NT, e.g., selective preference in Phil. 1:22; Heb. 11:25 and God's election of the community in 2 Th. 2:13.

haíresis.

A. haíresis in Classical Usage and Hellenism. On the basis of hairéō, the senses are "seizure" "choice" "resolve." Choice of opinion led to the philosophical use for "teaching" "school" with the associated ideas of delimitation from other schools, the authority of the teacher, specific doctrine, and the private character of these features.

B. haíresis in the LXX and Judaism. The sense of "choice" occurs, e.g., in Lev. 22:18, but Philo uses it for philosophical schools, e.g., in On Noah's Work as a Planter 151, and Josephus for the Essenes and Jewish parties in The Jewish War 2.118; Life 12. The corresponding rabbinic term was first used for parties in Judaism but later only for those opposed by the rabbis (late 1st and early 2nd cent.) and then for non-Jewish groups (late 2nd cent.).

C. haíresis in the NT.

1. The usage in Acts resembles that of Josephus and the early rabbis (Acts 5:17; 24:5; 26:5).

2. Yet there is from the outset a suspicion of the haíresis within Christianity itself, not through the development of orthodoxy, but through the basic incompatibility of ekklēsía and haíresis (cf. Gal. 5:20; 1 Cor. 11:18-19). In 1 Cor. 1: 10ff. haíresis has a sifting purpose. In 2 Pet. 2:1 it affects the church's very basis; a haíresis creates a new society alongside the ekklēsía and thus makes the ekklēsía itself a haíresis and not the comprehensive people of God. This is unacceptable.

D. haíresis in the Early Church. haíresis is still a basic threat in Ignatius Ephesians 6.2; Justin Dialogue with Trypho 51.2. The term has a technical sense, but a sense of basic hostility remains, as when it is used for philosophical schools, Jewish sects, and especially Gnostic societies. Origen, however, surrenders the distinction between ekklēsía and haíresis when he compares differences within Christianity to those in medicine and philosophy (Against Celsus 3.12).

hairetikós. This word can denote "one who can choose aright," but in Christianity it was used always for "adherent of a heresy" (cf. Tit. 3:9-10; Didascalia 33.31).

hairetízō. Found only in Mt. 12:18, quoting Is. 42:1 and perhaps reflecting 1 Chr. 28:6; Mal. 3:17, this word means "to choose."

diairéō, diaíresis. diairéō has five meanings: "to dissolve," "to distinguish," "to decide," "to distribute," "to apportion." The last two are most common in the LXX (Gen. 4:7 etc.), and are the obvious meaning in the NT at Lk. 15:12 and 1 Cor. 12:11, where the Spirit allots various gifts to members of the community as he wills. diaíresis similarly means "separation," "division," and "distribution," e.g., of property. The context of 1 Cor. 12:4ff. shows that the meaning there is "distribution" rather than "distinction": the one Spirit is seen in the apportionment of spiritual gifts, the one cháris in the charísmata, diaíresis covers both the distribution and what is distributed. Later diaíresis came to be used for the intertrinitarian distinction (cf. Origen Commentary on John 1.2.10.74). [H. SCHLIER, I, 180-85]

aírō [to lift up, carry off], epaírō [to lift up] aíro. The meanings are "to lift from the ground," "to lift in order to carry," and "to carry off."

1. The sense "to lift up" occurs for raising the hand in an oath (Rev. 10:5), raising the face in prayer (Jn. 11:41), and raising the voice in prayer (Acts 4:24).

2. "To take up and carry" in Mt. 11:29 means obeying God's will as it is revealed in Jesus in contrast to the yoke of the Torah. Taking up the cross denotes readiness for self-denial (and even martyrdom) in following Jesus (Mk. 8:34).

3. "To carry off" is used of death in Acts 8:33; Jn. 17:15, of depriving of salvation in Mt. 21:43, of taking away knowledge in Lk. 11:52, of removing judgment in Acts 8:33, of taking away guilt by the cross in Col. 2:14, and of the expiation of sin in 1 Jn. 3:5.

Whether the sense in Jn. 1:29 is "to take up and carry," i.e., in a vicarious bearing of penalty, or "to carry off," i.e., to remove by expiation, is debatable. If there is a reference to the Servant of the Lord, the former is more likely, but Lamb of God favors the latter: "takes away the sin of the world" (by the atoning power of his blood; cf. 1 Jn. 1:7).

epaírō. Used most frequently in the LXX for "to set or lift up," epaírō has 1. the religious sense of lifting up in prayer (1 Tim. 2:8; Lk. 18:13; Jn. 17:1), sometimes in a gesture of blessing (Lk. 24:50) or of hope (Lk. 21:28). It can also have 2. the figurative sense "to raise up oneself," "oppose," "exalt oneself," in arrogant assertion against God (2 Cor. 10:5) or others (2 Cor. 11:20). [J. JEREMIAS, I, 185-86]

aisthánomai [to perceive, understand], aísthēsis [insight], aisthētḗrion [sense, faculty]

A. The Linguistic Usage outside the NT. The verb has three main references: a. "sensory perception," b. "perception" or "discernment," and c. "intellectual understanding." The noun follows a similar pattern, being "sense" or "organ of sense," then "discernment," and finally "judgment." For Philo aísthēsis is the cause of passions, but it may be trained, and it can even be consciousness, with a hint of moral consciousness. Philo often opposes it to noús and religious awareness, but he can also say that in action noús is dependent on correct aísthēsis. aisthētḗrion is "organ of sense" in Philo (even of the psychḗ). In the LXX the group is used first for "sensory perception," then "perception" in general (Job 23:5), and finally "judgment" or "understanding" pressing on to decision (cf. Prov. 17:10; Is. 49:26; Is. 33:11). In Prov. 1:7 aísthēsis can even be compared with wisdom and instruction.

B. The Word Group in the NT. In Lk. 9:45 aisthánomai obviously means "to understand." In Phil. 1:9 aísthēsis means "moral discrimination." In Heb. 5:14 aisthētḗria (plural) are organs which, when trained, are to distinguish between the good and the bad. Without developed organs of this kind the doctrine of justification (v. 13) will be misunderstood, as by Paul's Judaizing opponents. [G. DELLING, I, 187-88]

aischýnō [to be ashamed], epaischýnō [to be ashamed], kataischýnō [to put to shame], aischýnē [shame], aischrós [shameful], aischrótēs [shame]

A. The Linguistic Usage in the LXX. Unlike the aidṓs group, this group was in common use and is thus often found in the LXX. The sense is "to shame," "put to shame" (God mostly as subject), "be shamed or ashamed" (personally rather than publicly). The main point of aischýnē is not "feeling of shame" but "disgrace," i.e., the shame brought by divine judgment, though sometimes with a stress on "being ashamed."

B. The NT Usage. The same meanings are found here: "to shame" (1 Cor. 11:4-5), "to bring to shame" (1 Cor. 1:27), "to be ashamed" (Lk. 16:3), almost "disillusioned" (Phil. 1:20). aischýnē means "disgrace" (Heb. 12:2; Jude 13), with a play on the sexual sense in Rev. 3:18. aischrós means "what is disgraceful" (1 Cor. 11:6; Eph. 5:12; Tit. 1:11). aischrótēs occurs only in Eph. 5:4 where it refers to "shameful talk." → aidṓs [R. BULTMANN, I, 189-91]

aitéo [to demand], aítēma [request], apaitéō [to demand back], exaitéō [to require], paraitéomai [to reject] aitéō (aitéomai).

1. "To demand." In the NT demands are often given a religious application (cf. Lk. 12:48). The Jews demand accrediting signs (1 Cor. 1:22). People will call us to account for our faith, i.e., demand an explanation of it (1 Pet. 3:15).

2. "To request." Found in both the active and the middle with little distinction, the verb in this sense has both a secular and a religious use. In secular usage we may have a transaction (cf. Mk. 6:24-25) or an official request (e.g., Mk. 15:43; Acts 9:2). In religious usage prayer is the most important reference (sometimes juxtaposed with ordinary requests, Mt. 7:9ff.). Jesus never uses this word for his own prayers (cf. Jn. 16:26), perhaps because it involves requests for self, or has an element of demanding, or is less intimate than erōtáō (which is used for the disciples' requests to Jesus and those of Jesus to God). The general use does not support distinguishing the active (for uttered requests) from the middle (for inner requests) in Jms. 4:2-3.

aítēma. "Request," "petition," "desire," especially for individual petitions, with a reference to the content (Phil. 4:6; 1 Jn. 5:15).

apaitéō

1. "To demand back"—something seized (Lk. 6:30), or "to call in debts"—what is loaned (Lk. 12:48).

2. "To demand"—an account (1 Pet. 3:15).

exaitéō. "To require," "demand the freedom of," "demand the surrender of." The third of these is the most likely sense in Lk. 22:31: Peter is to be handed over for sifting (cf. Job). Jesus allows this, but sustains Peter with his prayer (v. 32).

paraitéomai.

1. "To beg," hence "to beg off" in Lk. 14:18-19 (middle and passive).

2. "To seek to turn aside by asking," suggesting in Heb. that what was in Dt. 5:25 a justifiable request (through fear) is a sinful repudiation of divine revelation; in Acts 25:12 Paul will not try to avert punishment by entreaty.

3. "To reject or repudiate" (only in the Pastorals)—myths in 1 Tim. 4:7, controversies in 2 Tim. 2:23, widows under 60 in 1 Tim. 5:11, heretics (excommunication) in Tit. 3:10.

4. "To spurn"—used in Heb. of refusing to listen to God.

→ eúchomai [G. STÄHLIN, I, 191-95]

aichmálōtos [captive], aichmalōtízō [to lead captive], aichmalōteúō [to capture], aichmalōsía [captivity], synaichmálōtos [fellow captive]

1. Proper Use. The "prisoner of war" is a miserable person in special need of divine aid (cf. Lk. 21:24). The exile gave the term a religious reference (cf. Ps. 126:1). The messenger of Is. 61:1 proclaims freedom to captives, and Jesus accepts this as a messianic task (Lk. 4:18). Visiting prisoners is a loving duty (Mt. 25:36ff.), and working and praying for release is enjoined (cf. Phlm. 22). God himself grants liberation in Acts 5:19.

2. Figurative Use. Imprisonment may be used to denote subjection to error (2 Tim. 3:6) or sin (Rom. 7:23), but also to Christ (Eph. 4:8; 2 Cor. 10:5). Paul calls his helpers "fellow-prisoners," probably not in a literal sense but in the sense of being similarly subject to Christ (cf. "fellow-servants," Col. 1:7; 4:7). [G. KITTEL, I, 195-97]

aiṓn [age, aeon], aiṓnios [eternal]

aiṓn.

A. The Nonbiblical Use. Meanings are a. “vital force,” b. “lifetime,” c. “age” or “generation,” d. “time,” and e. “eternity.”

The term is used in philosophical discussions of time, usually for a span of time as distinct from time as such (chrónos), though for Plato it is timeless eternity in contrast to chrónos as its moving image in earthly time (cf. Philo). In the Hellenistic world Aiṓn becomes the name of the god of eternity.

B. aiṓn in the Sense of Prolonged Time or Eternity.

I. The Formulas “from Eternity” and “to Eternity.”

a. The concepts of time and eternity merge in the use with prepositions suggesting indefinite time (Lk. 1:70; Acts 3:21; Jn. 9:32; Jude 13). Sometimes the meaning is “from a remote time” (Lk. 1:70; Jn. 9:32—“never”), but sometimes there is a strong hint of eternity (Lk. 1:55; Jn. 6:51). This is especially true of the plural (Mt. 6:13; Lk. 1:33; Rom. 1:25; Heb. 13:8; Jude 25; cf. also with a past reference 1 Cor. 2:7; Col. 1:26; Eph. 3:11). The double formula “for ever and ever” (Heb. 1:8), especially in the plural (in Paul and Revelation; cf. also Heb. 13:21; 1 Pet. 4:11), is designed to stress the concept of eternity, as are constructions like that in Eph. 3:21 (“to all generations for ever and ever”).

b. The usage corresponds to that of the LXX (cf. Am. 9:11; Is. 45:17; Ps. 45:6), the only difference being intensification in the NT.

2. The Eternity of God.

a. aiṓn means eternity in the full sense when linked with God (Rom. 16:26; 1 Tim. 1:17; cf. Jer. 10:10).

b. In the OT this means first that God always was (Gen. 21:23) and will be (Dt. 5:23), in contrast to us mortals. By the time of Is. 40:28 this comes to mean that God is eternal, the “First and Last,” whose being is “from eternity to eternity” (Ps. 90:2). Eternity is unending time, but in later Judaism it is sometimes set in antithesis to time. The NT took over the Jewish formulas but extended eternity to Christ (Heb. 1:10ff.; Rev. 1:17-18; 2:8). Here again eternity could be seen as the opposite of cosmic time, God’s being and acts being put in terms of pre- and post- (1 Cor. 2:7; Col. 1:26; Eph. 3:9; Jn. 17:24; 1 Pet. 1:20).

C. aiṓn in the Sense of the Time of the World.

l. aiṓn as the Time of the World; the End of the aiṓn. In the plural the sense of aiōn is that of a stretch of time. In particular the word is used for the duration of the world. Thus the same term can signify both God’s eternity and the world’s duration (cf. the Parsee word zrvan). The doctrine of creation—an absolute beginning—underlay the distinction in use. aiṓn for time of the world occurs in the NT in the expression “end of the aeon” (Mt. 13:39 etc.). The plural in Heb. 9:26 and 1 Cor. 10:11 (aeons) represents no essential change; it merely indicates that the one aeon is made up of many smaller aeons, though as yet the word is not used for a particular period.

2. aiṓn as World. From “time of the world” aiṓn easily came to mean the “world” itself (cf. Mt. 13:22; 1 Cor. 7:33) with an equation of cosmos and aeon (1 Cor. 1:20; 2:6; 3:19). The plural can mean “worlds” along the same lines (Heb. 1:2; 11:3).

3. The Present and Future aiṓn.

a. If aiṓn means “duration of the world,” and the plural occurs, the idea is obvious that eternity embraces a succession or recurrence of aeons (cf. Eccl. 1:9-10—though here the aeons are periods of the world, and the biblical concept of creation, and hence of the uniqueness of this aeon, ruled out the idea of an unending series).

b. Instead of recurrence the antithesis of time and eternity combined with the thought of plural aeons to produce the belief in a new and future aeon (or cosmos or kingdom) which will succeed this one but will be completely different from it. For the present and future aeons in the NT cf. Mk. 10:30; Lk. 16:8; Rom.

12:2; 1 Cor. 1:20; Gal. 1:4; 1 Tim. 6:17; Eph. 1:21; Heb. 6:5 (and with kairós instead of aiṓn, Jn. 8:23 etc.).

c. The NT took over this concept from Jewish apocalyptic, e.g., Ethiopian Enoch. Similar ideas occur in rabbinic writings and there is hope of a future age in Vergil. In the NT, however, the new aeon is not just future. Believers are already redeemed from this aeon (Gal. 1:4) and taste the powers of the future aeon (Heb. 6:5 which Christ has initiated with his resurrection.

D. The Personification of Aiṓn. Important in Hellenistic syncretism, the personification of Aiṓn is absent from the NT (except for a suggestion in Eph. 2:2).

aiṓnios. An adjective meaning "eternal," and found in the LXX in Pss. 24; 77:5; Gen. 21:33, aiṓnios in the NT is used 1. of God (Rom. 16:26), 2. of divine possessions and gifts (2 Cor. 4:18; Heb. 9:14; 1 Pet. 5:10; 1 Tim. 6:16; 2 Th. 2:16, and 3. of the eternal kingdom (2 Pet. 1:11), inheritance (Heb. 9:15), body (2 Cor. 5:1), and even judgment (Heb. 6:2, though cf. Mt. 18:8; 2 Th. 1:9, where the sense is perhaps "unceasing"). For a more temporal use, see Rom. 16:25; Phlm. 15. [H. SASSE, I, 197-209]

akatharsía, akáthartos → katharós; akaíros → kairós; ákakos → kakós; ákarpos → karpós; akátagnōstos → ginōskō; akatákritos → krínō; akatálytos → lýō; akatastasía, akatástatos → kathístēmi

akéraios [pure, innocent]

The original meanings of akéraios are a. "Unravaged," "unharmed," of a city, walls, country. b. "Intact," "innocent." c. "Pure," e.g., of wine, or gold.

The sense is always figurative in the NT: Christians are to be innocent (Phil. 2:15); to maintain their integrity in face of evil (Rom. 16:19). [G. KITTEL, I, 209-10] akolouthéō [to follow], exakolouthéō [to follow], epakolouthéō [to follow], parakolouthéō [to accompany], synakolouthéō [to accompany] akolouthéō.

A. akoloutheín and hépesthai in Greek Usage. In Greek the ordinary sense of following led to that of intellectual, moral, and religious following, though for following God, hépesthai, not used in the NT, is more common.

B. Discipleship in the OT and Judaism.

1. The Following of God by the Righteous. The more common phrase here is "to go after other gods" (Judg. 2:12; Dt. 4:3; Jer. 11:10, etc.), and this is linked with adultery in Hosea (1:2; 2:7, 13). Going after Yahweh occurs in Deuteronomy (1:36 etc.) but does not receive emphasis (except in 1 Kgs. 18:21); this is because of the association with idolatry. Even when Jer. 2:2 refers to going after Yahweh in the wilderness. (Ex. 13:21-22), the thought in view is that of marriage. "Walking in God's ways" is the preferred expression (Dt. 5:30 etc.). The rabbis found it hard to conceive of following God, only his qualities (insofar as this is now possible). Philo adopted Greek usage, and Josephus could link akolouthía with the law in the sense of obedience to it.

2. The Following of the Disciple. Following is literal in the OT (cf. Judg. 9:4; Jer. 2:2). This applies when Elisha is said to follow Elijah in 1 Kgs. 19:20-21. The same is true of rabbis and their students; the former go on ahead, and the latter follow them, but with no suggestion of any figurative significance.

C. akoloutheín in the NT. Due to the OT inheritance and the new turn given by Christ's presence, the NT has no reference to "going after" God. The term is reserved for being a disciple of Christ (except when the sense is very general) and is confined to the four Gospels (apart from Rev. 14:4). External following is still involved (cf. Mt. 8:19; Mk. 10:28) but with a total commitment and in an exclusive relation to one who is recognized as not just a teacher but the Messiah. This discipleship brings participation in salvation (Mk. 10:17; Lk. 9:61-62; Jn. 8:12; Rev. 14:4), but also in suffering (Mt. 8:19-20; Mk. 8:34; Jn. 12:25-26). The strength of the figurative use may have been in the presence of sayings like Mt. 10:38, the possibility of discipleship without literally going after Jesus, and the active stress which rules out the use of a noun to express the concept. Since it is the historical Jesus that is followed, it is natural that other terms should be found in the other NT writings to describe the relation to the exalted Lord and his Spirit. Rev. 14:4 simply applies Mt. 10:38 to a particular group.

exakolouthéō. This has only a figurative sense in the NT, where it occurs only in 2 Peter: following "myths" in 1:16, "licentiousness" in 2:2, "the way of Balaam" in 2:15.

epakolouthéō. This, too, has a figurative sense: a. "to follow," e.g., the signs in Mk. 16:20, sin in 1 Tim. 5:24, "in Christ's steps" in 1 Pet. 2:21; b. "to pursue a matter" in 1 Tim. 5:10.

parakolouthéō. a. "To go along with," "accompany," e.g., the signs (Mk. 16:17); b. "to look into" (Lk. 1:3); c. "not to let slip," "to follow what has been grasped" (1 Tim. 4:6).

synakolouthéō. "To go along" with Jesus, though only externally in Mk. 5:37; 14:51, and perhaps in Lk. 23:49. Oddly, the term does not take on the pregnant sense of the simple form akolouthéō, as one might have expected in view of its figurative senses "to understand," "to obey," in secular Greek (Plato Laws 1.629). [G. KITTEL, I, 210-16]

akoúō [to hear, listen], akoḗ [hearing], eisakoúō [to obey], epakoúō [to listen], parakoúō [to fail to hear], parakoḗ [disobedience], hypakoúō [to listen, obey], hypakoḗ [obedience], hypḗkoos [obedient] akoúō (→blépo, horáō).

A. The Hearing of Man. The use of the group in the NT reflects the significance of God's word; hearing corresponds to revelation as its form of appropriation.

l. The Hearing of Revelation outside the NT.

a. In the Greek mysteries and Gnosticism more stress is laid on apprehension of God by seeing. Hearing can lead astray, not seeing (Philo On Flight 208). If some revelation is by hearing, the true mystery is known to sight. In the Mithras liturgy the God appears. Monuments depicting religious acts show that the climax often comes with vision.

b. The OT and Judaism have a different emphasis. Even when God is said to be seen, the usage is not strict. True vision is dangerous (Gen. 19:26; Ex. 3:6) and unusual (Ex. 33:11, 20). Seeing God is eschatological (Is. 60:1ff.). Even when Moses is face to face with God, they speak (Ex. 33:11). Seeing God is a setting for his word (Is. 6:1ff.). The decisive call is to hear (Is. 1:2, 10; Am. 7:16). Hearing entails action in obedience as true seeking (Jer. 29:13; Mic. 6:8).

c. Symbols are important in apocalyptic, but usually in relation to words (Dan. 7:17ff.; 8:16ff.). For the rabbis hearing is through reading out loud the holy books. Recitation of the Shema brings out the importance of hearing, for the passages used (Dt. 6:4ff.; 11:13ff.; Num. 15:37ff.) show that we know God by studying and keeping his law. The voice from heaven rather than the vision becomes the way of direct, physical apprehension of God.

2. The Hearing of Revelation in the NT.

a. The NT revelation, too, is a word or message. We receive what Jesus did and said by hearing (cf. Mk. 4:24; Mt. 11:4; Lk. 2:20; Acts 2:33; 1 Jn. 1:1). What Jesus looked like is of no interest. Seeing is directed to his acts. Parables like that of the sower are parables of hearing. Things seen take on significance in what is heard (cf. Mk. 9:7; 2 Cor. 12:3; Acts 18:9). akoúein in the absolute can express the true hearing of appropriation (Mk. 4:9). The content of hearing corresponds to that of what is heard. It is the reception of grace and the call to repentance in response to salvation and its ethical demand. Thus faith and obedience are the marks of real hearing (cf. Rom. 1:5; 16:26): the "obedience of faith."

b. This aspect is strong in John but also present in the other Evangelists. Note the message to the Baptist in Mt. 11:4, the blessing in Mt. 13:16, and the condemnation in Mk. 4:12. Yet since Jesus is present in work as well as word, eschatological seeing is also a factor (Mt. 11:20ff.).

B. The Hearing of God. akoúein can also refer to God's hearing of prayers, though eisakoúō is more common in this regard. epakoúō and epḗkoos, common in Hellenism for hearing deity, are largely avoided. For instances of God or Jesus hearing cf. Jn. 11:41-42; Acts 7:34; 2 Cor. 6:2; Heb. 5:7; 1 Jn. 5:14-15.

akoḗ. This common word has the active meaning 1. "sense of hearing" and the passive one 2. "report." In the NT it can mean "preaching" with a stress on the hearing (cf. 1 Th. 2:13; Rom. 10:16ff.; Heb. 4:2. In Gal. 3:2 the point is not "believing hearing" but "preaching of faith," i.e., with faith as the content and goal. In the pagan world akoaí was also used 3. for the ears put on sanctuary walls to symbolize hearing deity. The singular akoḗ could also be the place of hearing mysterious voices in a temple.

eisakoúō. With the basic senses "to hear" and "consent," this means a. "to obey" in secular Greek and the LXX, and b. "to hear," "answer," always passive in the NT: Lk. 1:13; Mt. 6:7; Acts 10:31; Heb. 5:7 (Christ).

epakoúō. This is the technical word for the hearing of deity, epḗkoos being a popular epiphet for pagan gods. The only NT instance is 2 Cor. 6:2 (cf. Is. 49:8 LXX). Avoidance of the term may reflect a desire to differentiate God from pagan deities.

parakoúō, parakoḗ (→ apeithéō). There are three meanings: a. "to overhear," b. "to hear incorrectly," and c. "to disregard." Sense a. seems to be the point in Mk. 5:35-36, sense c. in Mt. 18:17. parakoḗ in the NT bears sense c. (cf. Acts 7:57; Rom. 5:19; 2 Cor. 10:6; Heb. 2:2.

hypakoúō (→ peitharchéō).

1. "To hear the door," i.e., "open" (Acts 12:13).

2. "To obey." The word is used in this sense for wives, children, and servants (Eph. 6:1,5; Col. 3:20, 22), for demons and nature (Mk. 1:27; 4:41), for humanity in general relative to good or evil moral powers (Acts 6:7; Rom. 6:12, 16-17; 2 Th. 1:8), and for the community (Phil. 2:12; cf. Acts 5:32). LXX usage shows how strongly the sense of hearing is present in obedience (cf. Gen. 22:18; Jer. 13:10).

hypakoḗ, hypḗkoos. Except in Phlm. 21, this word always implies religious decision (e.g., Rom. 6:16-over against hamartía in Rom. 6:16 and parakoḗ in Rom. 5:19). What is obeyed may be the truth (1 Pet. 1:22) or Christ (2 Cor. 10:5), who is himself the subject in Rom. 5:19. The denotation is not the ethical attitude but the religious act from which it derives (1 Pet. 1:14). The obedience of faith (Rom. 1:5; 16:26) implies that the message of faith issues in obedience. hypḗkoos means "obedient"—to God (Acts 7:39), to the apostle (2 Cor. 2:9). Christ himself is hypḗkoos in fulfilling his divine mission (Phil. 2:8). [G. KITTEL, I, 216-25]

akrobystía [foreskin]

1. The Etymology of the Word. This word, translated “foreskin,” is formed from ákros (“running to a point”) and býō (“to stop up”) but may really be based on the medical akroposthía (“foreskin” or “male organ”).

2. The Occurrence of the Word. It is found only in biblical and ecclesiastical Greek with both a literal and a figurative reference and as the opposite of peritomḗ. There are 20 instances in the NT, only in Paul apart from Acts 11:3 (cf. Rom. 2:25, 26, 27; 3:30; 4:9, 10, 11, 12; 1 Cor. 7:18, 19; Gal. 2:7; 5:6; 6:15; Eph. 2:11; Col. 2:13; 3:11). Barnabas has it (quoting the OT, 9.5 and 13.7) among early Christian writers, and so do Justin and Ignatius. [K. L. SCHMIDT, I, 225-26]

→peritomḗ

akrogōniaíos → gōnía; akyróō → kyróō; ákōn→ hekṓn

alazṓn [arrogant], alazoneía [arrogance]

The alazṓn is “one who makes more of himself than reality justifies,” or “promises more than he can perform,” often used of orators, philosophers, doctors, cooks, and officials. A link with pride is sometimes seen; hence in Hab. 2:5 the alazṓn is one who does not trust in God. The term occurs in the lists in Rom. 1:30 and 2 Tim. 3:2 in its usual sense and with a religious nuance. This nuance is stronger in the case of alazoneía in 1 Jn. 2:16 (“thinking one can shape one’s own life apart from God‘”) and Jms. 4:16 (“thinking one controls the future”). [G. DELLING, I, 226-27]

alalázō [to wail]

Denoting extravagant expressions of emotion, alalázō is employed 1. for “lamentation” in Mk. 5:38 and 2. for the “clanging” of cymbals, as in orgiastic cults, in 1 Cor. 13:1. [E. PETERSON, I, 227-28]

hálas [salt]

Salt was significant in the ancient world of religion as a symbol of endurance and worth. It was thus used in worship (Ex. 30:35; Lev. 2:13; Ezek. 43:21) and the making of covenants (Num. 18:19). The cultic use dropped away in the NT except figuratively, e.g., disciples must be seasoned with salt like sacrifices (Mk. 9:49). Salt still denoted moral worth, e.g., of disciples (Lk. 14:34-35), or speech (Col. 4:6). The reference to loss of taste (Lk. 14:34-35 and par.) may be based on the fact that Dead Sea salt soon acquired a stale or alkaline taste. [F. HAUCK, I, 228-29]

aleíphō [to anoint]

aleíphō is used in the LXX for Hebrew terms meaning “to anoint,” “to rub over,” “to pour an oil offering over,” though chríō is a more common rendering and carries more significance. Thus the use is for purely outward anointing in the NT, though this can have its own deeper meaning.

1. In Mt. 6:17 anointing is for bodily comfort with a suggestion of joy and festivity not normally associated with fasting.

2. In Mt. 26:7; Lk. 7:38 it is a mark of honor shown to a guest. The woman’s anointing of Jesus has the deeper proleptic sense of anointing for burial (cf. Mk. 16:1).

3. Anointing could also be used in cases of sickness, medicinally but with a magical nuance in view of the ascription of sickness to demonic influence. An instance of medical use is in Lk. 10:34. In Mk. 6:13 the disciples anointed the sick as well as preaching and expelling demons in their role as heralds of the inbreaking kingdom. In Jms. 5:14 the elders are to continue this ministry with prayer and the promise of healing and forgiveness. In the later church anointing came to be used at baptism, in exorcisms, and in cases of sickness, producing the medieval sacrament of extreme unction in the west. Ignatius (Ephesians 17.1) offers a fanciful exegesis of Mk. 14:3 whereby the ointment signifies the true knowledge with which we must be anointed to be led to immortality.   [H. SCHLIER, I, 229-32]

→ chríō

alḗtheia [truth], alēthḗs [true], alēthinós [true], alētheúō [to speak the truth]

alḗtheia.

A. The OT Term for Truth.

1. The common OT word for truth appears some 126 times. It denotes a reality that is firm, solid, binding, and hence true. With reference to persons it characterizes their action, speech, or thought, and suggests integrity.

2. In law the word is used for a. the actual truth of a cause or process as shown by the facts (cf. Dt. 22:20; 1 Kgs. 10:6; Dan. 10:1). Only rarely is there a more abstract use, e.g., Gen. 4:16 ("whether it is as you say" or "whether there is any truth in you"). Normally the facts establish a matter beyond cavil, as also in the case of God's word (cf. 1 Kgs. 17:24; Jer. 23:28). Regard for facts is indispensable for the right dispensing of justice (Zech. 7:9; 8:16). b. An extension of this usage is to more general facts which demand recognition by all people as reality, as the normal state corresponding to divine and human order.

3. The religious use runs parallel to the legal but is not just a figurative application of it. It often denotes a religious reality that need not be explained by the forensic use. The righteous base their attitude to God on incontestable truth and practice truthfulness as God himself is truthful (cf. Ps. 51:6). Those who are qualified to dwell on God's hill speak truth in the heart, i.e., have their minds set on it (Ps. 15:2). Truth is linked with knowledge of God (Hos. 4:1). If it is fundamentally an attitude, the rational element in the legal use ties it to instruction in the law, i.e., Scripture (Ps. 119:160), for God's ordinances are true (Ps. 19:9). Thus walking in the truth can be taught (Ps. 86:11). Truth can also be set in opposition to deceit (cf. Mal. 2:6; Prov. 11:8; 12:19). Poetic expressions have truth springing from the ground or falling in the street (Ps. 85:11; Is. 59:14), but when it is said to be dashed to the ground in Dan. 8:12 it seems to be equated with the true religion. Along similar lines God is said to be the true (i.e., the only) God in 2 Chr. 15:3. Yet a parallel phrase in Ps. 31:5 refers to the '"reliable" God and thus adds an ethical dimension whereby God guarantees both moral and legal standards. Rich in truth (Ex. 34:6), God is worthy of trust. God does truth (Neh. 9:33), gives true laws (Neh. 9:13), gives valid commands (Ps. 111:7), swears truth (Ps. 132:11), and keeps the norm of truthfulness forever (Ps. 146:6). The element of trust, based on God's character, finds pregnant expression in 2 Sam. 7:28: "Thou art God, and thy words are true."   [G. QUELL, I, 232-37]

B. The Word for Truth in Rabbinic Judaism. The rabbinic use follows that of the OT. Truth is the basis of law, but with a religious reference, since law is a religious function. God's judgment is one of truth, but this is because God's very being is truth, and truth has its being in God. The image of the seal symbolizes this: God's seal is truth, truth meaning that God lives. A problem arises regarding the relationship between God's truth and kindness when truth signifies judgment. If truth is sometimes put first, the two are both seen to be essential qualities in God.   [G. KITTEL, I, 237-38]

C. The Greek and Hellenistic Use of alḗtheia. The NT usage is partly determined by the Hebrew term and partly by the nonbiblical use of alḗtheia. The two are not coincident, for the LXX had to use such words as pístis and dikaiosýnē as well as alḗtheia for the Hebrew. If it could use alḗtheia too, this is to be seen in the light of the flexible Greek usage.

1. The Original Greek Usage and Its Differentiations. Etymologically alḗtheia means "nonconcealment." It thus denotes what is seen, indicated, expressed, or disclosed, i.e., a thing as it really is, not as it is concealed or falsified. alḗtheia is "the real state of affairs," e.g., the truth in law, or real events in history, or true being in philosophy. Links develop with lógos, whose function it is to reveal, and pístis, since one may rely on truth and is also trustworthy when speaking it. alḗtheia can thus denote "truthfulness" as a personal quality. The philosophical question of absolute truth as distinct from relative truths, while alien to the OT, raises the similar concept of truth as a norm, which in practice yields the sense of "correct doctrine" that indicates the truth.

2. The Usage of Dualism. If in philosophy alḗtheia denotes true being, and if this is located in the world of ideas that is hidden from the senses and comprehended in thought, alḗtheia comes to mean "genuine reality" in antithesis to appearance. In Hellenism what truly is can then be equated with what is divine or eternal, in which one must share to be saved. Many circles no longer think this can be attained by thought but only by ecstasy or revelation, i.e., from the divine sphere. alḗtheia thus comes into relation with dýnamis (power) and then with the gnṓsis (knowledge) that it mediates and the zōḗ (life) and phṓs (light) that it gives. Similar connections are made with pneúma (spirit) and noús (mind) insofar as these concepts describe the divine sphere.

D. The Early Christian Use of alḗtheia.

1. alḗtheia is "that which has certainty and force": a. as a valid norm (with a hint of what is genuine) in Eph. 4:21; Gal. 1:6; b. as judicial righteousness (in the case of alḗthinós, cf. Rev. 15:3); c. as uprightness in Jn. 3:21; 2 Jn. 4; 1 Cor. 13:6; Eph. 4:24.

2. alḗtheia is "that on which one can rely": a. as trustworthiness (Rom. 3:3ff.; 15:8). b. as sincerity or honesty (2 Cor. 7:14. 11:10; 2 Jn. 1; 3 Jn. 1).

3. alḗtheia is "the state of affairs as disclosed" (Rom. 1:18, 25; 2:2; 1 Jn. 3:18).

4. alḗtheia is "truth of statement" used with speaking (Lk. 4:25) or teaching (Mk. 12:14).

5. alḗtheia is "true teaching or faith" (2 Cor. 13:8; 4:2; Gal. 5:7; 1 Pet. 1:22); thus the preaching of the gospel is the word of truth (2 Cor. 6:7), becoming a Christian is coming to a knowledge of truth (1 Tim. 2:4), the Christian revelation is truth (2 Th. 2:10ff.), the church is the pillar and ground of truth (1 Tim. 3:15), and the alḗtheia is Christianity (2 Pet. 1:12).

6. alḗtheia is "authenticity," "divine reality," "revelation," especially in John, where this reality, as a possibility of human existence, is out of reach through the fall but is granted to faith through revelation by the word (cf. Jn. 8:44; 1 Jn. 1:8; 2:4). Ambiguity thus arises when Jesus is said to speak the truth, for this means not only that what he says is true but also that he brings revelation in words (Jn. 8:40, 45; 18:37). As revelation, alḗtheia is known (Jn. 8:32; 2 Jn. 1). This is not just a knowledge of a complex of statements but an encounter with Christ, who is the truth (Jn. 14:6) and who sanctifies in truth (Jn. 17:17, 19). God himself is disclosed herewith, the incarnate word being "full of grace and truth" (Jn. 1:14; cf. v. 17). Worship in truth is to be understood similarly, i.e., not just in pure knowledge but as determined by God's own reality, in pneúma (Spirit), and by the revelation made in Jesus (Jn. 4:23-24). Again, the Paraclete as the Spirit of truth insures ongoing revelation in the community (Jn. 14:17; 16:13; cf. 1 Jn. 5:6), and this comes to expression in right doctrine (1 Jn. 2:21) and a right way of life (1 Jn. 1:6). Thus the church's witness may be equated with that of truth (3 Jn. 12) and Christians are to be fellow workers in the truth (3 Jn. 8), loving one another in the truth and united in truth and love (2 Jn. 1ff.).

alēthḗs.

1. alēthḗs means a. "constant" or "valid," as in 1 Pet. 5:12; b. "judicially righteous" (alēthinós in the NT); c. "upright" (Phil. 4:5).

2. It also means a. "trustworthy" (Rom. 3:4); b. "sincere" (Mk. 12:14; 2 Cor. 6:8; Jn. 3:33).

3. Another sense is "real" (Acts 12:9; Jn. 4:18; 1 Jn. 2:8).

4. It indicates a "true statement" (e.g., Tit. 1:13; Jn. 5:31).

5. It also indicates "correct doctrine," but the NT does not have this sense.

6. It then means "genuine" (Jn. 6:55; probably Jn. 3:33; 7:18, i.e., he himself is not just truthful but authentic).

alēthinós.

1. This often has the same meaning as alēthḗs, e.g., "sincere" (Heb. 10:22). With reference to words it means "true" or "correct" (Jn. 4:37; 8:16), "sure and certain" (Rev. 21:5-with pistoí), "real" (Rev. 19:9); with reference to God's ways or judgments "valid" (Rev. 15:3; 16:7; 19:2).

2. As a divine attribute it has the sense of "reliable," "righteous," or "real" (cf. Ex. 34:6; Is. 65:16; 1 Th. 1:9; Jn. 7:28; 1 Jn. 5:20; Rev. 3:7; 6:10); in the NT it can be used of Christ as well as God.

3. In Hellenism it also takes on the sense of "real as eternal" or "real as mediated by revelation." Thus in Heb. 8:2 the heavenly tabernacle is "true" in contrast to the earthly, and in Heb. 9:24 the human sanctuary is a copy of the true one, which is genuine as divine, and as thus containing truth and dispensing revelation. Similarly the true light of Jn. 1:9 is the light of life of Jn. 8:12, and the true bread from heaven is the bread of life (Jn. 6:32, 35, 48), while the true God of Jn. 7:28 is he who gives revelation, and Christ's true judgment is not merely just or trustworthy but authentic and definitive.

alētheúō. In Gal. 4:16 this may mean "speak the truth" but more probably means "preach the truth." In Eph. 4:15 (with love) it means "be sincere in love," or perhaps "live by true faith in love." [R. BULTMANN, I, 238-51]

allássō [to change], antállagma [exchange], apallássō [to release], diallássō [to exchange], katallássō [to reconcile], katallagḗ [reconciliation], apokatallássō [to reconcile], metallássō [to exchange] allássō. The basic sense is "to make other than it is," used in both the active and middle for "to alter," "to give in exchange," "to take in exchange," and intransitively "to change." The NT uses only the transitive active and passive.

1. The word has the sense of "to change" in Acts 6:14; Gal. 4:20; 1 Cor. 15:51-52.

2. It means "to exchange" in Rom. 1:23.

antállagma. This means "purchase-money," "equivalent," "substitute." It occurs in the NT only in Mk. 8:37 = Mt. 16:26 (based on Ps. 49:7), not to stress the infinite worth of the human soul, but to show that divine judgment is so serious that in it no exchange or equivalent for a forfeited life is possible.

apallássō. This means “to alter by removal,” “to do away,” with such nuances as “to dismiss,” “to liberate,” “to absent oneself,” “to withdraw.” In the NT it occurs in the transitive active in Heb. 2:15 for “to liberate,” and in the middle in Acts 19:12 for “to withdraw,” “leave,” and in Lk. 12:58 for “to break free,” “escape.”

diallássō. This word has such varied meanings as “to alter or exchange,” “to distinguish oneself,” and “to reconcile.” It occurs in the NT only in Mt. 5:24 in the sense “to reconcile,” i.e., to see to it that the offended brother renounces his anger.

katallássō (→ di-, apokatallássō, katallagḗ). With the thought of “change” predominating, this word can mean “to change,” “to exchange,” and “to reconcile” or “reconcile oneself.”

A. The Religious Use of katallássō outside the NT. The group plays no part in pagan expiatory rites, though it has a religious sense in Sophocles Ajax 744.

In Judaism God is said to “be reconciled” in the sense that his wrath gives way to grace, e.g., through prayer, confession, or conversion (2 Macc. 1:5; 7:33), but this use is rare. The word corresponds to rabbinic terms for “to placate,” “to reconcile oneself,” “to be reconciled,” “to reconcile,” in relations with others or with God.

B. katallássō in the NT.

1. Husband and wife. Greek marriage records have apallássesthai for marital separation and katalláesthai for reconciliation. Along these lines a separated wife is told in 1 Cor. 7:11 to “be reconciled to her husband,” the meaning being, not necessarily that she is at fault, but that she is actively to seek reconciliation.

2. God and Man.

a. In the NT only Paul uses the term for the divine-human relation. God is not reconciled, nor does he reconcile himself, but he himself reconciles us or the world to himself (2 Cor. 5:18-19), while we are reconciled to God (Rom. 5:10) or reconcile ourselves to him (2 Cor. 5:20). katallássein denotes a transformation of the state between God and us and therewith of our own state, for by it we become new creatures (2 Cor. 5:18), no longer ungodly or sinners, but justified, with God’s love shed abroad in our hearts (Rom. 5:6ff.). God has not changed; the change is in our relation to him and consequently in our whole lives.

b. Reconciliation is through the death of Jesus (Rom. 5:10). He was made sin for us and we are made God’s righteousness in him (2 Cor. 5:21). Thus reconciliation is parallel to justification (cf. “not imputing” in 2 Cor. 5:19). In it guilt is removed. Yet reconciliation also entails a change whereby the love of Christ comes to constrain us and we no longer live for ourselves (2 Cor. 5:14-15). On the basis of God’s reconciling act in Christ the call goes out: “Be reconciled to God” (2 Cor. 5:20). Reconciliation is not just a transaction but has personal effects which are known to the conscience and may be adduced in answer to opponents (2 Cor. 5:11ff.). These effects are the work of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 5:5) who enables us, even though we are sinners, to walk in the Spirit (Rom. 8:4). By the Spirit we are thus made active in reconciliation through the word of reconciliation that comes to us as a request (2 Cor. 5:20). Yet we are

---

NT New Testament

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

cf. confer, compare

active only in the sense of receiving reconciliation, not of effecting it, so that we may also be said to "be reconciled" (passive) in Rom. 5:10.

c. "We" are said to be reconciled in Rom. 5, and "the world" in 2 Cor. 5, but there is no opposition between them, for the world stands for the same thing as "we" in its widest range. Insofar as the ministry of reconciliation continues, and much of the world has still to hear the word of reconciliation, reconciliation has an ongoing aspect—not, of course, in the sense that its basis in Christ's death is incomplete, but in the sense that people have still to be reconciled to God and thus to become new creatures in whom God's love is shed abroad by the Spirit.

d. The hostility between God and us is not mentioned in 2 Cor. 5 and only alluded to in Rom. 5, but it obviously includes not only our enmity against God but also God's wrath against sin (Rom. 1:18ff.) wherein divine displeasure corresponds to human disobedience (Rom. 8:7-8). Reconciliation is effected by Christ's death inasmuch as this is not just to our advantage, or a revelation of God's love, but a vicarious action (2 Cor. 5:20), an exchange, in which the God who judges is also the God who reconciles. Yet reconciliation is a broader term than justification, for if it embraces forgiveness (Rom. 5:9-10) it also establishes a basis for the appeal of 2 Cor. 5:20 and finds fulfilment in the loving response which this appeal evokes.

katallagḗ. The meaning is first "exchange," then "reconciliation." Used only by Paul, in the NT it denotes a divine dispensation. Paul's word and work are the word and ministry of katallagḗ (2 Cor. 5:18-19). They bring God's reconciling action in Christ before people by an appeal which leads believers to "receive reconciliation, (Rom. 5:11). In this sense the reconciliation of the world is a continuing action through the ministry (Rom. 11:15).

apokatallássō. This word does not occur prior to the NT and is found only in Colossians and Ephesians, where it has much the same sense as katallássō. Christ is now the subject as well as God or the plērōma (Col. 1:20, 22; Eph. 2:16). Reconciliation is preceded by human enmity but enables us to stand in the judgment (Col. 1:22). It is connected with the conclusion of peace and a new creation (Eph. 2:15), not merely the removal of guilt. Reconciliation with God brings reconciliation of Jews and Gentiles (Eph. 2:16). It also embraces supraterrestrial beings (Col. 1:20) in what some exegetes see as a restoration of cosmic order, possibly through subjection to Christ (cf. Col. 2:10).

metallássō. "To change," "to exchange." In Rom. 1:25 God's truth, i.e., his self-revelation (1:18ff.), is "changed" into a lie, i.e., the idolatry that sets other things in place of God. This leads in Rom. 1:26 to the "exchanging" of natural relations for unnatural; this sexual perversion is the consequence of the religious perversion. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 251-59]

allēgoréō [to allegorize]

A. The Use of the Term. This verb, with the noun allēgoría, seems to come from the Hellenistic period, probably from Cynic—Stoic philosophy. It means "to speak or to explain allegorically." Thus in Gal. 4:24 the story of Sarah and Hagar is said to be allegorical.

B. The Application of Allegorical Exposition.

---

i.e. id est, that is

1. Allegorizing occurs when traditions are outstripped but not discarded. Thus the Greeks found in it a way to preserve Homeric myths that they found offensive if taken literally. In method, e.g., the handling of names, Jewish and Christian treatment of the OT owed much to the Greek exposition of Homer.

2. Allegorical interpretation of the OT began in Alexandria with Aristobulus (2nd cent. B.C.), who obviously borrowed from the Greeks even though there are some allegories in the OT itself. The Epistle of Aristeas then extracted ethical wisdom from OT ritual. Philo tried to avoid both extreme literalism and extreme allegorizing, but while he did not abandon the literal validity of the text he was notable for the inventiveness of his interpretations. Essential though it was, the literal sense had for him subordinate significance and caused difficulty at points, e.g., in the area of anthropomorphism.

3. Scribal circles in Palestine adopted allegorization too, e.g., in the case of the Song of Songs. Their allegorizing is rarer and less arbitrary than that of Philo. It is narrower in range and closer to the natural sense. But it is not exceptional, and it differs from Philo's, not in principle by retaining historical validity (which Philo also did), but in degree by being less open to Greek rationalism and its criticism of the OT. It finds it consonant with the dignity of Scripture that it should have many meanings, and with this in mind may well have been influenced by Alexandrian developments while taking some steps of its own toward allegorizing. Josephus, who had little occasion to allegorize and could criticize Greek allegorizing (Against Apion 2.255), did not hesitate to allegorize the tent and its furnishings along Alexandrian lines (Antiquities 3.179ff.).

4. Jesus did not use allegory according to the four Gospels, but Paul did in 1 Cor. 5:6ff.; 9:8ff.; 10:1ff.; Gal. 4:21ff. He followed the Palestinian model, not extracting cosmological or psychological lessons, but still allegorizing in the true sense. Distinctively, however, he did so as one living in the time of fulfilment (1 Cor. 10:11) for whom the veil had been removed (2 Cor. 3:14), so that he could now see the true sense which found its focus in Christ. Hebrews offers another example of christological allegorizing along these lines (7:1ff.). [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 260-63]

allēlouiá [Hallelujah]

Based on the Hebrew term for "praise the Lord," and found in the LXX as the heading or conclusion to psalms (104-06; 111-13; 115-17; 135; 146-50), allēluiá occurs in the NT only in Rev. 19:1, 3, 4, 6, where it introduces or merges into victory hymns and forms with amḗn (v. 4) an independent response. [H. SCHLIER, I, 264]

állos [other], allótrios [alien], apallotrióō [to alienate], allogenḗs [foreign], allóphylos [foreign] állos. The meaning is "the other," strictly where there are many, as distinct from héteros where there are only two, but used interchangeably with héteros or for it. In the NT héteros does not occur in the genuine Mark, 1 and 2 Peter, or Revelation, and only once in John (19:37). állos means "the other" where there are only two, e.g., in Mt. 5:39; Jn. 18:16; 19:32. The two words are interchangeable with no obvious

---

OT Old Testament

LXX Septuagint

v. verse

distinction in Mt. 16:14; 1 Cor. 12:8ff.; Heb. 11:35-36. In Gal. 1:6-7 héteros is used for "another gospel" and állos for "which is not another," i.e., which is no gospel at all but a human teaching.

allótrios. "Belonging to another," "alien," "unsuitable," even "hostile." For the most part it has the first sense in the NT (cf. Rom. 14:4; 2 Cor. 10:15; 1 Tim. 5:22; Heb.9:25. It is used as a noun in Lk. 16:12. It means "foreign" or "hostile" in Heb. 11:34, but the NT never uses it for hostile to God.

apallotrióō. "To estrange or alienate," found in the NT only in Col. 1:21 and Eph. 2:12; 4:18 for the state prior to reconciliation. It refers only to this state insofar as it is culpable and not to its presuppositions.

allogenḗs. "Alien," "foreign," found only in Jewish and Christian Greek, e.g., Ex. 29:33; Ob. 11 LXX. The only NT instance is in Lk. 17:18, a reference to the Samaritan leper who returned to give thanks. Elsewhere it occurs only on the inscription on the temple barrier, which was almost certainly Jewish rather than Roman in origin, although Josephus omits the term in his accounts of the inscription, probably to avoid offending his non-Jewish readers (The Jewish War 6.125; 5.194; Antiquities 15.417).

allóphylos. "Of alien descent," "foreign," found from the time of Aeschylus, used in the LXX (Is. 2:6) and Josephus (Antiquities 9.102), and adopted in Acts 10:28 to denote the Gentiles. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 264-67]

allotriepískopos → epískopos; álogos → légō

hamartánō [to sin], hamártēma [sin], hamartía [sin]

A. Sin in the OT.

1. The Words Used in the OT.

a. The LXX with its summary use of hamartía, adikía, anomía, etc. hardly does justice to the rich and flexible Hebrew original and often misses the point, e.g., when "guilt" is in view. The Hebrew terms translated by hamartía and the like (for a full list see TDNT, I, 268-69) do not have an exclusive religious use, so that it is easy in translation either to import this or to weaken it. No uniform or self-contained concept of sin is present in the OT authors, and detailed questions of linguistic history further complicate the matter.

b. The four main roots which carry the idea of sin have the varied senses of "sin or negligence," "rebelling," "guilt," and "error," enough to show the variety of thinking about sin quite apart from the many other roots.

2. The Legal and Theological Content of the OT Concept of Sin.

a. Statistically the root ḥṭ' (with derivatives) is the main term, and this harmonizes with the fact that it offers the best definition. It is basically metaphorical and has the sense of "missing," e.g., the way (Prov. 19:2), what is sought (Prov. 8:36), the mark (Judg. 20:16). While predominantly used for wrong action, the word thus suggests always the idea of going astray. The legal use, of which there are many examples, strengthens the conjecture that the Hebrew term does not have the primary sense of "sin," for what is often in view is transgression of custom, or law, or a treaty, or obligation, with the guilt that this implies (cf. Gen. 43:9).

b. The shift from the legal to the religious use is important inasmuch as it shows that the religious life, too, is seen to be ordered, i.e., that dealings with God must follow a pattern. Yet a root like the term for "to rebel" warns us that a volitional element is involved. In the secular sphere Israel revolts against David's dynasty (1 Kgs. 12:19). As sons rebel against their fathers, so Israel revolts against God (Is. 1:2). What is denoted is a human reaction against the holy and divine. Erring has something of the same dimension, though in its mainly ritual use it describes negligence through ignorance rather than willful transgression (cf. Lev. 4:13). Yet when applied religiously (cf. Job 12:16) it carries the thought that we do not attain to God because we cannot do so. False seers in their quasi-drunken wandering are partly culpable and partly clouded in their minds by God himself (Is. 28:7-8). Seeing no way out of their error, they must suffer the pain of the divine enigma (Job 19:4). For Ps. 119 only study of the law can bring us out of error and its affliction (Ps. 119:67). This darker aspect, however, is not predominant in the OT concept of sin. From a more rational, theological standpoint, sin is what is "unclean." If personal feeling lies behind this concept too, its essential content is failure to keep a norm. The phrase "with a high hand" (e.g., Num. 15:30) assumes that the norm is known (as it was not known, e.g., by the people of Sodom and Gomorrah, Gen. 18:20). Thus in Ps. 32 the one who prays is led to see and confess sin through suffering, i.e., to recognize that even breaches of the ritual, which might not seem to be sin, are really sin against God.

---

Heb. Hebrew

c. The wisdom writings usually have a more intellectual than religious view of sin. By instruction we come to know what is fitting in relation to God and how to apply it to life (as distinct from the fool, Ps. 14:1). Sin is thus folly, to which the righteous are superior. A deeper view occurs in Ex. 20:5; Dt. 5:9, where resistance to God's commands is defined as hatred, and sin is thus an inexplicable process involving such things as abomination, violence, and deception. All this tends to suggest that a theological concept of sin was a later construction. On the other hand, it was also a correct one grounded in firm categories whose validity no one in ancient Israel could contest. Censure, the assertion of guilt, and the knowledge of God's demanding will all meet in it to offer an interpretation of human experience and destiny. If God's will is the supreme law of life, apostasy from God has to come to expression in error, i.e., in terms of what life ought to be and digression from this norm. A connection with the covenant may be discerned at this point. Moreover, whether we regard the aberration as serious or trivial, its character as transgression is established by the concept of God and his order, to which account must be rendered. Violation of God's norm is the substance of the knowledge of sin. In a very bold insight, sin is even seen to serve a purpose by leading to a recognition of the unconditional validity of the divine norm. Human failure is thus ruthlessly set in the divine order and given a religious interpretation as sin (Ps. 51).

d. For the OT as a whole, then, sin is a legal and theological term for what is against the norm. The theological use is prominent but not exclusive. In its rational form it is less a matter of experience than of its theological clarification. The different formulas mediate different theological insights in an attempt to express the underlying religious phenomenon. The concept has many nuances but is not without a certain unity, both being illustrated by the heaping up of synonyms (cf., e.g., Ps. 32:5; Job 34:37; Lev. 16:21). At its root is aberration from the norm, but this may be viewed as either the inner process, the act, or the resultant state. The context rather than the selected root usually shows where the accent lies. In analysis, then, we have to reckon with possibilities ranging from sober intellectual assertion to divine conviction. Yet there will always be a theoretical element which, although of pedagogical value, may tend to reduce multiple religious phenomena to a common denominator. The terms denoting aberration always have a figurative aspect, and it is perhaps the root "to rebel" that brings us closest to the heart of the matter with its stress on motive. Even this, however, imposes a certain intellectual order on the irrational experience. It is thus in prayers that the irrational problem comes out best with their vocabulary of confession or complaint. Significantly, too, the story of the fall avoids the customary terms for sin.

3. Sin and Guilt. Often the terms for sin allude to it in such a way that the translation "guilt" is justifiable or necessary. This is always so when the reference is to the resultant state. Abnormal action and abnormal state are so related that no sharp distinction of vocabulary exists between sin and guilt. The more specific words for guilt belong first to the area of sacral law and bring out its objective character. One could incur guilt unintentionally but the resultant uncleanness (even if not recognized) would be no less a fact than in the case of sin with a high hand, and would need to be set aside by the same ritual as that employed to restore cleanness. Other terms (cf. Ps. 32:1) focus on guilt itself. Emphasis now falls on its intolerable burden (Ps. 38:4). It is the sum of the debts incurred by acts of sin and is manifested in afflictions, which are viewed as punishment for it. The rational or theological character of the OT concept of sin and guilt comes out strongly in the doctrines of expiation and retribution which rest on this basis, though the basis itself is religious.

4. The Story of the Fall (Gen. 3). This story stands aloof from legal concepts and does not influence them. Perhaps using and bending mythological materials, the author depicts the origin and results of sin with childlike force. He does not use the common terms, since these would be out of place in this portrayal of life. Apart from a few hints he lets readers draw their own conclusions, focusing on the events that the terms are meant to explain. He thus brings out far more clearly the sinister reality with which theology and cultus deal.

The basic ideas of the story are the prohibition that expresses the divine will, the clever serpent that sees the apparent disproportion between the transgression and its consequence, the question put to the woman, her readiness for scepticism, the suggestion that the warning is not serious and is only in the divine interest and against human interests, the attractiveness of the fruit, the foolish violation by the woman and the compliance of the man, and the four results: shame at nakedness, hiding from God, subterfuges to excuse the action, and punishment by God.

The stress in this chain of events lies on what is mysteriously indicated by the phrases "being as God" and "knowing good and evil." "Being as God" involves doubt that God's rule is really in the human interest and unconditionally binding. Helped by the serpent, the man and woman see that they can transgress the divine order. Indeed, they believe that practical reason, exalting itself as lord and God, impels them to do so without bothering about religious correctives or divine judgment.

Yet the story also points out that there is no escaping divine accountability. Those who try to be as God finally stand before God like children who have been found out and are full of evasions. The author thus brings out the full absurdity of the Prometheus motif. But he does so with insight into the tragic human situation in which it seems that there is immanent justification—in the desire for culture, the work of thought, and sensual longing—for human hostility to God and the attempt to break free from the divine prohibition. The true reality of sin can be grasped only when one perceives that the divine likeness itself opens up the possibilities of deviation and the unfathomable distress which every act of deviation causes when it comes under the pitiless divine glance.

In spite of aetiological features, then, the story in its totality offers a perspective on human existence as a whole. The curses undoubtedly explain common features of human life, just as the realization of nakedness explains the general use of clothing. Nevertheless, the explanations carry weight only because they relate, not to an isolated act, but to an act that is typical of the way that all of us act toward God and incur guilt before him. The aetiology thus extends beyond details—even such momentous details as sorrow, work, shame, and death—to the reality of sin as the real force behind all human unrest and unhappiness. Incidentally, shame at nakedness serves very well to express the shame, the insecurity, and the secretiveness that result from sin, quite apart from the problem of sexuality which it also involves.

A more general aetiological explanation justifies us in building on the story a doctrine of original sin in the sense of universal sinfulness. Sin is motivated by a human impulse that is present in all of us, so that in thousands of variations we will all be tempted similarly and sin similarly. The uncontrolled intellect is in conflict with religion, and freedom of will and thought prepares the ground for sin. By making the serpent the representative of the uncontrolled intellect, the author stresses the demonic character of the thinking which derives from doubt and engages in fanatical striving. This comes over us like an outside force, strengthens existing desires, and thus overpowers uncritical obedience. Our experienced inability to resist at this point compels us to recognize the general validity of the phenomenon. Wishing and to some extent able to be wiser than God and to pierce behind his thoughts, we open up a sphere of mistrust in which we renounce our proper attitude as creatures, regard the Creator with cynicism, and act as though we were ourselves God, responsible only to ourselves. Since reason and the power of judgment are native to us, the motive for sinning is present just as necessarily as life itself.

The author, however, is not trying to give a theological but a popular account. Piety rather than theology comes to expression in his simple presentation. An unsparing desire for truth gives it its unforgettable impress. Nowhere else in the OT do we find religious discussion that is so penetrating and yet so sustained by piety. The narrator is not spinning a theory but speaking out of the compelling experience of inner tension and trying to give his readers some sense of the serious situation which is inseparable from human existence. Why God made us thus, he does not try to say. His religion is to be found in this silence. [G. QUELL, I, 267-86]

B. Theological nuances of hamartía in the LXX. This section supplements A. and D. of this article and B. of the article on hamartōlós by pointing out some important nuances that are partly deliberate and partly due to difficulties of translation. First of all, the LXX gives greater prominence to arrogance as the chief sin by rendering arrogant as hamartōlós (Sir. 11:9). Sin is also identified with wealth (Hab. 3:14). Again, it is sickness (Is. 53:4; Dt. 30:3). In Job 42 the LXX stresses the thought of forgiveness, which is only hinted at in the Hebrew, i.e., by substituting the idea of Job's sin for God's wrath in v. 7 and bringing in the idea of remission in v. 9. A similar replacement of God's wrath by human transgression occurs in Judg. 1:18 (cf. Is. 57:17). Sin is equated with apostasy in 2 Chr. 12:2 (cf. 30:7). Folly or ignorance can also be rendered hamartía according to the familiar OT thought that folly is sin. The idea of sin is introduced into Is. 66:4 with its reference to the cause of punishment rather than the punishment itself (cf. 24:6). A spiritualization may be found in Ezek. 23:49. The thought of the school of suffering, which presupposes a strong sense of sin, is read into Job 15:11. The thrust of the LXX, then, is to make hamartía a general term for sin. In so doing it brings individual sins under the concept of the basic sin which separates us from God and controls us so long as we do not receive God's saving work. For linguistic details, see TDNT, I, 286ff. [G. BERTRAM, I, 286-89]

C. The Concept of Sin in Judaism.

1. The concept of the law is determinative in Judaism. The law as a whole, legal as well as cultic and moral, reveals God's will. Hence every transgression is sin. Two trends develop: one to level down, since even minor infringements are still sin; the other to differentiate, e.g., between flagrant misdeeds, acts of rebellion, and unwitting offenses. Based on this distinction such sins as violence, licentiousness, and especially idolatry are seen to be mortal, since to commit them is to commit every sin, whereas less serious offenses can be expiated by good works, purifications, and sufferings.

2. The tendency in Judaism is to regard sin as individual rather than collective (cf. Ezek. 18:2ff.). Sin as the individual's transgression has individual consequences. The commandment is taken to mean that God visits the fathers' sins on their refractory children to the third and fourth generation. Yet a sense of the general effects of even individual sins remains. The universality of sin finds no opponents. If Israelites sin by breaking the law, the Gentiles sin by breaking the Adamic and Noachic covenants, or even by refusing the law when it is offered to them. Exceptions to universal sinfulness are seen in such saints as Moses and Elijah, and avoidance of sin is possible through freedom and the gift of the law. Furthermore, it is fully expected both that the Messiah will be sinless and that sin will be set aside and sinlessness established in the messianic kingdom.

3. As for the rise of sin, it is traced to Adam and Eve, or at times to the fallen angels (Gen. 6:1ff.). More basically, sin has its origin in the evil impulse which is implanted by God, which entices to sin, and which may and must be overthrown by observance of the law. If it is not, sin brings such consequences as further sinning, separation from God, disruption of God's gracious purpose, and the punishments of sickness, death, and eternal damnation. But in respect of all these penalties we have the opportunity to repent and return to God. We sin, but God shows us the way of conversion before we die. [G. STÄHLIN and W. GRUNDMANN, I, 289-93]

D. The Linguistic Usage and History of hamartánō, hamártēma, and hamartía before and in the NT.

1. hamartánō, meaning "not to hit," "to miss," occurs from Homer and is also used figuratively for "to fall short intellectually," "to err," or "'to fall short morally," "to do wrong." In the LXX the moral sense is predominant.

2. hamártēma denotes the result of hamartánō, "fault," first due to folly, later, especially in law, in the sense of "offense." In the LXX it usually has a moral or religious sense, "sin," or "punishment of sin." It is rare in the NT.

3. hamartía, also used figuratively from the first, refers more to the nature of the act. It is a comprehensive term with intellectual and legal as well as ethical applications, and it can cover all wrong actions from simple errors to crimes. Aristotle defines it as missing virtue because of weakness, accident, or defective knowledge. Later, guilt is associated with it. In the LXX it is synonymous with hamártēma and carries the full sense of moral guilt and conscious opposition to God, expressing the Godward reference more clearly and fully than adikía or kakía. In the NT it stands for "offense against God with a stress on guilt" and is used a. for the individual act (e.g., Acts 2:38; 1 Tim. 5:22; Rev. 1:5; 1 Pet. 2:22; Heb. 1:3), often with the remission of sins in view (Mk. 2:5; Acts 7:60), in Paul usually only in quotations (e.g., Rom. 4:7-8, though cf. Rom. 7:5); b. for sin as human nature in its hostility to God (e.g., Jn. 9:41; 1 Jn. 3:5; 1 Cor. 15:17; Rom. 3:20; Heb. 4:15; and c. for personified sin (e.g., Rom. 5-7; Heb. 12:1. Behind the third use stands the idea of a demon "sin," but what we have in the NT is probably poetic imagery. [G. STÄHLIN, I, 293-96]

E. Sin and Guilt in Classical Greek and Hellenism.

1. Classical Greek does not have the thought of sin as enmity against God, but only of defect and guilt, i.e., missing the mark by error or by guilt. In view are intellectual and artistic as well as moral senses, i.e., all failures to do what is right. Other terms had to be added to express the idea of guilt.

2. Guilt arises through individual acts, ranging earlier from cultic neglect or perjury to social injustices. It is known by way of misfortunes inflicted by the gods as guardians of law and order.

3. By the sixth century the Greek world becomes aware of the riddle of human destiny and the inevitability of guilt. The mysteries express this with the ideas of original guilt (the soul's exile in the body) and the threat of death. Guilt is now seen as a disruption of order that must be made good by suffering. Guilt is associated with human limitation (e.g., of knowledge) and is thus posited by life itself. It has to be accepted and confessed. To this unavoidable guilt is added personal guilt through failure to heed divine warnings and ultimately through ignorance. Right understanding will thus lead to right action (cf. Socrates and Greek tragedy), although understanding may come only through suffering or paradigms of suffering. Plato, however, lays a greater stress on individual choice, while Aristotle uses the hamartía group for mistakes, or for deviations from the mean, and divests it of the association with moral guilt.

4. After Aristotle rationalism destroys the serious concept of guilt. But the idea of fate remains. In the mysteries and Hellenistic mysticism the hamartía group is used for predetermined destiny which is the cause of guilt but eliminates personal responsibility, redemption being offered by the rites or by gnṓsis.

5. Phrygian and Lydian religion offers an exception with the concept of omnipotent deity willing the good and punishing transgressions such as failing to give thanks, cultic violation, and a series of moral offenses. Sickness is a penalty for sin, which consists of the act, not an inner disposition, so that expiation aims at the restoration of health or cultic normalcy. [G. STÄHLIN and W. GRUNDMANN, I, 296-302]

F. Sin in the NT.

1. The Synoptic Gospels and Acts.

a. In the Synoptics the role of the group is comparatively slight. Jesus does not speak about sin but acts in awareness of it, and is conscious of being the victor over it.

b. His mission is to proclaim the divine lordship in his word and work. This proclamation evokes a sense of distance from God and thus leads to confession and conversion (cf. Lk. 15:18, 21). Sin means guilt toward God and thus demands penitence. Knowing that he has come to call sinners to repentance (Mt. 9:13), Jesus accepts solidarity with them (Mt. 9:10), victoriously bringing forgiveness (cf. Lk. 5:8; 7:37ff.; 19:1-2). His attitude and word of forgiveness are the extraordinary, eschatological breaking in of the divine lordship, as emerges in the Lord's Supper (cf. Mt. 26:28 and Jer. 31:31ff.). Jesus is the servant who by his death and resurrection carries away sin (cf. Is. 53:12). Sin is unforgivable only when people recognize the mission of Jesus by the Holy Spirit but defy and resist it (Mt. 12:31-32).

c. That Jesus is the victor over sin is expressed in his name (Mt. 1:21). The mission of the Baptist prepares his way with its call for confession (Mt. 3:6) and baptism with a view to remission (Mk. 1:4). Jesus himself brings fulfilment with the word and act of forgiveness. The apostles continue his ministry with proclamation of the accomplished salvation. Unlike Jesus, who confers it by fellowship, they summon their hearers to receive it by repentance (Acts 2:38), the difference from the Baptist being that they can now declare a completed, not an awaited basis of forgiveness. The usual sense of sin here is the individual act, hence the normal use in the plural.

2. John. John, too, presents Christ as the victor over sin, more specifically by taking it away in his death (cf. 1 Jn. 3:5). This atoning work has universal significance (1 Jn. 2:2). It rests on Christ's own sinlessness as the one who does his Father's will (Jn. 8:46). Sin here is action that contradicts the divine ordinance (1 Jn. 3:4). It derives from ungodliness, is universal, involves sins against others, and brings guilt and separation from God (Jn. 9:31; 1 Jn. 3:8) in servitude to demonic power (Jn. 8:34). The mission of Jesus ushers in a new situation expressed in the term krísis, i.e., division and decision. Christ's coming shows sin to be hatred of God. In face of him the decision is made that divides people (Jn. 9:41). Those who reject Christ die in sin (1 Jn. 5:16-17). But those who receive him find forgiveness (1 Jn. 1:9) as they confess their sin. The Spirit continues the sifting work of Christ (Jn. 16:8-9). Deliverance from sin is achieved in the community as believers are born of God, receive faith and knowledge, and work out the new situation in love (cf. 1 Jn. 3:6, 9). Tension naturally arises as Christians do in fact sin, but they can maintain a basic sinlessness through the advocacy of Christ (1 Jn. 2:1) and reciprocal intercession (1 Jn. 5:16). In Revelation Christ's loving work delivers us from the sinful world order (1:5). His blood has atoning power. Our task in the end-time is to keep ourselves from the increasing power of sin (18:4-5). By a final and definitive act God will destroy the universal dominion of sin from which we are already liberated.

3. Paul.

a. Paul's view is oriented to God's work in Christ, which (1) comes on us in the specific reality of sin, and (2) rescues us from this reality and reshapes us.

b. Paul's view of sin arises out of his own experience under revelation. From legal blamelessness (Phil. 3:6) he is driven to see and confess the sin of persecuting the church (1 Cor. 15:9) which resulted from attempted self-righteousness and hence from opposition to God even in zeal for his law. Sin for him is thus at its root hostility to God. It entered the world through Adam (Rom. 5) and therefore through freedom, but it subjected us to itself and brought death as its wages (Rom. 6:23). Paul thus connects sin with universal destiny, but does not depict it as a necessity of creatureliness. The act of Adam, death, and the general state of sin are interconnected. Judgment, revealed in Christ, rests on our being as such. The state of sin exists from Adam, but it is made clear only by the law, which actualizes sin and reveals its character (cf. Rom. 8:7), namely, as responsible guilt in enmity against God. Our carnal reality is sinful, not in the sense that sin is equated with the body, but in the sense that we are determined by sin in our carnal being. The law leads to individual sins by stimulating desires that oppose the divine claim. The nerve of individual sins is the failure to acknowledge God (Rom. 1:21). This gives all sins the character of guilt before God and results in sinning as the penalty of sin (Rom. 1:24ff.). Using God's holy will to enhance its power, sin has a demonic quality (Rom. 7:13), enslaving us (7:14) and handing us over to death, so that we cannot fulfil the law (7:15ff.; cf. Eph. 2:1). The law, however, still discharges its holy function by unmasking sin.

c. The Christ event strikes us in this reality of sin. Christ comes from God to judge and destroy sin (2 Cor. 5:21). The sinless Jesus became sin in vicarious atonement through crucifixion and resurrection. Christ can represent us because of our solidarity in sin. Thus the Christ event overcomes sin for us all. Its coming to us releases us from sin and constitutes us anew. Justified by faith, we have remission of sins (cf. Eph. 1:7). By fellowship with Christ in baptism, we are dead to sin (Rom. 6:2). Having died to it, we are free from it (6:7), we are no longer under the law (6:14), we are the servants of righteousness (6:14), and we need not continue in sin (6:1). Freedom from sin means the obedience of faith (cf. 14:23) and is expressed in love of the brethren (1 Cor. 8:12). But tension exists between the somatic life, which is given up to death, and the pneumatic life, which has overcome death (Rom. 8:10). This tension continues until Christ comes again and definitively abolishes sin and death (1 Cor. 15:26).

4. The Other NT Writings.

a. Hebrews views sin from the cultic standpoint, presenting Christ as the true and sinless high priest with the one offering for sin in contrast to human high priests with their repeated offerings for themselves and the people. Christ's offering terminates the cultus by bringing forgiveness and initiating the messianic age (10:17-18). Believers in the present time of affliction are to resist sin (12:1) and to avoid especially the deliberate sin of apostasy (10:26).

b. James derives sin from desire, relates it to the will, and finds its end in death (1:14-15). Sin is an act (2:9) and includes failure to do good. Confession and prayer bring forgiveness (5:15-16). To rescue others from sin is a Christian ministry (5:19-20).

c. 1 Peter proclaims Christ as the victor over sin by his voluntary submission and atoning death as the servant of the Lord (2:22, 24; 3:18).

In the NT as a whole the decisive feature is the realization that Christ is victor and that the new age has dawned in and with him. His victory is a victory over sin, which is (1) a reality that determines humanity and (2) a rejection of God's claim in human self-assertion. The victory consists of the saving action by which sin is forgiven and life is constituted anew. [W. GRUNDMANN, I, 302-16]

hamartōlós [sinner, sinful], anamártētos [without sin]

hamartōlós (→ telṓnēs, asebés, ádikos). Meaning "sinner" or "sinful," this word can be a value judgment for a class of people (cf. Mk. 2:16) as well as a description of our natural relationship to God.

A. hamartōlós in the Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. The basic thought is "not hitting" or "missing." It is used for a. the intellectually and b. the morally inferior.

2. On inscriptions it occurs in a sacral context but hardly seems to have the full religious sense of sinner.

3. Neither the Stoics nor Philo and Josephus use the term for the sinner.

4. It seems not to have been fully connected with hamartía in the Greek world, nor to have found much literary use, because it was a popular term with an ironical or disreputable flavor. It suggests inordinate negation of right and custom and is strongly derogatory if not an actual term of abuse.

B. harmartōlós in the LXX and Its Hebrew Equivalents.

1. In contrast, the term is common in the LXX, mostly for Heb. rāša', either as an adjective or a noun.

2. The occurrence is predominantly for the "sinners" of the Psalms, who are the opposite of the righteous, i.e., Jews boasting of the law and covenant but breaking the commandments (Ps. 10:7), proud of their folly (49:13), trusting in wealth (49:6), oppressing others, and even ignoring God. Basic to this polemical judgment is the insight that these sinners have a wrong attitude to the law and hence to the God whose will it reveals. The righteous, too, may become sinners but are not sinners in this deeper sense in which sin embraces, not just acts, but the whole attitude and the life which it produces. This usage continues in later Judaism with an even stronger emphasis on regard for the law, the study of which alone will keep us from sin, and rejection of which means separation from God. In both the OT and the rabbis the term has something of a contemptuous accent.

3. hamartōlós is obviously well adapted to express what is meant by the Hebrew term but in so doing it acquires more of a volitional character, since the law as a revelation of God's will demands decision. It also becomes a religious term, for it now comes into relation with the concept of God.

C. The Development of the Concept of the Sinner in Later Judaism.

1. a. For the rabbis the law is a manifestation of God to Israel and to the whole of humanity. By it the holy God sanctifies his people. This means that those who have the law are by nature holy, whereas those outside it (the Gentiles) are by nature sinners.

b. Those who have and keep the law are kept from sin in an ethical and not just a legal sense, but those who are outside Israel have no similar possibility. This is due to their rejection of the law, and it comes to light in their idolatry, ritual uncleanness, lack of sexual ethics, and general misconduct.

2. This suggests that the righteous, while they may commit sins, do not think of themselves as sinners in an absolute sense. Ideas of general sinfulness and collective sin are present but the possibility of sinlessness through the law is also asserted (cf. Lk. 18:11-12; Phil. 3:6), and there is a sense of distinction from "sinners" through a positive relation to the law. Even the sin of the Gentiles is not an imposed destiny but is by historical decision.

D. The New Testament.

1. The Lexical Evidence. In the NT hamartōlós, which is both an adjective and a noun, still has a derogatory nuance and is used a. for those living in conscious opposition to God's will in the law (cf. Mt. 9:10), or the woman in Simon's house (Lk. 7:37), in distinction from respectable people (Mt. 11:19; cf. 1 Tim. 1:9; Jms. 4:8); b. by Pharisees for those who do not keep their ordinances, i.e., most of the people, including Jesus and his disciples (cf. Mt. 9:13; 12:1ff.; 15:2); c. by the Jews for Gentiles (Mt. 26:45; Gal. 2:15), a usage avoided in Acts; d. for guilty humanity as it is yet without Christ and unreconciled (Rom. 5:8; Gal. 2:16ff.); e. for individuals who have fallen into specific guilt (Lk. 13:2; 15:7, 10; Heb. 7:26); and f. adjectivally in all the above senses. In Rom. 7:13 hamartía becomes hamartōlós beyond measure in the sense that the law gives sin self-awareness and thus brings its character to light and opens up the way to liberation from it.

2. The Attitude of Jesus.

a. Reckoning with sin's reality, though not analyzing it, Jesus adopts current formulas (not ironically) and utilizes them in his mission. He regards those called sinners as true sinners and draws them to himself, a sense of righteousness being the real obstacle rather than a sense of unworthiness, since Jesus has come to meet the need of sin.

b. Mediating total fellowship with himself and God, he thus accepts people as they are, requiring only a confession of need, not of specific sins, opposing the idea that a right relation with God comes by legal observance, and by his kindness, holiness, and majesty inducing renunciation of self-will and readiness for absolute obedience. Only rarely is hamartōlós used in self-description (cf. Lk. 5:8; 18:13); Jesus does not demand awareness of sin to the point of abject self-contempt and self-condemnation.

c. The righteous, too, need a new relation to God. Jesus does not call their righteousness sin but judges its inner character as that which meets only human and not divine standards, and leads to complacency, pride, and cruelty, so that the righteous, too, are called to repentance. In this way Jesus transcends the distinction between righteous and sinners, but in so doing he brings a universal offer of forgiveness and of a new and submissive relation to God, the only limit to the removal of sin by Jesus being unwillingness that it should be removed.

3. The Attitude of the NT Writers. This is the same as that of Jesus except that the cross keeps the NT writers from regarding only others as sinners. Hence hamartōlós is uncommon outside the Synoptists and does not occur in Acts, while in John only the Pharisees use it. For Paul it is a strong term that he applies to himself, signifying rejection of God’s lordship. The new feature is the absence of any frontier between sinners and the righteous, the new frontier being between those who are still subject to sin and those who in Christ are rescued from sin and put in the service of God. This is a sharper frontier, but it involves no sense of superiority, since believers do not magnify themselves as righteous but magnify the grace by which they are righteous and seek to point all people to this way of grace, since it is for them too.

anamártētos. This word, found from the time of Herodotus, is common and means “without fault,” either in a general sense or in a figurative though not necessarily moral or religious sense. It occurs three times in the LXX, in 2 Macc. 8:4 for “guiltless before God.” Philo uses it without any Godward reference, but it has this in the one instance in Josephus The Jewish War 7.329.

The only NT example is in Jn. 8:7 where Jesus challenges those who are without fault to cast the first stone at the woman taken in adultery. The obvious meaning of anamártētos is guiltless before God, but the context seems to rule out any specific reference to sexual sin. Oddly, the word is not used for the sinlessness of Jesus, perhaps to bring out the greatness of his freedom from sin by avoiding any suggestion that it was a mere inability to sin. [K. H. RENGSTORF, I, 317-35]

ámemptos → mémphomai; ametanóētos → metanoéō

amḗn [Amen]

A. Amen in the OT and Judaism. The OT uses the term in relation to both individuals and the community 1. to confirm the acceptance of tasks whose performance depends on God’s will (1 Kgs. 1:36), 2. to confirm the application of divine threats or curses (Num. 5:22), and 3. to attest the praise of God in response to doxology (1 Chr. 16:36). In every case acknowledgment of what is valid or binding is implied. In Judaism Amen is widely used, e.g., in response to praises, to the Aaronic blessing of Num. 6:24ff., to vows, and to prayers. It denotes concurrence, or in the case of a vow commitment, or at the end of one’s own prayer the hope for its fulfilment. The LXX mostly renders the Hebrew term by génoito, which retains the idea of validity but weakens that of commitment to a claim.

B. amén in the NT and Early Christianity. The NT mostly takes over the Hebrew as it stands and uses it in three ways.

1. As an acclamation in worship, it signifies response (Rev. 5:14; cf. Justin Apology 65.3; Did. 10.6).

2. At the conclusion of prayers and doxologies (e.g., Gal. 1:5; Eph. 3:21; 1 Tim. 1:17; 1 Clem. 20.12 for doxologies, 1 Clem. 45.8; Mart. Pol. 14.3 for prayers), it expresses the priority of prayer and doxology.

Along the same lines it can occur at the end of a prophecy (Rev. 1:7) or book (Gal. 6:18; Rev. 22:20). It can also be put at the beginning of a doxology, especially where a transition is made (Rev. 19:4). In Rev. 1:7 it is set close to the divine Yes, but Rev. 22:20 shows that it is the church's answer to the divine Yes, which is here the basis of the eschatological petition. The sense in 2 Cor. 1:20 is the same, for God's Yes in Christ is the firm foundation for the Amen of the community. Christ himself as the true witness can be called "the Amen" in his own response to the divine Yes that is declared in him (Rev. 3:14).

3. When Jesus places Amen before his own sayings, both in the Synoptics and (liturgically doubled) in John, the point is to stress the truth and validity of the sayings by his own acknowledgment of them. The sayings vary in content but all relate to the history of the kingdom of God as this is bound up with his own person, so that in the Amen we have all Christology in a nutshell. Acknowledging his word, Jesus affirms it in his life and thus makes it a claim on others. [H. SCHLIER, I, 335-38]

amíantos → miaínō

amnós, arḗn, arníon [lamb]

amnós. Attested from classical times and used in the LXX, this word occurs four times in the NT, always with reference to Jesus as the innocent lamb who suffers vicariously for others (Jn. 1:29, 36; Acts 8:32; 1 Pet. 1:19). Since Judaism does not call the Redeemer a lamb, two derivations have been sought: first, in the fact that the servant of the Lord in Is. 53:7 (cf. Acts 3:13; 4:27) is compared to a lamb (cf. Acts 8:32), and second, in that Jesus was crucified at the Passover and thus came to be seen as the paschal lamb (1 Cor. 5:7). The Aramaic might also offer a basis with its use of the same word for both "lamb" and "boy or servant." Thus the Baptist in Jn. 1:29, 36 might have been describing Jesus as the servant of God who takes away the sin of the world in vicarious self-offering (Is. 53). But the writer, in Greek, perceives a reference to the paschal lamb (cf. Jn. 19:36) whose blood blots out sins (→ aírō) by expiation. In any case the description of Jesus as amnós expresses 1. his patience in suffering (Acts 8:32), 2. his sinlessness (1 Pet. 1:19), and 3. the efficacy of his vicarious death (Jn. 1:29; 1 Pet. 1:19), which like the Passover initiates a new age, brings redemption (from sin), and establishes the people of God (extended now to believers from all nations).

arḗn. This word for "lamb" occurs only in Lk. 10:3, where, in antithesis to wolves, it expresses 1. the dangerous position of the defenseless disciples but also 2. the certainty of divine protection.

arníon. Originally a diminutive of arḗs ("little lamb"), and found four times in the LXX (e.g., Jer. 11:19), this word occurs in the NT once in Jn. 21:15 and 29 times in Revelation. "My lambs" of Jn. 21:15 are members of the community as the objects of Jesus' loving care. In Revelation Christ himself is called arníon 28 times, and antichrist as his antitype is called arníon once. It is sometimes argued that "ram" is here the correct translation in view of the references to the seven horns (5:6) and his wrath (6:16-17) and warfare (17:14). Indeed, a connection is even made with the zodiac. But Dan. 8:3 suggests the seven horns, while there is little philological justification for "ram," and the fact that the arníon is "slain" offers a link to the idea of Jesus as the sacrificial lamb (amnós). As Redeemer and Ruler, the lamb of Revelation a. vicariously shed his blood (5:9) and bears the marks of his slaughter (5:6); b. has defeated death (5:5-6) and is omnipotent and omniscient (5:6); c. takes over divine rule, opening the book (5:8ff.), receiving adoration (5:8ff.), establishing a reign of peace (7:9), overcoming demonic powers (17:14), and judging (6:16-17; 13:8); and d. is Lord of lords and King of kings (17:14), holding his marriage feast with the community (19:9) and sharing God's throne in rule over his people (22:1, 3). [J. JEREMIAS, I, 338-41]

ámpelos [vine]

Jesus compares himself with the “vine” in Jn. 15:1ff. to show the disciples’ dependence on fellowship with him and their intensive nurture by God. Jesus is the “true vine,” not as distinct from literal vines, but from others who might figuratively be called vines. The image is a common one in the OT, e.g., for Israel (Hos. 10:1) and the wife (Ps. 128:3); it is also used for wisdom (Sir. 24:17), and the Messiah (Syr. Bar. 36ff.). In later Near Eastern texts the term indicates heavenly messengers and beings from the world of light, and it may be in distinction from these that Jesus is called the “true vine.” [J. BEHM, I, 342-43]

ámōmos, amṓmētos* → mṓmos; anabaínō → baínō; angéllō → angelía; anagennáō → *gennáō

anaginṓskō [to read], anágnōsis [public reading] anaginṓskō means “to know exactly,” “to recognize,” and is mostly used to refer to (public) reading, e.g., a letter (Acts 15:31; 1 Th. 5:27) or the title on the cross (Jn. 19:20); usually the OT (Mk. 2:25, etc.), publicly in Lk. 4:16; Acts 13:27; the Daniel apocalypse (Mk. 13:14); the prophecy of Revelation (Rev. 1:3); and the NT (Justin Apology 67.3-4). anágnōsis, meaning “knowledge” or “recognition,” is also used for public reading, as of documents or the OT, and occurs in this sense in the NT (e.g., Acts 13:15; 2 Cor. 3:14; 1 Tim. 4:13) and the early church (e.g., Clement of Alexandria paedagogus 2.10.96.2). [R. BULTMANN, I, 343-44]

anankázō [to compel], anankaíos [compelling], anánkē [compulsion]

A. anank- outside the NT. The root refers basically to compulsion and the means of compulsion. As a necessary condition of life this may be 1. a cosmic principle, first personified as the divinity of being, then rationalized as immanent necessity, then repersonified in Hellenism as the inscrutable force controlling all reality. In cosmological dualism it may also be 2. the constraint or constraints which oppose spirit, the main aim in ethical life being to subject these to reason. In the OT the Greek word is used for the Hebrew “constraint” in the sense, not of a natural condition, but of divinely imposed afflictions such as persecution or sickness. Rabbinic theology uses the equivalent for the messianic tribulation.

B. anank- in the NT. Since acknowledgment of God as Creator and Preserver of the world leaves no room for necessity, the NT, like the OT, uses the term 1. to express a situation of need, such as a. the messianic tribulation (Lk. 21:23), and b. the afflictions of Paul (2 Cor. 12:10) or the community (1 Cor. 7:26); 2. to describe the apostolic office: it is a divine constraint which Paul cannot escape, being part of God’s plan of salvation (1 Cor. 9:16); 3. to denote the divine order (Rom. 13:5; Mt. 18:7). [W. GRUNDMANN, I, 344-47]

anágnōsis* → anaginṓskō; anadeíknymi → deíknymi; anazáō → zōḗ; anáthema, anathematízō, anáthēma → anatíthēmi; anakainízō, anakainóō, anakaínōsis → kainós; anakalýptō → kalýptō,; anákeimai* → keímai; anakephalaióō → kephalḗ; anakrázō → krázō; analambánō, análēmpsis → lambánō; anakrínō, anákrisis → *krínō

analogía [proportion]

análogos “corresponding to lógos ”; hence analogía, “correspondence,” “proportion.” In Rom. 12:6 the charism of prophecy is to be in correspondence to faith, not as what is believed (cf. vv. 3, 6), but as the actual believing. There can be no exercise of gifts such as healing without faith, but there may be inauthentic exercise of prophecy (cf. 1 Cor. 12:10; 14:29). Hence the reminder that prophesying is to be in proportion to one's faith. [G. KITTEL, I, 347-48]

vv. verses

análysis, analýō → lýō; anamártētos → hamartōlós

anámnēsis [remembrance], hypómnēsis [remembrance]

anámnēsis means "remembrance" or "recollection." In Heb. the sin offerings cannot remove sins but remind us of them (cf. Num. 5:15). In 1 Cor. 11:24 Christians are to enact the Lord's Supper in a recollection of Jesus which has the form of active re-presentation as the action of Jesus and the disciples is repeated. hypómnēsis in 2 Tim. 1:5 and 2 Pet. 1:13; 3:1 has much the same sense. [J. BEHM, I, 348-49]

ananeóō → néos; anáxios → áxios

anapaúo [to cause to rest], anápausis [rest], epanapaúō [to rest on] anapaúō. a. "To cause to cease"; b. "to give rest," "refresh"; c. "to rest"; d. "to remain at rest"; e. "to rest on." In the NT the word can mean bodily rest (c), as in Mk. 6:31, but more commonly it denotes refreshment (b), as in 1 Cor. 16:18. In Revelation it has an eschatological reference, "to rest from labor" (b) in 14:13, and "to tarry," i.e., await (d) in 6:11. God's Spirit is the subject in 1 Pet. 4:14: "to rest on" (e). Christ's saving work is to give rest (b) in Mt. 11:28.

anápausis. a. "Cessation," "interruption"; b. "rest"; c. "place of rest"; d. "day of rest." Instead of the rest given by wisdom, Jesus offers true rest (b) with the gospel (Mt. 11:28-29). Without "cessation" (a) is the sense in Rev. 4:8, "place of rest" (c) in Mt. 12:43.

epanapaúō. A late and rare word: a. "to rest on," b. "to lean on." Peace will rest on the house (a) according to Lk. 10:6, while rest in possession of the law (a) is meant in Rom. 2:17. [O. BAUERNFEIND, I, 350-51]

→ katapaúō, katápausis

anaplēróō → plēróō; anástasis → anístēmi; anastauróō → staurós; anastréphō, anastrophḗ → stréphō

anatéllō [to rise], anatolḗ [rising]

anatéllō. "To cause to come forth" or (intransitive) "to come forth," used in the NT for "to spring forth" in Heb. 7:14 (cf. Jer. 23:5) or "to shine forth" in 2 Pet. 1:19 (cf. Num. 24:17) with no precise distinction.

anatolḗ. 1. "Rising of stars"; 2. "sunrise" as a quarter of heaven, i.e., the east, either as a place of good (Rev. 7:2) or of bad (Rev. 16:12); 3. perhaps the Messiah in Lk. 1:78 (cf. Jer. 23:5; Zech. 3:8; 6:12 LXX), or the shining of a star from heaven (cf. v. 79 and Philo On the Confusion of Tongues 14). Justin and Melito in the early church see in Christ's advent the rising of a star (Justin Dialogue with Trypho 100.4 etc.) or the dawn of heavenly light. [H. SCHLIER, I, 351-53]

anatíthēmi [to set forth], prosanatíthēmi [to consult], anáthema [cursed], anáthēma [cursed], katáthema [accursed], anathematízō [to curse], katathematízō [to curse]

anatíthēmi (prosanatíthēmi). Used in the NT only in the middle with dative of person and accusative of object, this word means "to set forth one's cause" (Acts 25:14) or "to expound with a request for counsel, approval, or decision" (Gal. 2:2). prosanatíthēmi has the latter sense "to submit for approval, consideration, or judgment" in Gal. 1:16 and 2:6. The rendering "to impart something" in 2:6 is linguistically insecure and does not fit the context. "To impose an added burden" is not supported by outside references (cf. Acts 15:28).

anáthema, anáthēma, katáthema. ana;thema and anáthēma are variants for a. "something dedicated to deity," b. "something put under divine curse."

1. The NT has the first sense only in Lk. 21:5 (temple offerings).

2. Paul uses the term for the object of a curse. Calling Jesus accursed is a self-contradiction for Christians in 1 Cor. 12:3. Handing over to God's judicial wrath is the idea in 1 Cor. 16:22 (cf. Gal. 1:8; Rom. 9:3). Paul's readiness for this on behalf of his people (Rom. 9:3) is a supreme instance of his devotion to the gospel and his race. katáthema, a rare word, is equivalent to anáthema (perhaps a sharper form) in Rev. 22:3: There will not be "anything accursed" in the New Jerusalem as there was in the first Paradise (Gen. 3:17ff.).

3. In Acts 23:14 the meaning is a vow or obligation whose breach brings under a curse.

anathematízō, katathematízō. "To bring under the anathema," "to curse." Those who plotted against Paul in Acts 23:12, 21 put themselves under a curse, or under God's judgment, if they did not make every effort to fulfil their obligation. Peter in Mk. 14:71 puts himself under a curse if he is lying, or puts the people under a curse if they make out that he is a disciple. katathematízō has the same sense in the parallel passage in Mt. 26:74. [J. BEHM, I, 353-56]

anaphérō → phḗrō; anápsyxis → psychḗ; andrízomai → anḗr

anénklētos [blameless]

The word anénklētos means "blameless," "guiltless," normally in an everyday and even formal sense.

1. The NT uses it in this more general way when Titus is to see that presbyters, and Timothy that deacons, are "blameless" (Tit. 1:6; 1 Tim. 3:10).

2. The word has a more religious sense in 1 Cor. 1:8 and Col. 1:22. Christians are blameless, and will be presented as such at the judgment, on the basis of Christ's reconciling death and resurrection (cf. Rom. 8:33-34). Presupposed are God's help (1 Cor. 1:8) and continuation in faith (Col. 1:23). [W. GRUNDMANN, I, 356-57]

anektós → anéchō; aneleḗmōn, anéleos → éleos

anexereúnētos [inscrutable]

This postclassical word means "inscrutable" and is used in Rom. 11:33 for the mystery of God's way of judgment with Israel that leads to grace. The term implies that the question of the meaning of this judgment cannot be given any theoretical human answer. [G. DELLING, I, 357]

anexíkakos → kakós

anexichníastos [fathomless]

The meaning "indetectable" is found only in biblical and postbiblical usage (e.g., Job 5:9; 9:10 LXX). In the NT the word occurs in Rom. 11:33 and Eph. 3:8. The parallelism in Rom. 11:33 suggests a poetic source (with a Gnostic tinge). Eph. 3:8 in context points in the same direction. Irenaeus (Against Heresies 1.10.3) quotes Rom. 11:33 in his anti-Gnostic polemic. [E. PETERSON, I, 358-59]

anepílēmptos* → lambánō; ánesis → *aniḗmi

anéchō [to endure], anektós [tolerable], anochḗ [forbearance]

1. "To receive," "take up," "bear," "endure." Thus one "receives" the word (Heb. 13:22; 2 Tim. 4:3), "accepts" people (2 Cor. 11:1), "puts up" with them (Mk. 9:19), "receives" or "bears" afflictions (2 Th. 1:4), and "endures" in the absolute (1 Cor. 4:12); cf. in the absolute the verbal adjective anektós ("tolerable") in Lk. 10:12.

2. "To restrain oneself." God does this either to our destruction (Is. 64:12 LXX) or in mercy (Is. 42:14 LXX). In Is. 63:15 LXX the sense merges into that of "to tolerate." The noun anochḗ in Rom. 2:4 and 3:25 is God's "restraint" in judgment (linked with his kindness and patience in 2:4 and forgiveness in 3:25). [H. SCHLIER, I, 359-60]

anḗkei [fitting]

anḗkei denotes "what is fitting or seemly," with a suggestion of being "obligatory" in Phlm. 8. In Eph. 5:4 the idea is of "what does not belong" because believers are saints in Christ. The unsuitability may concur with the world's judgment, as in Col. 3:18, or run contrary to it, as in Eph. 5:4. [H. SCHLIER, I, 360]

anḗr [man, husband], andrízomai [to act manly]

A. anḗr outside the NT.

1. The word is common for "man" with adjectives or nouns denoting function.

2. It also denotes the human species a. as distinct from fabled monsters or gods and b. in the sense of the inhabitants of a place.

3. It can specifically signify the male.

4. It can also be used for husband (Ex. 21:22 LXX).

5. It may also denote an adult male as distinct from a boy.

6. It may also have the sense of full manhood as an absolutized natural force.

B. anḗr in the NT.

1. The term is most common in Luke; for sense 1. see Acts 3:14; 18:24.

2. a. This sense occurs in Lk. 5:8; Jms. 1:20; the main distinction is from spirits or animals. b. This is a common usage either for humans in general, as in Mt. 14:21, or for population of a place, as in Mt. 14:35.

3. Sexual differentiation is usually expressed differently, but cf. Lk. 1:34.

4. The use for husband occurs in Mk. 10:2, 12; Rom. 7:2-3; the household tables in Eph. 5:22ff.; Col. 3:18-19; 1 Pet. 3:1ff.; the rules for officebearers in 1 Tim. 3:2, 12; Tit. 1:6. If wives are to submit to their husbands, husbands are to show the same unselfish love as Christ. The fiance can already be called anḗr (Mt. 1:19; Rev. 21:2).

5. This sense underlies 1 Cor. 13:11. anḗr téleios in the NT is figurative (e.g., Eph. 4:13; Jms. 3:2).

6. This does not occur in a sexual sense in the NT, but Luke suggests the dignity of honorable and mature manhood in Lk. 23:50; Acts 6:3, 5; cf. 1:11. andreía is not used in the NT, but Paul has andrízomai in 1 Cor. 16:13 in the exhortation to stead-fastness in the faith. [A. OEPKE, I, 360-63]

anthomologéō* → homologéō; anthrōpáreskos → *aréskō ánthrōpos [man], anthrṓpinos [human] ánthrōpos.

1. “Man” as a species, a. as distinct from animals (Mt. 12:12), angels (1 Cor. 4:9), Christ (Gal. 1:12), and God (Mk. 11:30); b. as subject to weakness (Jms. 5:17), death (Heb. 9:27), sin (Rom. 3:4), evil (Mt. 10:17), flattery (Lk. 6:26), error (Gal. 1:1). The phrase katá ánthrōpon suggests not only analogy to the human sphere and human logic (Gal. 3:15; 1 Cor. 15:32) but also the limited nature of human thinking and conduct compared to God’s (Rom. 3:5; 1 Cor. 9:8; Gal. 1:11), with a stress sometimes on its sinful nature (1 Cor. 3:3; 1 Pet. 4:6).

2. The word is used in Semitic fashion with a genitive to suggest relationship (cf. Lk. 2:14; 2 Th. 2:3—man of sin; 1 Tim. 6:11—man of God).

3. Paul has the word in some sets of antitheses: a. the outer man (the physical side) and the inner (the Godward side) (2 Cor. 4:16; Eph. 3:16); b. the old man (unconverted and sinful) and the new (renewed in Christ) (Rom. 6:6; Eph. 4:22ff.; Col. 3:9-10). c. The physical man and the spiritual (1 Cor. 2:14-15).

4. “The man” is a messianic term for Jesus in Rom. 5:15; 1 Cor. 15:21, 47; Eph. 5:32; 1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 2:6; → huiós toú anthrṓpou. For the first and second man of 1 Cor. 15:45, 47 → Adám and huiós toú anthrṓpou.

anthrṓpinos.

1. This is used of humans as part of the created world; cf. Jms. 3:7, where humans are distinguished from animals; 1 Pet. 2:13, where the sense is more likely “human creature” than “human institution,” there being no instance of ktísis for the latter.

2. It is also used to distinguish humans from God (Acts 17:25), with a stress on limitation (Rom. 6:19; 1 Cor. 2:13; 4:3 —in contrast with God’s judgment; 10:13, where the temptation is not said to derive from us, but not to be beyond our puny human strength).   [J. JEREMIAS, I, 364-67]

aníēmi [to release], ánesis [rest]

The basic idea is that of “relaxation of tension.” aníēmi means “to release” or “loose” in Acts 16:16; 27:40, figuratively “to give up” in Eph. 6:9.

ánesis has the sense of “mitigation of imprisonment” in Acts 24:23, but elsewhere has the figurative sense of “rest” or “refreshment” (cf. 2 Cor. 2:13; 7:5; 8:13; 2 Th. 1:7; with an eschatological reference, cf. anápsyxis in Acts 3:20). ánesis is not used in the NT for “remission,” nor in the fairly common Greek sense of “license,” “self-abandonment.”   [R. BULTMANN, I, 367]

ánitos → níptō

anístēmi [to raise, arise], exanístēmi [to raise, arise], anástasis [resurrection], exanástasis [resurrection] anístēmi, exanístēmi.

A. Meanings of anistánai and exanistánai. In the Bible the words have the general senses a. “to raise up,” “awaken,” “institute,” “deport,” “set up,” “repair,” and intransitively b. “to rise up,” “waken,” “recover,” “rise up” (e.g., to speak, or in enmity).

The words also have the special senses a. “to begin an action,” b. “to raise up seed,” c. “to introduce” (a personage in history), and d. “to raise up, or rise, from the dead.”

B. Resurrection in the Greek World. Apart from transmigration, the Greeks speak of resurrection only a. as an impossibility, or b. as an isolated miracle of resuscitation. They have no concept of a general resurrection; the hearers in Acts 17:18 seem to think anástasis is a proper name (cf. 17:31-32).

C. Resurrection in the OT and Judaism. The OT recounts individual restorations to life (1 Kgs. 17:17ff.) and prepares the ground for the hope of a general eschatological resurrection (cf. Ezek. 37:1 ff.; Is. 53:10; Job 19:25ff.; Ps. 73), but this becomes specific only in, e.g., Is. 26:19; Dan. 12:2. The Samaritans and Sadducees rejected the hope but it was solidly established in later Judaism, being spiritualized by Josephus (immortality) and Philo (mystical liberation), though neither uses the word anástasis.

D. Resurrection in the NT.

1. The NT recounts individual restorations to life (Mk. 5:42; Acts 9:40). The stories are marked by sobriety and solemnity, and the awakenings are not just isolated miracles but messianic signs (Mt. 11:5; Jn. 11:25-26; Mt. 27:53).

2. Jesus predicts his own resurrection (Mk. 8:31; 9:9; 10:34), and his raising is described as the work of the Father exalting the crucified Lord to messianic glory (Acts 1:22; 2:24; Rom. 1:4; 1 Cor. 15:1ff.). On the significance of the resurrection for the kerygma → egeírō, syzáō.

3. The resurrection of Jesus is the firstfruits of general resurrection (1 Cor. 15:20; Col. 1:18). The logic of faith is toward resurrection to life (1 Cor. 15:22; Rom. 8:11; Jn. 6:39-40). Yet there is a double resurrection, believers being raised first (perhaps Lk. 14:14; Rev. 20:5-6; possibly 1 Cor. 15:23-24, especially if télos means "the rest" rather than "the end"; 1 Th. 4:16-17, though cf. Rom. 2:16; 2 Th. 1:9-10; 1 Cor. 4:5). New life is a present possession but is still the goal of resurrection hope and striving (Phil. 3:11 —the only NT instance of exanástasis). 2 Tim. 2:18 refutes the Gnostic error that resurrection has already taken place, and 1 Cor. 15 combats denial of the resurrection, possibly as too materialistic.

anástasis, exanástasis. The words are equivalent: a. "erection" of statues, dams, etc.; b. "expulsion" from one's dwelling, then (intransitively) a. "arising," e.g., from bed, or sleep; b. "rising up" or "departure"; c. "resurrection."

In the NT 2. a. occurs in Lk. 2:34: "fall and rising," i.e., judgment and salvation. Elsewhere the terms are used only for Christ's resurrection (e.g., Mk. 2:18; Jn. 5:29; Rom. 1:4; Heb. 6:2 Phil. 3:11). [A. OEPKE, I, 368-72]

→ egeírō, zōḗ

ánoia → noús; anomía, ánomos → nómos; anósios → hósios; anochḗ → anéchō; antagōnízomai → agṓn; antállagma → allássō; antanaplēróō → plēróō; antapodídōmi, antapódoma, antapódosis → dídōmi; antapokrínomai → krínō; antéchō → échō

antí [in place of]

A preposition from the Hellenistic period, antí does not have the sense "over against" in the NT but is used for a. "in place of" to denote a replacement or equivalent (Rom. 12:17; 1 Th. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:9; Heb. 12:16, or a similarity (1 Cor. 11:15). From this develop the senses b. "on behalf of" in Mt. 17:27 or "to the account of" and c. "for the sake of" or "for this cause" (Eph. 5:31), "because" (2 Th. 2:10— antí toútou). In Mk. 10:45 the position of antí pollōn ("for many") shows that it goes with lýtron rather than doúnai and thus has sense a.: The sacrificed life of Jesus is a sufficient price to redeem many. Even if we put it with doúnai and give it sense b., it still carries a vicarious significance, for Jesus is then giving his life “on behalf of” the forfeited life of the many. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 372-73]

antídikos [opponent]

A. antídikos outside the NT.

1. The basic meaning is “the opponent at law,” whether individual or collective (cf. Prov. 18:17 LXX).

2. Figuratively the term then means “the opponent in a dispute” (cf. Jer. 27:34 LXX). 3. The word then simply means “opponent” (Esth. 8:11 LXX).

B. antídikos in the NT. The NT never uses the term in the direct sense 1. Sense 2. occurs in Mt. 5:25, which is not just prudent advice, since the antídikos is the brother and the background is eschatological. Lk. 12:58 makes the same point with the same background, but the relation to God rather than to the neighbor is more prominent here.

The usage in 1 Pet. 5:8 hovers between 2. and 3. The image of a court action is abandoned, but the idea of Satan as the accuser (Job 1:6ff.; Zech. 3:1; Rev. 12:10) is still present to give color to the expression. Sense 3. is the obvious meaning in Lk. 18:3, since the widow is not pleading in court. [G. SCHRENK, I, 373-75]

antilambánomai [help], antílēmpsis [helpful], synantilambánomai [to support]

The main idea is that of “taking up” or “grasping,” but with such extensions as “to help,” “to import,” and in the LXX “to keep to” (Is. 26:3), “to enter into alliance with” (Mic. 6:6) as well as, predominantly, “to help.”

In the NT antilambánomai has the first sense in Acts 20:35 (“take up the cause of”) and the sense of divine “help” in Lk. 1:54 LXX.

antilēmpsis in 1 Cor. 12:28 does not refer to assuming office but to “help” in the general sense, i.e., not of miracles, but of loving action (cf. Acts 6:1ff.).

synantilambánomai means “to take in hand with,” and has a general sense in Lk. 10:40 (Martha and Mary) and a more specific sense in Rom. 8:26, where the Spirit joins with us in intercession to fashion pneumatic prayers that surpass human comprehension but are searched out by God, who knows the mind of the Spirit. [G. DELLING, I, 375-76]

antílytron* → lýō; antimisthía → misthós; antítypos → týpos; antíchristos → Christós; anypókritos → hypokrínō; anypótaktos → *tássō

ánō [above], anṓteron [above], ánōthen [from above]

1. As an adverb of place ánō means “above” (or “earlier”) and is used of land, mountains, atmosphere, and heaven, heaven in the NT usually in either a material (Jn. 11:41) or a religious sense (cf. tá ánō in Jn. 8:23; Phil. 3:14). The above-below distinction was important in the rabbis, with a measure of parallelism between what happens above and what happens below.

2. In Philo the distinction between God and the world is linked with the cosmological distinction between an upper and a lower world, God being at the head and matter at the foot (cf. Gnosticism). Judaism and the NT do not divide the cosmos in this way, since God is its Creator and Lord, and God is thus above and the whole world as his creation is below. Thus the ánō klḗsis in Phil. 3:14 is God’s call in Christ, the tá ánō of Col. 3:1-2 refers to where Christ is at God's right hand, and the Father, not "that world," is the opposite of "this world" in Jn. 8:23; 13:1. Similarly, the Jerusalem that is above in Gal. 4:26 is described in religious terms, with "the present Jerusalem," not that which is below, as its counterpart. The NT does offer descriptions of the world to come in Revelation, making use of the idea of a world above and a world below for this purpose, but its basic distinction is not between two worlds but between God as holy and eternal on the one side and the world as sinful and transitory on the other.

ánōthen. Both outside and in the NT ánōthen is an adverb a. of place "from above" (Mt. 27:51) and b. of time "from an earlier period" (Acts 26:5). Further senses are then c. "from the first" (Lk. 1:3) and d. "anew" (Gal. 4:9). In Jn. 3:3, 7 the original usage inclines in favor of "from above," which alone links with Job 3:4 and Jms. 1:17 to suggest "of God." John uses ánōthen elsewhere in sense a. (3:31; 19:11, 23) and always describes birth in terms of origin (1:13; 1 Jn. 2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:18; Jn. 3:5-6). Sense d. helps to make the obtuseness of Nicodemus a little more intelligible and is considered by Origen and Chrysostom, though they both lean heavily toward a. The versions vacillate between a. and d. The suggestion that both a. and d. are meant cannot be proved. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 376-78]

áxios [worthy], anáxios [unworthy], axióō [to consider worthy], kataxióō [to consider worthy]

áxios, anáxios. Strictly "bringing into balance," hence "equivalent" (e.g., Rom. 8:18), with such extensions as "being appropriate" (1 Cor. 16:4), "deserving" (Mt. 10:10), "worth," e.g., considering or accepting (1 Tim. 1:15), or praising (Rev. 4:11), "worthy" almost in the sense of "in a position to" (Rev. 5:2), and "corresponding to" (Mt. 3:8).

In the NT the thought of merit is excluded; we are worthy of the gospel only as we receive it (cf. Mt. 10:11, 13; 22:8; Acts 13:46; Heb. 11:38; Rev. 3:4).

In many expressions a genitive or infinitive is put with áxios to denote the sphere of correspondence (cf. Rom. 16:2). Paul admonishes his readers to walk worthy of the gospel, their calling, and the Lord (1 Th. 2:12; Phil. 1:27; Col. 1:10; Eph. 4:1; cf. 3 Jn. 6), thus linking the motive and goal of Christian action, the motivating power residing in God's prior action. Hence the warning not to receive the Lord's Supper unworthily (anáxios) does not refer legalistically to a moral quality but to an attitude determined by the gospel.

axióō, kataxióō.

1. "To make worthy"—the sense in 2 Th. 1:11.

2. "To regard as worthy," "to value." The NT use of the compound kataxióō (Lk. 20:35; Acts 5:41; 2 Th. 1:5) helps to bring out the fact that in ourselves we are not worthy of the divine gift of grace.

3. "To regard as right" (Acts 15:38). [W. FOERSTER, I, 379-80]

aóratos → horáō; apangéllō → angelía; apaídeutos → paideúō; apaitéō → aitéō; apallássō → allássō; apallotrióō → állos

apántēsis [meeting]

In 1 Th. 4:17 there will be, at the Lord's return, a rapture of his people to meet him. The word apántēsis was used for the public welcome accorded to important visitors. Similary Christians will welcome Christ, acclaiming him as Lord. [E. PETERSON, I, 380-81] hápax [once, once for all], ephápax [at once, once for all] hápax.

1. “Once,” a. as a strictly numerical concept, used in the NT for Christ’s unique and unrepeatable work (Heb. 9:25-26), with added emphasis through (1) the reference to the last time, (2) the double repetition in vv. 27-28, and (3) the application in v. 28, where Christ is the one offering as well as the one high priest. The term then takes on significance for Christ’s second coming as well as the first (Heb. 12:26 “once more,” i.e., “for the last time.” b. “Once” as an indefinite concept of time, “when,” “after,” etc., in the NT only in one reading of 1 Pet. 3:20 and perhaps Heb. 6:4; 10:2.

2. “Once for all,” used in the NT for the definitive Christian state and the one baptism (Heb. 6:4). “Once...tasted” suggests a proverbial saying similar to “having once tasted blood”; it is unnatural to let the gift go again. In Heb. 10:2 the point is that there was no once-for-all cleansing by the old offerings. Jude refers to the definitive nature of Christian teaching (“the faith”) by which we know all that is needed for salvation and which we are thus to hold fast.

ephápax.

1. “At once,” “together,” in the NT (1 Cor. 15:6).

2. “Once for all,” with reference to the uniqueness of Christ’s death (Rom. 6:10), by which sin and Christ are quits, so that in him we can die to sin in an irreversible turning to God. Heb. 7:27 expresses the same thought in sacrificial language; Christ offered himself once for all in contrast to the high priests with their daily sacrifices, and he thus accomplished a once-for-all cleansing (Heb. 10:10), our sanctification having the same definitiveness as the sacrifice. [G. STÄHLIN, I, 381-84]

aparábatos → parabaínō; aparnéomai → arnéomai; aparchḗ → árchō

apatáō [to deceive], exapatáō [to deceive], apátē [deception]

apatáō, exapatáō. Common from Homer, also in the LXX, for “to deceive or entice” (e.g., Judg. 14:15; Jer. 4:10; Gen. 3:10; Job 31:27).

The chief sense in the NT is that of enticing to sin (cf. 2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:14; Rom. 7:11). Eph. 5:6 warns against “deception,” and 1 Cor. 3:18 refers to sinful “self-deception.”

apátē. a. “Deception or enticement,” b. “pleasant illusion,” “pleasure.” Meaning a. is found in the NT in Col. 2:8; Heb. 3:13; 2 Th. 2:10, while b. is most likely in Mk. 4:19; 2 Pet. 2: 13; and perhaps Eph. 4:22, but always with a stress on the evil aspects. It is thus strongly influenced by a. [A. OEPKE, I, 384-85]

apátōr → patēr; apaúgasma → augázō; apeítheia, apeithéō, apeithḗs → peíthō; apeírastos → peirázō; apekdéchomai → déchomai; apékdysis, apekdýō → dýō; apeleútheros -> eleútheros; apelpízō → elpízō; aperítmētos → peritomē; apéchō → échō; apistéō, apistía, ápostos → pisteúō

haploús [simple], haplótēs [simplicity]

haploús. a. “Simple,” then b. “open,” “with no ulterior motive,” then c. “simple” in the negative sense. In the NT, as in Judaism, “simple” is mostly either neutral or positive.

In Mt. 6:22 the meaning might be “healthy,” but if there is an ethical reference (cf. the “evil eye” as the possible opposite) “pure” is the meaning (cf. haplótēs d.). In Jms. 1:5 “kind” is possible, but “wholehearted” is more likely.

haplótēs. a. “Simplicity,” b. “noble simplicity,” as of heroes, c. “purity,” “singleness of heart,” and d. “generosity.”

The usual NT sense is c. (Eph. 6:5; Col. 3:22; 2 Cor. 11:3), but d. “liberality” occurs in Rom. 12:8; 2 Cor. 8:2; 9:11, 13. [O. BAUERNFEIND, I, 386-87]

apogígnomai* → gígnomai; apódektos, apodéchomai → déchomai,; apodídōmi → dídōmi; apodokimázō → dókimos; apodoché̄ → déchomai; apothnḗskō → *thánatos

apokathístēmi [to restore], apokatástasis [restoration]

apokathístēmi. “To restore,” then 1. “to return” (e.g., something borrowed), 2. “to restore” a. buildings etc., b. middle “to heal,” e.g., lepers in Ex. 4:7, c. “to renew the world,” d. “to reconstitute,” e.g., a kingdom.

The biblical and messianic usage derives from 2 d. (and c.). The term is used for God’s restoring of Israel to its land (Jer. 16:15; Hos. 11:11). This comes to be understood messianically and eschatologically, but inner restitution is also required (Am. 5:15), effected by the returning Elijah (Mal. 4:5). From the Aramaic for effecting a turn, or returning, the Samaritan Messiah derives the name Taheb. The originally political sense of the term may be seen in the disciples’ question in Acts 1:6. The answer accepts the expectation but denies its political significance. Elsewhere in the NT the verb relates to the forerunner (the Baptist) rather than the Messiah (cf. Mk. 9:12; 8:28; Mt. 11:10; Jn. 1:21). The “all things” of Mk. 9:12 is to be interpreted in terms of the Baptist’s mission.

apokatástasis.

A. apokatástasis in Secular Usage. Found in the NT only in Acts 3:20-21, this word basically means “restoration,” and then has special applications 1. in medicine, 2. in law, and 3. in politics. 4. It is also used in astronomy for the return of the constellations, the shining again of the sun or moon, the restitution of the cosmic cycle, and the periods of the phoenix, with the corresponding ideas of eternal recurrence and new creation (as in Stoicism). 5. It is used, too, of individual souls, e.g., when entering again the cycle of generations, and in the Hermetic writings in connection with the release from matter.

B. apokatástasis in Judaism. The LXX does not have the term, and it is rare in Judaism with little technical input. Josephus uses it for the return from exile, and Philo for the exodus and mystically for the soul. Surrounding cosmological speculation had hardly any influence.

C. apokatástasis in the NT. The reference in Acts 3:20-21 is strictly to the restitution of that of which the prophets have spoken, or the establishment of what they have spoken. Grammatically the conversion of persons cannot be intended. The relations of which the prophets spoke are restored to the integrity of creation while their promise is itself fulfilled. The times of refreshing mark the beginning of the transformation through the messianic work of Jesus. The text has no bearing on the question of universalism with which it is often linked. Judaism holds out no such hope, and if Paul stresses the comprehensive work of the second Adam (Rom. 5:18; 1 Cor. 15:22; Col. 1:20) he also says that judgment will have a twofold outcome (Rom. 2:7ff.), while God’s being all in all will be through the overthrow of opposition (1 Cor. 15:25ff.).

D. apokatástasis in the History of the Church. From Origen’s day the word has often been used for the restoration of all created beings. Irenaeus does not take this view, and Clement of Alexandria only hints at it, but Origen equates beginning and end and hence looks for the ultimate removal of all hostility to God, relying mainly on 1 Cor. 15:25ff. and Jn. 17:11 but taking his term from Acts 3:21 in the medical and political senses rather than the astronomical. His followers include many eastern theologians and such westerners as Scotus Erigena, Hans Denck, J. A. Bengel, and F. D. E. Schleiermacher. [A. OEPKE, I, 387-93]

apokalýptō, apokálypsis → kalýptō

apokaradokía [eager expectation]

Made up of kára and dékomai, apokaradokía denotes stretching the head, e.g., to spy on, or to pay attention. It is linked with hope in the NT (Phil. 1:20) and thus denotes "confident expectation." The same applies in Rom. 8:19, where creation is straining forward, i.e., waiting with eager longing under the stress of conflict.

[G. DELLING, I, 393]

apokatallássō → allássō; apokatástasís → apokathístēmi; apókeimai → keímai; apokóptō → kóptō; apókrima, apokrínō, apókrisis → krínō; apokrýptō, apókrypsos → krýptō

apóllymi [to destroy], apṓleia [destruction], Apollýōn [Destroyer]

apóllymi.

A. The Literal Use. a. "To destroy," "kill," in battle or prison; b. "to suffer loss or lose"; c. "to perish"; d. "to be lost" (cf. Lk. 15), not sharply distinguished from c.

B. The Figurative Use.

1. In Mk. 8:35 etc., with b. and d. as a background, the soul is an object of value which is not just lost but which we actively lose in trying to save or secure our lives, like the rich fool of Lk. 12: 16ff. The ambivalent concept of life gives the sayings their profundity. In Lk. 15 the three parables are told from God's standpoint. The lost sheep has Ezek. 34:4 as a basis, with the idea of wandering and perishing in view. Jesus must seek what is lost and will not lose what the Father has given him (Jn. 6:39).

2. A specific NT usage with sense a. or c. as the basis occurs in 1 Cor. 8:11; Rom. 2:12; 1 Cor. 1:18; 2 Th. 2:10; 1 Cor. 15:18; Jn. 10:28, etc. The meaning is "to be lost," or, more likely, "to perish," active "to destroy" with a human or demonic destroyer (Rom. 14:15), or someone divinely commissioned (Mk. 1:24), or God himself as subject (cf. 1 Cor. 1:19; Jude 5; Jms. 4:12). In view is not just physical destruction but a hopeless destiny of eternal death.

apṓleia. Rare in secular Greek, this means a. "destruction," "ruin," b. "perishing," c. "loss." It is common in the LXX in sense b. (cf. Job 26:6). In the NT the curse of Acts 8:20 has an OT ring. Eternal destruction is signified in Mt. 7:13; Rom. 9:22; Phil. 1:28; 2 Th. 2:3; Jn. 17:12; 2 Pet. 2:1; Rev. 17:8, 11.

Apollýōn. In Rev. 9:11 Apollýōn is a translation and personification of the Hebrew and means Destroyer (usually seen as a play on Apollo, the god of pestilence, who was regarded as the god of the empire and had the locust as his creature). [A. OEPKE, I, 394-97]

apoloúō → loúō; apolýtrōsis → lýō; aposkíasma → skiá; apostasía → aphístēmi

apostéllō [to send out], (pémpō) [to send], exapostéllō [to send out], apóstolos [apostle], pseudapóstolos [false apostle], apostolḗ [apostleship] apostéllō (pémpō).

A. apostéllō and pémpō in Secular Greek.

1. apostéllō is a strengthening compound of stéllō and is common in Greek for "to send forth," differing from pémpō, which stresses the fact of sending, by its relating of sender and sent and its consequent implication of a commission, especially in Hellenistic Greek.

2. It thus carries the further thought of authorization, e.g., in the case of official envoys, but also divinely sent teachers. It is used in the latter sense by the Cynics and Stoics, by Irenaeus (with reference to Menander), and by Philo.

B. apostéllō and pémpō in the LXX (OT) with Judaism.

1. apostéllō occurs over 700 times in the LXX, mostly for the root šlḥ; pémpō only some 26 times, six with no Hebrew original. apostéllō/šlḥ are mostly used where there is commissioning with a message or task. Alone they denote the sending of a special messenger with emphasis on the sender (cf. Is. 6:8), so that the messenger is a kind of plenipotentiary. The message and the one sent are of interest only as they embody the sender, no matter who the sender or the sent may be. Even those who are sent realize that the stress is on the sender (cf. Gen. 24:1ff.).

2. The LXX pursues this thought consistently, even using apostéllō for šlḥ contrary to the literal sense in order to bring out the authoritative element in the action and the position of the one who acts. The features of the verb in secular Greek are thus taken up and merged with what the OT equivalent contributes. Even in relation to the prophets the use is not just religious; the situation itself gives the religious flavor. Nor does the term denotes self-awareness, as in the case of the Cynic, for there is no place for this alongside unconditional subjection to the will of the sender.

3. Rabbinic Judaism keeps within the sphere delineated by šlḥ. Josephus has apostéllō some 75 times, more or less synonymously with pémpō in some cases, elsewhere to denote official missions or sending by God. Philo has an absolute use similar to that of Cynics and Stoics and not affected by šlḥ.

C. apostéllō and pémpō in the NT.

1. apostéllō occurs some 135 times in the NT, mostly in the Gospels and Acts. pémpō occurs some 80 times, 33 in John, five in Revelation, 22 in Luke/Acts, only four in Matthew, and one in Mark. Apart from the special use of pémpō in John, the Lucan material predominates; it prefers apostéllō, yet like Josephus can use pémpō as a synonym and has less sense of the specific nature of apostéllō. The religious character of the NT material explains the general predominance of apostéllō, and in the NT as a whole pémpō seems to be used when the stress is on the sending, apostéllō when it is on the commission, and especially (in the Synoptists) when it is God who sends.

2. In John, Jesus uses apostéllō to denote his full authority, i.e., to ground his mission in God as the One who is responsible for his words and works. But he uses pémpō, e.g., in the phrase “the Father sent me,” so as to state God’s participation in his work by the act of sending. There is a slight parallel here to Cynic usage but with the distinction that the Cynics stress responsibility to God alone, whereas the point in John is the unity of will and action between Jesus and the Father. The terms as such do not shape Johannine Christology, for they are not basically or essentially theological terms. They are given their specific meaning in John by the context. The mission of Jesus acquires its significance and force from the fact that he is the Son, not from its description in terms of apostéllō.

3. In the NT apostéllō certainly begins to be a theological word for “sending forth to serve God with God’s own authority,” but only in context and not with any radical departure from its normal sense.

exapostéllō. This has essentially the same meaning as apostéllō, with which it is interchangeable in the LXX and Philo. It occurs 13 times in the NT, eleven in Luke, and two in Paul. The idea that in Gal. 4:4

the ex- denotes a prior presence with the sender (Zahn) finds no support. Here, too, the term derives it christological flavor only from the context, and the emphasis is on God as the sender.

apóstolos (→ dṓdeka, mathētḗs).

A. The Word and Concept apóstolos in Classical Greek and Hellenism.

l. The Greek Usage. In older Greek the term is a nautical one denoting a freighter or a naval force with no sense of initiative or authorization. Hence it does not become a term for envoy as in the NT, nor do the LXX, Josephus, or Philo form a link at this point to the distinctive and unusual NT usage.

2. Religious Messengers in Hellenism.

a. Material contacts between the NT apostolate and the Greek world are also slight. The Greek prophḗtai serve as mouthpieces for deity, but they do so as anonymous intermediaries, totally subject to the deity and with no specific sense of mission or authority.

b. The Cynics are something of an exception with their awareness of sending, and their use not only of apostéllō but also of such words as ángelos, kḗryx, and katáskopos to describe their work as messengers, heralds, and observers (with a view to helping). The Cynics have an active attitude with a strong sense of commitment to their message and of responsibility both for humanity and toward Zeus, to whom they are ultimately bound and from whom they derive their boldness of speech. In particular the term katáskopos offers in their case something of a parallel to the NT apóstolos, at least in the formal sense. Their mode of life is also similar, since they move about with their message, dependent on well-wishers for support. They express their awareness of mission by a certain arrogance and by their claim to be "divine men" (a phrase especially used by the Stoics). This claim, however, involves a certain tension with its approximation to the impersonality of the Greek prophḗtai. The unlimited claim goes hand in hand with a renunciation of personal significance which does not leave room for development of the concept of the apóstolos. The relation of the messenger to the deity does not have the character of an unconditional appointment, there is no clear concept of God or certainty about the revelation of his will, and the message can thus make no claim to absoluteness. For this reason the legal aspect plays little or no role.

B. apóstolos/ šālî(a)ḥ (šālû[a]ḥ)in Judaism.

1. apóstolos among the Greek Jews. In Greek Judaism the term does not occur much, since the Jews were not a seafaring people. Josephus has it once for the sending of envoys to Rome (involving a journey by sea, but with some influence of apostéllō). The LXX has it only in 1 Kgs. 14 to describe Ahijah's commission to give a divine message to the king's wife.

2. The Later Jewish Institution of the šālû (a)ḥ. Judaism takes us a step forward with the term šālî (a)ḥ, which is recognized, e.g., by Jerome, to bear some kinship to the NT apóstolos.

a. The legal institution of the šālû (a)ḥ, which is ancient but takes shape in the first century, involves commissioning with specific tasks and stresses authorization. The legal element of giving and obeying orders is decisive. The person sent represents the sender, e.g., in betrothal, divorce, or purchase. Full adherence to the commission is presupposed. The applicable law is that of the messenger, whose honoring or shaming is an honoring or shaming of the sender (1 Sam. 25:40-41; 2 Sam. 10:1-2). The person sent is as the person who sends.

b. The šālî (a)ḥ, however, may represent a group as well as an individual, e.g., a congregation, or the community. It is in this sense that rabbis regulate the calendar in the dispersion, or the high priest acts for the people, or rabbis make a collection for the Palestinian scribes after A.D. 70, or Paul goes to Damascus in Acts 9:1ff. Laying on of hands for such tasks confers a religious as well as an official character. Jewish missionaries, however, are not called by this term (not even by Justin in Dialogue with Trypho 108), since they do not have the authorization of the community. Thus the bearers of the office are better called "authorized representatives" than "apostles," since the latter term, in view of NT usage, would give a wrong impression of the missionaries of Judaism, who were backed by groups rather than the people as such.

c. The term does, of course, carry the idea of divine authorization, e.g., in the case of the priest or of such personages as Moses and Elijah, who are commissioned by God, not the community. The prophets, however, are never given this designation, perhaps because, although they speak about God in God's name, they do not actively represent God, especially as they are for later Judaism instruments of the Spirit.

C. The Use of apóstolos in the NT.

1. Statistical Findings. There are 79 instances plus some secondary readings: one each in Matthew, Mark, and John; 29 in Paul plus five in the Pastorals; 34 in Luke/Acts; one each in Hebrews, 1 Peter, and Jude; two in 2 Peter; and three in Revelation-hence 80 percent in the Pauline and Lucan material. The term stands at the head of epistles some eleven times-six in Paul, three in the Pastorals, and one each in 1 Peter and 2 Peter.

2. The Meaning.

a. The NT contains no trace of the common nonbiblical use for the act of sending or, figuratively, the object. Always signified is the person sent with full authority. The Greek gives only the form, the Hebrew the content. The legal element entails that the reference is only to males, although by the course of things women might have been apostles too (see D.2.).

b. There is full identity between apóstolos and šālî (a)ḥ in Jn. 13:16, where apóstolos denotes one who is legally charged to represent the person and cause of another (cf. the juxtaposition of doúlos and kýrios, apóstolos and pémpsas).

c. apóstolos can refer to the commissioned representative of a congregation, as in 2 Cor. 8:23 or Phil. 2:25 (Epaphroditus).

d. apóstolos also denotes bearers of the NT message, first the twelve (Acts 1:26) sent out by Jesus himself (cf. Mt. 10:2; Mk. 6:30), with Peter their head and Jerusalem their center (Acts 8:1); then the first Christian missionaries, as in Acts 14:4, 14 (Paul and Barnabas), Gal. 1:19 (James), Rom. 16:7 (Junias and Andronicus), and 1 Cor. 15:7 (a wider circle). Paul and Barnabas are sent by the congregation at Antioch (Acts 13:1ff.), but the apostle is properly an apostle of Jesus Christ, and this larger group shares with the twelve the common basis of a meeting with the risen Lord and commissioning by him personally. Hence Apollos and Timothy are not called apostles, but Paul's apostleship is accepted at Jerusalem (Acts 15; Gal. 2:9; cf. 1 Cor. 15:8ff.). Apostles, then, are not officials of the church but officers of Christ for its upbuilding, and in this sense they are comparable to the OT prophets (Eph. 2:20; 3:5). "In the church" in 1 Cor. 12:28 refers to the whole body whose head is Christ (cf. Eph. 1:22; Col. 1:18; Eph. 4:11), not to the local congregation.

e. Heb.3:1 calls Jesus himself an apostle, obviously in the sense that the definitive revelation of God has taken place in him. Absence of the article before high priest shows that the phrase "apostle and high priest" is a unity. For the church Christ is the Son in whom God has finally spoken and who has made final expiation. Where the Son speaks and acts, God speaks and acts (as it was God who spoke and acted through the OT priest). The confession has absolute authority on the basis of his absolute authorization for word (apóstolos) and work (archiereús). Another possibility is that the two terms contrast Jesus with Moses and Aaron in virtue of his unique divine sending, but this would involve an unusual NT sense and isolating two terms (apóstolos and archiereús) which the author is concerned to relate.

D. The Rise and Nature of the Apostolate in the NT.

I. Jesus and the First Circle of Disciples.

a. The rise of the apostolate begins with the first group of disciples. Externally this group resembles similar groups around other leaders. The difference lies in its genesis and outcome. It originates on the initiative of Jesus. The disciples accept his call, listen to him, and learn obedience from his revelation of God as Holy One and Father. The apostles cannot later become mere officebearers because they are under God's orders and acknowledge the supremacy of the rule of love. Only true disciples can have this authoritative part in the work of Jesus. Thus all apostles must be disciples, though not all disciples need be apostles. The phrase "twelve apostles" can be used quite early (Mt. 10:2), yet it does not imply an exclusive equation of "the twelve" and "the apostles."

b. The disciples begin their apostolic work when Jesus makes them co-workers. No reason for this is given. Jesus simply calls the twelve and sends them out (apostéllein in Mark) with authority (Matthew, Mark, Luke). Here, then, is authoritative sending in the sense of full delegation, followed by a later return and report. To question the historicity of the sending creates more problems than it solves, but the derivation of the apostolate from Jesus does not depend on this sending in view of Mk. 9:38ff., where the basis of John's complaint about the exorcist is that only the disciples are authorized to use the power of Jesus, and Mt. 10:40ff., where the identification of sender and sent presupposes authorization (the one sent is as the one who sends, and what is done to the former is done to the latter). As the disciples are shown and perceive, their authorization is linked with the person of Jesus. Yet the correction of John in the first passage rules out any claim based on the authorization. If the disciples have full power to speak and act as Jesus does, this does not confer rights but implies the duty of service. The second passage is to the same effect: commissioning by Jesus means humiliation rather than exaltation. Service and humility purge the apostolate of the claims which might accompany its legal authorization. They make it a commission rather than an office. This is also illustrated by the sending out of the seventy (Lk. 10:1) and the fact that when the disciples return to Jesus they do not continue their work but become hearers and ministers again (Lk. 9:49-50). Apostleship as such has no religious character but is just a form. The apostles receive their religious impress from him who commissions them, and in such a way that the commission itself is the main thing, not its bearers.

c. The use of the terms "apostles" and "disciples" in Matthew and Mark supports this. When commissioned, the disciples of Mt. 10:1 become the apostles of 10:2 (cf. Mk. 6:30). But on their return they become disciples again throughout the rest of these Gospels. The situation is a little more complex in Luke, where "apostles" is a fixed term for the first disciples in 22:14; 24:10 but elsewhere is used in connection with actual mission, e.g., 6:12-13; 9:10. In 6:12-13 Jesus himself would use the Aramaic term, which does not have the suggestion of office that later came to attach to the Greek word. Hence it is reasonable enough to believe that the term is not a later assimilation or intrusion so long as we understand that apóstolos is simply an objective word to denote a fully accredited representative with a specific commission. Lk. 6:12-13 corresponds to Mk. 3: 13ff., though in both cases the true appointment as apostles comes later (Lk. 9:1; Mk. 6:7). The disciples are chosen with a view to their later sending. The apostleship, then, derives from Jesus, and in Aramaic the word itself is also his, not in terms of office, but in terms of authoritative commissioning.

d. Significant, too, is the linking of the apostles with the proclaiming of the word. In Mk. 3:14; Lk. 9:2 the disciples are sent out to preach (cf. Mt. 10:7-8). An objective element, the message, thus becomes the content of apostolate. Full and obedient dedication to the task is demanded. Action accompanies speech in demonstration of authentic commissioning. The works are not a subject of boasting or evaluation but of a joy that expresses a complete ignoring of the person and absorption in the task (Lk. 10:17). The success of the apostles is the success of Jesus himself, and in the report it crowds out any reference to difficulties in the discharge of the task (about which Jesus gives clear warning in, e.g., Mk. 6:11).

2. The Early Christian Apostolate as a Gift of the Risen Lord.

a. The first commission to preach the kingdom is for a limited period. The death of Jesus leaves the disciples at a loss, but the risen Lord constitutes them a community and renews the commission. The apostles are now witnesses of the resurrection. On the other hand, not all such witnesses are apostles. Thus women are not included, although women are in fact the first witnesses and the church includes women prophets. Again, not all the "more than 500" seem to have been apostles. Personal commissioning by the risen Lord, as well as personal meeting with him, is the basis of the apostolate. This applies primarily to the twelve (Matthias replacing Judas), who have been prepared for the task but have now to preach Christ as the fulfilment of OT prophecy. They become his authoritative representatives, but the very nature of their commission means that they are now also missionaries. A number of others join with the twelve in receiving and executing this commission (cf. Acts 15:1 ff.). The missionary aspect is something new compared to the Jewish šālî(a)ḥ institution. The new commission is also of a more lasting character, applying to the whole period between the ascension and the return. Yet there is only one appointment, so that we can hardly think of the apostolate as a continuing office. It is still marked by an endowment with authority and the duty of rendering an account; Paul is a classical example. The Spirit is indispensable, for in the Spirit (Pentecost) the apostles receive assurance of Christ's presence and power and also a standard of what is to be done as the apostles dedicate themselves to God's will and aim at faith in the hearers rather than personal achievement as preachers or healers. The accompanying works are displays of Christ's power which validate the divine message as fact and not just theory. They are indispensable, not to the messengers, but to the message. To dismiss them as legendary accretions is to disclaim the apostolate as a basic religious institution, reducing it to a legal office. The thinking relating to these apostolic signs finds its model in Moses as the divine messenger endorsed by signs (Ex. 3:12). To be sure, Christ as the risen Lord works in the whole community, not just in the apostles. Yet the apostles have special significance as leaders who enjoy the full accreditation of the Lord with a universal commission to what is to be a universal community. The Lord is still behind what they say and do. He himself is the subject of their message. In this new commissioning, however, this is an ongoing message to the world.

b. John's Gospel confirms these findings while not using the term apostle. In it the Easter stories show how the Lord united the disciples to himself and gave them full authority (cf. Thomas in 20:24ff.; Peter in 21:1ff.). Here again obedience and service are the issue, not personal achievement. Believers are Christ's sheep and Peter is to feed them, not rule over them. Commitment and responsibility go with the commission. Only with the Spirit can it be discharged (20:21ff.). The use of apostéllō and pémpō in 20:21 shows that the work is ultimately Christ's own work in which he gives the disciples a share as he sends them (pémpō). The messengers' authorization is subsidiary to that of Jesus. By the same token, however, it is he who sustains them in their office; hence the importance of the paráklētos whom he sends (pémpō) (14:26; 15:26). Probably the focus on Christ as the one who works with the Father from first to last is what causes John to avoid the term apóstolos while not denying that the disciples were fully accredited representatives.

c. It was perhaps in Antioch that apóstolos first came to be used for šālî(a)ḥ in the first instance for the mission, then for the missionaries. Paul might have had a hand in it, for he is the first clearly to use it for the individual messenger of Jesus. It could be adopted only because of an existing relation between apostéllein and šālaḥ. A problem is that of distinguishing between apóstoloi in the absolute and the apóstoloi of the churches (cf. Acts 13:1), but since Jesus is the principle of the churches' action, since the Spirit has the initiative, since only Paul and Barnabas are sent, and since apostéllein is not used for what the church at Antioch does, Paul and Barnabas are obviously apostles of Christ, not of the Christians at Antioch.

d. While the chief basis of the apostolate is the will and commission of Christ under the direction of the Spirit, the election of Matthias shows that eyewitness is also a qualification. The new commissioning is thus a continuation of the old, and the history of Jesus is regarded as supremely important. Paul is inferior in this regard and hence seeks a further basis for his apostolate while entering at the same time into the full stream of the historical tradition (1 Cor. 11:23ff.; 15:1 ff.).

3. The Classical Form of the Apostolate in the Person of Paul. Paul offers the classical case of an apostle because of the information he leaves, his unusual position, his special labors, his strong sense of calling and office, and his need to vindicate his apostolate against objections.

a. Paul's entry on the apostolate involves a sharp break in his life which he can trace only to the eternal will and special action of God. His apostolic sense is determined by his meeting with Jesus on the Damascus road. His response to this is one, not of vacillation, but of sudden and resolute commitment to the Jesus he had formerly persecuted. For Paul this meeting is not a visionary experience but an objective act of God speaking through Jesus. He thus becomes an apostle of Jesus Christ, but by the will of God (1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1; Eph. 1:1). Being an apostle means being "set apart for the gospel" (Rom. 1:1) "before he was born" (Gal. 1:15). The apostolate is thus a sign of divine grace leading to obedient subjection (1 Cor. 15:10). In this regard Paul links up with the OT prophets, especially Jeremiah, in whom we see complete devotion to the message, the predominance of the concept of God, elimination of the ecstatic element, a developed prophetic self-awareness, a determinative union with God, the embracing of his whole life by his calling, and a powerful restriction to the word. Whether or not Paul consciously follows Jeremiah in his sense of mission, he does so in his evaluation of suffering as an element in apostolic life, his concentration on the word, his rejection of any ecstatic basis for the apostolate (cf. 2 Cor. 12:1ff., where Paul can in fact boast of ecstatic experiences but refuses to link them with his apostolate lest grace should be obscured), and his parallel depreciation of apostolic signs (2 Cor. 12:12, where he mentions them only to show the justice of his cause, not the significance of his person). It is in the service of his message (the word of the cross, 1 Cor. 1:18; of reconciliation, 2 Cor. 5:19) that Paul stresses his apostolic authorization. The apostle, like the prophet, is a bearer of divine revelation. Since this revelation is fulfilled in Christ, a new term is needed in place of "prophet"-a term which corresponds to the new situation but still refers to the divine commission. The NT prophets, of course, do not correspond to those of the OT, though they are held in high regard. It is the apostle who has in the new situation the function of the prophet in the old.

b. If the special position of Paul is primarily determined by his calling to be a messenger, one of the reasons that gives him a more developed sense of calling similar to that of the prophets is the objection that he does not have the status or dignity of the other apostles (Gal. 1). But this goes hand in hand with his experience of Jesus and his recognition of the importance of the Spirit. These lead him to see himself as an envoy of Christ (2 Cor. 5:20) working together with him (2 Cor. 6:1). The God who worked in Jesus works through Paul as one who serves God and thus shares in God's own work (1 Cor. 3:8, 11ff.). This is true, however, only on the basis of his commission, not his person. As the servant of this Lord, conscious of God's overruling all history, he can insist with joy on his apostolic responsibility even though the close bond with the Lord imposes present poverty and suffering (2 Cor. 12:10).

E. Jesus as the One Who Was Sent.

1. Only once is Jesus called apóstolos (Heb. 3:1), but in John especially the thing itself seems to be present; cf. the use of apostéllō. The question arises whether redeemer myths have an influence here with their talk of the messenger, the sending, the ambassador of light, and the imparting of truth. An important point is that spatial movement (from above) rather than authorization is the main issue in such circles.

2. In John, however, the sending brings out the significance of the person of Christ and of what is done in him, namely, that the Father speaks and acts by him. a. In the signs God manifests Jesus as the promised one and himself as the one who works in and through him. b. The destiny of those who meet Jesus is decided by their attitude to him rather than by his doctrine: Jesus represents the Father in person. c. The death of Jesus is inseparable from his word, and his crucifixion and glorification constitute a unity. Thus Jesus is more than the Gnostic ambassadors. If the idea of sending plays a role, it is colored by John's Christology rather than shaping it. For John the whole complex is linked with prophetic sending and acquires its stamp from the fact that this ambassador is not a man, not even primal or preexistent man, but the Son in whom the Father manifests his presence and offers salvation or judgment.

pseudapóstolos. This word occurs only in the NT, and in the NT only in 2 Cor. 11:13, where Paul himself defines it: "disguising themselves as apostles of Christ." These false apostles are not authorized by Christ, as is shown by their lack of exclusive commitment to God or Christ. Their description as "superlative apostles" (11:5) is full of irony, for an apostle already has an incomparable position as such, and yet is marked by humility. Paul has in view his Judaizing opponents who contest his apostleship (cf. Gal. 1:1). Christians, perhaps Paul himself, probably coined the term, which supports the thesis that apóstolos in its distinctive sense is also of Christian provenance. For the same idea, though not the word, cf. Rev. 2:2: "who call themselves apostles but are not."

apostolḗ. A fairly common word for a. "dispatch of ships," b. any kind of "sending," also active "separation," "entombment" (of a mummy). In the Jewish sphere it can have such varied senses as "tribute," "present," "dispatch of a gift," or simple "sending."

In the NT it is used with diakonía in Acts 1:25, cháris in Rom. 1:5, alone in 1 Cor. 9:2 and Gal. 2:8, always with reference to the office of the apóstolos of Jesus, being fully controlled now by apóstolos in its NT sense. [K. H. RENGSTORF, I, 398-447]

apostréphō → stréphō; aposynágōgos → synagōgḗ; apotássō → tássō

apophthéngomai [to declare]

"To speak out loudly and clearly, or with emphasis" (of philosophers, ecstatics, singers, and prophets), sometimes in a bad sense. It is used in a good sense in Acts of those who, filled with the Spirit, speak ecstatically (Acts 2:4) or prophetically (Acts 2:14; 26:25). [J. BEHM, I, 447]

apopsýchō → psychḗ; apróskopos → kóptō; aprosōpolḗmptōs → prosōpolēmpsía

apōthéō [to reject]

Used from Homer for "to repel," "to reject," this word occurs in the NT only in the rhetorical question of Rom. 11:1 and the negative answer it demands (v. 2). Israel is God's people, hence he cannot repudiate them. [K. L. SCHMIDT, I, 448]

apṓleia → apóllymi

ará [curse], kataráomai [to curse], katára [curse], epikatáratos [cursed], epáratos [accursed]

ará. Originally "wish," "petition," but used for "curse" from Homer's time, and found in the NT only at Rom. 3:14.

kataráomai. "To curse," so Lk. 6:28; Jms. 3:9 with accusative of person (mostly dative in nonbiblical Greek).

katára (→ exagorázō). Derived from katarásthai, "to enchant," katára means "curse." l. Curse (and Blessing). Curses, found in almost all religious history, are utterances that are designed to bring harm by supernatural operation. They are made by priests, chiefs, the dying, etc. They often involve special formulas and rites. Sometimes they are linked with prayers. They demand belief in their fulfilment. They play a role in law, e.g., self-cursing for breaches of oaths. Jesus forbade his disciples to curse (Lk. 6:28), giving authority only to withhold remission (Jn. 20:23). God's curse, e.g., through the prophets, reveals his judgment in such a way as to initiate it (cf. Gal. 3:10, 13), the emphasis being on the ineluctability of the consequences of sin.

2. Gal. 3:13. This is the curse of the law, since the law expresses it (Dt. 27:26), but as such it is God's curse. It applies to everybody, not just to the Jew or Jewish Christian. To be a sinner is to stand under God's wrath and condemnation. Release comes because Jesus became a curse on our behalf (hypér) in a vicarious action which is not relativized but also not merely objectivized as though it were a legal transaction apart from us. Jesus' vicarious work effectively establishes a new fellowship between God and us, so that redemption is ours through Christ's becoming a curse (v. 13), as reconciliation is ours through his being made sin (2 Cor. 5:17ff.). His being made a curse means that he enters our alienation in order to bring us out of it. Why this is necessary, Paul does not say. He simply accepts the fact. But he also sees that the curse of the law initiates the punishment of sin, so that new fellowship is in fact possible only by Christ's vicarious bearing of the penalty.

epikatáratos, epáratos. epikatáratos occurs in the NT only in Gal. 3:13 and means "cursed." epáratos in Jn. 7:49 (on the basis of Dt. 27:26) expresses the scorn of the scribes for the unlearned; not knowing the law, they are "cursed." [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 448-51]

argós [idle], argéō [to be idle],katargéō [to render inoperative]

argós, argéō. argós means a. "indolent," "useless," "unemployed," and b. "incapable of action." It occurs in the NT in the secular sense in Mt. 20:3 ("unemployed"), Mt. 20:6 ("inactive"), and Tit. 1:12 ("idle"). It also has a religious sense in 2 Pet. 1:8, namely, "ineffective," i.e., without works that express faith and hence "unserviceable" or "worthless" (parallel ákarpos, "unfruitful"). argéō, used in the LXX for "to rest," is used in the negative in 2 Pet. 2:3 to express the latent activity of judgment; it is "not idle."

katargéō. In the NT this word has the secular meanings "'to condemn to inactivity" (Lk. 13:7), "to destroy" (1 Cor. 13:11), and "to take out of the sphere of activity" (Rom. 7:2).

1. Religiously Paul uses it for "to make inoperative."

a. When God or Christ is the subject, the effect is beneficial. A transvaluation of values is effected in 1 Cor. 1:28: God "brings to nothing" things that are. In Eph. 2:15 he "destroys" the law of commandments; Christ's work frees us from the legalistic requirements of the law (while not invalidating its ethical demands; cf. Rom. 3:31). God also "robs" this age and its rulers "of their power" (1 Cor. 2:6), including death, and, as Hebrews puts it (2:14), the devil. The body of sin, i.e., our form in subjection to sin, is thus "negated," although our new life has not yet taken on its definitive form, and thus includes things which will be ended, e.g., prophecy and our present knowledge (1 Cor. 13:8). For with the coming of the perfect, the imperfect "loses its point" (v. 10).

b. When we are the subject, the effect is harmful, for by a Judaizing approach to the law we can nullify faith and make the promise void (Rom. 4:14), or by insisting on circumcision we "remove" the offense of the cross (Gal. 5:11).

2. The provisional disarming of demonic powers will issue in their complete destruction at the return of Christ (1 Cor. 15:24; 2 Th. 2:8; 1 Cor. 6:13).

3. The sense in Rom. 7:6 and Gal. 5:4 is "taken out of the sphere of operation," i.e., of the law in the first verse, of Christ in the second.

4. In 2 Cor. 3 vv. 7 and 13 seem to be instances of 2. ("transitory," "evanescent"). The same might apply in v. 14 if the point is that the illusion that the glory of the law remains is "destroyed" in Christ; but if the old covenant is taken to be the subject, the meaning is that it is "devalued" by Christ, having only a borrowed glory and not its own, and thus losing its relative value when the true glory comes with Christ. [G. DELLING, I, 451-54]

aréskō [to please], anthrōpáreskos [man-pleasing], areskeía [desire to please], arestós [pleasing], euárestos [well-pleasing], euarestéō [to be well-pleasing] aréskō. aréskō originally meant "to set up a positive relation," hence "to make peace," then aesthetically "to please," with such nuances as a. "to be well disposed," b. "to take a pleasant attitude," and c. "to please."

In the NT the word means "to please" in Mk. 6:22; Acts 6:5, "to please oneself" in Rom. 15:1ff., "to please" in expression of an attitude or approach in 1 Th. 2:4; Gal. 1:10; Rom. 8:8; 1 Th. 2:15; 4:1.

anthrōpáreskos. The opposite of an incipient theáreskos, this word in Col. 3:22; Eph. 6:6 denotes the norm of those who, out of fear, try to please their superiors. Paul in contrast bases true service to others on service to God.

areskeía. This word denotes the attitude of an áreskos; hence the meaning in Col. 1:10 is "every kind of pleasing attitude," toward whom being only implied.

arestós. Meaning "acceptable" or "pleasing," and denoting in the LXX what God (or a person) accepts as pleasing, this word is used for "pleasing" to God in Jn. 8:29; Acts 6:2; to the Jews in Acts 12:3; "things pleasing to God" (par. commandments) in 1 Jn. 3:22.

euárestos, euarestéō. Meaning "well-pleasing," "acceptable," euárestos in the NT always (except in Tit. 2:9) refers to God, and is never an evaluation (except in Phil. 4:18, describing the Philippians' gifts) but always the goal of the Christian life (e.g., Rom. 12:1-2; 14:18; Col. 3:20), so that we are constantly to test what is euáreston (Eph. 5:10). Of the three senses of euarestéō, a. "to be well-pleasing," b. "to take pleasure in," and c. "to walk as is well-pleasing," b. occurs in Heb.13:16 and c. in Heb. 11:5-6 [W. FOERSTER, I, 455-57]

aretḗ [virtue, excellence]

A. aretḗ outside the NT. This word has many senses but primarily means a. "eminence" in either achievement or endowment or both, b. "martial valor," c. "merit," d. in philosophy "virtue," which in Hellenistic Judaism (though not in Philo) can approximate righteousness, e. "self-declaration" on the part of the gods, and finally f. "fame" (its exclusive nuance in the Greek translation of the OT).

B. aretḗ in the NT. It is important here that the LXX finds no use for the Greek idea of "virtue" and hence has the term only in the sense of "excellence" or "fame." Not surprisingly, then, it is extremely rare in the NT. In Phil. 4:8 Paul puts it next to "praise" in a series with "what is true" etc., and if the series has

---

par. paragraph

mainly a religious ring, what he has in mind is the excellence that the righteous are to maintain in life and death. The same applies in 2 Pet. 1:5 (in spite of a secular parallel that might suggest "virtue") while in the only other verse (1 Pet. 1:9) the context suggests either "self declaration" (e.) or "fame" (f.) [O. BAUERNFEIND, I, 457-60]

arḗn → amnós

arithméō [to count], arithmós [number]

1. These words are often used in the literal senses "to count" and "sum" or "number" (Mt. 10:30; Acts 11:21; Rom. 9:27), but in Rev. 13:17-18 aríthmós has a special sense which raises the question of sacred numbers. The mystery of regularity seems to have led to the investing of numbers with potency. In the NT new content is given them by events, the inherited symbolism is refashioned, and the symbolism is mainly formal and stylized, 7, 10, and 12 being especially prominent in Revelation.

2. As for Rev. 13:18 the riddle is that of numerical values ascribed to letters, with the added complications that the alphabet might be either Greek or Hebrew, and that 616 is an alternative reading to 666. The various solutions proposed, e.g., Titus, Nero, the Roman empire as such, or simply antichrist, are all unsatisfactory, and it may be that the divine was writing only for initiates of his own day, or that the passage is pure eschatology in the sense that the meaning will be clear only when the mystery is already present. [O. RÜHLE, I, 461-64]

arkéō [to be sufficient], arketós [sufficient], autárkeia [contentment], autárkēs [content]

arkéō, arketós.

1. In religion these terms, which at first simply express "contentment," can become an ethical demand for contentment with what we have, either out of prudence, or freedom relative to external goods, or (in the NT) confidence in God's adequate provision (cf. Heb.13:5, 1 Tim. 6:8; also Mt. 6:32ff.; Lk. 3:14).

2. A warning may also be issued against the security of illusory sufficiency (though the NT does not usually have the arkéō group for this).

3. Contentment is related by some philosophers to the supreme good, e.g., fashioning life according to nature. In the OT contentment is associated with moderation in 1 Kgs. 3:6ff., and the sense of God's guidance and the readiness for obedience in Ps. 73. Rabbinic exegesis finds religious satisfaction in God in his answer to Moses in Dt. 3:26 (cf. the paraphrase of Gen. 17:1). In Jn. 14:8 being shown the Father confers supreme contentment. In 2 Cor. 12:9 participation in grace is all-sufficient for Paul.

autárkeia, autárkēs.

1. The philosophical sense among the Cynics and Stoics is that of "self-sufficiency" or "self-reliance," while the ordinary meaning is "competence" or "sufficient quantity."

2. In the NT the word is given a new dimension as part of godliness (1 Tim. 6:6). Thus Paul's apparently philosophical contentment in Phil. 4:11ff. finds its center in "him who strengthens me" (v. 13). "Enough" also means having something to give to others too (2 Cor. 9:8).

3. On the basis of the divine name, rabbinic exegesis transfers the ideal of the autárkēs to God either in his self-sufficiency, his infinitude relative to the world, his satisfaction with creation, or his saying "Enough" to human suffering. [G. KITTEL, I, 464-67]

Hár Magedṓn [Armageddon]

This is the name given for the site of the final decisive battle (Rev. 16:13ff.) and world judgment (19:19ff.). The use of Hebrew and absence of interpretation are in the style of apocalyptic. Two explanations have been advanced: a. a link with Megiddo, and b. a Greek rendering of the mount of assembly in Is. 14:13. The problem with a. is that there is no Mt. Megiddo, that Megiddo is not given eschatological significance, and the earliest exegesis does not mention it. The problem with b., which would make Hár Magedṓn the demonic counterpart of the mountain of God (cf. Heb.12:22ff.), is that it is not an exact transliteration of the Hebrew of Isaiah. [J. JEREMIAS, I, 468]

arnéomai [to deny, refuse]

a. "To say no" in answer to a question; b. "to refuse" in relation to a claim or demand.

1. In the NT we find a. in Lk. 8:45; Acts 4:16; Jn. 1:20; Mk. 14:68; Jn. 18:25; 1 Jn. 2:22: "to deny." Examples of b. are Heb.11:24, Tit. 2:12; Acts 3:13: "to refuse."

2. The main thrust in the NT, however, is that of denying a person, as in Acts 3:13; Jn. 1:20; Mk. 14:68. This contains four elements: a. denial of a person rather than a thing (Jesus in Jn. 13:38; the Master in 2 Pet. 2:11; the Son in 1 Jn. 2:22-23; the name or faith representing the person in Rev. 2:13; 3:8; perhaps that which gives power to godliness in 2 Tim. 3:5); b. prior acknowledgment and commitment (cf. 2 Tim. 2:12; Rev. 3:8); c. unfaithfulness in the three forms of not meeting the claim for confession (Mt. 10:33; Mk. 8:38), not meeting the claims of neighbors (2 Tim. 2:11ff.), and not acknowledging Christ in sound teaching (2 Pet. 2:1ff.; 1 Jn. 2:22); d. a failure of the whole person in respect of total truth before God (Mt. 10:33; 2 Tim. 2:12; 1 Jn. 2:23).

3. The person denied may be the self. Thus God cannot deny himself (2 Tim. 2:13), but the disciples must deny the self (Mk. 8:34) in a radical renunciation, an acceptance of the cross, and the finding of true life in Christ.

aparnéomai. The compound has no greater intensity in the NT but has the same sense as arnéomai, as is shown by their interchangeability (Lk. 9:23 and Mk. 8:34), their alternate use in the same passage (Lk. 12:9), and the textual variants (Lk. 9:23; Jn. 13:38). [H. SCHLIER, I, 469-71] harpázō [to seize], harpagmós [something to be grasped] harpázō. a. "To steal" b. "to capture" c. "to snatch," d. "to seize," e.'"to take by force," f. "to catch away" (in visions).

Three possibilities exist in Mt. 11:12: a. that the kingdom is taken away and closed; b. that violent people culpably snatch it; c. that people take it forcibly in a good sense. The first has some support in the wording and context, the third is likely because of the irruption of the kingdom with the Baptist and the need for resoluteness to enter it. The second is intrinsically improbable.

harpagmós. Used in the NT only in Phil. 2:6, this word means a. "the act of seizing," b. "what is seized," and c. "something regarded as gain or utilized." In Phil. 2:6 sense a. is impossible due to a lack of object, while sense b. is hardly intelligible. We are thus left with c.: "He did not regard equality with God as a gain, either as not to be let slip, or as to be utilized." Those who favor the former nuance here refer to the temptation of Jesus, but the reference seems to be pretemporal and therefore it is best to translate: "He did not regard it as a gain to be equal with God," the reference being, not to resistance to temptation, but to a free (if unexpected) act of self-abnegation. [W. FOERSTER, I, 472-74]

arrabṓn [deposit, guarantee]

NT New Testament

arrabṓn is a commercial loanword from the Semitic signifying “pledge” or “deposit.” Paul uses it in 2 Cor. 1:22 and Eph. 1:14 for the Spirit who is for us the guarantee of full future possession of salvation. [J. BEHM, I, 475]

arrḗtos* → erṓ; artigénnētos → *gennáō

ártios [suitable], exartízō [to equip], katartízō [to prepare], katartismós [equipment], katártisis [improvement]

The meanings of ártios are a. “suitable,” b. “correct” or “normal,” and c. “even” (in mathematics). katartízō has the senses a. “to regulate” and b. “to equip.” In 2 Tim. 3:17 ártios means “what is proper or becoming.” exartizō in 2 Tim. 3:17 means “to equip” and in Acts 21:5 “to end as prescribed.” katartízō means a. “to order” (the aeons in Heb.11:3 to destruction in Rom. 9:22), and b. “to confirm” (in unity, 1 Cor. 1:10; the fallen, Gal. 6:1; in everything good, Heb.13:21 , confirmation being a mutual task (2 Cor. 13:11) but finally God’s work (1 Pet. 5:10). katartismós in Eph. 4:12 denotes equipment for the work of the ministry, while katártisis is the inner strength of the organic relationship of the community, or of the character of its members (2 Cor. 13:9). [G. DELLING, I, 475-76]

ártos [bread]

1. This word signifies literal bread in passages like Lk. 24:30; Acts 27:35; Jn. 6:11 (at the Last Supper, Mk. 14:22; the showbread, Mk. 2:26).

2. It then stands for nourishment in general (Lk. 7:33; Jn. 13:18; 2 Th. 3:12).

3. The idea of participation in eternal bliss underlies Lk. 14:15 and Christ as the true bread or bread of life in Jn. 6:31ff. [J. BEHM, I, 477-78]

archángelos* → ángelos; archiereús → hiereús; archipoimḗn → poimḗn; archisynágogos → *synagōgḗ

árchō [to rule, begin], archḗ [beginning, ruler], aparchḗ [firstfruits], archaíos [old, ancient], archēgós [founder, leader], árchōn [ruler] árchō. Active a. “to rule,” b. “to begin”; middle “to begin.”

1. The active occurs in the NT only in Mk. 10:42; Rom. 15:12 and means “to rule.” Jesus relativizes all earthly rule, finding true power only in God.

2. The middle is more common, especially in Luke, usually as a kind of auxiliary verb signifying “indeed” or “moreover,” but sometimes in a more pregnant sense, as in Jn. 13:5; 2 Cor. 3:1 (the only instance in Paul); 1 Pet. 4:17.

archḗ.

A. The General and Philosophical Use of archḗ. The meaning is “primacy,” whether in time or rank.

1. In time it denotes the point of a new beginning in a temporal sequence. The relativity of the time sequence is implied, as in the religious statement that God is beginning and end. In philosophy it is used at first for the original material out of which everything evolves, then for the basic laws controlling all evolution. Stoicism views both God and matter (which God permeates) as archaí; God is identical with archḗ (and télos) as lógos and noús. Philo calls the four elements archaí, as he does the atoms, but the number 1 is also archḗ, and so is the lógos and God.

---

Heb. Hebrew

2. In rank the senses are a. "dominion," b. "realm," and c. "authorities."

B. archḗ in the LXX.

1. The usual sense is "temporal beginning," sometimes "primeval time."

2. Fairly frequently archḗ signifies "dominion," "power," "position of power," "person of influence." In Dan. 7:27 all archaí shall serve God's saints; these are earthly kingdoms but with a hint of supraterrestrial powers (ch. 10).

C. archḗ in the NT.

1. archḗ as "beginning" is used in the NT a. in the formula "from the beginning," e.g., of creation (Heb.1:10, of Christ's appearing (Lk. 1:2), of being a Christian (1 Jn. 2:24), indeterminately of our election (2 Th. 2:13), with the devil as subject ("from all ages," though not in the sense of eternal, Jn. 8:44; 1 Jn. 3:8). 1 John has the phrases "that which was from the beginning" (1:1) and "he who was from the beginning" (2:13-14) for the Logos who has become perceptible to the disciples but is eternally preexistent, since it is God himself who here gives himself to us.

b. "In the beginning" in Jn. 1:1 says this specifically of the Logos; the Logos is before all time, so that no temporal statements can be made about him. Eternal preexistence is plainly implied. Elsewhere "in the beginning" refers to Paul's first evangelistic work in Phil. 4:15 and the early days of the Jerusalem church in Acts 11:15.

c. tḗn archḗn is used adverbially in Jn. 8:25 for "all the time."

d. archḗ may also denote the first occurrence in a series, as in Mt. 24:8; Heb. 5:12 (the beginning of Christian instruction); Heb. 3:14 (of the confidence of faith); 2:3 (of Christ's own preaching of salvation). In the negative the saying that Christ has no beginning (or end) puts him beyond time (Heb. 7:3).

2. archḗ as "power" means a. "dominion" or "power," e.g., Lk. 12:11 for the secular or spiritual authorities, and 20:20 for the power of the Roman procurator (always with exousía except in Jude 6); b. (plural) supraterrestrial forces (cf. Daniel) which seem to be hostile to God (Eph. 1:21), which have an overlord (Eph. 2:2), which govern different spheres, e.g., religious (1 Cor. 8:5), sexual (1 Cor. 6: 15ff.), vital (1 Cor. 15:26), and social (cf. Eph. 6), which are spiritual (Eph. 6:12), related to angels (Rom. 8:38), and originally meant to be good (Col. 1:16), which are now confined to the lowest heaven (Eph. 3:10), which have been robbed of their power by the cross (Col. 2:15) and are now subject to Christ (Col. 2:15) their Lord (Col. 2:10, 16), but which still engage in conflict with Christians (Eph. 6:12) even though they cannot finally separate them from God (Rom. 8:38) and will ultimately lose all their influence (1 Cor. 15:24).

LXX Septuagint

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

cf. confer, compare

3. In Col. 1:18 Christ himself is archḗ as the image of God and the firstborn of all creation “before” all else. As archḗ he is the norm for creation by and for which all things were made (cf. 1:16b). He is also archḗ as the firstborn from the dead. Rev. 3:14 probably calls him archḗ in much the same sense (cf. 21:6; 22:13). Eschatology with its relativizing of history brought some kinship in philosophical usage: Christ on the throne is pre- and posttemporal (→ AŌ).

aparchḗ.

A. aparchḗ outside the NT. This means a. “firstfruits,” then b. “proportionate gift” from earnings and the like, e.g., as a thank offering, then c. “offering” to the deity or sanctuary (cf. the temple tax in Josephus Antiquities 16.172). The offering may sometimes be of humans, e.g., for colonization or for temple service. The LXX uses the term for a. “firstfruits,” b. “regular offerings,” and c. “special gifts,” almost always with a cultic reference (“portion” in Dt. 33:21 and “firstborn” in Ps. 78:51 are exceptions).

B. aparchḗ in the NT.

1. In Rom. 11:16 Paul uses the firstfruits of dough as a comparison to show that Israel’s election continues in spite of present apostasy.

2. In 1 Cor. 1:16 the household of Stephanas is called the firstfruits of Achaia either in the sense that they are the first converts, or in the sense that they are Achaia’s offering to Christ. Jms. 1:18 has a similar use: God shows his constancy by giving believers new birth so that they are a firstfruits of humanity offered to God. In Rev. 14:4 the 144,000 have become God’s both by (temple) redemption and as firstfruits. They are thus the cultic personnel of the heavenly Jerusalem who are always in the Lamb’s presence and alone learn the new song.

3. In Rom. 8:23 the relation is reversed, for now it is God who gives us the Spirit as a firstfruits, to be followed by adoption and the spiritual body.

archaíos. This means “from the beginning,” then “past” or “old,” often with a reference to origins and with something of the dignity of “ancient.” In the LXX it can sometimes have the sense of pretemporal, as in Is. 37:26.

In the NT the “ancient world” of 2 Pet. 2:5 is the world before the flood. In Mt. 5:21 the “ancients” are forefathers or predecessors. In Lk. 9:8 the “ancient prophets” are those of repute. In Acts 15:21 the reference is to a “long past,” whereas the “early days” of the community are at issue in 15:7. In 2 Cor. 5:17 preresurrection religious relations and attitudes are in view (e.g., to Christ, v. 16). In Rev. 12:9; 20:2 Satan is the,“ancient serpent” (cf. Gen. 3).

archēgós. a. The “hero” of a city, its founder or guardian; b. the “originator” or “author” (e.g., Zeus of nature or Apollo of piety); c. “captain.” Philo uses the term for Abraham, and once for God, while the LXX mostly has it for “military leader.” In the NT Christ is archēgós in Acts 5:31: we bear his name and he both looks after us and gives us a share of his glory, especially his life (3:15) and salvation (Heb. 2:10); he is also the archēgós of our faith both as its founder and as the first example when in his death he practiced his faith in God’s love and its overcoming of the barrier of human sin (Heb. 12:2).

árchōn. The term denotes a “high official,” mostly in civil life, rarely in the religious sphere, though Neh. 12:7 refers to archons of priests and Dan. 10 to celestial beings guarding and representing individual states.

---

v. verse

The NT uses the term 1. for Roman and Jewish officials of various kinds; 2. for Christ in Rev. 1:5, and 3. for the demonic prince (Beelzebul) who, the Pharisees allege, is behind the exorcisms of Jesus (Mt. 12:24), but whose power is broken (Jn. 12:31), who cannot touch the sinless Christ (Jn. 14:30), and who has already come under judgment (Jn. 16:11); along the same lines Paul speaks of the árchōn that works in non-Christians (Eph. 2:2) and of several powers of this age that have lost their force by ignorantly trying to make the Lord of glory their prey (1 Cor. 2:6, 8). [G. DELLING, I, 478-90]

asébeia, asebḗs, asebéō → *sébomai

asélgeia [licentiousness]

"License," mostly physical, figuratively spiritual. "Debauchery" or "licentiousness" is the sense in 2 Pet. 2:7 (Sodom and Gomorrah) and Eph. 4:19 (the pagan world). Sexual excess is probably meant in Gal. 5:19 and certainly so in Rom. 13:13; 2 Cor. 12:21; 2 Pet. 2:2, 18. [O. BAUERNFEIND, I, 490]

asthenḗs [weak], asthéneia [weakness], asthenéō [to be weak],asthénēma [weakness]

A. Linguistic Data. This group denotes "weakness" of various kinds, often used for kšl in the LXX.

B. Material Data.

1. The first reference is to physical weakness, but in the NT weakness a. extends to the whole person, e.g., the "weaker" sex in 1 Pet. 3:7, Paul's "unimpressive" appearance in 1 Cor. 2:3, the "weakness of the flesh" in Mt. 26:41; Rom. 6:19. It may then be b. a mark of the Christian (in contrast to God's strength): God has chosen the weak (1 Cor. 1:26); Christ himself became weak (2 Cor. 13:3-4; cf. Heb. 5:2); weakness is a reason for joyful boasting (2 Cor. 11:30); God's power is made perfect in our weakness (2 Cor. 12:10). Yet weakness can be c. something that must be overcome, as in the case of the "weak in faith" of Rom. 14:1 and 1 Cor. 8:9, who are certainly to be protected by the "strong" (Rom. 15:1: the terms are perhaps party slogans), but who are still deficient in knowledge (1 Cor. 8:7), not having fully freed themselves from their pre-Christian past. Weakness also has d. almost the sense of "sin" in Heb. 4:15; 7:28; Rom. 5:6 (the "helpless" here being parallel to the "sinners" of v. 8).

2. A special form of weakness is "sickness," and the group is often used for this in the NT, e.g., in Jn. 5:5 (cf. Acts 28:9); Lk. 10:9; Mt. 10:8. Sickness is seen as a. the work of demons (Mt. 17:18; Lk. 13:11) or b. a punishment for sin (1 Cor. 11:30); Mk. 2:5-6; cf. Jms. 5:16; also Jn. 11:4 and 1 Jn. 5:16). The mighty works of Jesus include healings of sickness (Jn. 6:2; Mt. 8:17, quoting Is. 53:4). So do those of the apostles (Mt. 10:8; Acts 28:9), and later we find the laying on of handkerchiefs (Acts 19:12) and anointing with oil (and prayer) (Jms. 5:14, 16).

3. Figuratively weakness can also have the form of "inner poverty" or "incapacity." Thus we read of the beggarly elemental spirits of Gal. 4:9, the inability of the law to save in Rom. 8:3, and the apparent insignificance of some parts of the body in 1 Cor. 12:22.

4. The weakness may finally be economic, i.e., "poverty," as in Acts 20:35. [G. STÄHLIN, I, 491-93]

askéō [to exercise]

askéō occurs in the NT only in Acts 24:16: "I exercise or exert myself." The term is used by Homer for artistic endeavor but is then applied spiritually from Herodotus and Pindar and occurs in the Stoics for taming the passions, exercise in virtue, and thought control. Philo finds in Jacob the model askētḗs on the basis of Gen. 32:24ff. Later fathers like Clement and Origen adopt the same usage and example. Paul has

---

i.e. id est, that is the term only in Acts 24:16, but his self-discipline as he describes it in 1 Cor. 9:25ff. resembles the askeín of the spiritual athlete. In Acts 24:16 he devotes much concern or works hard at having a conscience void of offense. It is surprising, but perhaps purely accidental, that the askéō group, which is so common in Jewish Hellenism and later Christian literatare, is not used more often in the NT (especially in view of the parallel in 1 Tim. 4:7-8). [H. WINDISCH, I, 494-96]

aspázomai [to greet], apaspázomai [to bid farewell], aspasmós [greeting]

A. aspázesthai and aspasmós outside the NT. aspázesthai means to effect aspasmós, "to proffer a greeting," e.g., on the street, or when entering a house, or when parting. aspasmós includes embracing, kissing, offering the hand, and even proskynesis, as well as words of greeting. Homage paid to an overlord is a special form of aspasmós, whether a. by paying a ceremonious call, or b. by acclamation. aspasmós may also be the greeting in a letter; such greetings were more common in the Near East and less common in the Graeco-Roman sphere in the pre-Christian period. The basic sense seems to be "to embrace" and derived senses are then a. "to like someone," "to pay respects to someone," "to agree with someone," and b. "to give oneself to something," "to welcome something." In the LXX aspázesthai occurs only in Ex. 18:7 for "to ask about the welfare" (in greeting); it is more common in the Apocrypha. aspasmós does not occur at all.

B. In the NT.

1. Jesus' Rules of Greeting. Greetings were important for the Jews (cf. Mk. 12:18). Once (Mk. 9:15) the crowd greets Jesus himself. (More often we read of the more respectful proskyneín.) There is also a mock greeting at the trial (Mk. 15:18-19). Gentiles, too, greet their brethren as a sign of fellowship (Mt. 5:47). Jesus, however, requires his disciples to greet enemies as well as brethren. That he takes greeting very seriously is shown by his command to the disciples, when he sends them out, that they should greet a strange house on entering it, and that the peace of the greeting will either rest on the house or return to them (Mt. 10:12-13). The greeting of the apostles is thus endued with authority. On the other hand, the disciples must not let their time be wasted by casual greetings on the way (Lk. 10:4).

2. The aspasmós in Religious Narrative. In Lk. 1:29 Mary is puzzled by the angelic greeting. In Lk. 1:40ff. her own greeting of Elizabeth causes the child to leap in the womb and leads Elizabeth herself to cry in the Spirit: "Blessed are you among women.",

3. The Greeting of the Apostle. In Acts an apostle greets a church on arrival and at parting (cf. 18:22; 21:7, 19). This may simply indicate a visit in 18:22 but receives emphasis in 21:7, 19. In 20:1 it comes at the end of an exhortation and in 21:6 it involves a moving ceremony that no doubt included embracing, kissing, and the wishing of peace.

4. The aspasmós in the Epistles. aspázesthai is the most common form of greeting in letters (47 times). It occurs in all the epistles except Galatians, Ephesians, 1 Timothy, James, 2 Peter, Jude, and 1 John. Paul seems to have regarded the greeting as very important as an expression of affection. In the imperative the writer may a. ask his readers to present greetings from a distance (Rom. 16:3ff.), b. greet all the members of the church (Phil. 4:21), c. tell the members to greet one another (1 Cor. 10:20; 1 Th. 5:26, which implies that the greeting would include embracing), or d. pass on a greeting to friends (2 Tim. 4:19). In the indicative a. absent individual Christians deliver greetings (1 Cor. 16:19; Rom. 16:21ff.: the scribe), b. groups in the church send greetings where there is a special relation (Phil. 4:22; Heb. 13:24), c. the whole church sends greetings, having no doubt asked the apostle to do this (2 Cor. 13:12; Phil. 4:22), d. a general ecumenical greeting is sent (1 Cor. 16:19; Rom. 16:16), and e. a special greeting is sent in the apostle's own hand (2 Th. 3:17; 1 Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18), this being both personal and a mark of authenticity (2 Th. 3:17), but surprisingly not occurring in all of Paul's letters (though without the aspasmós formula it is perhaps to be found in Gal. 6:11ff.; Rom. 16:17ff.). [H. WINDISCH, I, 496-502]

áspilos [without spot]

1. "Without spot," "blameless," cultically "unblemished." In 1 Pet. 1:19 the figure of speech obviously implies that Jesus is an unblemished offering because he is sinless.

2. "Morally pure": this is a biblical usage (Job 15:15) and occurs in the NT in Jms. 1:27; 2 Pet 3:14; 1 Tim 6:14. Moral content is thus given to a cultic concept. [A. OEPKE, I, 502]

astatéō [to be unsteady]

"To be unsteady," "restless"; a. active of a flickering glance, an unreliable person, fickle fortune; b. passive "to be set in commotion"; c. either active or passive "to wander around unsteadily" (rare in secular usage). In 1 Cor. 4: 11 Paul lists kaí astatoúmen as an apostolic burden: "we have no fixed abode," though with no specific stress on "wandering" (cf. 2 Cor. 5:8). [A. OEPKE, I, 503]

astḗr, ástron [star]

astḗr denotes a star, ástron a star or a constellation. The ancients regarded stars as "beings" and even deities, but in the OT they execute God's command and declare his glory (Is. 40:26; Ps. 19:1), although in so doing they are living creatures (with angels set over them in the pseudepigrapha) (cf. 1 Cor. 15:40ff.). Apocalyptic speaks of stars falling from heaven (Mk. 13:25; Rev. 6:13) or being obscured (Rev. 8:12). A falling star may have destructive effects (Rev. 8:10-11). The seven stars of Rev. 1:16, 20; 2:1;, 3:1 may be the planets or the stars of the Great or Little Bear but are more probably related to the lampstands (cf. Josephus and the rabbis), just as the angels are parallel to the churches (1:20). The twelve stars have been connected with the zodiac but more likely refer to the twelve tribes. The morning star of Rev. 2:28 has been understood to be the Holy Spirit, the chief stellar angel, or the dawn of salvation; in 22:16 it seems to be Christ himself. The star which appeared to the Wise Men accords with messianic expectation on the basis of Num. 24:17, but what star it was, and how the wise men interpreted it, we cannot say for certain. [W. FOERSTER, I, 503-05]

astrapḗ [lightning, beam of light]

astrapḗ is often used as a comparison in the NT (the Easter angel in Mt. 28:3; the suddenness of the divine working in Lk. 10:18; the visibility and suddenness of the coming in Mt. 24:27). In Rev. 4:5; 8:5; 11:19; 16:18 lightning is linked with OT theophanies, with echoes of the plagues in the last three passages. With thunder, lightning climaxes the series of plagues that display God's supremacy, but it does not occur in the final judgment of 20:11ff. [W. FOERSTER, I, 505]

ástron* → astḗr; asýnetos → *syníēmi

aspháleia [certainty], asphalḗs [sure], asphalṓs [securely], asphalízō [to safeguard]

These words all suggest "firmness" or "certainty." The idea in Lk. 1:4 is the "reliability" of the teachings, in Acts 21:34; 22:30; 25:26 "the truth" (i.e., the facts, the real reason, something definite), in

---

OT Old Testament

Acts 2:36 "sure knowledge," and in 1 Th. 5:3 "security" (with eirḗnē, "peace and security") in the sense of false security in an eschatological situation. [K. L. SCHMIDT, I, 506]

ásōtos [dissolute], asōtía [debauchery]

The original sense is "incurable"; then we have the ideas of dissipation, gluttony, voluptuousness, and indiscipline. The only OT instances are Prov. 7:11 and 28:7. The reference in Lk. 15:7 is to the prodigal's life of dissipation, and in Eph. 5:18; Tit. 1:6; 1 Pet. 4:4 to a disorderly life (rather than voluptuousness). [W. FOERSTER, I, 506-07]

ataktéō, átaktos* → *tássō

augázō [to shine], apaúgasma [radiance]

augázō. augḗ means "radiance" and can be rendered "dawn" in its only occurrence in the NT (Acts 20:11). augázō means a. "to shine forth," b. "to illuminate," and c. "to see." In 2 Cor. 4:4 b. is impossible, and while older translations and variants favor a., the parallel in 3:13 strongly supports c. ("that they should not see").

apaúgasma. a. "Effulgence," b. "reflection," used by the LXX of wisdom's relation to eternal light (a.), by Philo of its relation to the world (b.), of our relation to God (a.), and of the relation of the human spirit to the divine lógos (a.). In Heb. 1:3 (of Christ) both senses are possible, but patristic consensus favors a.: Christ is the effulgence of the glory of God as sunshine is of the sun or light of light. [G. KITTEL, I, 507-08]

authádēs [self-willed]

a. "Self-satisfied," b. "arbitrary," c. "morose," d. "shameless." In Tit. 1:7 (bishops) the related adjectives favor b., while in 2 Pet. 2:10 (heretics) the context suggests d. [O. BAUERNFEIND, I, 508-09]

autárkeia, autárkēs* → arkéō; autóptēs → horáō; autokatákritos → krínō;aphtharsía, áphthartos → *phtheírō

aphíēmi [to let go pardon] áphesis [forgiveness], paríēmi [to leave], páresis [forgiveness]

A. The Greek Usage. aphiénai, "to send off," can have such varied nuances as "to release," "to hurl," "to let be," "to pardon." áphesis, which is less common, is used for "release" (from office, obligation, debt, penalty). paríēmi means "to send by" with such nuances as "to leave behind," "leave off," "let be," "give up," "remit."

B. The Use of aphíēmi, áphesis in the LXX. In the LXX aphiénai is used for a whole series of words denoting a. "to release," "to leave (in peace)," and b. "to remit" (with God as subject, unlike Greek usage). áphesis accordingly means "release" (eschatological in Is. 58:6; 61:1), "exemption" (from taxation) (Esth. 2:18), and "forgiveness" (Lev. 16:26).

C. The NT Usage.

1. aphiénai means "to let go," "to leave" (Mk. 1:20; 10:28-29; Jn. 4:3; 16:28; 1 Cor. 7:11ff.; Rom. 1:27; Rev. 2:4), or "to leave behind" (Mk. 1:18; Mt. 5:24; Jn. 4:28; Heb. 6:1), or "to let alone" (Mk. 11:6; 14:6; Mt. 3:15; Lk. 13:8; Jn. 11:48; Acts 14:17), or "to allow" (Mk. 1:34; 5:19; cf. the formula in Mk. 7:27; Mt. 3:14; 7:4).

2. aphiénai can also mean “to remit,” “to forgive” in a secular (Mt. 18:27) or more often a religious sense, e.g., sins (Mk. 2:5ff.), trespasses (Mt. 6:14), iniquities (Rom. 4:7), and the intent of the heart (Acts 8:22). The noun áphesis almost always means “forgiveness,” usually of sins (Mk. 1:4; Mt. 26:28; Acts 2:38; 5:31; 10:43; Col. 1:14), but of trespasses in Eph. 1:7. páresis has the same meaning in its one use in Rom. 3:25. The forgiveness denoted is almost always that of God. It is constantly needed, and is granted when requested so long as there is a readiness to forgive others. Its basis is the saving act of Christ, so that Christ may be said to dispense it (Mk. 2:5ff.) or the community through him (Col. 1:14; Eph. 1:7), through his name (Lk. 24:47; Acts 10:43), or on his commission (Jn. 20:23), especially in baptism (Acts 2:38; Heb. 6:1ff.) and the Lord’s Supper (Mt. 26:28). As the community is the holy community of the end-time, forgiveness is an eschatological blessing (Lk. 1:77). Though forgiveness is fundamental, it is not strongly developed conceptually (as the infrequency of aphiēnai etc. in Paul and John shows). But related concepts make it plain a. that responsibility is maintained to God as Judge, b. that forgiveness is known as his act, not as a theoretical deduction, c. that as an eschatological event forgiveness means total renewal, and d. that forgiveness is received when God’s judgment is affirmed in the confession of sins (1 Jn. 1:9; Jms. 5:16; Acts 19:18), penitence (Lk. 24:47; Acts 2:38; Heb. 6:1, and faith (in Paul and John). [R. BULTMANN, I, 509-12]

aphilágathos* → *agathós

aphístēmi [to fall away], apostasía [apostasy], dichostasía [dissension]

aphístēmi. Transitive “to remove” either spatially or within a relationship, “to win over,” “to seduce,” middle “to remove oneself,” “to resign,” “desist,” “fall away.” Only the personal use is important theologically, and in the LXX the term becomes almost a technical one for religious apostasy (Dt. 32:15; Jer. 3:14; Is. 30:1), usually from God or the Lord, and leading to idolatry and immorality.

In the NT this sense occurs in Acts 5:37; 15:38; 19:9. Decline from God is the meaning in Heb. 3:12. In 1 Tim. 4:1 apostasy involves capitulation to heretical beliefs as an eschatological phenomenon. An absolute use is found in Lk. 8:13 and cf. Rev. 3:8.

apostasía. Based on apostátēs (politically a “rebel,” religiously an “apostate”), this term signifies the state (not the act) of apostasy. Paul is accused of apostasy against the law in Acts 21:21. Eschatological apostasy is the issue in 2 Th. 2:3, either with or prior to the man of lawlessness. Resting on Jewish tradition, this will be the decline of Christians into error and sin in the last days (cf. Mt. 24:11-12).

dichostasía. This word for “division” or “dissension” is used for objective disunity in the church in Rom. 16:17, in some readings of 1 Cor. 3:3, and in Gal. 5:20 (probably a reference to party strife within the community). [H. SCHLIER, I, 512-14]

aphomoióō* → hómoios; aphorízō → *hóros

β b

Babylṓn [Babylon]

1. Apart from references to the captivity in Mt. 1:11, 12, 17 and Acts 7:43, and the single mention in 1 Pet. 5:13, the term Babylṓn occurs only in Revelation, where it denotes the ungodly power of the end-time (14:8; 16:19; 17:5, 18; 18:2, 10, 21). Its destruction is announced in 14:8. When it will fall is shown in 16:19. Seven visions depict the fall in 17:1-19:10. It is presented as a harlot (17:1; 19:2), the abomination of the earth (17:5), sitting on the beast in striking array, with her name on her forehead and drunk with the blood of saints (17:3ff.). God will judge it, to the joy of heaven and sorrow of earth (17:17; ch. 18). The main features in this presentation, including Babylon as a symbol, are taken from the OT (cf. Tyre as a harlot in Is. 23:15ff. and the image of the beast in Dan. 7). But the sayings of Jesus have also had an impact (cf. Mt. 23:25; 24:15ff.). The author, however, weaves the various elements into a totality, perhaps with reference to a city already present (17:18), namely, Rome as the city on seven hills which was often called Babel (as representing ungodly power) in later Judaism.

2. In 1 Pet. 5:13 the greeting is almost certainly from Rome; this is supported by almost all early exegesis and the tradition of Peter's work in Rome. If we accept the identification we must infer that Peter and the churches apply the prophecies against Babylon to Rome and thus expect its destruction. [K. G. KUHN, I, 514-17]

báthos [depth]

báthos means "depth" as a. the depth of a stratum and b. depth as a dimension, also used figuratively for greatness or inscrutability. Its use in the NT is figurative in relation to God or the world: God's riches etc. in Rom. 11:32 in the sense of unfathomability, his work in 1 Cor. 2:10 as it is accessible only through the Spirit, and the heavenly inheritance in Eph. 3:18 in its comprehensiveness and universality; then depth as a creaturely power in Rom. 8:39, and as immorality in Rev. 2:24 (the "deep things of Satan"). It may be noted that unlike Gnosticism (in which there are analogies), the NT never calls God himself depth. [H. SCHLIER, I, 517-18]

→ hýpsos

(baínō) [to go away], anabaínō [to go up, ascend], katabaínō [to go down, descend], metabaínō [to change one's place]

(baínō). Not used in the NT or Philo, and used only twice in Josephus and four times in the LXX, this word is mostly intransitive in classical Greek and means "to go," "to stride," then "to go away," "to go on before," "to come."

anabaínō.

1. The primary sense is spatial, "to rise up," e.g., to mount a horse or ship, or to climb a hill, or move from the coast inland, or go to an upper story, or to mount a rostrum, or to rise to address the court. Thus in the NT Jesus climbs a hill (Mt. 5:1; 14:23) or climbs into a boat (Mt. 14:22) or goes up to Jerusalem (Mt. 20:17-18); Joseph goes up from Galilee (Lk. 2:4), the men with the sick of the palsy go up on the roof (Lk. 5:19), and Zacchaeus climbs the tree (Lk. 19:4). anabaínein is also used intransitively of the seed springing up in Mt. 13:7 and parallels.

2. More important in the NT is the cultic use (based on the OT and LXX). Jesus' going up from baptism acquires significance through the descent of the Spirit (Mt. 3:16). Going up to the sanctuary or Jerusalem is a stock phrase (Lk. 18:10; Jn. 2:13; 5:1; 7:8, 10, 14; 12:20). For Paul this means not only going to a place but to the mother community (cf. Acts 18:22). Actual ascent is indicated (since the holy city is on a hill) but going to worship is implied, as also in pagan usage due to the common situation of shrines on eminences.

3. The culminating religious use of the term is for ascent to heaven. In Acts 2:34 the claim is made, perhaps against a nonmessianic understanding of Ps. 110:1, that Jesus alone fulfils the prophecy by his ascension and session (possibly also in repudiation of other ascensions depicted in apocalyptic). John's Gospel gives an important role to anabaínein. As Jesus has come from heaven, and knows heavenly things, he will go back to heaven (6:62), or to the Father (20:17). Angels ascending and descending keep him in touch with the heavenly world (1:51; cf. Eph. 4:8ff.). In Rom. 10:6-7, which is based on Dt. 30:11ff., the point seems to be that we are not asked to do the impossible, to ascend to heaven or descend to the depths to bring Christ down or raise him up, because through the word of faith he is already present, having himself come down and risen up again. In Rev. 4:1 the command to come up through the open door and see the heavenly throne room denotes prophetic rapture. In Acts 10:4 the prayers of Cornelius have mounted up to God. The odd expression in Acts 7:23 ("it came into his heart") is modeled on the Hebrew (cf. Lk. 24:38: "Why do questionings rise in your hearts?").

katabaínō.

1. This is the spatial, geographical, and cultic opposite of anabaínō, used of leaving Jerusalem (also in the absolute), and of rain falling from heaven.

2. Religiously it often occurs with anabaínō (cf. Jn. 3:13; 6:33ff.). Jesus has come down to do his Father's will (Jn. 6:38). He is the bread from heaven (6:41-42). This bread comes down from heaven and gives life to the world (6:33). Every good gift comes down from God (Jms. 1:17). The Spirit comes down on Jesus at his baptism (Jn. 1:32). In baptism one goes down into the water (Acts 8:38). Descending angels keep Jesus in touch with heaven (Jn. 1:51). Christ descends to earth (not Hades), according to Eph. 4:9-10 (though katábasis is a term for descent to the underworld).

3. Eschatological events (cf. the parousia in 1 Th. 4:16 and the new Jerusalem in Rev. 3:12; 21:2, 10) start in heaven and come down.

4. Philosophically souls are said to come down into bodies, and Philo speaks of the Spirit and joy descending from heaven.

5. Commercially the term is used for a decline in the value of money.

metabaínō. The usual meaning is "to change place," but the term also denotes change of topic or state. It is mostly topographical in the NT but figurative in John, e.g., for the change from death to life in Jn. 5:24; 1 Jn. 3:14 (which takes place by acceptance of the divine word), or Jesus' transition to his preexistent glory with the Father in Jn. 13:1. [J. SCHNEIDER, I, 518-23]

Balaám [Balaam]

1. The OT shows Balaam as an instrument of blessing in Num. 22-24 and of seduction and consequent immorality and apostasy in Num. 31:16.

2. Later Judaism tended to interpret the first story in the light of the second, so that Balaam is presented as a wrongdoer (except in Josephus).

3. The NT accepts the Jewish assessment (2 Pet. 2:15; Jude 11; Rev. 2:14). Balaam is the model of the licentious Gnostics who lead the people into apostasy (Rev. 2:14), doing so for gain (Jude 11), and thereby showing his hostility to God. [K. G. KUHN, I, 524-25]

ballántion [purse]

Sometimes spelled balántion, this word means "pocket" or "purse," especially for money. It occurs six times in the LXX and is used in later Judaism for money bag. All four NT instances are in Luke (10:4; 12:33; 22:35-36). The point in 10:4 (cf. Mt. 10:9; Mk. 6:8) is that money is not to be taken for the journey, but while Matthew and Mark think of tying coins in the girdle, Luke has in mind a special purse. Hence renunciation of the security of settled life is demanded, as also in 12:33. The situation changes, however, with the death of Jesus (Lk. 22:35-36).

→ pḗra [K. H. RENGSTORF, I, 525-26]

bállō [to throw], ekbállō [to throw out], epibállō [to lay on] bállō. a. Transitive "to throw, propel," "cast oneself down"; b. "to lay down," "pour in,'" "lay up (in the heart)"; c. intransitive "to cast oneself on," "sink into (sleep)." We find the sense "to throw" in the NT in Mt. 4:18 etc.; "to cast off" fruit in Rev. 6:13. In connection with judgment we find "to cast" into the fire (Mt. 3:10) or hell (Mt. 5:29) and "to throw out" (Mt. 5:13). "To throw off," i.e., that which causes sin, is the sense in Mt. 18:9. In Mt. 8:6 we find the passive for "to lie" (the sick servant). Other NT senses are "to put in," as wine in wineskins (Mk. 2:22); the finger in the ears (Jn. 20:25); a thought in the heart (Jn. 13:2). There is an intransitive use in Acts 27:4.

ekbállō. a. "To throw out," "expel," "repel"; b. "to send forth," "lead forth," "leave aside." In the NT it is used especially for the expelling or repelling of demons (Mk. 1:34; 3:15, etc.). Judaism had a series of formulas to effect exorcisms, though a word of command might also be enough. Jesus simply uses the word (Mt. 8:16) and has full power over demons (Mk. 1:27; Lk. 11:20). This displays his sovereignty but is also a mark of the inauguration of the kingdom (Mt. 12:28) and accompanies his preaching as such. Jesus commissions his messengers to cast out demons too (Mt. 10:1, 8). He regards the charge that he expels demons by means of demons as a blasphemous misrepresentation (Mt. 12:24). If he himself casts out demons in God's name, they can also be cast out in his own name (Mk. 9:38).

The NT also uses ekbállein for expelling a wife (Gal. 4:30), plucking out the eye (Mk. 9:47), expulsion from the Jewish community (Jn. 9:34-44) and the church (by Diotrephes, 3 Jn. 10), the casting out of the name of believers (Lk. 6:22), and the unwillingness of Jesus to "cast out" any who come to him (Jn. 6:22). Other meanings are "to send out" in Mt. 9:38, "to let go" in Acts 16:37, "to lead out" in Mk. 1:12.

epibállō. a. Transitive "to throw over," "lay on"; b. "to cast oneself on," "dedicate oneself to," "break in," "follow," "belong to"; c. middle "earnestly to desire." The term occurs in the NT with the meanings "to lay upon" in 1 Cor. 7:35, "to seize" in Mk. 14:36 (cf. Jn. 7:30, 44: Jesus cannot be seized until his hour comes), "to put one's hand to work" in Lk. 9:62, "to put on" a patch in Mt. 9:16, "to throw oneself on" in Mk. 4:37, "to burst out" (crying) in Mk. 14:72, "to accrue to" in Lk. 15:12. [F. HAUCK, I, 526-29]

báptō [to dip] baptízō [to baptize], baptismós [baptizing], báptisma [baptism], baptistḗs [Baptist, Baptizer]

A. The Meaning of báptō and baptízō. báptō, "to dip in or under," "to dye," "to immerse," "to sink," "to drown," "to bathe," "wash." The NT uses báptō only in the literal sense, e.g., "to dip" (Lk. 16:24), "to dye" (Rev. 19:13), and baptízō only in a cultic sense, mostly "to baptize."

B. Religious Washings in Hellenism.

1. The General Facts. Sacral baths are found in the Eleusinian cults, in Egyptian religion, in Isis worship, and in the mysteries. Baptisms of blood are post-Christian.

2. baptízein in Sacral and Similar Contexts. This usage is rare; it may be found in some papyri, Plutarch, and the Hermetic writings, but not in any technical sense.

3. The Meaning of the Rites. One underlying theme is that of washing and cleansing. Various liquids, including water, may be used to wash away uncleanness before God. Water, however, gives life, and hence another theme is vivification by way of symbolic drowning, e.g., in the Nile; the drowning connects one who drowns with the god and thus confers divinity. Yet the idea of purification is predominant, though this is cultic, not moral, and thus comes under criticism, e.g., from Plato, Philo, and Josephus. It must be stressed, of course, that the term baptízein itself has no great cultic significance.

C. bapt(íz)ein in the OT and Judaism. In the LXX báptein (baptízein occurs only in 2 Kgs. 5:14) is used for "to dip" in Judg. 2:14; Josh. 3:15; Lev. 4:6; 11:32. Naaman's dipping in the Jordan in 2 Kgs. 5:14 possibly has some sacramental significance. Later, baptízein becomes a technical term for lustrations (cf. Jdt. 12:7). It then comes to be used for the washing of proselytes, though it is hard to say when this practice originated; it seems intrinsically unlikely that it would have started after Christian baptism. Like other lustrations it is a continuation of the OT rites of purification, which are cultic but not magical, having the legal goal of ritual purity. A proselyte is put in a new position and from this point must keep the law. There is no thought here of death and regeneration, and the Hebrew term (ṭbl) behind baptízein does not signify sinking, drowning, or perishing.

D. The Baptism of John. This baptism (Mk. 1:4ff.; Jn. 1:25ff.; Acts 1:5; 11:16, etc.) is a powerful messianic awakening from which Christianity springs. As presented in the Gospels it does not seem to be a child of Near Eastern syncretism. The nearest analogies are in Judaism, especially proselyte baptism. Like this, John's baptism makes great demands on the elect people. Unlike it, it has a more urgent ethical and eschatological thrust. John is preparing the people for God's imminent coming. His baptism is an initiatory rite for the gathering of the messianic community. He himself actively baptizes, so that the passive use of baptízein now becomes more common than the middle found elsewhere. Cleansing, connected with repentance, is the main point, with a suggestion of purification for the coming aeon. The contrast with the baptism of the Spirit and fire shows that there is at least some influence of the idea of life-giving inundation, but the eschatological dimension rules out individualistic death and regeneration.

E. Christian Baptism.

1. Jesus lets himself be baptized but does not himself baptize (cf. Jn. 3:22; Jn. 4:2). The sinlessness of Jesus does not exclude his baptism (Mt. 3:14-15) since his concept of messiahship includes identification with sinners (cf. Jn. 1:29). If Jesus does not personally baptize, he endorses John's baptism (Mk. 11:30) but with a focus on his own death as a "being baptized" (Mk. 10:38-39) (cf. the OT figure in Pss. 42:7; 69:1; Is. 43:2; Cant. 8:7).

2. Christian baptism is practiced from the very first (Acts 2:38ff.). This is not just because John's disciples come into the church. It plainly rests on a command of the risen Lord irrespective of critical objections to Mt. 28:18, 20.

3. Syntactically baptízein is linked with báptisma in Acts 19:4. The means is expressed by the dative (Mk. 1:8: water; Mk. 1:8: the Holy Spirit, or en, "in" (Mt. 3:11 etc.), and once eis (Mk. 1:9). The goal is normally expressed by eis, "unto" (i.e., "for") or "into," as in Mt. 3:11; Gal. 3:27, etc. "Into" Christ, or the triune name, is not mystical but has a more legal flavor (cf. the commercial use of "in the name" for "to the account" and the invocation and confession of Christ's name in baptism [Acts 22:16; cf. 19:3]).

4. The Saving Significance of Baptism into Christ. The goal of baptism is eternal life, but not primarily by way of vivification. In spite of 1 Pet. 3:20-21; Jn. 3:5-6; Tit. 3:5, the thought of the cleansing bath is more fundamental (1 Cor. 6:11; Eph. 5:26; Heb. 10:22). Biblical piety rules out magical evaluations of religious objects and actions. Hence baptism has no purely external efficacy and in itself is unimportant (1 Cor. 1:17; Heb. 9:9-10; 1 Pet. 3:21). As the action of God or Christ, it derives its force from God's reconciling work or Christ's atoning death (1 Cor. 6:11; Eph. 5:25-26; Tit. 3:4-5). It places us objectively in Christ and removes us from the sphere of death (Adam). Imputed righteousness impels us to ethical renewal, for forensic justification (in Paul) leads on to spiritual fellowship with Christ; only a distinction of thought, but no real leap or transition is demanded. Baptism is participation in Christ's death and resurrection which effects a transition to the new creation, though translation into the reality of the present aeon is still a task. Paul may well have taken over the current terminology of the mysteries here, but the content, i.e., the historical relationship, the eschatological new creation, and nonmystical justification, is different. With Christ's death, baptism has a once-for-all character. What we have is more a Christ metaphysics than a Christ mysticism, and if there are spiritual connections there is no magical transformation of human nature. 1 Cor. 10:1 ff. combats a materialistic (as distinct from an objective) view, and while 1 Cor. 15:29 seems to suggest a baptism for the dead, this is probably a tactical argument, or even an allusion to some non-Christian practice in the mysteries. The close connection with Christ's death and resurrection is mostly found in Paul, but the connection with the gift of the Spirit is common to Christian thinking. The Spirit may be given prior to baptism (Acts 10:44-45), but more often at or after baptism. The link with forgiveness and the ethical element remain, as in John's relating of baptism to regeneration (Jn. 3:5; cf. Tit. 3:5), since this still stresses faith and retains the connection with salvation history. Infant baptism, which cannot be supported from NT examples, makes sense within this objective interpretation but represents a departure from apostolic Christianity when linked with the later hyperphysical rather than eschatological-christological views.

F. Baptism as a Syncretistic Mystery. After NT days the eschatological context ceased to be a leaven and was treated as an appendage. In consequence baptism tended to become a syncretistic mystery with a primary stress on the matter (Ignatius, Barnabas, Tertullian), the rite (Didache, Hermas), the institutional ministry (Ignatius, Tertullian), the timing (either postponement or in earliest infancy), and the question of second repentance for serious postbaptismal sin.

baptismós, báptisma. "Immersion" or "baptism"; baptismós denotes only the act, báptisma (not found outside the NT) the institution. baptismoí in Mk. 7:4 are Levitical purifications and in Heb. 6:2 all kinds of lustrations. báptisma is the specific term for John's baptism (Mt. 3:7; Mk. 11:30; Lk. 7:29; Acts 1:22; 10:37), which is a baptism of repentance for the remission of sins (Mk. 1:4); it is also a term for Christian baptism, which is connected with Christ's death in Rom. 6:4 and with the atonement in 1 Pet. 3:21, and is a basis of unity in Eph. 4:5. Christ's death is itself his báptisma in Mk. 10:38-39; Lk. 12:50. As a special term, perhaps coined in the NT, báptisma shows us that Christian baptism is regarded as new and unique.

baptistḗs. The nickname for John in Mt. 3:1; Mk. 6:25; Lk. 7:20, etc., apparently coined for him, and thus showing that his appearing as the messianic precursor was unique, a baptizer being indispensable for a baptism to which the word gives its content. (Josephus uses the term for John; the mysteries speak of baptisms by gods and priests, but rabbinic disciples at proselyte baptisms are only witnesses.) [A. OEPKE, I, 529-46]

bárbaros [barbarous, barbarian]

A. The Greek Usage.

1. The basic meaning is "stammering," "stuttering."
2. This gives the sense "of a strange speech," i.e., other than Greek.
3. The next development is "of a strange race," i.e., non-Greek. Alexander's conquests, however, helped to remove the ethnic distinction with extensive Hellenization, and hence to give the term more of a cultural nuance.
4. We thus find a further sense "wild," "crude," "fierce," "uncivilized."
5. The term takes on a positive sense when used of some barbarians (rulers and philosophers) who are highly estimated (cf. the use in the Apologists).

B. bárbaros in the LXX, Jewish Hellenism, and the Rabbis. In the LXX bárbaros occurs only in Ps. 114:1 (sense 1.) and Ezek. 21:31 (sense 4.). Sense 4. is the most common one in the Apocrypha. Philo follows Greek usage, as does Josephus (who does not reckon the Jews as bárbaroi). As a loanword it is used by the rabbis for the Jews as other nations see them, for non-Jewish peoples, and for the uncultured.

C. bárbaros in the NT. The term occurs only four times. In 1 Cor. 14:11 Paul has it in sense 1. In Acts 28:2, 4 the reference is to non-Greeks speaking their own language (in Malta). In Rom. 1:14-15 Paul is describing the universality of his apostolic commitment (cf. 1:5); he is to preach to barbarians as well as Hellenes. He includes the Romans among the Hellenes but describes the whole non-Jewish world by the formula. In 1:16 we find the different division "Jews and Hellenes," so that we have finally a three-pronged grouping of Jews, Hellenes, and barbarians. There are hints of this in Col. 3:11 with its reference to Jews and Hellenes, or circumcision and uncircumcision from the biblical standpoint, and barbarians and Scythians. Paul, then, does not include Jews among the bárbaroi but by way of the gospel is leading all the groups into a new totality in Christ. [H. WINDISCH, I, 546-53]

báros [weight, burden], barýs [heavy, burdensome], baréō [to burden, weigh down]

báros. Originally "weight," then figuratively "suffering," "power."

A. In the Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. From physical weight the meaning is first extended to "tone" or "stress" in speech.
2. The next development is to "thrust," with a nuance of force or violence.
3. A rather different use is for "fullness," "plenitude," "maturity."
4. The next meaning is "oppressive suffering," e.g., illness, depression, and burdensome taxation.
5. Finally we have a common use for "weight" in the sense of "dignity or power," e.g., personal appearance or influence, the power of a state, or the power of arms.

B. The NT Usage.

1. Faith carries with it a changed attitude to affliction and power which is expressed in the changed use of báros. Christians are still under the burden of the world's suffering, as in Mt. 20:12; 2 Cor. 4:17; Rom. 8:18, but this is not to be compared with the weight of glory (Rom. 8:18). There is here no thought of merit as in Mandaean parallels. The new glory in affliction is solidly based on grace in Christ (2 Cor. 4:17), in contrast to the Hellenistic viewing of life as a misfortune or the mystical attempt to achieve ascetic or ecstatic liberation.

2. Suffering offers a chance to show love by bearing others' burdens (Gal. 6:2). If the primary reference in Galatians is to moral lapses, the implications are broader ("fulfilling the law of Christ"). As distinct from Stoic altruism, this bearing of burdens finds focus in the community.

3. A distinctive NT use is for the burden of the law from which Christians are freed (Acts 15:28; Rev. 2:24) as they accept the easy yoke of Christ (Mt. 11:29-30).

4. When báros denotes earthly influence or power in the NT, it is something to be opposed. This rather than "financial burden" is probably what Paul has in view in 1 Th. 2:6-7; he does not support his authority by external power or appearance.

barýs. This is parallel to báros, being used for "heavy," "deep (in tone)," then "forceful," then "mature," and finally "oppressive" and "significant." The sense "oppressive" is most important in the NT, especially in relation to the law. a. In Mt. 23:4 Jesus accuses the Pharisees of laying "heavy burdens" on the people. b. In 1 Jn. 5:3 we are told in contrast that Christ's commandments are not demanding or burdensome, not so much in the sense that they do not ask too much, but rather in the sense that in keeping them we can draw on Christ's perfect triumph. The sense of "significant" occurs in Mt. 23:23 with reference to the more important commands. "Violent" is the meaning in Acts 20:29.

baréō.

1. The meaning is purely physical in Mt. 26:43; Mk. 14:40. On the other hand, Lk. 21:34 refers to the pressure of desires and cares on the heart.

2. a. The figurative sense of “affliction” occurs in 2 Corinthians. In 2 Cor. 1:8 the troubles in Asia are unbearably severe, so that trust has to be placed in God (v. 9) who gives the necessary strength to endure. In 2 Cor. 5:4 suffering is shown to be under God an expression of our earthly existence as one of hope. Sighing at mortality is a symptom of life in the Spirit. It is unlikely that the sighing is at the prospect of being unclothed. The burden is that of death itself, and the Spirit is the only guarantee of perfection.

b. In spite of similarities with Wisdom, Philo, and Epictetus, which stress the cleavage between body and soul and the consequent burdening of the soul (to be rejected according to Epictetus), Paul accepts the full severity of the burden but in faith and hope focuses on the new life which is provisionally linked with the present mortal body.

3. In 1 Tim. 5:16 the reference is to financial burdens. [G. SCHRENK, I, 553-61]

básanos [torment], basanízō [to torment], basanismós [torment], basanístḗs [tormentor]

1. The básanos was originally used by inspectors of coins, then the word became a commercial term for checking calculations, later it was used figuratively for testing, and finally it came to signify putting to the test by torture.

2. The group is rare in the LXX, being used mainly a. for “testing afflictions” and b. for “judicial sufferings.” basanízein occasionally means “to test” but mostly “to torment.”

3. In the NT básanoi means “pains” in Mt. 4:24 and “torments” (of hell) in Lk. 16:23. basanízein means “to plague, torment” in Mt. 8:6 (the servant) and Mt. 8:29 (the demons). The boat is “battered” by the waves in Mt. 14:24. The reference in Rev. 12:2 is to “birth pangs.” Lot’s “torment” at the sight of wickedness is the point in 2 Pet. 2:8. basanismós occurs only in Revelation, and is actively the “torment” that comes on the race in 9:5 and passively the “suffering” of Babylon in 18:7ff. basanistḗs is used in Mt. 18:34, not for “tester,”‘ but for “tormentor.” [J. SCHNEIDER, I, 561-63]

basileús [king], basileía [kingdom], basílissa [queen], basileúō [to rule], symbasileúō [to rule with someone], basíleios [royal], basilikós [royal]

A. basileús in the Greek World. basileús denotes the lawful king (usually hereditary, later distinguished from the týrannos, “usurper”). The king’s power derives from Zeus and ideally he is inspired by the Muses. For Plato knowledge of the ideas is a royal art. Plato also depicts the benevolent ruler who knows only his own will as law. This ideal king fuses with the god-king of the Near East to produce the Hellenistic concept of divine kingship. [H. KLEINKNECHT, I, 564-65]

B. meleḵ and malḵûṯ in the OT.

1. The word meleḵ denotes first the king of Israel. Saul arose as a charismatic leader. David, his successor, first ruled over Judah, then the united kingdom. He established a dynasty under covenant with Yahweh (2 Sam. 7; 23:1ff.). The Davidic dynasty lasted some 400 years in Judah, but after the disruption only short-lived dynasties, designated by Yahweh, ruled in Israel. The monarchy was not basic in Israel’s religion but came into secondary relation with it and was thus subject to criticism by Yahwism. The stock titles and styles of address of Near Eastern courts were adopted in Israel but incorporated into Yahwistic ideas, as in the Royal Psalms (cf. 2; 20-21; 45; 72; 110; 132).

2. The word can also denote the Redeemer King. Court language forms a bridge to faith in the Messiah. Ideas associated with the king form the soil for messianic expectation. The person of David and the Davidic covenant (the promise of a house for David) are the starting point. Other motifs (e.g., from Gen. 49:8ff.) add their quota to produce the hope of a new aeon of righteousness and peace (Is. 9; 11; Mic.

5:1ff.; Jer. 23:5-6; Ezek. 17:22ff.; 34:23-24); this is projected on Cyrus in Is. 45:1ff. and Zerubbabel in Zech. 6:9ff. Notions of preexistence and paradisal fertility (which may have mythical roots) fill out the picture.

3. Another concept is that of Yahweh as king, which is more prominent than that of the messianic king and hard to relate to it. God as king extends protection and demands obedience (cf. Num. 33:21; Dt. 33:5; 1 Kgs. 22:19). His kingship is eternal (Ex. 15:18; 1 Sam. 12:12; Ps. 145:11ff.). Not being fully visible now, it has an eschatological dimension (Is. 24:23; Zeph. 3:15; Zech. 14:16-17). Yet it is a present kingship. This is perhaps expressed in the so-called Coronation Psalms (47; 93; 96; 99). Messianic beliefs see the coming messianic king as ruling in Yahweh's kingdom (see 1 Chr. 17:14; 28:5; 29:23; 2 Chr. 9:8). Before the exile Yahweh is mostly the king of Israel, bringing peace to his chosen people. Later he is called King of the World, enthroned in Jerusalem and magnified by all nations. But Yahweh can equally well be called Shepherd (Mic. 5:3) or Creator and Redeemer (Is. 43:14-15), so that his kingship has no very specific content.

4. The noun malḵûṯ is one of the few older Hebrew abstract terms and denotes "kingdom" or "kingship." It usually means a political kingdom (1 Sam. 20:31). David's kingdom, however, merges into that of Yahweh (1 Chr. 29:23; 2 Chr. 9:8). In apocalyptic, with its sharper distinction between the aeons, God's kingdom is then more precisely delineated as the final and eternal kingdom of the saints (Dan. 7:16ff.; more strongly nationalistic in later apocalyptic, Eth. En. 84:2; Ass. Mos. 10:1ff.). [G. von Rad, I, 565-71]

C. The Kingdom of Heaven in Rabbinic Literature.

1. This term, equivalent to "kingdom of God," owes its origin to the tendency of later Judaism to avoid direct statements about God or use of the divine name. Heaven here is not the territory ruled by God. The phrase simply denotes the fact that God is king, i.e., the divine kingship, just as "kingdom" in secular usage implies "rule" or "government" (though "kingdom of heaven" is not merely a religious application of this usage but is an abstract construction of "God is king").

2. The term is comparatively rare but occurs in two important expressions: "accepting the yoke of the kingdom," i.e., confessing by a free decision that the one God is king, and the "manifesting of the kingdom," which points to the future when the time for decision for or against the kingdom will be past.

3. Israel as a people plays little role here. The decision is individual, though rabbinic theology stresses also Israel's privileges, describes God as king of Israel, and finds Abraham the first to confess God as king. The two concepts of individuality and nationality both derive from the OT, and the rabbis see no need to harmonize them. In the case of the kingdom the main stress is individual.

4. The rabbinic kingdom of heaven tends to be more purely eschatological in contrast to the idea of a future messianic kingdom which is a hope for the end of the age. The messianic kingdom is the kingdom of the people of Israel as the goal of God's saving purpose; the kingdom of heaven is the true éschaton when God is all in all and the link with Israel is no longer of special significance. The two ideas exist together but are not inwardly related. [K. G. Kuhn, I, 571-74]

D. basileía (toú theoú) in Hellenlstic Judaism. Where there is a Hebrew original the LXX follows it closely. Elsewhere the kingdom is linked with wisdom (Wis. 10:10 etc.) or ethicized (4 Macc. 2:23). In Philo basileía means kingship or lordship, but basileía constitutes a chapter in his moral teaching (the true king is the wise person) and is not for him an eschatological entity. Josephus never speaks of God's kingdom, mentioning basileía in connection with God only in Antiquities 6.60. In general he prefers the hēgemṓn group to the basileús group, e.g., the hēgemonía of the Roman emperor.

E. The Word Group basileús in the NT.

basileús.

1. a. A first use in the NT is for earthly kings, in contrast or subordination to God, e.g., Pharaoh in Acts 7:10, 18; Heb. 11:23; Herod the Great in Mt. 2:1 etc.; Herod Antipas in Mt. 14:9; Herod Agrippa I in Acts 12:1; Herod Agrippa II in Acts 25:13; Aretas in 2 Cor. 11:32. All earthly rulers are kings (1 Tim. 2:2; 1 Pet. 2:13; Mt. 17:25; Acts 4:26; Rev. 1:5, etc.). Kings are not divine: God is king of the nations (Rev. 15:3) and the Messiah is King of kings (Rev. 19:16). Children of the kingdom are set above earthly kings, though they will be haled before them (Mt. 10:18). Kings wear soft clothing (Mt. 11:8) but do not know what the children of the kingdom do (Lk. 10:24). They make war, but must hear the gospel (Lk. 14:31; Acts 9:15). The kings of the east will cause havoc in the end-time but will then be destroyed (Rev. 16:12 etc.). The kings of the earth will bring their glory into the holy city (Rev. 21:24).

b. Abaddon, an intermediary being, is no more and no less than an earthly king (Rev. 9:11).

c. David and Melchizedek are kings by divine appointment, the former an ancestor (Mt. 1:6) and the latter a type of Christ (Heb. 7:1-2).

2. a. Christ is king in the NT. He is first "king of the Jews" (Mt. 3:2; Mk. 15:2, etc.), accused as such (Lk. 23:2-3), but also treated as a pretender (Jn. 19:12). The people want him as king in a political sense; hence he resists their pressure (Jn. 6:15). Yet in a true sense he is indeed the promised "king of Israel" (Mt. 27:42; Mk. 15:32). He enters Jerusalem as such (Zech. 9:9; Mt. 21:5), and as such will conduct the last judgment (Mt. 25:34). Outside the Gospels the NT seldom refers to Christ as king of the Jews or of Israel (though cf. Acts 17:7). John offers a christological definition of the kingdom in 18:37, and Revelation gives the royal title a cosmological dimension. 1 Tim. 6:16 gives Christ the same title as Revelation: "King of kings and Lord of lords." 1 Cor. 15:24 implies the kingship of Christ when it speaks of the subjection of all other rule, authority, and power until at last the kingdom is handed to the Father.

b. As noted, God the Father receives the kingdom in 1 Cor. 15:24. That God is king is plainly stated in 1 Tim. 1:17: "King of the ages." Matthew, too, describes God as "the great King" (5:35), and many of the parables, especially in Matthew, are parables of the kingdom in which God exercises various kingly functions (Mt. 14:9; 18:23; 22:2, 7, 11, 13).

c. In some readings of Rev. 1:6; 5:10 Christians are called basileís; they are certainly said to reign, or reign with Christ, in other passages.

basileía. This term refers to the being or nature or state of a king, i.e., his dignity, and secondarily the expression of this in the territory he governs. The sense of dignity is primary in the LXX, Philo, and the NT.

*1. The Earthly basileía.

a. Earthly kingdoms correspond to earthly kings. Sometimes the reference is plainly to kingly dignity, as in Lk. 19:12, 15; Rev. 17:12, sometimes to territory, as in Mt. 4:8; 12:25; 24:7; Mk. 6:23. Earthly basileíai are subject to God or even opposed to him (Rev. 11:15). The devil claims a kingdom by seducing the basileíai.

b. Hence a kingdom of the devil arises as either reign or realm (Mt. 12:26).

c. There is also a basileía of God's chosen people. David represents this (Mk. 11:10). This basileía rightly belongs to Israel (cf. Acts 1:6).

2. The basileía of Christ. Christ, too, has a kingdom. The angels will gather wrongdoers out of this (Mt. 13:41). Some will see the Son of Man come in his kingdom (Mt. 16:28). This kingdom will have no end (Lk. 1:33). The disciples will eat and drink in it (Lk. 22:30). The thief asks to be remembered when Jesus comes into it (Lk. 23:42). It is not of this world (Jn. 18:36). It is linked with Christ's appearing (2 Tim. 4:1), and we are to be saved for it (2 Tim. 4:16). Entrance into this eternal kingdom is given to Christians

(2 Pet. 1:11). Christ's basileía is also God's. Sinners have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God (Eph. 5:5). The kingdom of the world will become that of our Lord and his Christ (Rev. 11:15). Yet a distinction can also be made. God has handed the kingdom to Christ (Lk. 22:29). God has put us in the kingdom of his Son (Col. 1:13). Having received the kingdom from the Father, Christ will finally hand it back to him (1 Cor. 15:24).

3. The basileía of God.

a. In usage, we should note (1) the alternative "kingdom of heaven," found only in Matthew apart from the textually uncertain Jn. 3:5. Matthew also uses "kingdom of God," but the expressions seem to be interchangeable. The nuance "of heaven" suggests that the essential meaning is "reign" and that this kingship does not arise by human effort. "Kingdom of the Father" (Mt. 13:43; 26:29 [cf. 6:10]; 25:34; Lk. 12:32) has essentially the same meaning. basileía also occurs sometimes (2) in the absolute (Mt. 4:23; 9:35; 13:19; 24:14; Heb. 11:33; 12:28; Jms. 2:5; perhaps Acts 20:25), but in all these verses the reference is plainly to God's kingdom. Few attributes (apart from "of God" or "of heaven") are supplied (3) to identify or describe the kingdom. It is unshakable in Heb. 12:28; heavenly in 2 Tim. 4:18, and eternal in 2 Pet. 1:11. It belongs to the poor in spirit in Mt. 5:3 and the persecuted in Mt. 5:10. Many synonyms (4) help to bring out its richness. It is related to righteousness in Mt. 6:33, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit in Rom. 14:17, palingenesía in Mt. 19:28, tribulation and patient endurance in Rev. 1:9, power in Mk. 9:1; 1 Cor. 4:20, glory in 1 Th. 2:12; Mk. 10:37, promise in Jms. 2:5 (alternative reading), life in Mt. 18:9 (par. Mk. 9:47), and knowledge in Lk. 11:52 (par. Mt. 22:13). These synonyms all show the kingdom to be soteriological.

b. The kingdom is implied in the whole message of Christ and the apostles. The gospel is that of the kingdom (Mk. 1:14; cf. Mt. 4:23; Lk. 4:43; Acts 8:12). Words like kerýssein (Mt. 4:23), diamartýresthai (Acts 28:23), peíthein (Acts 19:8), laleín (Lk. 9:11), and légein (Acts 1:3) all refer to the kingdom. The mystery is that of the kingdom (Mt. 13:11), and so is the lógos (Mt. 13:19). The kingdom also brings with it healings (Lk. 9:2) and exorcisms (Mt. 12:28); the work of the kingdom accompanies its word.

c. The concept of the kingdom was already present when John and Jesus proclaimed it to be near. This concept may be found in the OT and apocalyptic, in the LXX, and in Philo and Josephus.

d. That the kingdom is primarily God's kingly rule emerges in the dominant statement that it is near, or comes, or will come (Mt. 3:2; Mk. 1:15; Lk. 10:9-10; 21:31; 17:20; Mt. 12:28; Lk. 11:20; 19:11; Mt. 6:10; 11:2). Negatively, the kingdom is different, miraculous, not a human product. We cannot arrogantly bring it in but have to wait for it patiently (1 Th. 5:8, 19) like those who sow seed (cf. Mk. 4:26ff.); cf. also the parables of the mustard seed (Mt. 13:31-32), the leaven (Mt. 13:33), and less obviously the wheat and tares (Mt. 13:24ff.), the treasure and pearl (Mt. 13:44-45), the dragnet (Mt. 13:47ff.), the wicked servant (Mt. 18:23ff.), the laborers (Mt. 20:1ff.), the marriage feast (Mt. 22:2ff.), and the virgins (Mt. 25:1ff.). Everywhere the kingdom is shown to be different as it is now overwhelmingly present in the signs given in the ministry of Jesus. In this regard the kingdom is the cosmic catastrophe of apocalyptic (Mk. 13; 14:25), though Jesus refuses to depict the last things, rejects as irrelevant the scorn of the Sadducees (Mk. 12:25-26), and will not give the signs that people ask for (Lk. 17:20-21: the kingdom does not come with signs to be observed but is "among" and "in the midst of" us). With the kingdom, Jesus does not promise political glory for Israel but salvation for the world. There is still some privilege for Israel (Mt. 19:28), but Jews have no particular claim (cf. Rom. 2). The kingdom is not achieved by individualistic ethical achievement but by membership in the community, which stands under the promise. On the other hand, access to the kingdom does not come along Greek lines with spiritual training, ecstasy, or asceticism. Anthropomorphic descriptions do less violence to God's supraterrestrial majesty than the presentation of the kingdom as human self-evolution. The negative point that the kingdom is totally distinct from the world is the most positive thing that can be said about it. The actualization of God's rule is future, but this future determines our present. Setting us before God and his rule, it calls for conversion. A response in faith puts us in touch with this kingdom which comes apart from us, and the gospel is thus glad tidings for us.

---

par. paragraph

e. Many terms describe our dealings with the kingdom. God gives it as a gift (Lk. 12:32). It is taken from some and given to others (Mt. 21:43). Christ gives Peter its keys (Mt. 16:19). He appoints it for us as the Father did for him (Lk. 22:29). God calls us to it (1 Th. 2:12), has set us in it (Col. 1:13), makes us worthy of it (2 Th. 1:5), saves us for it (2 Tim. 4:18), and has promised it (Jms. 2:5). He does not shut it like the Pharisees (Mt. 23:13). We for our part receive it like children (Mk. 10:15; cf. Heb. 12:28), inherit it (Mt. 25:34; cf. 1 Cor. 6:9-10; Gal. 5:21; Eph. 5:5; Jms. 2:5), see it (Mk. 9:1; Jn. 3:3), enter it (Mt. 5:20; 7:21, etc.), or go into it (Mt. 21:31). We are to be its children (Mt. 8:12). We may be "not far from it" (Mk. 12:34), or "trained for it" (Mt. 13:52). As we decide for God we are fit for it (Lk. 9:62). It demands effort; we are to be fellow workers for it (not of it! Col. 4:11), to fight for it (Heb. 11:33), to seek it earnestly (Mt. 6:33). It is destined for the poor (Mt. 5:3), the persecuted (Mt. 5:10), and children (Mt. 19:14). Hence God's invitation demands metánoia (conversion). Various parables bring out the sharpness of the decision (cf. Mt. 22:1ff.; 13:44ff.). We must cut out eye or hand (Mt. 5:29-30) or even make ourselves eunuchs (Mt. 19:12) for the kingdom's sake. The latter saying does not demand self-emasculation or even voluntary celibacy but is designed to illustrate the drastic nature of the decision that must be made. Many will be weeded out (Mt. 22:14). Temporary enthusiasm is not enough (Lk. 9:62). The cost must be counted (Lk. 14:28ff.). Hearing without doing will not suffice (Mt. 7:21, 24ff.). Supreme readiness for sacrifice is required (Mt. 10:37).

f. Jesus alone truly fulfils the demands of the kingdom. Hence the kingdom of God is especially linked to Christ. It is in Christ that the kingdom of David comes (Mt. 21:9 par. Mk. 11:10). "For the kingdom's sake" in Lk. 18:29 means "for my sake and the gospel's" in Mk. 10:29 and "for my name's sake" in Mt. 19:29. The kingdom of God in Mk. 9:1 is the same as the Son of Man and his kingdom in Mt. 16:28. For Jesus the invading kingdom of God has come in his person. This equation accounts for the once-for-allness of the mission of the Messiah. Origen's term autobasileía aptly sums up the equation, which also explains why the later NT does not refer so much to the kingdom, the phrase "the Lord Jesus Christ" being in itself an adequate substitute.

4. In view of the autobasileía the NT refers only once to believers as the kingdom (Rev. 1:6), and the implication here is plain that they are so only in a derivative sense, i.e., as linked to Christ.

basílissa. In Mt. 12:42; Lk. 11:31 we read of the "queen" of the south who will confront impenitent Jews because she came to hear Solomon's wisdom. Acts 8:27 speaks of the Ethiopian queen Candace. In Rev. 18:7 the harlot Babylon sits as a queen and is judged.

basileúō. This word, meaning "to be king," "to reign," is used of Jesus Christ in Lk. 1:33, of God in 1 Cor. 15:25, and of God and his Christ in Rev. 11:5. The called will reign with God (Rev. 5:10) or Christ (20:4, 6) to all eternity (22:5). This reigning with Christ stands behind Paul's ironical statement in 1 Cor. 4:8 (cf. v. 8b). We reign with Christ because we reign through him (Rom. 5:17). By his gift grace reigns (Rom. 5:21) when the usurpers sin and death are destroyed. References to human reigns occur in Mt. 2:22. 1 Tim. 6:15 (cf. Lk. 19:14,27).

symbasileúō. Christians reign with Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 4:8). This rule implies service, obedience, and patience (2 Tim. 2:12).

basíleios. This word, meaning "royal," occurs in Lk. 7:25 ("palaces"). The "royal priesthood" of 1 Pet. 2:9 (Ex. 19:6 LXX) may refer to its royal dignity, or its being the priesthood of God the King, or its being royal in the same way as royal service, but in any case it is royal, not by inherent quality, but by the calling of God, and by Christ through whom the call comes.

basilikós. This less common word, also meaning "royal," is fairly common in the NT. In Jms. 2:8 ("royal law") the reference is to law as it is given by the king, and thus having royal dignity, rather than to preeminent law. The probable sense in Jn. 4:46, 49 is "royal official."

F. basileía (toú theoú) in the Early Church. Quotations and original references show that the usage is much the same as in the NT. The kingdom is eternal. It is equated with Christ's promise. We receive it as a gift. We meet, see, and inherit it; we dwell and are glorified in it. It will finally come with Christ's return. In contrast to the NT, however, there is more stress on the need for the sacrament and good works. A degree of ascetic ethicizing may be noted. Sometimes, too, the kingdom is not clearly distinguished from the church. The Apologists make little original use of the concept since they lay more stress on the need for virtuous living with its claim to reward. Quotations, however, prevent the gospel from being transmuted into religious philosophy. In the Alexandrians belief in individual moral progress tends to replace the biblical idea of the kingdom (in spite of Origen's autobasileía), while Latin theology thinks increasingly in terms of the active realization of the kingdom on earth. [K. L. SCHMIDT, I, 574-93]

baskaínō [to bewitch]

From báskanos, baskaínō means "to hurt by words," then a. "to bewitch," b. "to revile," and c. "to envy." To a. is added the thought of harming by looks (the evil eye), though sometimes this might be unintentional. In the LXX the sense is "to be unfavorably disposed to." The only NT instance is in Gal. 3:1 ("to bewitch"). The use is figurative, but not without some realism insofar as the power of falsehood stands behind magic. In yielding to these "magicians" the Galatians have come under the power of untruth. [G. DELLING, I, 594-95]

bastázō [to bear]

Rare in the LXX, bastázō occurs 27 times in the NT for "to lift up" (Jn. 10:31), "to bear away" (Jn. 20:15), and "to pilfer" (Jn. 12:6). External carrying of the cross (Jn. 19:17) symbolizes discipleship (Lk. 14:27). Paul carries the marks in Gal. 6:17 (cf. Rev. 7:2; 9:14, etc.: bearing the seal or name of God, Christ, or antichrist). Carrying the name in Acts 9:15 denotes confession of Christ in missionary service; there is no idea of a burden. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 596]

battalogéō [to babble]

Used only in Mt. 6:7, battalogéō means "to babble" in the sense of trying to achieve success in prayer by heaping up repetitions. The etymology is much disputed; the word was perhaps formed in analogy to battarízō, "to stammer." [G. DELLING, I, 597]

bdelýssomai [to abhor], bdélygma [abomination], bdelyktós [abominable]

The basic stem means "to cause abhorrence" and the group is often used for an improper or shameless attitude. bdelýssomai in the middle passive with the accusative means "to abhor" or "to censure" and is common in the LXX; in the active it means "to make abhorrent" and in the perfect passive "to be abhorrent.” bdélygma denotes a subject of abhorrence and bdelyktós means abhorrent. The biblical point is that God finds some things abominable, e.g., idols (Ezek. 5:9, 11; 6:9) or wickedness (Prov. 8:7; 11:1, etc.). Even when an aesthetic nuance may be discerned, e.g., in respect of unclean animals or incest, what is abhorrent to God is basic. Israel is under obligation to separate herself from everything pagan in her life. In the NT Rom. 2:22 refers to paganism. Pagan abominations are obviously at issue in Rev. 17:4-5; 21:8, 27. The reference is more general in Tit. 1:16. Jesus sounds a strong prophetic note in Lk. 16:15: the holy God abhors what we esteem. The bdélygma of Mk. 13:14 is based on Dan. 12:1-2, which refers to the desecration of the temple. In view is the antichrist (cf. 2 Th. 2:3-4). [W. FOERSTER, I, 598-600]

bébaios [firm], bebaióō [to establish], bebaíōsis [confirmation]

A. bébaios etc. outside the NT. bébaios means “firm,” “steadfast,” “steady,” “reliable,” “certain.” bebaioún has the sense “to make firm,” “to confirm,” “to keep truth” (absolute), “to assure for oneself” (middle). In the LXX bébaios is rare. It does not occur with lógos (a common combination in secular speech), but cf. bebaioún in Ps. 119:28.

B. bébaios etc. in the NT.

a. The ordinary meaning occurs in Heb. 6:19; 2 Pet. 1:10 (making our present election sure); 2 Cor. 1:7 (unwavering hope); Rom. 4:16 (the sure and valid promise). The same applies to bebaioún in Col. 2:6-7 (established in faith); 1 Cor. 1:8 (sustained by Christ); Rom. 15:8 (the validation of the promises); 2 Pet. 1:19 (the prophetic word validated by its enactment); Heb. 2:2 (the angelic message shown to be valid by its efficacy).

b. The group then has the special nuance (taken from the commercial world) of what is legally guaranteed. We find this in Heb. 6:16 (confirmation by an oath); Phil. 1:7 (confirmation as valid witness); Heb. 2:2 (of legal force); Mk. 16:20 (the valid lógos takes effect in the signs); 1 Cor. 1:6 (the legal force of the witness is displayed in the charísmata); possibly 2 Cor. 1:21 (in connection with arrabōn, but in a more baptismal context). [H. SCHLIER, I, 600-603]

bébēlos [profane], bebēlóō [to desecrate]

bébēlos. This,means “accessible,” then “what may be said publicly,” then in the LXX “what may be used freely,” then “of a profane disposition” in Philo, also “ravished.” It occurs in the NT only four times in the Pastorals and once in Hebrews.

1. Gnostic myths and chatter (1 Tim. 4:7; 6:20; 2 Tim. 2:16) are “profane”; they claim to offer otherwise inaccessible truth but are in fact remote from God.

2. Certain persons (Heb. 12:16; 1 Tim. 1:9) are profane, i.e., far from God in their immorality and irreligion. As in Judaism, Esau typifies such people.

bebēlóō. “To desecrate,” used in the LXX of God (Ezek. 13:19), his name (Lev. 18:21), his day (Neh. 13:17-18), his land (Jer. 16:18), his covenant (Ps. 55:20), and the name of the priest (Lev. 21:9; used also here of a virgin). The only NT instances are in Mt. 12:5 for desecration of the sabbath and in Acts 24:6 for that of the temple, both involving the OT concept of holiness. [F. HAUCK, I, 604-05]

Beelzeboúl [Beelzebub (Beelzebul)]

Used by the Pharisees in Mk. 3:22; Mt. 12:27; Lk. 11:18, this is a name for the prince of demons (cf. Mt. 10:25). Jesus is accused of casting out demons in his name. In his reply Jesus substitutes the name

Satan, using Beelzeboúl only in Mt. 10:25. Beezeboúl and Beelzeboúb are alternative forms. The meaning is unimportant in the NT. The god of Ekron possibly underlies the term. There was no necessary equation with Satan (the accuser) in contemporary Judaism. [W. FOERSTER, I, 605-06]

→ daímōn

Belíar [Belial]

A name for the devil found only in 2 Cor. 6:15 (originally perhaps a god of the underworld; cf. 2 Sam. 22:5; Ps. 18:4). Why Paul should choose the term is uncertain; possibly, but not very probably, he has antichrist in view. [W. FOERSTER, I, 607]

→ diábolos

bélos [arrow]

"Pointed weapon," "javelin," "arrow," used also for lightning, rays of the sun, moon, or fire. Greek and Semitic gods are armed with both bows and arrows. In the OT the rainbow is God's bow (Gen. 9:13), lightning is his burning arrow (Ps. 7:13), and the arrows of the sun cause drought and sunstroke (Ps. 90). God shoots the wicked with his arrows (Lam. 3:12; Job 6:4). God's servant is an arrow in Is. 42:9, and Is. 59:17 speaks of ethical and spiritual armament. In the NT bélos occurs in Eph. 6:16. The righteous are armed as God's warriors (cf. Is. 59:17). They are attacked by the flaming darts of the evil one but they can parry this assault with the shield of faith, which gives union with God. [F. HAUCK, I, 608-09]

biázomai [to use force, suffer violence], biastḗs [violent man]

biázomai.

A. biázomai in Ordinary Greek. The reference of the term is always to "forced" as distinct from voluntary acts. The middle means "to compel," "overpower" (sometimes sexually), the passive "to be constrained." All kinds of compulsion may be at issue.

B. biázomai in the NT.

1. In Mt. 11:12 the word occurs in the context of sayings relating to John the Baptist: his position relative to Jesus' works (vv. 1-6); his character (vv. 7-8); his place in God's economy (vv. 9-15); his reception (vv. 16-19). Stress is put on his greatness as the forerunner (v. 10). But he does not belong to the age when the kingdom comes in full power (v. 11). It is in this regard that biázomai occurs. a. A first possibility is to take biázetai as an intransitive middle: "the rule of God breaks in with power" (cf. the mighty works of Jesus). But this does not go well with the second part of the verse (cf. biastaí), which seems to be interpreting the first half. b. To translate "the kingdom of heaven compels" (middle) is no more help in this regard. c. The passive raises other difficulties if taken in a good sense, i.e., that people are pressing into the kingdom, since Mt. 11:1-24 seems to suggest the very opposite (cf. also Mk. 10:17ff.; Mt. 5:3ff. on entry into the kingdom; the striving of Lk. 13:24 is hardly the same as the forcible seizure denoted by biázetai and biastaí:). d. Nor does the rendering "The kingdom is forcibly advanced by God" solve the problem of the second half. e. Another possibility is that the reference is to unprincipled enthusiasts trying to establish the kingdom on their own, but this seems to have no relevance to the general context. f. A final possibility is that Jesus is referring to contentious opponents who attack or hamper the kingdom and snatch it away from others (cf. 13:19). This has the merit of agreement with the fact that John himself is under constraint and that both he and Jesus have met with widespread opposition (cf. 11:2, 16ff., 20ff.).

---

vv. verses

2. The other instance of the term in Lk. 16:16 has as its context the righteousness of the Pharisees and the validity of the law. John is put in the age of law, while the present age is that of preaching the good news. The subject of biázetai here is not the kingdom, but "everyone." Of the various possibilities under 1., f. does not fit the context very well, b. is possible but artificial ("everyone is pressed in"), and a middle active offers the best sense ("everyone presses in"), agreeing with the missionary impulse in Luke and the impression of an ardent and jostling response to the new message. The point of agreement in Matthew and Luke is that with John the Baptist the old age ends and the new begins; Jesus inaugurates the kingdom.

3. Implicit in both uses of the term, then, is the fact that the divine rule, whether present or future, is already here in Jesus, so that all that precedes him is now transcended (cf. Paul's saying in Rom. 10:4; also John's in 1:17). In face of the kingdom, however, opposition intensifies; it has to meet acts of hostility and violence. Nevertheless, the true characteristic of the new age is that people are pressing into the kingdom as in the Lucan saying. If persecution arises, old barriers are also broken down. We thus have both negative and positive signs of the one reality of forceful and decisive change.

biastḗs. biastás occurs as an adjective for "strong" or "brave," and we also find words like biastéon, biazómenos, and bíaioi denoting violence, but biastḗs ("violent man,") seems to occur for the first time in Mt. 11:12, where it refers most naturally to those who violently assault the divine rule and snatch it away from others. [G. SCHRENK, I, 609-14]

bíblos [book], biblíon [book, scroll]

bíblos.

1. General Use. As a loanword from the Egyptian, this first denotes the papyrus. Then, as papyrus replaces wooden tablets for writing, it comes to mean the inscribed paper, the scroll, other writing materials, and finally the writing as book, letter, record, or statute. The form biblíon is more common in the LXX.

*2. bíbloi hieraí. "Sacred writings" can be used in general for hieratic books (cf. bíbloi in Acts 19:19), but in Philo and Josephus they come to denote especially and very frequently the books of Moses and the rest of the OT.

*3. bíblos can also be used for individual books of the canon. It can cover the whole law, as in Mk. 12:26. We also read of the book of Psalms in Acts 1:20, the book of the sayings of Isaiah in Lk. 3:4, and the book of the prophets in Acts 7:42.

*4. bíblos genéseōs. This phrase in Mt. 1:1 is based on Gen. 5:1; it relates only to the genealogy that follows, not to the whole infancy story.

biblíon.

1. General Use. This diminutive form first means the same as bíblos but then is more especially used for a scroll or writing, for nonbiblical writings, for libraries, archives, and chronicles, also for epistles and documents (cf. the bill of divorce in Mk. 10:4).

2. biblíon and biblía for the Canon. With reference to the OT, tó biblíon first denotes the law (Gal. 3:10; Heb. 9:19. On the basis of Josephus' use of biblía for the law or canon, 2 Tim. 4:13 might mean the OT scrolls. The use of tá biblía for the whole canon (for Christians including the NT) follows the same usage. biblíon for a single book occurs in Lk. 4:17 (a scroll, as we see from ptýxas in v. 20). In Jn. 20:30 the author calls his work a biblíon, but this is not in itself a formal claim to canonical authority.

3. The Apocalyptic Use and the Other NT Passages concerning the Book of Life. The word has a special sense in Revelation as a term for the divine secret and as a symbol of God's impregnable purpose. Five nuances may be discerned.

a. The unsealed biblíon (22:10) of the Revelation itself contains prophetic sayings and is to be sent to the churches (1:11). b. The biblíon with seven seals, which is again a scroll, relates to all the judicial acts that unfold from ch. 6 onward. It is the book of God's purposes of judgment, sealed at first (i.e., hidden from us), but coming into effect as the seals are opened by the only one who is worthy to open them. This is the crucified Lamb who is now enthroned as the Lion, so that the cross is shown to be the basis of divine rule. c. The biblarídion which the divine has to swallow (10:9-10) contains visions of the temple and the witnesses, i.e., of God's dealings with Israel in the end-time. d. The biblíon tḗs zōḗs in Rev. 13:8; 17:8; 20:12; 21:27, as well as the bíblos tḗs zōḗs in 3:5; 13:8; 20:15, is based on the OT truth that the righteous are written in God's book (cf. also Lk. 10:20; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23). The metaphor may be based on family lists, though the common idea of books of destiny may also have played a role (cf. Ps. 56:8). In the NT the idea expresses assurance of salvation (cf. 2 Tim. 2:19). The book is that of the crucified Lamb (Rev. 13:8). God's eternal purpose lies behind his reconciling work; hence the names are written from the foundation of the world. But there must be a human will to persevere if the names are not to be erased (3:5). Abomination and falsehood are to be shunned (21:27), worship of the beast refused (13:8), and obedience rendered. The books of judgment are the opposite of the book of life (20:12). e. These books of judgment-the phrase goes back to Dan 7:10 (cf. also Is. 65:6; Jer. 22:30; Mal. 3:16)-contain all works, both good and bad, but perdition awaits those who are not written in the book of life (20:15). [G. SCHRENK, I, 615-20]

bíos → zōḗ

blasphēméō [to blaspheme], blasphēmía [blasphemy], blásphēmos [blasphemous]

A. blasphēmía in Greek Literature. The word means a. "abusive speech," b. "personal mockery," c. "blasphemy."

B. blasphēmía in the LXX and Judaism. In the LXX blasphēmía has no fixed Hebrew original. It always has reference to God, e.g., disputing his power (2 Kgs. 19:4), desecrating his name (Is. 52:5), violating his glory (Ezek. 35:12), wicked speech (Is. 66:3), or human arrogance (Lev. 24:11). The religious sense is predominant in Philo. For the rabbis speaking impudently about the law, idolatry, and shaming God's name are blasphemy.

C. blasphēmía in the NT.

1. Blasphemy is violation of God's power and majesty. It may be directly against God (Rev. 13:6), his name (Rom. 2:24), the word (Tit. 2:5), Moses (Acts 6:11), or angelic beings (Jude 8-10; 2 Pet. 2:10-12). The concept is a Jewish one; hence Jesus seems to be blaspheming when he forgives sins (Mk. 2:7), or claims to be the Messiah (Mk. 14:64), thus making himself equal to God (Jn. 10:33ff.).

2. For Christians blasphemy includes doubting the claim of Jesus or deriding him (cf. Lk. 22:64-65; Mk. 15:29; Lk. 23:39). Persecuting Christians is also blasphemy (1 Tim. 1:13). The community has to suffer blasphemy (Rev. 2:9; 1 Cor. 4:13; 1 Pet. 4:4). Opposition to Paul's message is necessarily blasphemy (Acts 13:45) because it attacks its basic content.

3. Christians may give cause for blasphemy if they deny Christ, if the weak eat idol meats (1 Cor. 10:30), or if they do not love (Rom. 14:15-16). A bad action is blasphemy either because it resists God's will or brings Christianity into disrepute (1 Tim. 6:1; Jms. 2:7; Rom. 2:24; Tit. 2:5). Yet only blasphemy against the Holy Spirit cannot be forgiven, i.e., the willful and wicked rejection of God's saving power and grace (Mt. 12:32). For this the only remedy is to hand the blasphemer over to Satan (1 Tim. 1:20). The opposition of the beast (Rev. 13:1) and the harlot (17:3) in the last days is blasphemy. The lists of offenses in Mk. 7:22; Mt. 15:19; Eph. 4:31;, Col. 3:8; 1 Tim. 6:4; 2 Tim. 3:2 contain the blasphēm- group.

D. blasphēmía in the Early Church. The different NT nuances recur in the fathers. Tertullian takes a very serious view of blasphemy. In dogmatic debates opposing views are stigmatized as blasphemy. The exposition of Mt. 12:32 causes considerable difficulty. [H. W. BEYER, I, 621-25]

blépō* → *horáō

boáō [to cry, call]

"To cry," "to call" in such senses as a. "to exult," b. "to proclaim," c. "to call to or call out," d. "to raise an outcry," e. "to utter a cry" (demons in Acts 8:7).

boáō* as Crying in Need to God. The most significant theological use is for crying out in need, e.g., in the LXX the crying of the oppressed (Judg. 10:10), of innocent blood (Gen. 4:10), of workers (Dt. 24:15), of the field (Job 31:38). God will swiftly answer such cries (cf. Ex. 22:21ff.). The NT contains the same thought in Jms. 5 and Lk. 18: God will redress the wrongs of those who cry to him (cf. Lk. 18:8). On the cross, however, Jesus cries out from the lowest depths of need in dereliction (Mk. 15:34). Biblical crying finds its deepest expression in prayer for God himself, and this leads to a new relationship with God. Prayer is elemental crying. It does not ring out in the void. This mortal cry of the old being is also the first cry of the new being that comes to life with the death of God's Son (cf. 2 Cor. 13:4; Gal. 4:4ff.; Rom. 8:16, 26). [E. STAUFFER, I, 625-28]

boēthéō [to help], boēthós [helper], boḗtheia [help]

boēthéō. The basic meaning is "to run to help," then "to help." The word is often used of doctors. In the NT see Acts 21:28; Mk. 9:22; Acts 16:9; Rev. 12:16; of God, only 2 Cor. 6:2; for help in religious need, Mk. 9:24; Heb. 2:18.

boēthós. The only NT instance is Heb. 13:6 (quoting Ps. 118:6-7): God is the helper of the righteous.

boḗtheia. "Help," used in the NT only in Acts 27:17 (a nautical term) and Heb. 4:16 (God's help). The sparing use of the group in the NT differentiates it from rational piety with its common references to divine help. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 628-29]

boúlomai [to desire], boulḗ [counsel], boúlēma [purpose]

boúlomai

A. boúlomai outside the NT. In distinguishing boúlomai and (e)thélō, a. some find more rational as distinct from more impulsive desire, but b. others refer ethélō to resolution of spirit and boúlomai to inclination of soul. "To prefer," suggesting volition, seems to be the original sense, then "to wish," "to purpose," or, more weakly, "to think." In the LXX boúlomai is slightly more common than ethélō, with little difference of sense. It means variously "to will," "to resolve," "to desire," "to want," "to purpose," "to seek," even "to be inclined." Josephus has it for "to prefer" but mostly "to desire" or "to resolve." The idea of wishing or intending is to the fore in Philo, especially in connection with God's will or goal.

B. boúlomai in the NT. In the contest between boúlomai and ethélō, the latter has won out by NT days so that little of boúlomai remains. a. Mostly it simply means "to wish, desire, intend." b. Three times it is used of apostolic ordering. c. It can still denote the will of God, the Son, or the Spirit (seven times). Thus it expresses God's eternal purpose in Heb. 6:17, his will to save in 2 Pet. 3:9, his will to give new life in Jms. 1:18, his sovereign counsel in Lk. 22:42. Christ's own will (in execution of God's counsel) is the issue in Mt. 11:27 (Lk. 10:22). The Spirit controls the distribution of gifts, according to 1 Cor. 12:11.

boulḗ.

A. boulḗ outside the NT.

1. boulḗ means first the "process of deliberation" (Prov. 2:11; 8:12), "deliberation" itself (Dt. 32:28), or simply "thought" (Is. 55:7).

2. It then denotes the result: a. "resolve"; b. "intention," "purpose"; c. "plan" (Is. 8:10; 30:1; 44:6); d. "counsel" given to others (Gen. 49:6; 2 Sam. 15:31; 1 Kgs. 12:8; Ps. 1:1).

3. It can also mean the machinery of counsel and resolution: a. the process in general (1 Chr. 12:19); b. the "council" of a city; c. a resolution of state.

4. boulḗ may also be "divine counsel" (Job 38:2; Prov. 19:18; Is. 5:19; 14:26; 46:10; Jer. 29:21), or the counsel of wisdom (Prov. 1:25). In Hellenistic mysticism the divine boulḗ (or thélēma) is important as representing God's transcendence; it is linked with lógos as parent or creator of the cosmos, and is sometimes depicted as a goddess separate from God.

B. boulḗ in the NT. In 1 Cor. 4:5 the meaning hovers between the weaker "desires" and the stronger "purposes"; "intents" (inward intentions) seems to fit best.

Sense 3.a. is demanded in Acts 27:12, 42: consultation leading to a plan.

In the NT, however, the divine counsel is the main issue, especially in Luke's writings. David died by God's counsel in Acts 13:36. The Pharisees rejected God's counsel in opposing the Baptist (Lk. 7:30). Jesus was delivered up by God's definite plan (Acts 2:23). God's boulḗ is the content of the apostolic message (Acts 20:27). Eph. 1:1ff. climaxes in the statement that God does all things according to the counsel of his will, which overarches the choosing and destining of vv. 4-5, and sets in motion the whole grace present in Christ and granted to the church as the reality of salvation. boulḗ here strengthens thélēma; all God's economy is linked with it (cf. Acts 20:27). God's oath in Heb. 6:17 confirms the unbreakable and unchangeable nature of this counsel.

boúlēma.

1. This rare term denotes the will as "plan" or "purpose" or "intention," with such different nuances as "last will" in the papyri and "preference" in 4 Macc. 8:18.

2. "Purpose" rather than "resolve" seems to be at issue when the reference is to God's boúlēma (Josephus Antiquities 1.232; Philo On the Life of Moses 1.95).

3. The NT follows the common usage. In Acts 27:43 the captain frustrates the design of the soldiers. In 1 Pet. 4:3 Christians used to follow the direction of the Gentiles in ungodly living. In Rom. 9:19 no one can resist the purpose of God, which is described in v. 18 as his twofold will of mercy and severity. [G. SCHRENK, I, 629-37]

brabeúō [to rule], brabeíon [prize]

brabeúō. This term describes the work of an umpire at the games, then comes to mean "to order" or "control." Paul uses it of the peace which settles strife in the church and maintains its unity (cf. phrourḗsai in Phil. 4:7).

brabeíon. This means "prize" in a contest (also used figuratively). Paul has it in 1 Cor. 9:24ff. and Phil. 3:13-14 for the prize of eternal life that we can win only if we throw in all that we have, although only because God first calls us and sets the goal. On the basis of God's call we must break with all that is behind us (Phil. 3:7ff.) and bend all our efforts to attain the end (note the sevenfold "that" in 1 Cor. 9:19ff.), integrating our will into God's (1 Cor. 9:17). [E. STAUFFER, I, 637-39]

brachíōn [arm]

brachíōn occurs in the NT only for God's "arm" and in quotations from the LXX or similar expressions (Lk. 1:51; Jn. 12:38; Acts 13:17). In the OT God's arm signifies his power (Is. 62:8; 63:5), which may be exerted on behalf of the righteous (2 Chr. 6:32) but is seen especially in creation (Is. 51:9), the exodus (Dt. 4:34), the preservation of Israel (Dt. 33:27), and the bringing of eschatological salvation (Is. 40:10). In the NT this arm shows its power in the birth of the promised Messiah (Lk. 1:51) and the signs that are done by Jesus before the people (Jn. 12:37-38). → cheír [H. SCHLIER, I, 639-40]

brontḗ [thunder]

Translated "thunder," brontḗ is used for a powerful voice in Jn. 12:29; Rev. 6:1; 14:2; 19:6, and mentioned with other natural phenomena in Rev. 4:5; 8:5; 11:19,; 16:18. In the LXX it denotes God's terrifying revelation. The sons of Zebedee are called "sons of thunder" in Mk. 3:17, but there is debate as to the orthography of the Aramaic and its meaning. [W. FOERSTER, I, 640-41]

brýchō [to gnash], brygmós [gnashing]

brýchō. In the LXX this complex term comes to be used for "to gnash (with the teeth)," as in Lam. 2:16; Ps. 35:16 (in hatred). The only NT instance (Acts 7:54) is in line with LXX usage: Stephen's opponents ground their teeth in rage.

brygmós. This word, used for "chattering of the teeth," "groaning," and "gnashing,'' occurs in the phrase "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Mt. 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; Lk. 13:28). The reference is not to despairing rage, nor to a physical reaction, but to the remorse of those who are shut out of the kingdom even though called to it. This special use, which is almost peculiar to Matthew, derives its meaning from the context. [K. H. RENGSTORF, I, 641-42]

brṓma [food], brṓsis [eating]

l. "Food" in the Strict Sense. The crowds need food in Mt. 14:15; we are to share food in Lk. 3:11; distinctions of food are done away in Mk. 7:19. Food is not significant in the relation to God (1 Cor. 8; Rom. 14), though regard for the weak requires voluntary renunciation of some foods (1 Cor. 8:13; Rom. 14:15). Rules about food have lost their validity in the new covenant (Heb. 9:10). Foods cannot strengthen the heart (Heb. 13:9). All food is God's gift and is thus to be received with thanksgiving (contra false asceticism) (1 Tim. 4:3).

2. "Food" in the Figurative Sense.

a. The term denotes miraculous food from heaven in 1 Cor. 10:3 (cf. Ex. 16). b. It is used for spiritual food in 1 Cor. 3:2; milk is the first presentation of the gospel, solid food (Heb. 5:12ff) is the interpretation.

For Jesus, doing God's will is his inner nourishment (Jn. 4:34). Jesus also grants spiritual food to others as he fed the multitude (Jn. 6:27). This food nourishes to eternal life and is received by faith in him (6:35ff.), i.e., by the reception of Christ himself (6:51ff.). [J. BEHM, I, 642-45]

γ g

gála [milk]

1. In 1 Cor. 3:1-2 "milk" signifies the basic gospel. In Heb. 12ff. it is used similarly for the rudiments of Christian teaching (cf. 6:1-2). It is contrasted with the solid food suitable for mature believers.

2. In 1 Pet. 2:2 pure, spiritual milk will help newborn babes to grow up to salvation. The figure of speech may rest on a mythical, magical, or eschatological conception but more probably derives from LXX usage, for in the OT milk is a characteristic of the promised land (Ex. 3:8), is a general mark of blessing (Job 29:6), and has eschatological significance (Joel 3:18). Thus the use of the term in 1 Pet. 2:2 undoubtedly indicates the character of the gospel as mystery or sacrament, but the content of the gospel distinguishes it from the mysteries that used similar terminology. [H. SCHLIER, I, 645-47]

gaméō [to marry], gámos [marriage, wedding]

1. Marriage Customs in the NT. The LXX has gámos only in Gen. 29:22; Esth. 2:18; 9:22. Jewish marriages lasted several days and were celebrated far into the night (Lk. 12:36; 14:8; Jn. 2:1ff.).

2. The New Ideal of Early Christianity. Gen. 2:24, which speaks of the union of man and wife, forms the starting point. Continued here is the work of creation in Gen. 1:28. For Jesus marriage is the original form of human fellowship. It has its basis in creation, has a history which divides into three periods, and will end with this aeon. Full union is the original state (Mk. 10:6ff.). Sin causes the disruption which leads to the bill of divorce allowed by Moses. Jesus inaugurates a new period marked by a new law of divorce, a deepened ideal, and a fourfold reservation (Mk. 10:9-10). According to this realistic view, dissolution may take place, but not a new marriage, for replacement of one spouse by another is adultery and affects the original union. The cause of marital failure is hardness of heart; hence the need is for a new heart (5:27-28). Inward as well as outward union is demanded. Copulation without communion is fornication. Free love and double standards are both ruled out here, though the initiative of the husband in the conclusion and direction of a marriage is assumed in Lk. 17:27. The four reservations are as follows: (1) In some ages marrying and giving in marriage may be frivolous and irresponsible (Lk. 17:27); (2) marrying may sometimes hamper our readiness for God's call (Lk. 14:20); (3) some people have the gift of celibacy (Mt. 19:12); (4) there will be no more marrying in the new aeon (Mk. 12:25). Though Jesus himself does not marry, and marriage belongs to the passing aeon, Jesus does not warn against marriage or enjoin celibacy, but endorses the institution found in Gen. 2:24. Paul develops the same motifs. In 1 Cor. 6:16- 17 he shows how the union of Gen. 2:24 rules out fornication. In 1 Cor. 7 he quotes Jesus in rejection of remarriage after divorce (7:10-11). Once contracted, marriage must be fully carried out with only brief periods of withdrawal (7:3ff.). Paul, however, presses more strongly the fourfold reservation of Jesus. Marriage may hinder true dedication to God (7:5, 32ff.) and is not consonant with the hour (7:26, 28-29). If ascetic experimentation is not approved, and widows are free to remarry (7:39-40), he could wish that all had the gift of celibacy as he himself had for the sake of his unique commission (7:1-2, 7-8; cf. 1 Cor. 9:5, 12, 15ff.). Later, although the ideal is that widows should remain unmarried, young widows are exhorted to remarry rather than engage in questionable activities (1 Tim. 4:3; 5:5ff., 11, 14). Marriage is to be honored according to Heb. 13:4, and if celibacy is also extolled in the case of the 144,000 of Rev. 14:4, this is on account of their special calling. In general, building on the foundation laid by Jesus, the NT finds in agápē rather than érōs the force that creates and sustains marital fellowship. The ground and measure of human agápē lie in the love of God as this comes to expression in Christ's love for his community (Ephesians).

3. The Messianic Wedding and Christian Marriage. gámos acquires its deepest meaning when it is used for God's fellowship with us. Ancient religion often speaks about the intercourse of gods with humans or sacred marriages among the gods. Plato thinks that heavenly marriage, as an idea, gives form and meaning to earthly marriage. Israel, too, speaks about the marriage of God and his people, but only as a symbol of the covenant (Hos. 2:19; Is. 54:4ff.; Ezek. 16:7ff.). If Philo allegorizes the concept, the rabbis extol the Sinaitic covenant as God's marriage with Israel, and they look forward to the marriage feast when the covenant will be renewed in the days of the Messiah. Jesus takes up this idea of the messianic wedding in the parable of the virgins (Mt. 25: 10ff.) and also when he calls himself the Bridegroom (Mk. 2:19; Jn. 3:29). He himself is now the son for whom the king holds the great feast (Mt. 22:1-2), and the kingdom itself is compared to the feast to which those who are first invited refuse to come, leaving the door open for others (Mt. 22:3ff.). Who is the bride? The covenant people in OT thought, but in the parables the disciples seem to be guests. Yet soon the new covenant people is presented as the bride (cf. 1 Cor. 6: 14ff.; Rom. 7:4; 2 Cor. 11:2; Jn. 3:29). This idea is most vividly depicted in Revelation, where the bride waits with longing (22:17) and the day of consummation is at hand (19:7ff.) when the new Jerusalem will descend as a bride adorned for her husband (21:2). The teaching on marriage in Eph. 5:22ff. is based on the normative union of Christ and the church with overriding love on the one side and self-giving on the other in a relationship that resolves all tensions as the wife is entrusted to the husband and the husband takes responsibility for the wife in mutual service in Christ. In later developments NT teaching conflicts with Hellenistic motifs as Gnostics talk about heavenly syzygies, mystics dwell on the images of Canticles, ascetics despise the body, and ecstatics focus on spiritual union with the heavenly Bridegroom. [E. STAUFFER, I, 648-57]

→ nymphaíos

géenna [Gehenna]

1. géenna is the Greek form of the Hebrew name for the Wadi er-Rababi. This acquired a bad reputation because of the sacrifices offered to Moloch there (2 Kgs. 16:3). Judgment was pronounced on it (Jer. 7:32), and it thus came to be equated with the hell of the last judgment (Eth. En. 90:26). Later it was also used for the place where the wicked are punished in the intermediate state. The LXX, Philo, and Josephus do not have the term; Philo has tártaros instead.

2. The NT distinguishes between hádēs and géenna : a. the former is temporary, the latter definitive (cf. Mk. 9:43, 48); b. the former is for the soul alone, the latter for the reunited body and soul (Mk. 9:43ff.; Mt. 10:28). géenna is preexistent (Mt. 25:41). It is manifested as a fiery abyss (Mk. 9:43) after the general resurrection. Those who fall victim to divine judgment (Mt. 5:22; 23:33) will be destroyed there with eternal fire. The ungodly are sons of géenna (Mt. 23:15). They go to it with Satan and the demons (Mt. 25:41; cf. Rev. 19:20; 20:10-11). The threat of géenna in the NT is used to show the seriousness of sin and to awaken the conscience to fear of the divine anger (Mt. 10:28; 23:33). Even contemptuous words must be avoided (Mt. 5:22); no sacrifice is too costly in the war against sin (Mk. 9:43ff.). [J. JEREMIAS, I, 657-58]

→ aiṓnios, pýr

gélaō [to laugh], katageláō [to laugh at], gélōs [laughter]

1. The Word Group Applied to Men. The group is common for joyous or scornful laughter, or for its occasion. The note of scorn is stronger in the LXX (cf. Sarah in Gen. 18:12, the enemies in Lam. 1:7). The NT follows OT usage when the people in Jairus' house laugh at Jesus (Mt. 9:24), when a Woe in pronounced on those who laugh (Lk. 6:25) and they are equated with the wealthy who find satisfaction in this aeon, and when James (4:9) demands that laughter should give place to humility before God.

2. The Word Group Applied to the Deity. For the Greeks merry laughter characterizes the gods. In the OT, however, God laughs only because of his superiority over his opponents (Pss. 2:4; 37:13; 59:8; Prov. 1:26). Hence the point of laughter in Ps. 126:2 is really that of victory, although the LXX imports the sense of joy in God by translating the Hebrew as chará instead of gélōs. This may have a bearing on the eschatological laughter that is promised in Lk. 6:21, which was probably based on Ps. 126:2 unless Luke chose gelán with the Greek sense in mind ("joy)" and in order to keep the parallelism with 6:25. [K. H. RENGSTORF, I, 658-62]

geneá [descent], genealogía [genealogy], genealogéō [to trace one's descent], agenealógētos [without genealogy]

geneá. This means a. "birth," "descent," b. "progeny," c. "race," and d. "generation.'' In the NT it is common in the Synoptics, rare in Paul, and absent from John. It mostly means "generation" and is often qualified: "adulterous" (Mk. 8:38), "evil" (Mt. 12:45), "unbelieving and corrupt" (Mt. 17:17); the formula "this generation" is very common (Mk. 8:12 etc.). "Crooked generation" in Acts 2:40; Phil. 2:15 is based on Dt. 32:5 (cf. Mt. 17:17 and Dt. 32:20). The use of "generation" by Jesus expresses his comprehensive purpose: he aims at the whole people and is conscious of their solidarity in sin. geneá has the sense of "age" in Mt. 1:17; Acts 13:36; Eph. 3:5; Col. 1:26, and of "manner" in Lk. 16:8. In Acts 8:33 there is an allusion to Is. 53:8 in a literal rendering of the obscure original.

genealogía. "Genealogical tree." The only NT instances are in 1 Tim. 1:4 and Tit. 3:9. The meaning here is contested. The texts link the term with (Jewish) myths and therefore with Jewish Gnostics who claim to be teachers of the law (1 Tim. 1:7) but who do not truly keep the law (1:8), teaching human commandments instead (Tit. 1:14). The genealogies, then, are probably human ones taken from the OT and the reference in the phrase "myths and genealogies" is to the biblical history enriched by interpretations and additions.

genealogéō. This derives from genealógos, "one who draws up a genealogy." It occurs in the LXX only in 1 Chr. 5:1 and in the NT only in Heb. 7:6: Melchizedek does not "derive his descent" from the descendants of Levi.

agenealógētos. This occurs only in Heb. 7:3 where Melchizedek is said to be "without genealogy." Unlike the Aaronic priests, he was no traceable descent. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 662-65] gennáō [to bear, beget], génnēma [born], gennētos [begotten, born], artigénnētos [newborn], anagennáō [to be born again] gennáō.

A. "Begetting" as an Image of the Relationship of Master and Disciple. In the LXX and NT, as well as Greek in general, gennáō means "to beget" (father) or "to bear" (mother). Already in the OT teacher and disciple are depicted as father and son (2 Kgs. 2:12). The rabbis adopt this usage to express the supremacy of the teacher and the respect of the pupil, but with no thought of actual begetting (cf. Mt. 23:8ff.). Paul actually uses the term gennán for the relation in Gal. 4:19, but since he begets through the word (1 Cor. 4:15; cf. Philem. 10), he is obviously not thinking in mystical terms but simply expressing more forcefully the common rabbinic concept. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 665-66]

B. The Idea of New Birth by Conversion to the True Religion in Later Judaism. This idea is common in the rabbis. Bringing people to Judaism is like creating them, and proselytes are like newborn children. Winning converts fulfils the command to be fruitful and multiply. This is, of course, only a comparison. Proselytes come from mere existence to true life by conversion. They do so by coming into the holy people; the terms "new" and "holy" are parallel. Regeneration, then, has a forensic rather than a mystical character. Old relations are dissolved; a new relationship begins. Here is the context of Paul's statement in 2 Cor. 5:17. As there is a strong connection between rabbinic and NT holiness, so rabbinic ideas of new birth influence the gennēthḗnai of Christians (Gal. 4:19; 1 Cor. 4:15; Phlm. 10). If there is a difference, it is not because of intrusion from the mysteries but because Christ replaces the law, his perfect sanctification subsumes our imperfect strivings, and relation to him supersedes the more forensic element. Living by the gospel (1 Cor. 4:15) is a new being in grateful response to the divine action in Christ. [K. H. RENGSTORF, I, 666-68]

C. Generation by the Deity.

l. Generation from God in the OT and Judaism. God is rarely said to "beget" in the OT, but the instances are significant. He begets the king in Pss. 2; 110; wisdom in Prov. 8:25. Generation of the king is perhaps a stereotyped formula for institution as heir, though rabbinic exegesis sees in it either affection or new creation out of troubles. What Proverbs says of wisdom is transferred to the law in Sir. 24:6. Philo calls creation a begetting but he does not think of the righteous, or of Israel, as begotten by God.

2. Generation or Adoption in the Mysteries. Sexual images are important in the mysteries but adoption rather then generation applies to initiates (in spite of attempts to prove the contrary).

3. Ps. 2:7 in the NT. This verse is much used in the NT. Its "today" is referred to the resurrection of Jesus in Acts 13:33. On one reading of Lk. 3:22 it applies to his baptism. No point of time is given in Heb. 1:5; 5:5. The birth stories do not quote it (though cf. Lk. 1:35), but on the basis of the resurrection and impartation of the Spirit Jesus is for the church more than a superior human being. The new aeon comes with him. In him we see true generation from God. In faith in him believers are assured of the resurrection and have the pledge of the Spirit. Hence they also see themselves as born of God.

4. gennēthḗnai in John. John always gives the point of origin of gennēthḗnai God in 1 Jn. 2:29; Jn. 1:13, the Spirit in Jn. 3:5, water in Jn. 3:5, the flesh in Jn. 3:6, the will in Jn. 1:13. The seed of 1 Jn. 3:9 is the Spirit rather than the word. Birth from God or the Spirit is a reality but also a mystery. Statements about it are not based on experience but are made in faith and are true in virtue of the believer's fellowship with God (1 Jn. 1:3, 6ff.; 3:9). This birth results in doing righteousness (1 Jn. 2:29), in not sinning (3:7ff.), in love (4:7), in overcoming the world (5:4), in faith in Jesus as the Christ (5:1). Birth from above belongs first to Jesus himself (5:18) and then to believers who, as members of the new aeon, have a share in the Spirit and are thus united to Christ, passing from death to life (3:14; 5:24). This concept of divine gennán has little in common with what may be found in the mysteries; the view of piety is totally different.

génnēma. "What is born," "fruit," common in the LXX and Philo, but found in the NT only in the phrase "brood of vipers" in Mt. 3:7; 12:34; 23:33.

gennētós. Common in Philo, this occurs in the NT only in the phrase "those born of woman" (Mt. 11:11) to denote humans as distinct from God or angels.

artigénnētos (→ neóphytos). "Newborn," found in the NT only in 1 Pet. 2:2: "newborn babes," the reference being to the newly converted or possibly the newly baptized if the epistle, or 1:3-4:11, is a baptismal address.

anagennáō (→ palingenesía).

A. The Nonbiblical Usage. This term is usually connected with the mysteries, but attestation is rare and late. Philo does not use it, although he has anagénnēsis for Stoic rejuvenation, and Josephus uses the verb in a general sense.

B. anagennáō in 1 Peter. In 1 Peter regeneration is God's act (1:3). It is effected by Christ's resurrection (1:3) or the word (1:23). The result is a living hope (1:3). Regeneration is not a state or experience or power. Believers are posited on faith. They are given a nonmystical new beginning which sharpens the tension between present and future as they hope for an inheritance and live in fear of God (1:17). Regeneration is not cultically or sacramentally mediated; baptism is an act of faith in which one is cleansed by prayer for the good conscience received on the basis of Christ's resurrection. It is this resurrection that enables us to speak of regeneration, giving it an eschatological character as a matter of faith (2:6; 1:5; 5:9), hope (1:3; 3:15), and fear of God (1:17; 2:18; 3:2, 15). The background is Jewish, i.e., hope for a new life rather than inner experience. Yet after Christ's resurrection the new aeon has begun and regeneration is also a present reality, though grasped as yet only in faith. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 668-75]

geúomai [to taste, experience]

1. Strictly "to taste," "enjoy"; 2. figuratively "to come to feel," "to learn by experience" (both good things and bad). "To taste death" is a common Semitic expression; cf. also "to taste something of the world to come." In the NT we find 1. "to taste" in Mt. 27:34, "to enjoy" or "to eat" in Acts 10:10; 20:11. In Acts 23:14 the conspirators vow not to eat, while in Col. 2:21 Christians are to ignore taboos about food. The figurative use 2. occurs in 1 Pet. 2:3: we are to desire the word as those who have already tasted the goodness of Christ. Similar is Heb. 6:4-5, which refers to the tasting of the heavenly gift, the word of God, and the powers of the future aeon, by initial participation in the Spirit. "To taste death" occurs in Mk. 9:1; Jn. 8:52; Heb. 2:9; it expresses very vividly the harsh reality of dying. [J. BEHM, I, 675-77]

gḗ [earth], epígeios [earthly]

gḗ.

1. The Earth, Land, as a Dwelling Place of Man. a. "Land" (in the geographical sense), as in Mt. 9:26; Mk. 15:33; Acts 7:3, 4 (Palestine); named in Mt. 2:6: Judah; Acts 7:29: Midian; Acts 13:19: Canaan; Acts 7:36: Egypt etc.; b. the "land of promise" (Acts 7:3; Heb. 11:9, and in an eschatological sense Mt. 5:5); c. the "inhabited earth" (Rev. 3:10; 14:6; Acts 22:22); d. the earth as the theater of history: the past (Rev. 16:18); the work of Jesus (Mk. 2:10; Mt. 10:34; Jn. 17:4-this concept merges into that of the human world); eschatological history (Lk. 18:8; 21:23, and many passages in Revelation).

2. The Earth as Part of the World. The ancient phrase "heaven and earth" for the cosmos is common in the NT (cf. Mk. 13:31; Heb. 1:10-11; 2 Pet. 3:7, and for the new heaven and earth 2 Pet. 3:7; Rev. 21:1). Since "sea" is a third component, earth denotes dry land (cf. Acts 4:24; Heb. 11:29; Rev. 8:7ff.). In another triad earth comes between heaven and what is under the earth (Rev. 5:3). There is, however, no consistent cosmology, and cosmological ideas, even in Revelation, are wholly subordinate to theological. Interesting phrases are "from the ends of the earth" for "from abroad" in Mt. 12:42, "to the ends of the earth" for "everywhere" in Acts 1:8, "four corners of the earth" in Rev. 20:8, and "from the margin of earth to the margin of heaven" (i.e., one end of the world to the other) in Mk. 13:27. An echo of personification may be caught in Rev. 12:16.

3. The Earth in Its Relation to God. Created by God (Acts 4:24 etc.), the earth shares the world's relation to him as creation. It exists by his will, has a beginning and end, and is his possession (1 Cor. 10:26). God is its Lord (Mt. 11:25), as he is of heaven, although with differentiation, for if things may be valid in both earth and heaven (cf. Mt. 16:19; 18:18-19) and earthly things copy heavenly things (Heb. 8:5), the earth is the place of what is imperfect (Mk. 9:3) and transitory (Mt. 6:19), of sin (Mk. 2:10) and death (1 Cor. 15:47). Christ, then, is not of earth (Jn. 3:31; 1 Cor. 15:47). He comes down and is lifted up again (cf. Eph. 4:9). In contrast to redeemer myths, however, the NT has the incarnation in view and makes no final metaphysical distinction between heaven and earth, since both are God's. The real difference is that the earth is the theater of sin. The Son of Man comes to it to forgive sins (Mk. 2:10), and it is because of the fall that believers are "strangers and pilgrims on earth" (Heb. 11:13) and are "ransomed from the earth" (Rev. 14:3), being exhorted not to "set their mind on what is on the earth" but to mortify their "earthly members" (Col. 3:2, 5).

epígeios. a. "Existing on, belonging to, earth," b. "earthly" (in contrast to heavenly). In Phil. 2:10 the totality of being includes the heavenly, the earthly (not just human), and those under the earth. 2 Cor. 5 refers to the earthly body as distinct from the heavenly; cf. 1 Cor. 15:40ff., where perishable, inglorious, weak, and physical are parallels. Since the earth is the place of sin, "earthly" may have a subsidiary moral sense as in "earthly minded" (Phil. 3:19) and "earthly wisdom" (Jms. 3:15). In Jn. 3:12 the contrast is perhaps between earthly parables and direct instruction on heavenly things (cf. 16:25). [H. SASSE, I, 677-81]

gínomai [to be born], génesis [birth], génos [kind, family], génēma [fruit], apogínomai [to die], palingenesía [rebirth, renewal]

gínomai. This word has little theological interest in the NT apart from the distinction between gínesthai and eínai in Jn. 8:58. The common Synoptic expression (kaí) egéneto (as in Lk. 5:12, 17) seems to be consciously based on the style of the OT.

génesis.

1. "Birth," "genesis" (Mt. 1:18. Lk. 1:14), with such derived senses as a. "what has come into being" and b. "life" (cf. perhaps Jms. 1:23).

2. bíblos genéseos for Genealogy in Mt. 1:1. This phrase goes back to the OT (Gen. 2:4; 5:1, etc.). The use in the OT varies, and genealogies are named after ancestors, so that one cannot deduce from the OT whether the reference is only to vv. 2-17 or to the whole book. The heading is undoubtedly needed to introduce vv. 2-17 (cf. v. 2 and v. 17).

3. ho trochós tēs genéseōs as the Wheel of Life in Jms. 3:6. This phrase is a technical one in Orphic teaching (cf. also Philo), but there the idea is that of the recurrence of birth and death. The saying in James is closer to the popular idea of the inversion of things which can even be said to bring burning pain. Judaism also speaks about the world as a wheel, although this saying, which is probably the source of the statement in James, itself seems to have been taken from popular Greek sayings about the uncertainty of fortune. The Buddhist idea of the wheel of rotation, becoming and time, which is set on fire by self-consciousness, is too speculative to explain Jms. 3:6. The author is simply adapting a popular expression to a practical end.

génos.

1. "Posterity," "family," as in Acts 17:28 (all are related to God) and, individually, in Rev. 22:16 (descendant, not representative).

2. "People," e.g., the Jewish people in Gal. 1:14; Phil. 3:5, Christians in 1 Pet. 2:9 (quoting Is. 43:20).

3. "Kind," e.g., species of animals or plants, but also tongues (1 Cor. 12:10, 28).

génēma. "Product," "fruit (of the earth)," common in the LXX (to be distinguished from génnēma, from gennán, for the offspring of humans or animals). In the NT 2 Cor. 9:10 ("harvest of well-doing") follows Hos. 10:12, while Mk. 14:25 is parallel to the blessing of the paschal cup in contemporary Judaism.

apogínomai. This rare term occurs in the NT only in 1 Pet. 2:24, where the reference is to the goal of Christ's saving act, namely, that we might "die" to sin and live to righteousness. The death and resurrection of Christ are thus interpreted in terms of the Jewish concept of destruction and renewal. The goal is at issue rather than an inner or sacramental experience.

palingenesía.

A. The Usage outside the NT. Deriving from pálin and génesis, and thus meaning either a. "return to existence" or b. "renewal to higher existence," this word takes its distinctive impress from Stoicism with a cosmic and then an individual sense. It then spreads to educated circles with a more general reference, and occurs later in the mysteries, though not in Orphic or Pythagorean writings. Philo has it for restoration of life and the reconstitution of the world after the flood, and Josephus for the reestablishment of the people after the exile, but the only LXX instance is in Job 14:14. In Judaism existence in the new aeon is not just a repetition of this life but an existence in righteousness following the definitive crisis of the last judgment.

B. palingenesía in the NT.

1. In Mt. 19:28 the reference is to individual resurrection and cosmic renewal in the Jewish sense (cf. Lk. 22:30: the kingdom; Mk. 10:30: the age to come).

2. In Tit. 3:5 the term embraces both moral renewal and new life, but with a stress on the latter (cf. v. 7). The grace of God works here by instruction and personal fellowship, not by magical incantation; hence the origin of the use is to be found in the Jewish adaptation of Stoicism, not in the mysteries.[1] ginṓskō [to know, understand], gnṓsis [knowledge] epiginṓskō [to know, recognize], epígnōsis [knowledge, recognition], kataginṓskō [to condemn], akatágnōstos [not condemned], proginṓskō [to foreknow], prógnōsis [foreknowledge], syngnṓmē [forbearance], gnṓmē [intention, opinion], gnōrízō [to make known, to know], gnōstós [known] ginṓskō, gnṓsis, epiginṓskō, epígnōsis.

A. The Greek Usage. The ordinary use is for intelligent comprehension ("to perceive," "to understand," "to know"), at first with a stress on the act. As distinct from aisthánesthai, ginṓskō emphasizes understanding rather than sensory perception, and as distinct from dokeín it is a perception of things as they are, not an opinion about them. Related to epistḗmē, gnōsis needs an objective genitive and suggests the act of knowing rather than knowledge as such. This act embraces every organ and mode of knowledge, e.g., by seeing, hearing, investigation, or experience, and of people as well as things. Supremely, however, knowledge implies verification by the eye; hence the dominant concept is that of knowledge by objective observation. This is related to the Greek view of reality. Reality consist of forms and figures, or of the elements and principles that shape them. The truly real is timeless reality that is constant in every change. Those who see or know this possess and control it. Hence knowledge of what really is constitutes the supreme possibility in life. Those who know participate in the eternal. They are thus capable, as Plato thinks, of right political action, or may achieve the ideal, as Aristotle thinks, of disinterested scientific contemplation.

---

[1] Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (80). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

B. The Gnostic Usage. Hellenistic and Gnostic usage follows the classical development yet also draws on the belief of the mysteries that a secret knowledge may be mediated that leads to salvation. In this area gnṓsis a. means knowledge as such as well as the act, with a primary stress on knowledge of God. God is the self-evident object of gnṓsis and distinct from all becoming, so that he can be known only by turning away from the world, i.e., by a special kind of knowledge. This knowledge, then, is not b. an activity of the noús but a chárisma, i.e., illumination by ecstatic or mystical vision. This knowledge cannot be possessed, although knowledge achieved on the way to it may. In true Gnosticism, however, this preparatory knowledge is an esoteric knowledge acquired by initiatory training, so that the prerequisite is the hearing of faith rather than scientific inquiry. The knowledge that is thus imparted by sacred tradition guarantees the ascent of the soul after death. Its content embraces cosmology and anthropology but always with a view to the knowledge of the self that leads to salvation, i.e., of the self as a soul that comes from the world of light, is entangled in matter, and must return to its true home by turning aside from the physical world. Gnostic knowledge carries with it c. investiture with the divine nature. It is a divine power that drives out death, working almost like a magical fluid identical with light or life, and constituting a mysterious quality of the soul which is made secure by an ascetic mode of life.

C. The OT Usage.

1. The OT view of knowledge comes out most clearly in the use of yāḏaʿ (normally rendered ginṓskein or eidénai). Perception is an integral part of knowledge here too, i.e., coming to know in various ways. Implied are comprehension, ability, and a grasp of what needs to be done. Yet the Hebrew term is broader than the Greek word ginṓskein and embraces objects such as blows (1 Sam. 14:12), childlessness (Is. 47:8), and sickness (Is. 53:3) that sound odd in Greek. Sexual intercourse may also be denoted (Gen. 4:1 etc.), and while the element of information can be stressed (Ps. 94:11), more attention is paid to the knowing subject, hearing is more important than seeing, and events (as divine or human acts) constitute the reality of knowledge rather than the timeless principles behind things. God himself is not so much that which always is; he is the will that has a specific goal in either claiming, blessing, or judging. Knowledge of God, then, is acknowledgment of his grace, power, and demand, so that we have knowledge, not as mere information or mystical contemplation, but only in its exercise. A movement of will is involved which means that ignorance is guilty. Knowledge is acknowledgment of God's acts (Dt. 11:20), recognition that Yahweh is God (Dt. 4:39), and the honoring of his name and doing of his will (1 Sam. 2:12; Is. 1:3, etc.). Hence knowledge of God is much the same as fear of God (Hos. 4:6). Similarly "known" people are respected people (Dt. 1:13). In the case of God, to know, being an act of will, means to make an object of concern and thus carries the nuance "to elect" (Gen. 18:19; Ex. 33:12, etc.).

2. Among special LXX nuances, ginṓskein means to know sin in Leviticus, to know something by revelation in Is. 8:9, to know the power of God's wrath in Is. 26:11, and to know God by his self-revelation

---

i.e. id est, that is

OT Old Testament

in Ex. 29:42-43, while in the negative it denotes ignorance of God in Zech. 7:14 and his unknowability in Is. 40:13. When God is said to know us, the sense may be that of standing the test (Gen. 22:12), of election (Num. 16:5; Hos. 5:3), or of God's omniscience in love or mercy. The noun gnṓsis is rarer than the verb and often denotes a revealed knowledge whose author is the God of knowledge (1 Chr. 4:10), which is a possession of the righteous (Prov. 24:26), and which is taught by the sage or servant of the Lord (Is. 53:11). Sinners, apostates, and idolaters do not have this knowledge (cf. Prov. 13:19; 19:20, etc.). It may be insight into God's plan (Dan. 12:4), and while it surpasses human comprehension (Ps. 139:6), all creation proclaims it to believers (Ps. 19:2). (For details cf. TDNT, I, 698-701.)

D. The Jewish Usage.

1. The OT understanding continues in Judaism. For the rabbis knowledge is knowledge of the law, and while the term may denote a thinking, gifted, or learned person, the law and tradition are the basis and theme of instruction. Obedience is regulative in this regard, although liturgically God is still praised for the endowment of knowledge. Hellenistic Judaism finds in knowledge the recognition of God's acts and perception of his ways, but with a special stress now on the confession that there is only one God. In more Hellenic fashion the issue of the possibility of knowledge of God is raised in this field (cf. 2 Macc. 7:28).

2. Philo's use of the group is strongly Hellenistic. He can speak of knowledge of the one God, but this involves only knowledge of the existence or power of God; direct vision that is divinely given is needed to know God's nature. A similar blend of philosophical, Gnostic, and OT views occurs in Philo's thinking about self-knowledge.

E. The Early Christian Usage.

1. Popular Usage. In a general sense ginṓskein can have such varied meanings as "to detect" (Mk. 5:29), "to note" (Mk. 8:17), "to recognize" (Lk. 7:39), "to learn", (Mk. 5:43), and "to confirm" (Mk. 6:38), with the suggestion of awareness (Mt. 24:50), acquaintance (Mt. 25:24), or understanding (Lk. 18:34). The idea of mastery occurs in Mt. 18:3 and familiarity in Rom. 7:7. epiginṓskein is often used instead of ginṓskein with no distinction of sense (cf. Mk. 2:8 and 8:17; Mk. 5:30 and Lk. 8:46). Its general meaning is "to perceive" but it may also mean "to learn" (Lk. 7:37), "to understand" (2 Cor. 1:13-14), or "to know" (Acts 25:10). It should not be pressed too narrowly in the antithesis of 2 Cor. 6:9.

2. The OT and Jewish Usage and Its Influence. The OT view may be seen when a movement of will is required in the phrase: "Be told" (Mt. 24:43; Lk. 10:11; Eph. 5:5; cf. Jms. 1:3; 2 Tim. 3:1; 2 Pet. 1:20). It is clearer still when insight into God's will is at issue, so that knowledge is acknowledgment or obedient submission (cf. Rom. 3:17 [quoting Is. 59:8]; Heb. 3:10 [Ps. 95:10]; Lk. 19:42, 44; Rom. 10:19). Knowledge of God along these lines is the point in Rev. 2:23. Since, however, the Christian message goes out to pagans, knowledge may precede acknowledgment, though the two are linked (Rom. 1: 18ff.; cf. 1 Cor. 1:21; Gal. 4:8-9). This knowledge is not speculative (Rom. 11:34). It is a service of God (1 Th. 1:9). The theoretical element is included but is not decisive (1 Cor. 8:4ff.; Jn. 1:10); it becomes more prominent in the apostolic fathers (cf. 2 Clem. 3.1), though not to the exclusion of the practical side (1 Clem. 59.3; Did. 5.2). Another use along OT lines is for God's electing (2 Tim. 2:19). The noun denotes obedient acknowledgment of God's will in Rom. 2:20 (with a suggestion of monotheism). For a liturgical nuance cf. 2 Cor. 2:14; Lk. 1:77. God is the subject in Rom. 11:33; the reference is to his gracious will in the direction of history. The compound epígnōsis can take on almost a technical sense for conversion to Christianity, and

---

LXX Septuagint

cf. confer, compare

epiginōskein has the same nuance in 1 Tim. 2:4;, Tit. 1:1; 2 Tim. 2:25, though not in Rom. 1:28. Strict differentiation from gnṓsis, however, is hardly possible. In general, the Christian view of knowledge follows closely that of the OT. It involves obedient acknowledgment. It is not a fixed possession. It is a gift of grace that marks the Christian life (1 Cor. 1:5; 2 Cor. 8:7). Practical interests are always implied. Edification rather than learning is the main point (Rom. 15:14; 1 Cor. 14:6). Reflective inquiry must be grounded in love and lead to right action (Phil. 1:9-10; Phlm. 6; Col. 1:9-10; 1 Pet. 3:7). Yet theological knowledge on a biblical basis may also be at issue (Gal. 3:7; Jms. 2:20; cf. 1 Clem. 32.1; 40.1; Barn. 7.1; 14.7). Faith implies knowledge of the mysteries of the kingdom (Mt. 13:1). We know the significance of baptism according to Rom. 6:6. Faith should bring us knowledge of the mystery of Christ (Col. 2:2).

3. The Influence of Gnostic Usage.

a. Christianity developed its view of knowledge in conflict with both polytheism and pagan Gnosticism. It thus ran the risk of permeation by Gnostic ideas, as we see from Jude, 2 Peter, 1 John, Rev. 2:24, the Pastorals, Colossians, Ephesians, and even 1 and 2 Corinthians, where the desire for speculative wisdom, the grounding of authority in knowledge, the ascetic trends, and the denial of bodily resurrection suggest that the opponents of Paul were Gnostics. In answer Paul uses some of their own terms, e.g., gnṓsis in the absolute in 1 Cor. 8:1 etc. But while he grants that Christians have a special knowledge of the divine plan, he also states that it is knowledge of the plan of salvation and that it demands walking by the Spirit (1 Cor. 2:12; 3:1ff.). As 1 Cor. 8:1ff. shows, this knowledge is not theoretical. It must go hand in hand with a lovethat is not just a mystical relation to God but finds expression in love of others. It is also grounded in God's knowledge of us (cf. Gal. 4:9). Again, the knowledge of faith in 1 Cor. 13 may be a spiritual capacity (v. 8), but it is set under love and shown to be purely provisional in contrast to faith, hope, and love. Even when Paul uses epignṓsomai for a future relationship, he robs it of its Gnostic significance by qualifying it, as in 1 Cor. 8:3 or Gal. 4:9. Paul follows a similar course in 2 Corinthians by putting objective genitives with gnṓsis (cf. 2:14; 4:6; 10:5). In Phil. 3:8ff. he calls the knowledge of Christ a mark of the Christian, but this knowledge means renouncing confidence in the flesh (v. 4), involves confessing Christ as Lord (v. 8), and needs constant renewal (v. 12). It is not withdrawal from the world but a being found in Christ and an experience of the power of his resurrection (vv. 9-10).

b. ginṓskein plays a bigger role in John and 1 John. It denotes personal fellowship with God or Christ. The relation between Father and Son is a knowing, and so is that between Jesus and his disciples (Jn. 10:14-15, 27). Because the Father and the Son have life, to know them is to have eternal life (5:26; 17:3). Knowing God also means being determined by love (1 Jn. 4:7-8). Love governs the relation between both Father and Son (Jn. 3:35 etc.) and Jesus and his disciples (13:1 etc.). Thus knowledge is neither observation nor mystical vision; it comes to expression in acts. Observing the commandments is a criterion of knowledge (1 Jn. 2:3ff.). Also involved is an awareness of being loved as the basis of loving (cf. Jn. 15:9; 13:34). Thus ginṓskein means the recognition and reception of love, i.e., faith. It is not direct knowledge of God (Jn. 1:18) but knowledge through the revelation in Christ, so that all knowledge is tested by Christ's claim. Knowing Christ is more than having information about his life (6:42; 7:28). It is a knowledge of his unity with the Father (10:38), of his obedience and love as the one whom God has sent (14:31 etc.). This knowledge is imparted by the church's proclamation (1 Jn. 4:6). It is the church also that knows the

---

v. verse

vv. verses

Paraclete (14:17). Johannine ginṓskein thus corresponds to the OT view of knowledge but with four distinctive nuances: (1) ginṓskein can be combined with verbs of seeing (Jn. 14:7ff. etc.); (2) historical revelation involves the dogmatic knowledge expressed in "that" statements (10:38; 14:20, etc.); (3) obedience is a criterion of knowledge, not knowledge itself; and (4) pisteúein and ginṓskein are interrelated in such a way that the former is the first and indispensable step (cf. Jn. 5:24; 6:60ff.) and the latter the full and true relation (as of Father and Son), although ginṓskein is an element in pisteúein and can give it new power (16:30; 17:7-8).

c. In Mt. 11:27, which is unique in the Synoptists, the relation between Father and Son is described as in John and hence the view of knowledge is necessarily the same.

F. The Later Developments of the Usage. The Apologists follow popular usage, using the group for knowledge of God or Christ or the truth, for knowledge attained from Scripture, and for theological knowledge. The Alexandrians find in gnṓsis a higher stage of Christian achievement than that of pístis, although the latter is never without the former nor vice versa.

kataginṓskō, akatágnōstos. The verb means "to note," "to see something in someone," "to know to be guilty," "to judge," "to take a low view of."' It is rare in the LXX, where it means "to condemn" (Dt. 25:1) and "to scorn" (Prov. 28:11). Condemnatory self-knowledge is the point in 1 Jn. 3:20-21. "Detected" (or "condemned") is the meaning in Gal. 2:11. akatágnōstos means "one against whom no fault can be alleged or accusation sustained"; it occurs in the NT only in Tit. 2:8.

proginṓskō, prógnōsis. The verb means "to know in advance," and in the NT it refers to God's foreknowledge as election of his people (Rom. 8:29; 11:2) or of Christ (1 Pet. 1:20), or to the advance knowledge that believers have by prophecy (2 Pet. 3:17). Another possible meaning is "to know before the time of speaking," as in Acts 26:5. The noun is used by the LXX in Jdt. 9:6 for God's predeterminative foreknowledge and in Jdt. 11:19 for prophetic foreknowledge; Justin uses it similarly in Dialogue with Trypho 92.5; 39.2.

syngnṓmē. This word has such various senses as "agreement," "forbearance," and "pardon." In 1 Cor. 7:6 "forbearance" or "concession" is obviously meant. The context might support "opinion," but no instances of this exist.

gnṓmē. 1. A first meaning is "disposition," "will," "mind," as in 1 Cor. 1:10; Phil. 2:2; Rev. 17:13. 2. "Resolve," "decision" is a second meaning; this is perhaps the point in Rev. 17:17. 3. "Counsel," "opinion" is the meaning in 1 Cor. 7:25; 2 Cor. 8:10.

gnōrízō.

1. "To make known." As in the LXX the priest or prophet makes things known (cf. 1 Kgs. 6:2 etc.), or God makes known his power or will, or grants secret knowledge (Jer. 11:18), so in the NT the word can be used of God's disclosure of his power (Rom. 9:22-23) or secret counsel (Col. 1:27) and also of the declaration of his acts in preaching (Rom. 16:26; 2 Pet. 1:16). Jesus is the subject in Jn. 15:15; 17:26. Rather different is the making known of our requests to God in Phil. 4:6. For a purely secular use cf. Col. 4:7, 9.

2. "To perceive," "to know." This sense, common in the LXX, Philo, and Josephus, occurs in the NT only in Phil. 1:22, where Paul does not know (or cannot tell?) which to choose when faced by going to be with Christ or remaining in the flesh.

NT New Testament

gnōstós. This term means “knowable,” “known,” “made known” (e.g., Is. 19:21 LXX). The sense seems to be “recognizable” in Acts 4:16, and this is certainly the meaning in Rom. 1:19, though whether the genitive “of God” yields the sense “what may be known about God” or “God in his knowability” (cf. “his invisible nature” in v. 20) may be debated. [R. BULTMANN, I, 689-719]

glṓssa [tongue, language, speech], heteróglōssos [of a strange tongue] glṓssa.

A. The General Use of glṓssa.

1. The physical organ “tongue” is the first meaning.
2. We then have “speech,” or “manner of speech,” or “language.”
3. “An expression which is strange or obscure and needs explanation” is a third sense.

B. The Use of glṓssa in the NT.

1. “Tongue” occurs in the NT in Lk. 16:24; 1:64; Mk. 7:35. Sins of the tongue are given prominence in Jms. 3:1-12. A similar stress may be found in Job, Psalms, Jeremiah, and Sirach, where the bent is practical but the sins are ultimately against God. Figuratively, the tongue can also rejoice (Acts 2:26) and praise (Phil. 2:11). Tongues as of fire symbolize God’s descending power at Pentecost (Acts 2:3).

2. “Language” is the meaning in Acts 2:11; “language” is also used figuratively for “nation” in Rev. 5:9; 7:9; 10:11, etc.

3. Glossolalia.

a. Speaking in tongues (1 Cor. 12-14; cf. Mk. 16:17; Acts 2:4) is a gift (1 Cor. 14:2). This speaking is primarily to God (14:2, 28) in the form of prayer, praise, or thanksgiving (14:2, 14-17). Its benefit is for the individual rather than the community (14:4ff.). In it the noús is absorbed so that the words are obscure (14:2, 9, 11, 15-16). Since the sounds are not articulated, the impression of a foreign language is left (14:7-8, 10-11), and uncontrolled use might suggest that the community is composed of mad people (14:23, 27). Yet tongues are a sign of God’s power (14:22). To make them useful either the speaker or someone else must interpret (14:5, 13, 27-28; 12:10, 30). If parallels may be found in other religions, Paul discerns a difference in the religious content (1 Cor. 12:2-3). He can thus accept and even claim the charisma (1 Cor. 14:18, 39) but demands that it be subject to edification, order, limitation, and testing (1 Cor. 14:26ff.). Prophecy is superior to it, and above all the gifts is love (1 Cor. 13).

b. It should be noted that, while there are Hellenistic parallels for tongues, there is also an OT basis. Thus the seers of 1 Sam. 10:5ff. seem to be robbed of their individuality, and their fervor finds expression in broken cries and unintelligible speech (cf. 2 Kgs. 9:11). Drunkards mock Isaiah’s babbling speech (Is. 28:10-11). The later literatare, e.g., Eth. En. 71:11, gives similar examples of ecstatic speech (not necessarily speaking in tongues).

c. The event recorded in Acts 2 belongs to this context. Like the speaking in tongues depicted by Paul, it is a gift of the Spirit (v. 4) which causes astonishment (v. 7) and raises the charge of drunkenness (v. 13). But in this case the hearers detect their own languages (vv. 8, 11). Since they are all Jews (v. 9) and an impression of confused babbling is given, it is not wholly clear what this implies. Perhaps there is a reflection of the Jewish tradition that at Sinai the law was given to the nations in seventy languages. In any case, the orderly proclamation of Peter quickly follows (vv. 14ff.).

d. Why glṓssa came to be used for this phenomenon is debatable. Speaking (only) with the physical tongue is a most unlikely explanation in view of Paul’s génē glōssṓn in 1 Cor. 12:10 and the plural in 14:5. Nor is it likely that the phrase “tongues as of fire” of Acts 2:3 underlies the usage. The meaning

"unintelligible sound" might seem to fit the case, but Paul sharply criticizes this aspect and glōssa is for him more than an isolated oracle (1 Cor. 14:2, 9, 11, 26). It seems, then, that "language" is the basic meaning; here is a miraculous "language of the Spirit" such as is used by angels (1 Cor. 13:1) and which we, too, may use as we are seized by the Spirit and caught up to heaven (2 Cor. 12:2ff.; cf. 1 Cor. 14:2, 13ff. as well as the stress on the heavenly origin of the phenomenon in Acts 2:2ff.).

heteróglōssos. a. "Speaking another language," "of an alien tongue"; b. "speaking different languages." The only NT use is in 1 Cor. 14:21, where Paul applies Is. 28:11-12 (originally spoken of the Assyrians) in his teaching about the use of tongues in the community: As God will speak to Israel by the Assyrians, so he will give the sign of tongues to unbelievers. Paul offers us here an instructive example, paralleled in the rabbis, of his use of the OT. [J. BEHM, I, 719-27]

gnḗsios [genuine, legitimate]

Deriving from gnētós ("born"), not génos, this word means "true born" as distinct from adopted or illegitimate; figuratively it is used for "regular" or "genuine." In the NT, Phil. 4:3 has it for a "true" fellow worker and 1 Tim. 1:2 and Tit. 1:4 describe Timothy and Titus as "genuine" sons of Paul because of their faith. "Genuine" is also the sense in 2 Cor. 8:8 and Phil. 2:20. [F. BÜSCHEL, I, 727]

gongýzō [to grumble, murmur], diagongýzō [to murmur], gongysmōs [grumbling, complaining], gongystḗs [grumbler] gongýzō.

A. The Greek Usage.

1. The early instances yield the sense "to be dissatisfied," "to grumble because of disappointed hopes."

2. The idea is that a supposedly legitimate claim is not met. What is denoted is a strong personal attitude. The word is thus well adapted to describe Israe1's reactions in certain circumstances.

B. gongýzō among Greek Jews.

1. gongýzō occurs 15 times in the LXX and diagongýzō ten times. Behind the use stands the thought of grumbling based on guilty unbelief and disobedience.

2. The chief root translated by the gongýzō group is lûn, which means "to murmur" and which is used when the people, discontented after the deliverance from Egypt, murmurs against Moses (Ex. 15:24), Moses and Aaron (Ex. 16:2), and God (cf. Ex. 16:7-8). There are always some grounds for grumbling, e.g., lack of water or the apparent unattainability of the promised land. The fault is that the people is making grace into a claim and then complaining because justice is not done to the claim. God is thus robbed of his sovereignty, and the murmuring is rightly called a tempting (Ex. 17:2) or scorning (Num. 14:11) of God. The basic sense of gongýzō is thus maintained but a theological orientation is given.

3. While the term is often avoided, the rabbis, Philo, and Josephus agree with the LXX as to its connotation. a. The rabbis cannot avoid seeing the attitude of Israel as it is depicted in the law but in their exegesis try to soften it by selecting other terms, or to mitigate the guilt by calling it a murmuring before God rather than against him. b. Philo and Josephus not only avoid the word but in their apologetic efforts to present Israel as favorably as possible give a different twist to the actual events. Thus for Josephus the murmuring at Marah is a call for help (Antiquities 3.11) and in other instances the complaint is simply against Moses and not against God. Philo construes the murmuring of Num. 14:1ff. as cowardice and restricts it to a majority of the people rather than the totality (On the Life of Moses 1.233-34).

C. gongýzō in the NT.

1. In Mt. 20:11 the grumbling is simply the ordinary grumbling of workers over their pay. The grumbling of the religious leaders at Jesus' dealings with sinners in Lk. 5:30 is again normal dissatisfaction (cf. diagongýzō in Lk. 15:2; 19:7).

2. 1 Cor. 10:10 recalls the guilty murmuring of the people in the desert and transfers at least the possibility of similar murmuring to the church. Paul consistently carries through here the thought of the church as the covenant people and pinpoints the danger of substituting its own expectations for God's promises.

3. a. In Jn. 6:61 gongýzō is used for the scepticism of the disciples regarding the hard saying of Jesus about eating and drinking his flesh and blood to eternal life. At issue is the point that they are measuring Jesus by their own expectations and are disappointed. Since, however, Jesus is the Son of Man (v. 62), their criticism is also criticism of God. The situation is a decisive one, for if the murmuring does not yield to confession, the result is parting from Jesus (vv. 66ff.).

b. In Jn. 6:41, 43 the Jews, repeating their former history, reject Jesus because he does not measure up to their own ideas and desires. The people are in fact mostly Galileans but they represent Israel at a point of crisis similar to that in the desert, not accepting God as God but complaining because he is not the God of their own opinions and hopes. Perhaps because of the repetition of the wilderness situation the term "Jews" is chosen for those who either treat Jesus with scepticism or openly reject him.

c. Jn. 7:32 probably carries the same sense rather than the weaker one of mere discussion. The crowd is vacillating, and while the Pharisees are afraid that the decision might go against them, vacillation is still not acceptance and comes under the judgment of unbelief.

diagongýzō. In the NT this occurs only in Lk. 15:2; 19:7, where it denotes simple dissatisfaction.

gongysmós. The noun corresponds to the verb and has a similar history in secular writings, the LXX, and the rabbis. a. In the NT it occurs in Jn. 7:12 for the vacillation of the people (cf. gongýzō in 7:32). b. In Acts 6:1 and 1 Pet. 4:9 it has the ordinary sense of grumbling, i.e., that the claims of Hellenist widows are not met, or that hospitality imposes too burdensome demands. c. In Phil. 2:14 the apostle has general dissatisfaction in view but with a suggestion of the grumbling of desert Israel and a consequent summons to full committal in faith and obedience.

gongystḗs. This word, found only in the LXX and NT, is used by Jude 16 for the false teachers who are discontented with their lot and with God as they follow their own passions. [K. H. RENGSTORF, I, 728-37]

góēs [sorcerer]

a. In the strict sense góēs means "magician," especially one working with verbal formulas. The góēs is a lower practitioner than the mágos. b. The term then means "false magician." c. Finally it can denote any "charlatan" (cf. the figurative use in Philo for the confusion and delusion of idolatry or hypocritical and sensual conduct). The only NT instance is in 2 Tim. 3:13, where the sense is the figurative one for the person who entices others to impious action by pious words (cf. vv. 6-7). → mágos [G. DELLING, I, 737-38]

góny [knee], gonypetéō [to bow the knee]

A. Genuflection in the NT. Except in Heb. 12:12, góny is used in the NT only in connection with genuflection. We have tithénai tá gónata in Mk. 15:19; Lk. 22:41; Acts 7:60, etc., and kámptein tá gónata in Rom. 11:4; 14:11; Eph. 3:14; Phil. 2:10. Kneeling is linked to prayer in Lk. 22:41; Acts 7:60, etc., to requests to the Lord in Mt. 17:14, to a greeting in Mk. 10:17, to homage in Mt. 27:29, to idolatry in Rom. 11:4, and to acknowledgment of God in Rom. 14:10-11 and the Lord in Phil. 2:10. The gesture expresses supplication, abasement, worship, and subjection.

B. Genuflection outside the NT. The history of the term goes hand in hand with that of proskyneín, especially since there is not usually any distinction between genuflection and full prostration. We find genuflections of slaves before their masters and of devotees before the gods (although not in the official cult). In the LXX it is a sign of humility in prayer (e.g., 1 Chr. 29:20), or of acknowledgment and homage before God (e.g., Is. 45:23), the king (e.g., 1 Chr. 29:20), or the man of God (2 Kgs. 1:13). In prayer standing is more common (e.g., Gen. 18:22; 19:27; 1 Sam. 1:26). Among the rabbis different words are used for brief falling on the knees, falling on the face, and prostration with outstretched hands and feet. A distinction is also made between inclining, bowing, prostrating oneself, and kneeling. In the early church kneeling becomes customary for individual and public prayer. It expresses subjection, abasement, and petition. Standing, however, is enjoined on the Lord’s Day and between Easter and Pentecost. In synagogue worship some place is also found for genuflection and prostration. [H. SCHLIER, I, 738-40]

→ proskynéō

grammateús [scribe]

1. Scribes in the NT Period. Once in the NT (Acts 19:35) grammateús is used for a higher official in the city of Ephesus (the town clerk). This accords with the early use of the Hebrew word sôp̱ēr for royal secretary. But elsewhere in the NT the term denotes the rabbinic scholar or theologian, as the Hebrew does in Nehemiah, 1 Chronicles, and Sirach (although Philo and Josephus do not have grammateús in this sense and the rabbis distinguish between themselves and scholars of an earlier time). As we see from the NT, the rabbis are a closed order of qualified scholars who have received the spirit of Moses by succession (Mt. 23:2). They enjoy a high reputation (Mk. 12:38-39) as those who know the law and proclaim God’s will by their teaching, preaching, and judgments. As scholars they question Jesus on his message and breaking of tradition, and as members of the Sanhedrin they help to prosecute and condemn him.

2. The Judgment of Jesus on the Scribes. To understand this judgment, we must distinguish between the scribes and the Pharisees, who were not scholars. The accusations against the scribes are kept distinct in Luke (11:46-52; 20:46), and have particular reference to their learning and resultant social claims and privileges. In Mt. 5:21-48 the theologians are again singled out after a common attack in 5:20. The main charges are their lack of humility (Mt. 23:5ff.), unselfishness (Mk. 12:40a), and sincerity (Mk. 12:40b), and their failure to practice what they preach (Lk. 11:46). In doctrine their casuistry defeats God’s true will as it is contained in the law of love (cf. Mk. 7:9ff.). Jesus brings out the seriousness of God’s true will in the antitheses of Mt. 5:21ff.

3. Paul’s Judgment. Himself an ordained scribe, Paul finds in the scribes’ rejection of the cross a fulfilment of Is. 33:18 (cf. 1 Cor. 1:20).

4. The Christian Scribe. There is reference to a Christian grammateús in Mt. 13:52 (cf. 5:19; 16:19; 18:18; 23:8ff.). Matthew is an example of such a scribe at work, e.g., in his proofs from Scripture. [J. JEREMIAS, I, 740-42]

gráphō [to write], graphḗ [writing, Scripture] grámma [letter], engráphō [to record, write in], prográphō [to write beforehand, set forth publicly], hypogrammós [example] grápho.

A. The General Use of graphṓ.

1. The original sense seems to be "to carve," "to engrave" (cf. the carved figures of 1 Kgs. 6:28, the hewn-out chamber of Is. 22:16, and the engraving on stones in Dt. 27:3 in the LXX, and the engraving on wax in Lk. 1:63 and engraving on the ground in Jn. 8:6 in the NT).

2. A further meaning is "to draw," "to paint."

3. We then find the word more generally for "to write" (e.g., in Rom. 16:22; 2 Th. 3:17); this includes writing by dictation (cf. 1 Cor. 4:14; 14:37; Jn. 21:24 [?]), or earlier writing (1 Cor. 5:9; 7:1; 9:15).

4. Another sense is "to set down" or "draw up" (cf. Mk. 10:4; Lk. 16:6-7; Jn. 19:19, 21-22—the title on the cross). This leads to such senses as "to accuse," "to inventory," and "to characterize," not found in the NT.

5. Composition of a Writing or Inscription in a Scroll or Book. In the OT writing down is an important mark of revelation. God writes down in Ex. 24:12 etc., Moses in Ex. 24:4, Joshua in Josh. 24:26, Samuel in 1 Sam. 10:25. The king must have God's law written down (Dt. 27:18). The people must write it on the doorposts (Dt. 6:9). The NT endorses the significance of the writing of the OT (cf. Paul's use of egráphē in 1 Cor. 9:10; 10:11; Rom. 4:23; 15:4). Jesus himself did not write down revelation, nor cause others to write it (apart from Revelation). Yet writing serves the gospel (Lk. 1:3). It is undertaken with great responsibility (Gal. 1:20). Its goal in Jn. 20:30-31 is that people might believe. Writing is witness (Jn. 21:24). If not all that Jesus did can be written down, what is written is of supreme importance. The things written are gegramména—gegramménon being also the term used in John to introduce OT quotations. In Revelation the writing is by divine direction (1:11, 19). Those who keep what is written are blessed (1:3). The author is commanded to write to the churches (2:1ff.). A similar command occurs in 14:13; 19:9; 21:5, a prohibition in 10:4. There is also a scroll in heaven (5:1), names are written in the book of life, a new name is engraved on the stone (2:17), and the holy name is written on the foreheads of the victor (3:12) and the 144,000 (14:1). In such ways the divine revelation comes to expression in writing.

6. gráphein in Legislative Activity. Another meaning of gráphein is "to prescribe," "to decree," used also for God's decrees in the LXX and Philo. The NT refers to what Moses wrote in Mk. 10:5; 12:9; Rom. 10:5. (In Jn. 1:45; 5:46 not law but prophesying of the Messiah is the issue.) A Christian counterpart is 1 Jn. 2:7-8: "I am writing you no new commandment," and for legislation written on the heart cf. Rom. 2:15.

B. The Special Use of gégraptai and gegramménon. graptós is "what is fixed in writing" and tá gegramména is a stock expression for written laws. When used in the OT (cf. also gégraptai) this term denotes the absolute validity of what is written, both legally and religiously. Behind it stands the binding authority of Yahweh as King and Lawgiver. This is first true of the law and then by extension of the prophets and the writings.

1. The Specific Use of gégraptai.

a. The simple use as in Mt. 4:4ff.; Lk. 4:8 corresponds to 2 Esdr. 5:7 and to parallel phrases in Philo, Josephus, and the rabbis.

b. The confirmatory kathṓs gégraptai (Mk. 1:2; Acts 7:42; ten times in Romans and four in 1 Corinthians) is based on 2 Chr. 23:18 etc. and rabbinic parallels.

c. For hóti gégraptai in Gal. 3:13 there are parallels in the papyri.

d. hós gégraptai in Mk. 7:6; Lk. 3:4; Acts 13:33 is also based on the LXX and finds parallels in the papyri.

e. katháper gégraptai in Rom. 3:4; 9:13, etc. is paralleled in the papyri.

f. hoútos gégraptai in Mt. 2:5 finds rabbinic parallels.

g. gégraptai hóti in Mt. 4:6; Mk. 11:17 is also found in Philo.

h. gégraptai gár in Mt. 4:10; Acts 1:20; Rom. 12:19; 14:11; 1 Cor. 1:19; Gal. 3:10 finds parallels in Philo and the rabbis.

i. perí hoú gégraptai in Mt. 11:10; Mk. 14:21; Mt. 26:24 has rabbinic parallels.

2. The Specific Use of gegramménon. There are classical instances of tá gegramména for "written laws," and the term is often used in the LXX for the OT itself, as also in Josephus. The NT has it for Scripture mostly in Luke and John (only twice in Paul). Luke stresses that Christ fulfils all Scripture (Lk. 18:31; 21:22; 24:44; Acts 13:29; 24:14). John has the term in Jn. 6:45; 10:34; 15:25 (éstin gegramménon); 6:31; 12:14 (with preceding kathṓs); and 2:17 (with preceding hóti). Paul has it only in 1 Cor. 15:54 and 2 Cor. 4:13. Sometimes a reference is made to Jesus by means of a dative or epí (cf. Lk. 18:31; Jn. 12:16; Mk. 9:12-13). At issue is what is written concerning Jesus.

graphḗ.

A. graphḗ in Secular Greek.

1. The first meaning is "writing," "written characters," or, more broadly, the "art of writing."
2. A second sense is "copy," "drawing," "picture," "art."
3. We then find "written statement," such as a. "letter," b. "piece of writing," c. "record" or "document" (e.g., genealogy or contract), d. "list," e. "decree," f. "accusation."
4. A further meaning is "published work" in the literary sense.
5. Then we have "written law," "statute," sometimes in the LXX with the suggestion of "holy scripture" (1 Chr. 15:15; 2 Chr. 30:5).

B. graphḗ as Holy Scripture.

1. graphaí for the (Holy) Scriptures, or the Collection of Individual Books. The rabbis and Philo speak of the Holy Scriptures, but not the OT itself. The NT seldom refers to Scripture as holy. Paul has graphaís hagíais (not hieraís) in Rom. 1:2. He also calls the law hágios in Rom. 7:12. Only 2 Tim. 3:15 has hierós in relation to graphaí. The plural for the OT as a whole is common in Philo and the rabbis. The NT follows this usage (cf. Mt. 26:54). In Mt. 21:42; 22:29 the reference might be to individual passages, but normally the whole collection is in view (cf. Jn. 5:39; Acts 17:2, 11;, 18:24, 28; Rom. 15:4; 16:26; 1 Cor. 15:3-4).

2. graphē for Individual Passages of Scripture. hḗ graphḗ in the Synoptics, Acts, and John can denote an individual statement, as in Mk. 12:10; Acts 1:16; 8:32, 35, and often perhaps when a quotation follows, as in Jn. 7:38; 13:18; 19:24. In Paul all Scripture is at issue in Gal. 3:8, 22, but in Gal. 4:30; Rom. 4:3; 9:17; 10:11 individual texts are in view, and perhaps also in 11:2, though Paul himself may not have made any clear-cut distinction. Jms. 2:23 obviously has a single passage in view, as does Jms. 2:8.

3. graphē for a Single Book. There are no NT instances except perhaps 2 Tim. 3:16, though contemporary parallels suggest that this means "every passage."

4. graphē Emphasizing the Unity of Scripture: the Totality of OT Scripture. The use of the singular for all Scripture does not occur in Philo or Josephus and is perhaps based on rabbinic use. Paul has it in the personification in Gal. 3:8 (where the obvious point is that God himself speaks through Scripture), John in 2:22; 10:35; 17:12; 20:9, and Peter in 1 Pet. 2:6; 2 Pet. 1:20. The early church embraced this usage and included the NT canon as well.

C. The Question of Scripture.

1. The Judaistic View of Scripture. According to this view Scripture is sacred, authoritative, and normative. It is God's dictate given by the Spirit. This applied first to the law, then to the prophets and writings. The authors spoke or wrote by a direct inspiration which in Alexandria was construed along the lines of Greek ecstaticism. The concern of rabbinic exegesis was to rediscover and establish the tradition of Scripture by minute examination; it had a tendency to become legal, syllogistic, and scholastic. Alexandrian exegesis took a freer view but surrendered the more easily to Hellenistic allegorizing.

2. The Early Christian Canon. Establishment of the canon accompanied the attempt to consolidate an authoritative tradition. The NT sheds light on this with the reference to Chronicles in Mt. 23:34, the mention of the threefold division in Lk. 24:44, the quotations of Jesus from the prophets, Psalms, and Deuteronomy, the quotations of Paul (older versions of the LXX) from Isaiah, the Psalms, and the law (especially Genesis and Deuteronomy), and the paucity of apocryphal quotations (Jude 14ff. and possibly Lk. 11:49; Jn. 7:38; 1 Cor. 2:9; 9:10; Eph. 5:14; Jms. 4:5). 2 Pet. 3:16 calls Paul's epistles graphaí.

3. The Belief of the Early Church regarding Scripture.

a. Inspiration. The early church follows Judaism in searching Scripture to find eternal life (Jn. 5:39). While accepting the Judaic view of inspiration and to some degree the same line of exegesis, it does not attach the same importance to tradition. It modifies OT authority by giving the Lord's sayings equal authority (cf. "I say unto you" in the Sermon on the Mount and 1 Cor. 7:10; 9:14; 11:23). The graphaí express God's will, and the authors speak by the Spirit (e.g., David in Mt. 22:43 etc.; the prophets in Acts 18:25; 1 Pet. 1:11; 2 Pet. 1:21; cf. also Heb. 3:7; 9:8; 10:15). 2 Tim. 3:16 formulates inspiration more expressly, but the same conviction underlies Eph. 6:12, as do all the statements that God (Mk. 12:26; Mt. 15:4; 19:5) or the Lord (Mt. 1:22; 2:15; 1 Cor. 14:21; 2 Cor. 6:17) speaks in Scripture. The role of the Spirit, who will bring to mind what Jesus said (Jn. 14:26), presupposes that the words are spirit and life (Jn. 6:63). If there is here more regard for the human authors (cf. Mt. 2:5, 17, 23; 3:3; 4:14, etc.), it is still assumed that God is the true author and this explains why Paul handles the text quite freely (though not capriciously as Josephus does). Paul can also allegorize in rabbinic fashion (cf. Gal. 4:24ff.), but the literal text has far greater importance for him than for Philo, and allegorizing is not his chief mode of exposition. Other rabbinic features in Paul are his combining of quotations from the three groups and his use of catenae.

b. The Thought of Fulfilment as the Heart of the Early Christian Understanding. All the NT books are convinced that OT Scripture is fulfilled in and by Christ. The Gospels find messianic prophecy in the OT (cf. Mk. 14:49; Mt. 26:54; Lk. 4:21; Jn. 17:12, 19:24, 28, 36; also Acts 1:16). The risen Christ himself shows how his work fulfils and confirms the great message of Scripture (Lk. 24:27, 32, 45). Paul follows this up in Acts 17:2; 28:23, and cf. Apollos in Acts 18:28. It applies not merely to specific predictions but to the OT as a whole, which is thus adopted as Christian Scripture (Rom. 15:4), so that all its teachings may be applied in different ways (cf. Rom. 4:23; 1 Cor. 10:11; 1 Cor. 9:10). John, too, refers all Scripture to Christ (5:39, 47); Abraham may be called his prophet (8:56) and Moses may be said to write about him (5:46-47). Not only his cross and resurrection are prefigured (19:37; 20:9) but also his sabbath freedom (7:22) and his sonship (10:34ff.). Hebrews works out the same thought typologically by showing how Christ both fulfils and transcends the work of Moses and Aaron and the function of the OT cultus, and also by claiming the great heroes of OT faith as Christian witnesses. Revelation takes its symbolism from the OT, so that here, too, the event of Christ sheds a new light on Scripture. In sum, the NT no longer has Scripture without Christ. The fact of Christ is regulative for its use of Scripture. In keeping with this is the truth that while we are to believe Scripture or the prophets (Jn. 2:22; Acts 26:27), we do not believe in Scripture.

c. The Twofold Attitude to Scripture in Early Christianity. If Scripture is fulfilled, it no longer exists alone, yet its authority remains (Jn. 10:35). Tension thus arises, for while Jesus finds God's will in the law (cf. Mt. 5:18), he does not hesitate to assert his own authority (cf. Mt. 5:21ff., 31ff.). In Paul we find the same tension, for if we are to live according to Scripture (1 Cor. 4:6), it is by Christ and the Spirit that the nómos and grámma are given their true validity, as Scripture itself shows us by its permanent soteriological, ethical, and eschatological teaching. Hebrews, too, finds continuity with the OT even as it presents the superiority of Christ. Scripture, then, is not just what is written but God's dynamic declaration climaxing in Christ and the Spirit. Scripture serves Christ but finds its true force only in the revelation of Christ and the Spirit that is more than what is written.

grámma.

A. grámma in Greek and Hellenistic Usage. Like graphē, grámma has such meanings as 1. "inscription," 2. "picture," 3. "symbol" as a. writing in letters, b. individual letter, c. letters of a book, d. handwritten character, and e. language, 4. "what is written," 5. "grammar" or "academic discipline," 6. "written piece" as a. letter, b. record, c. official report, and d. decree, 7. "written law," and 8. "literature." It is then used 9. for the sacred Scriptures of the OT and NT. In this instance the addition of hierá is not necessary but tá hierá grámmata is the most common formula, e.g., in Philo and Josephus, then in Origen (who also has theía grámmata). Like graphē, grámma can also be used for a specific reference.

B. grámma in NT Usage.

1. In Lk. 23:38 grámmata are written characters, as also in Gal. 6:11: they represent letters in Paul's hand.

2. The meaning in Jn. 7:15 is "learning," the point being that Jesus is not qualified to teach. Paul's learning is what is disparaged by Festus in Acts 26:24.

3. The meaning in Acts 8:31 is "communication by letter" and in Lk. 16:6-7 "bill of indebtedness."

4. In Jn. 5:47 the reference is to the law (the writings of Moses). Since this bears witness to Christ (v. 46), those who do not believe it will not believe the words (rhḗmata) of Christ.

5. grámma/pneúma. Paul often draws an antithesis between grámma and pneúma. In Rom. 2:27 grámma is the law as what is demonstrably written. Like the demonstrable sign of circumcision, this does not guarantee observance. Through it (not in spite of it), the Jews are transgressors. grámma in this context means more than letter; it has the sense of prescription. The circumcision of the heart or spiritual circumcision is needed (vv. 28-29) to make a true Jew, i.e., one who fulfils the law. The opposing pairs sárx and kardía, en tṓ phanerṓ and en kryptṓ, correspond to the distinction between circumcision en grámmati (by the letter of the law) and en pneúmati (by a decisive invasion of the personal life). The grámma cannot do what the pneúma does. The basic antithesis is not between Scripture and the Spirit, but between law as a purely written prescription and the Spirit. Rom. 7:6 makes this point clear. As mere grámma, which does not rule in the heart, the law does not enable us to serve. We have to be dead to the law in this sense. Without Christ and the Spirit it is ineffective. But this does not have to mean that there is an absolute antithesis between grámma and pneúma. It simply means that in and by itself what is written cannot give new life. 2 Cor. 3:6-7 sheds further light on the relation. Here grámma is linked with the old covenant and pneúma with the new. On the basis of Jer. 31:33 what Paul has in mind is that the law that is merely written can only condemn us, but the law that God writes on the heart by the Spirit gives life. This is by divine purpose and not simply due to a false use of Scripture. God gave Scripture as law with a view to judgment, and he has now given the Spirit with a view to life. In v. 7 grámmata (plural) means letters carved on stone and obviously refers to the tables of the law. The letters again point us to the law, so that Paul is not just opposing letter to spirit, or inadequate writing to true meaning, but the older phase of revelation, which is a ministry of death, to the new phase, which through Christ and the Spirit is a ministry of life. The divine purpose behind the old dispensation can be seen, of course, only when Christ removes the veil (vv. 14, 16). It is hidden when he is obstinately rejected (v. 14).

6. grámma/graphḗ. Paul's distinction between grámma and pneúma is not meant to disparage Scripture as such. grámma characterizes the law as a written law, while graphē is Paul's term when he is stressing the positive aspect of Scripture. The word that is near us (Rom. 10:8) is not grámma but Scripture self-attested through the Spirit of Christ. Although we are not to focus on the mere letter of the law, we are still under the authority of Scripture as this is regulated by Christ and the Spirit. The new covenant gives life by the Spirit, not because unwritten law now replaces written law, but because the Spirit gives power to fulfil the inner intention of what is written.

engráphō.

1. Lk. 10:20. The references of engráphein are to a. "writing in a letter or petition," b. "entering in a document," c. "inscribing on a list," d. "inscribing the divine words in the Bible," and e. "entering in the book of life" (Dan. 12:1 LXX). The Lord's saying in Lk. 10:20 carries the thought that those who belong to Christ are enrolled as citizens of the eternal politeía.

2. 2 Cor 3:2-3. What Paul is saying here is that the Corinthians are letters "inscribed" on his heart. The idea of inscribing on the heart or soul is a common one in antiquity, but Paul is probably influenced more by Jer. 31:33; Prov. 3:3; also Ex. 24:12; 31:18; 34:1; Ezek. 11:19; 36:26.

prográphō.

1. Eph. 3:3: "As I have written above," a common use (e.g., when referring to a heading).

2. Rom. 15:4. "What was written previously, in earlier times.

3. Gal. 3:1. The reference here may be a. to public proclamation, e.g., on placards, or b. to vivid depiction. The latter is less likely both because there is no attestation for this sense and a heart-rending description of the cross is less in keeping with apostolic preaching than its public promulgation.

4. Jude 4. The idea here is that of public proscription; the false teachers have been long since listed for condemnation.

hypogrammós (hypográphō). The term hypográphō originally means a. "to draw lines for children learning to write," then b. "to show," "depict," "denote," "signify," c. "to demand," d. "to dazzle," e. "to paint" (under the eyes), and f. "to write below," "subscribe." In 1 Pet. 1:21 the rare hypogrammós (only biblical and post-Christian Greek) refers to the tracks that Christ has left as examples for us to follow, not in imitation, but in commitment to his way of suffering. This passage influences the Christian use of the term, e.g., in 1 Clem. 5.7; 16.17 and Clement of Alexandria Paedagogus 1.9.84.2.   [G. SCHRENK, I, 742-73]

grēgoréō → egeírō

gymnós [naked], gymnótēs [nakedness], gymnázō [to exercise naked], gymnasía [exercise]

gymnós.

1. “Naked” in the literal sense of a. “unclothed,” b. “badly clothed,” c. “stripped by force,” or d. “without an upper garment,” “partly clothed.”

2. “Naked” in the figurative sense of a. “unconcealed,” “manifest” (Heb. 4:13), b. “without bodily form.” In 1 Cor. 15:37ff. Paul contrasts the bare seed with the future plant or flower in illustration of the transition from the present body to the resurrection body. It should be noted that what is planted is not the naked soul but the present body (which also bears our individuality), so that the bare seed does not simply represent a nonbodily “soul” but that which has not yet received its future form. In 2 Cor. 5:3 a question arises whether Paul is referring to a nonbodily state prior to the parousia of Christ or to the final destiny of the reprobate who will not be clothed with the glorious resurrection body. The latter seems more likely. c. A final figurative sense is “inwardly unprepared,” as in Rev. 3:17; 16:15.

gymnótēs. Rare in secular Greek, this term means “nakedness,” “poverty,” as in Rom. 8:35; 11:27; it is used figuratively in Rev. 3:18.

gymnázō. The literal sense is “to exercise naked.” It is used only figuratively in the NT, e.g., for concentration on godliness (as distinct from dualistic asceticism) in 1 Tim. 4:7 (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24ff.; Phil. 2:12); for training in discernment in Heb. 5:24 and in righteousness in Heb. 12:11; for training in greed (perhaps sarcastically) in 2 Pet. 2:14.

gymnasía. “Exercise,” also used figuratively (e.g., for “martyrdom” in 4 Macc. 11:20). The term is meant literally in 1 Tim. 4:8, but the context shows that the reference is not to ordinary bodily exercise but to dualistic asceticism (cf. 4:3; 5:23). [A. OEPKE, I, 774-76]

gynḗ [woman, wife]

In general gynḗ denotes a. “the female” (as distinct from the male), b. “wife” (Dt. 13:6; Mal. 2:14; Lk. 1:5; 1 Cor. 7:2, 27; Eph. 5:22-23; Col. 3:18-19, etc.). By Semitic law a fianceée is already called gynḗ (cf. Gen. 29:21; Dt. 22:24; Rev. 21:9; Mt. 1:20). gynḗ chḗra means “widow” in 1 Kgs. 17:9; Lk. 4:26.

A. Woman in the Contemporary NT World. The disparagement of women in antiquity finds expression in the common male saying, backed up by anecdotes, that it is a matter of thanksgiving not to be an unbeliever or barbarian, a slave, or a woman. The proverb undoubtedly originated in the Near East.

1. The Greek World and Hellenism. Athenian women were of inferior status, often guarded by dogs, treated as fickle, contentious, and uncultured in comedy, liable to be oppressed if not under male protection. The Doric world gave them more freedom and influence. A high ideal of womanhood persisted even in the Attic world. Plato could demand equality for women, and capable individual women made a surprising impact in both private and public life. Marriage was the rule, but concubinage was common. No laws existed against bigamy but monogamy ruled in practice. Married couples were often affectionate but divorce was common either by consent, by declaration before a judge or third party, or by the unilateral action of the husband. Repeated divorces constituted a form of polygamy. No obstacle existed to remarriage after the death of a partner, though remaining single was sometimes praised, especially on the part of widows. Menander treated marriage cynically, and Neo-Platonism and the mysteries promoted asceticism in the form of total or temporary sexual abstinence, but the older Stoicism valued marriage highly.

2. Rome. In Rome housewives enjoyed a relatively high status. Women were not confined to the home, and Roman Stoicism advocated equal education for them. Many noble as well as reprobate women figured in Roman history. Sexual intercourse prior to marriage was frowned on, and Roman marriage was strictly monogamous, although this did not exclude intercourse with slaves or harlots. Various ceremonies of marriage were practiced. Divorce was relatively easy for all kinds of reasons and even by mutual repudiation. As in Greece, successive divorces and remarriages became common later, but widows who remained unmarried were highly respected.

3. Women in the OT. In spite of traces of an older matriarchate, women in the OT had few rights. They passed from the protection of one male to another. In Levirate marriage they had no legal choice as the males did (Dt. 25:5ff.). Wives could not claim the sabbath rest (Ex. 20:8ff., though cf. 2 Kgs. 4:22ff.). They depended heavily on their husbands' decisions (cf. 1 Sam. 1:5). Polygamy was a heavy burden for them (1 Sam. 1:5ff.). Stricter fidelity was demanded from them. Yet women could appear in public life (Gen. 24:13ff.). Daughters could inherit property (Num. 27:8). Their wishes were to be consulted in marriage (Gen. 24:39, 58). They could have enormous influence for good or bad (cf. Sarah, Rebekah, Abigail, and Jezebel), and in a few instances played public roles as prophetesses or national leaders (Deborah). The creation stories accord them a high position as helpmeets and lay a firm basis for the close relationship of the one man and the one woman even if they do also show woman to be secondary and focus on her role in the fall.

4. Women in Judaism. The rabbinic writings gave an unflattering picture of women, portraying them as greedy, inquisitive, vain, and frivolous. Their rights and religious duties were restricted and they were assigned a special place in the synagogues. Hellenistic and Palestinian Judaism differed little in this regard. Yet notes of praise are heard too. Women are said to be an adornment to their husbands and to have equal promise with them before God. Some women could be extolled for their learning or piety. Marriage was a duty for loyal Jews. Polygamy was legal but for various reasons (usually financial) was not common. Divorce, however, was rampant, and successive divorces produced a successive form of polygamy. Ascetic ideas were largely alien to Judaism but extramarital intercourse was firmly opposed. Great stress was laid on the physical side of marriage (though not for reasons of carnal desire), yet the personal aspects of the marriage relationship were also valued (cf. Philo). As regards divorce, the initiative lay with the husband, but there was debate whether the main ground ("something scandalous") covered only licentiousness or many other matters, some of them extremely trivial.

B. Woman in Christianity. Two important factors underlie Christian thinking in this area: (1) the establishment of monogamous marriage by creation, and (2) the removal of differentiation of sex by the divine lordship. Yet these principles are not worked out with revolutionary vigor. Christianity is often conservative in practice. Its main advantage is a new adaptability.

1. Jesus. Jesus is no radical social reformer but he comes impartially to help all who are in need. He gives women a role in some of the parables (Mt. 13:33; Lk. 15:8ff.). If he observes Jewish proprieties (cf. Mk. 5:40), he can also break them to speak with a woman (Jn. 4:27), to teach one (Lk. 10:39), or to speak on behalf of women (Mk. 12:40ff.). He also acts decisively to heal sick women (Lk. 13:10ff.; Mk. 1:31). He accepts the ministrations of a band of women (Lk. 8:2-3) who stay with him in his passion (Mk. 15:40-41) and share in his exaltation (Mk. 16:1ff.). Even at a distance he evokes a response from women (cf. Lk. 11:27). He never speaks a derogatory word about women, and by offering them equal salvation he sets them at the side of men as no less the children of God.

2. The Community. Women belong fully to the first Christian community (Acts 1:14). The Christian mission wins them along with men (Acts 16:13-14). As the men are brothers in the family of faith, the women are sisters (Rom. 16:1).

a. A certain tension may be discerned in Paul. By creation woman is a stage further from God (1 Cor. 11:3, 7), and Eve was seduced first (2 Cor. 11:3); on the other hand, differences are transcended in the new aeon (Gal. 3:28). Thus wives are still subject to their husbands (Col. 3:18; Eph. 5:21-22), but husbands are to exercise their leadership unselfishly in a loving service modeled on that of Christ.

b. The same tension may be seen in later writings. The role of Eve in the fall is stressed in 1 Tim. 2:13-14, but 1 Pet. 3:7 demands full recognition of women as joint heirs of life. There is little trace of the ascetic ideals that would emerge strongly in the apocryphal Acts.

C. Sacral and Social Functions of Women.

1. In non-Christian antiquity women take part in worship and the mysteries. Some feasts are for them alone, but they are excluded from other rites. They function as priestesses and sibyls (cf. Delphi).

2. The OT. The OT knows no priestesses, but women are part of the religious community and take part in festivals, sacred dances (Judg. 21:21), sacrificial mea1s (1 Sam. 1:4), and temple service (Ex. 38:8) as well as having a prophetic ministry (Miriam, Huldah). With children and aliens, they belong, like men, to the covenant people.

3. Judaism. Women have only a restricted role here, being confined to the women's court in the temple, having a special place in the synagogue, not being required to say the Shema or to observe the whole law, and being discouraged from saying grace publicly or publicly reading the law in the synagogue. Destruction of the temple made their earlier participation in festivals impossible, but they were still members of the covenant people with the duty, e.g., of daily prayer.

4. The NT.

a. Jesus has women followers but appoints no women among the twelve.

b. The NT churches include ministering women (Acts 9:36ff.), many of whom are commended for their zeal (Rom. 16:6, 12-13 and cf. Lydia). Phoebe is described as a diákonos (probably an office, Rom. 16:1). Women also help in evangelism (Acts 18:26; Rom. 16:3; Phil. 4:2-3). Prophetically gifted women may address the community (1 Cor. 11:3ff.) but only by way of exception (1 Cor. 14:34ff.).

c. As the charismatic element becomes less prominent, women's work may sometimes have to be resisted as heretical (Rev. 2:20), but it can also be given a regular form as older women minister to younger ones (1 Tim. 3:11) as counterparts of the deacons. The relation of these to the widows of 1 Tim. 5:3ff. is complex; the latter are older women who are supported by the church and may have fulfilled some of the duties listed in Tit. 2:3ff. The qualification "wife of one husband" may refer to nonremarriage after the death of the spouse, but in view of the right to such remarriage in Rom. 7:1ff., the commendation of it for younger widows (1 Tim. 5:14), and the general approval of a married clergy (1 Tim. 3), it seems more likely that the reference is to remarriage after divorce (as in 1 Tim. 3:2, 12). The prṓtē pístis of v. 12 is undoubtedly loyalty to Christ rather than fidelity to the first husband.

5. Further Developments in the Church. Women teachers are found mostly in sectarian circles, e.g., the Gnostics and Montanists. We sometimes read of women's choirs in worship. Women engage in charitable service and visitation. Younger unmarried women come to be supported by the church and are reckoned as officebearers, although not ordained by laying on of hands. Deaconesses have a more distinct function, especially in the east, and assist at baptisms, in the visitation of women, and in the presentation of the elements at communion. The right of women to give emergency baptism is debated, and they are not ordained as presbyters. Later they find a new sphere of service in and through monasticism; the abbess is called a deaconess. [A. OEPKE, I, 776-89]

Gṓg kaí Magṓg [Gog and Magog]

This phrase occurs in the NT only in Rev. 20:8-9 as the name of the host that after the millennial period wages war against God's people and is destroyed by God. The name is taken from Ezek. 38-39 and the sequences in Ezekiel and Revelation are similar: messianic reign, Gog and Magog and their destruction, the new Jerusalem (in Revelation the resurrection in 20:11ff. followed by the new heaven and earth and the new Jerusalem in 21:1ff.). Some of the rabbis have a similar sequence, although Gog and Magog can precede the messianic reign where this is seen to be the period of absolute consummation. Some apocalyptic works, however, do not mention Gog and Magog at all. One big difference between Ezekiel and Revelation is that Ezekiel is more strictly prophetic whereas Revelation paints a broader eschatological picture. Again, in Ezekiel Gog is the prince (1 Chr. 5:4) and Magog the territorial name (Gen. 10:2), but in Revelation the two form a sinister double-name for the hostile host, as in some rabbinic works and Sibylline Oracles 3.319; 3.512. [K. G. KUHN, I, 789-91]

gōnía [corner], akrogōniaíos [cornerstone, capstone], kephalḗ gōnías [cornerstone, capstone] gōnía. "Corner" (Mt. 6:5; Acts 26:26), hence the four corners of the earth (Rev. 7:1; 20:8; cf. the four winds and four angels) from which destructive winds blow and the hostile nations come to attack the centrally located holy city (Rev. 20:8-9).

akrogōniaíos (→ kephalḗ gōnías). The "final stone" in a building, probably over the gate; used with reference to Christ in 1 Pet. 2:6 and Eph. 2:20. The idea is that the church is a temple, the prophets and apostles are the foundation, and Christ completes the building.

kephalḗ gōnías. This is a Hebraism referring to the final stone in a building and consistently referring to Christ on the basis of Ps. 118:22. In Mk. 12:10 Jesus calls himself the rejected stone which becomes the head of the corner in the new sanctuary (of which he is also the builder, Mk. 14:58; cf. Mt. 16:18). He is thus above the earthly temple (Mt. 12:6). Acts 4:11 finds in Ps. 118:22 a prophecy of the death of Christ (the rejection) and his resurrection (being made the chief cornerstone). 1 Pet. 2:7 relates Ps. 118:22 to Is. 8:14; the kephalē gōnías is a sharp stone at the corner; against it some stumble and fall in their failure to believe that the rejected stone can be the head of the corner. [J. JEREMIAS, I, 791-93]

δ d

daímōn [demon, divinity], daimónion [demonic], daimonízomai [to be demon-possessed], daimoniōdes [demonic], deisidaímōn [religion], deisidaimonía [fear of divinity] daímōn, daimónion.

A. daímōn in the Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. A persistent animism, which even educated circles had to recognize, underlay the daímōn concept in the Greek world. The daímōn can be a deity or minor deity but may also be given a philosophical sense. The etymology and original meaning of the term daímōn are uncertain.

2. daímōn as a Term for Gods and Divine Powers. Various senses may be noted in this field: a. "god" b. "lesser deity" c. "unknown superhuman factor," d. "what overtakes us" e.g. death, or good or evil fortune, e. "protective deity," and in Stoicism f. "the divinely related element in us," e.g., noús or conscience. Stars can also be called daímones.

3. The Influence of Popular Religion on the Philosophical Systems. While philosophy interpreted daímō as general divine power, it also introduced daímones as personal intermediaries. Heroes and daímones are akin, and daímones also serve as messengers, supervisors, and mediators. Under the influence of popular belief they are related especially to magic, to misfortune, and to possession. They are also regarded as spatial (especially evil daímones), and have a place on the great ladder from God to us as beings that are superior but still imperfect, their wickedness being due to their association with matter.

4. daímōn in Popular Greek Belief. In popular belief daímones are a. spirits of the departed, b. shades which appear especially in lonely places at night. They cause all kinds of mischances, are responsible for illness and madness, bear special names, and may be warded off or conjured up by magic.

5. Demon Terminology in the Greek and Hellenistic World. daímōn is the more usual term, while daímonion (the neuter of the adjective daimónios) has the more indefinite sense of "the divine," especially fate. Parallel terms are hḗrōs, eídōlon, and psychḗ, and later under Judaic influence ángelos and pneúma.

6. daímōn in Josephus and Philo. Even linguistically Philo follows the Greek. He uses daímōn for destiny, a protective spirit, the spirit of a murdered wife, and intermediary beings in the air. Josephus moves in the same world but he approximates the rabbis in speaking of a daimónion pneúma and in the main he uses daimónia (not daímones) for demons.

B. The OT and Later Jewish View of Demons.

1. Belief in Spirits and Demons in the OT. Traces of a belief in spirits occur in the OT in 1 Sam. 28:13 (the witch of Endor) and Is. 8:19. But those who conjured up the dead were to be expelled (Dt. 18:10; 1 Sam. 15:23a; cf. Num. 23:23). Thus the demonic appears only on the margin. Spirits are mentioned to depict the destruction of Babylon and Edom (cf. Is. 34:14; 13:21). Spirits are possibly linked to idolatry in Dt. 32:17; 2 Chr. 11:17. Only once in Ps. 91:6 LXX is there a possible reference to protection against demons. A special word ángelos replaces daímōn for God's messengers, and God himself is the source of all that happens, including retributive or educative evils. In the main the LXX uses daimónion for Heb. šēḏ, but can also use eídōlon and mátaia as equivalents, thus showing that daimónion is a contemptuous term for pagan gods. Tob. 6:8ff. offers an example of an evil spirit attacking and destroying humans. But daimónia rather than daímones is preferred for such spirits, perhaps because it is closer to popular belief and avoids the positive aspects of daímōn.

2. Tannaitic Judaism. Here we find a widespread belief in spirits, many of which are named, e.g., Lilith, Bath Chorin; also group names. They have wings and enjoy special knowledge but have sensual needs. Magicians contact them. As spirits of defilement they are in complete antithesis to the Holy Spirit. They are ubiquitous and harmful, and precautions must be taken to avoid them (e.g., at night or in ruined places). They also cause sickness and acts as seducers. They are not connected with Satan. God and his angels can protect against them, as can study of the law, but external precautions are also to be taken. Unlike angels, they are not God's intermediaries, but angels could become hostile demonic powers and there can thus be reference to the angels of Satan in a historical fusion that does not erase the fundamental distinction between angels and demons.

3. Pseudepigraphal Judaism. Linguistically this stands between the OT and rabbinic Judaism as regards demons. We find the idea of fallen angels, and Satan's angels are called demons. We also read of evil or unclean spirits or spirits of Beliar, and of unclean demons in Jub. 10:1 (though daímones is seldom used). Only rarely here are demons capricious and hurtful. Their main work is to tempt into witchcraft, idolatry, war, bloodshed, and prying into mysteries. Pagans pray to them when seduced into idolatry. They are in opposition to God and owe their position to a fall which implies sin and guilt. They are depicted sometimes as related or subordinate to Satan, but not consistently so. In general the link with the souls of the dead is broken, and there is no bridge between evil spirits and good. Demonology is adopted because there is found in us a will that resists observance of the law; this evil will is ascribed to demonic influence, and a relation to Satan is thereby suggested.

C. The View of Demons in the NT.

Heb. Hebrew

1. The NT usage is similar to that of later Judaism. Daímōn occurs only once, in Mt. 8:31. daimónion is used elsewhere, as are pneúma, pneúma akátharton, pneúma ponērón, pneúma álalon, pneúma astheneías, and pneúma pýthōn. Mark is most faithful to Jewish usage, and Luke follows. The Athenians use daimónion in Acts 17:18, and Paul has it four times; cf. also pneúma in Eph. 2:2 and 1 Timothy. References to Satan's angels are found in Mt. 25:41 etc., and to bad angels in 1 Cor. 6:3; 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6; and Rev. 9:11.

2. In the main the NT follows the OT. There is no reference to the spirits of the dead. daímōn, which suggests a divine intermediary, is avoided. Angels and demons are basically antithetical. There are few references to demons except in the case of demon possession. Paul does not refer to perils from demons (2 Cor. 11:23ff.), and if he finds in his "thorn" the work of an angel of Satan (2 Cor. 12:7), God overrules this hindrance for good. Because of faith in God, the fear of demons is expelled. Yet Paul regards witchcraft as meddling with demons (cf. the warning in Gal. 5:20), and pagan sacrifices are offerings to demons (1 Cor. 10:20-21). Demonic activity is perhaps alluded to in 1 Cor. 12:2. Revelation also refers to demon worship, in 9:20. A surge of demonic activity is expected in the end-time (1 Tim. 4:1; Rev. 16:13-14). The demonic activity denoted by the swarm of locusts in Rev. 9:1ff. may be eschatological, but it may also be past or even present. We are to arm against spiritual foes in Eph. 6:12, and cf. the devilish wisdom of Jms. 3:15 and the admonition of 1 Jn. 4:1. Demonic powers are reserved for judgment (Mt. 25:41; cf. 1 Cor. 6:3; 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). Demons are subject to Satan (Eph. 2:2) in a kingdom that opposes God's kingdom. They are thus the instruments of Satan (cf. the reply of Jesus in Mk. 3:20ff.). The conflict with demons is for this reason a mortal one, but the main attention focuses, not on demons as such, but on their head. Evil thoughts do not come from seducing spirits but from the heart (Mt. 15:19). Because people do not honor God, he gives them up to a base mind (Rom. 1:28). Sin and the flesh act as evil forces but they are not external to us; they express the sinful self.

3. As regards demon possession in the Synoptics and Acts, it should be noted (1) that while not all sicknesses are said to come from demons, they are all in a sense Satan's work (cf. Lk. 13:11ff.); (2) that the main issue in possession is the distortion of the divine likeness or the impairment of the center of personality (Mk. 5:5) which Jesus comes to remedy (Mt. 12:28); and (3) that demons have a knowledge about Jesus (and their own fate, Mt. 8:29; Jms. 2:19) which they impulsively utter but which is not the confession that Jesus seeks.

4. In John the people accuse Jesus of having a daimónion, this implies total rejection and dishonoring, and Jesus replies to it firmly (Jn. 8:49). When Paul in Acts 17:18 is called a preacher of foreign damónia, this might carry an allusion to the charge against Socrates. OT usage recurs when Babylon is called the abode of daimonía in Rev. 18:2. The NT resists Greek divinizing of demons and dispels fear of the demonic, yet it retains a sense of the sinister activity of spirits as they attack us spiritually and physically in the service of Satan. The demonic characterizes the old aeon, but Jesus has gained a decisive victory over it and will keep his people until the final consummation of the new aeon that he has already inaugurated.

daimonízomai. "To be possessed by a daímōn," originally used in all the senses of daímōn, not used in the LXX, and found in the NT with relatively the greatest frequency in Matthew.

daimoniṓdes. "Demonic," used in the NT only in Jms. 3:15, which contrasts devilish wisdom with the wisdom from above.

deisidaímōn, deisidaimonía. Made up of deídō, "to fear," and daímōn, this term normally denotes piety either as religion or (sometimes) as excessive fear of the gods. Since daímōn in the Greek world can mean any supernatural power, it is a good neutral expression for religion, and has this sense in Acts 25:19 (Festus) and (the adjective) in Acts 17:22 (Paul of the Athenians). [W. FOERSTER, II, 1-20]

dáktylos [finger]

The only significant NT use is in Lk. 11:20, where Jesus says that he expels demons with the finger of God (denoting God's direct activity). In the OT a. the heavens are the work of God's fingers (Ps. 8:3), b. the tables of the law are written with God's finger (Ex. 31:18), and c. God's finger works miracles (Ex. 8:19). [H. SCHLIER, II, 20-21]

déēsis* → *déomai

deí; [it must be], déon estí [it is necessary]

Most common as deí (with infinitive) or déon estí, this term denotes the element of necessity in an event. It is most precise when linked with the compulsive power, but usually has a weaker sense. In philosophy it expresses logical or scientific necessity. It can also denote ethical or religious obligations backed sometimes by statute). In the LXX the law must be done as God's will (Lev. 5:17; cf. in the NT Lk. 13:14; 22:7; also Christian duties, 1 Th. 4:1; 1 Tim. 3:2; Tit. 1:7). Fate may often be viewed as the power behind necessity, but the term can also denote the compulsion of magic or the presuppositions essential to its success. In Greek and Hellenistic usage what is expressed is an idea of neutral deity which does not sit well with the OT and rabbinic concept of the personal will of God overruling history and issuing a personal summons to us. The LXX, Josephus, and even the NT adopt the term, but in so doing, while suffering some tension, make it plain that it relates to God's personal will rather than a neutral fate.

2. Lucan usage is important in this regard. Of the 102 NT instances, 41 are in Lucan writings. The usage varies. Sometimes the term expresses God's will in the law (Lk. 11:42; Acts 15:5), with which Jesus may clash as he follows the deí of God's will as he himself knows it (Lk. 13:6). The deí thus represents for Jesus a rule of life (Lk. 15:32). It is the deí of the divine lordship which governs his work (Lk. 4:43) and leads him to suffering and glory (Lk. 9:22; 17:25; cf. Acts 1:16; 3:21; 17:3). Its basis is God's will as laid down in Scripture (Lk. 22:37). His disciples and the church stand under the same deí (Lk. 12:12; Acts 9:6, 16; 14:22, etc.). The will of this deí is a saving will, so that its demand is a demand for obedient faith in every situation of life.

3. As used by Luke, the term expresses the necessity of the eschatological event. It is well adapted to do this, since the event is known only by revelation and sets us before the inconceivable ineluctability of a historical act that is grounded in God's will. Faith in God's eternal if mysterious plan formulates it. The necessity derives from the very nature of the God who has committed himself to this plan. Daniel stated this already in Dan. 2:28 LXX; Revelation repeats the thought (1:1; cf. 4:1), as does Jesus in Mt. 24:6; Mk. 13:10. The imperative of eschatology is to both judgment and salvation. Everything stands under it from the predicted return of Elijah fulfilled in the Baptist (Mt. 17:10ff.). The messianic age has come; hence the passion and resurrection are under the divine deí (Mt. 16:21) of this age. Jesus does not just preach eschatology; his history is eschatology. The gospel confirms this by showing that his work is the fulfilment of Scripture (Mt. 26:54; Lk. 22:37; Jn. 3:14; 20:9) and will necessarily, for Paul, issue in Christ's reign (1 Cor. 15:25), the judgment (2 Cor. 5:10), and the resurrection transformation (1 Cor. 15:53).

4. As the divine deí shapes Christ's history, it also controls God's work in us, e.g., in the new birth of Jn. 3:7, the need to call on Christ's name in Acts 4:12, the necessity of faith in Christ to salvation in Acts 16:30-31 (cf. Heb. 11:6).

5. Another use of deí is for the necessity of prayer in the Christian life. As Jesus taught us, we ought always to pray (Lk. 18:1). The Spirit helps us because we cannot pray as we ought (Rom. 8:26). Worship ought to be in spirit and truth (Jn. 4:20ff.); the divine Spirit sets us in the truth by relating us to Christ who is the truth. [W. GRUNDMANN, II, 21-25]

deíknymi [to point out, reveal], anadeíknymi [to show, appoint], anádeixis [manifestation, installation], deigmatízō [to expose], paradeigmatízō [to hold up for contempt], hypódeigma [example, copy] deíknymi.

A. The Usage outside John's Gospel.

1. In Mt. 4:8 and parallels the sense is "to point to something," though with little distinction from "to show," "to exhibit," as in Lk. 24:40 (cf. Mt. 8:4 and par.). There are many parallels for this in pagan authors, the LXX, Josephus, and the early fathers.

2. Another nuance is "to point out" (e.g., Mk. 14:15), or even "to bring to pass" in the sense of "to manifest" (1 Tim. 6:15).

3. "To indicate verbally" is another nuance, leading to the sense "to teach," "to explain," "to demonstrate" (cf. 1 Cor. 12:31b; Acts 10:28; Mt. 16:21).

B. The Usage in the Johannine Writings.

1. The term is used in John to show that the works of Jesus are signs; it thus takes on the sense "to reveal," "to disclose" (Jn. 10:32). The Father is shown in Jesus (cf. Philip's request and Jesus' reply in 14:10-11). The unity of Father and Son means that the Father shows all his works to the Son and thus assigns the Son his own actions (5:20). To the showing of the works corresponds a teaching of the things to say (8:28; 12:49).

2. In Rev. 1:1ff. the words of the prophecy represent a revelation of Jesus Christ; God gave him this revelation to show future things to his servants by the mediation of the author, who saw and bears witness to it. Hence deíknymi here signifies a. a divine declaration in the form of revelation, b. divine revelation of the future, and c. a fusion of intimation and symbolism. Seeing (v. 2) is the response to the showing (cf. 4:1; 17:1; 21:9-10; 22:1). The general root of this usage is the sense "to cause to see," "to manifest," but instances may also be found, e.g., in 1 Clem. 26:1, of the meaning "to intimate in advance," or, in the LXX, of the theological sense "to reveal" (in 82 of 119 instances, in many of which the LXX itself imports the idea of revelation). In apocalyptic writing, too, we find the senses "to disclose," "to prophesy," and "to refer to mysteriously."

anadeíknymi.

1. In Lk. 10:1 the idea is "to appoint," "to institute," with some vacillation between the idea of ordaining for a task and legally instituting. The word is taken from the political sphere and suggests an official action.

2. In Acts 1:24 the idea is different, for while an appointment is at issue, what is asked is that God will "disclose" or "show" whom he has chosen.

anádeixis. The meaning in Lk. 1:80 is uncertain. Lk. 3:1ff. and 10:1 suggest "installation," as in secular usage relating to official institution. But the meaning might also be "manifestation," which carries the thought that John's appearance is part of revelation.

---

par. paragraph

deigmatízō. This rare word means “to exhibit,” “make public,” “bring to public notice.” In Mt. 1:19 Joseph does not want to expose Mary by having her appear publicly. In Col. 2:15 Christ makes a public exhibition of the vanquished forces, not just by proclamation, but by public display, as in a triumphal procession.

paradeigmatízō. This stronger term, which is more common than deigmatízō, means “to expose to public obloquy.” It occurs in the LXX in Num. 25:4 (public hanging), in Jer. 13:22 (Heb. “suffer violence”), and in Ezek. 28:17 (“to pillory”). Apart from a variant in Mt. 1:19, the only NT instance is in Heb. 6:6. By apostasy Christ is crucified again and “publicly shamed.”

hypódeigma. In Hellenistic Greek this alternative to parádeigma means “example” as well as “document” or “proof.” The LXX has it (with parádeigma) for “model” and “copy.” The use for “copy” shows what is at issue in Heb. 8:5 and 9:23-24. What Moses sees on the mountain is the original, and the constructed tent etc. are the copy which reflects the original, yet also the model which points to it. The term “image” is perhaps the best suited to bring out this twofold sense. The OT cultus has a typical character when it is seen in the light of Christ. In this light it points to heavenly things, but it can do so only as a reflection of them. Elsewhere in the NT the term has the sense of “example.” The prophets are an example in Jms. 5:10. Jesus offers a prototype of mutual service in Jn. 13:15. The warning of a bad example is offered in 2 Pet. 2:6 and Heb. 4:11. [H. SCHLIER, II, 25-33]

deípnon [meal, Lord’s Supper], deipnéō [to eat, dine]

This word, which ordinarily means “meal,” “chief meal,” “feast,” takes on theological significance in the NT when used 1. for the meal consecrated to the Lord (1 Cor. 11:20); the church’s table fellowship constitutes divine service. The word also has significance 2. as an eschatological image; the heavenly banquet represents perfect fellowship with God and Christ (cf. Lk. 14:24; Rev. 19:9; 3:20, and the parallel marriage-feast, Mt. 22:2ff. etc.). The terrible counterpart of this feast is “the great supper” of Rev. 19:17 (based on Ezek. 39:17ff.; cf. Mt. 24:28). The use for a cultic meal is common in Hellenistic religion. The idea of an eschatological banquet occurs in the OT (cf. Is. 34:6ff.) and apocalyptic and rabbinic writings. [J. BEHM, II, 34-35]

deisidaimonía, deisidaímōn → daímōn

déka [ten]

The number ten, linked originally to reckoning by the fingers, is a favorite round figure in the OT, e.g., the Ten Commandments, the ten plagues, the ten patriarchs before the flood, the tenth as an offering to God, and ten as a measurement in relation to the ark, tent, and temple (Ex. 26-27; 1 Kgs. 6:7). The number is also common in rabbinic Judaism, e.g., the ten temptations of Abraham, the ten divine words at creation, the ten needed to constitute true worship. In apocalyptic, too, we read of the ten epochs of the world, of which the tenth is that of the Messiah. In the NT, ten plays a lesser role. It is a round number, e.g., in Lk. 19:13; Mt. 25:1; Rev. 2:10. Jesus displays his messiahship by ten miracles in Mt. 8 and 9. The genealogy in Mt. 1:1ff. fits into a ten-period schema. The ten horns in Revelation represent a totality of power (as in Dan. 7:20). In Rom. 8:38-39 ten powers are unable to separate us from God, and in 1 Cor. 6:9-10 ten vices exclude from the kingdom of God. On Gnostic speculations about the number cf. Irenaeus in Migne Patrologia Graeca 1.17.1; 18.3. [F. HAUCK, II, 36-37]

dektós → déchomai

dexiós [right (hand, side)]

From the stem dek-, this means “right” a. as the opposite of left; b. as a noun (hē dexiá) for God’s right hand as a symbol of his power; c. for the favorable or honored side, e.g., birds on the right as a good omen in Greece, the worthy walking on the right, or the law on God’s right hand in the OT and rabbis; d. for what is eminent or good, e.g., studying the law on the right hand for proper application to it; and e. in connection with treaties or compacts (on the basis of giving the right hand when concluding agreements).

1. In the NT, Jesus in the parable of judgment says that the sheep will be set at God’s right hand and the goats at his left; the right side is that of favor or salvation, as in Plato and the rabbis.

2. The NT depicts Christ himself as exalted to God’s right hand. In Acts 2:34 Peter refers to the session at God’s right hand, and in 5:31 he says that God exalted Jesus to his right hand. This is a fulfilment of the royal psalm 110 messianically interpreted; cf. Mt. 22:41ff., where Jesus himself shows that Davidic sonship does not exhaust his messiahship but becomes a riddle in view of the greater glory which goes far beyond a mere restoration of David’s throne and kingdom. Jesus belongs at God’s right hand because he is Lord of the world as well as King of Israel. Throughout the NT his exaltation to God’s right hand comes to expression (cf. Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:20; Col. 3:1; Heb. 1:3, 13; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2; 1 Pet. 3:22). What follows his death vindicates his claim to a place of honor alongside God. In fulfilment of his claim, he has been declared Christ and Lord, the messianic age has dawned, and he shares God’s glory and deity, as manifested by his sending the Spirit. Older rabbinic writings refer Psalm 110 to Abraham or David, but later exegesis adopts again a messianic interpretation. Another rabbinic view sets the law at God’s right hand but sees the Christ replacing it in the messianic age. [W. GRUNDMANN, II, 37-40] déomai [to ask, pray], déēsis [prayer], prosdéomai [to need] déomai, déēsis.

1. The original meaning of déomai is “to lack,” “to need,” and of déēsis, “lack.” But there are few traces of this in the LXX and none in the NT.

2. The NT sense is, according to context, “to ask” or “to seek.” Formally, in Acts 21:39 and 8:34, it means “please” (déomaí sou). A fuller sense occurs when requests are made to Jesus for help or healing, as in Lk. 5:12; 9:38; cf. also 8:28. Paul uses it in an earnest admonition in 2 Cor. 5:20 (cf. 10:2; Gal. 4:12). Apart from Mt. 9:38 it is exclusive to Luke and Paul.

3. It then comes to be used for “to pray.” Jesus prays for Peter in Lk. 22:32 (cf. Heb. 5:7. Paul prays about his plans in Rom. 1:10; 1 Th. 3:10. In Acts 4:31 the reference is to the prayer of vv. 24ff. déēsis is intercession in Rom. 10:1, but the element of petition is less strong in Lk. 5:33; Phil. 1:4; 1 Tim. 2:1. Prayer in general seems to be the issue in Acts 10:2; Lk. 2:37; 1 Tim. 5:5. If the answer is uncertain, an ei clause is used (Rom. 1:10). The content is denoted by a hópōs or hína clause, while intercession for someone is hypér or perí tinos.

prosdéomai. In his address in Acts 17:22ff. Paul says that God does not want worship as though he “had need of something (more).” The pros- strengthens an element that is already present in déomai, since “to need” carries the thought of something to be added. The real point, of course, is that God does not need anything; Paul is continuing the polemic of the OT (also Stoicism) against anthropomorphic ideas of deity and against the idolatry which worships images that have to be propped up and carried (Is. 40:20 etc.). For Paul the stoicheía, too, are weak and ineffectual; the Galatians must not subject themselves to them now that they know the true Lord (Gal. 4:8-9). [H. GREEVEN, II, 40-42]

→ erōtáō, eúchomai

déos* → *phóbos

desmós [imprisonment], désmios [prisoner]

Paul’s imprisonment (literally “fetter”) has special religious significance in phrases like désmios Christoú Iesoú (Eph. 3:1; Phlm. 1:9), désmion autoú (2 Tim. 1:8), désmios en kyríō (Eph. 4:1), and cf. Phlm. 13 and Phil. 1:13. Actual imprisonment underlies the usage, but the real bondage is to Christ for whose sake it is suffered and to whom self-will is offered in sacrifice. In answer to the idea that Paul borrows here from the concept in the mysteries that katochḗ precedes the final dedication, it should be noted that Paul nowhere calls imprisonment a penultimate stage prior to being with Christ (Phil. 1:23). Imprisonment symbolizes his whole life and ministry.

→ aichmálōtos [G. KITTEL, II, 43]

despótēs [owner, master], oikodespótēs [master of the household], oikodespotéō [to rule one’s household] despótēs.

A. despótēs outside the NT.

1. Greek Usage. The first meaning is the domestic one of “owner.” This extends to the political sphere when an alien people takes over a land. The word thus acquires such varied nuances as a. master of the house, b. master as distinct from slave, c. absolute ruler (equivalent to týrannos in Plato), d. powerful divine being, e. the Roman emperor, and f. (astrologically) planet. While the term expresses social rank or position, it is not one of status; hence the Jews can not only follow normal Greek usage but also link the term with God. In the Greek Bible, while strongly subordinate to kýrios, it appears some 56 times (25 times in direct address to God with a special emphasis on his omnipotence). God is kýrios because he is despótēs of all things (cf. Job 5:8ff.). Elsewhere in the LXX we find all the other nuances except a. and f., but these are less prominent compared to that for God.

2. The Reason for the Paucity of despótēs in the LXX. The distribution of despótēs in the LXX is striking. In the law it occurs only in Gen. 15:2, 8 (déspota kýrie), in the history books only in Josh. 5:14, in Isaiah in 1:24; 3:1; 10:33“ (ho despótēs kýrios [or kýrios ho despótēs] sabaṓth), and in Jeremiah in 1:6; 4:10; 14:13; 15:11, but it occurs more frequently in Wisdom, Maccabees, and Sirach, and still more in other renderings. The reason for this paucity is probably that the term has acquired too abstract a character in its use for absolute power. The God of Israel, however, is the Creator and Lord of all things who is known to his people through acts in history. His omnipotence, then, is a concrete reality and is more suitably expressed by kýrios. This explains three characteristics of the use of despótēs in the LXX: (a) additions such as “of all things, all creation, heaven and earth” are often made; (b) it occurs more often in later works which display Hellenistic intrusion; (c) in Gen. 15:2, 8 Abraham is appealing to God’s omnipotence in a unique way which no doubt suggested the term to the translator.

B. despótēs in the NT.

l. Secular Usage. In four of the ten instances the reference is to the master as distinct from slaves, e.g., 1 Tim. 6:1; 1 Pet. 2:18. “Master of the house” is the sense in 2 Tim. 2:21.

*2. God as despótēs. Simeon addresses God as déspota in Lk. 2:29, and so does the Christian group in Acts 4:24. God is also meant in Rev. 6:10.

*3. Jesus as despótēs. A new feature is the description of Jesus as despótēs in Jude 4; 2 Pet. 2:1. In 2 Pet. 2:1 the heretics may be known by their rejection of Jesus as despótēs. In Jude 4 a double denial, first of one despótēs, then of Jesus, might be intended, but this is unlikely in view of 2 Pet. 2:1. The use of agorázein in 2 Pet. 2:1 might lead one to expect kýrios rather than despótēs, but the latter expresses very well Christ's right to his people in virtue of his saving act. It is less likely that the intention is to equate Jesus with God as the Almighty.

oikodespótēs, oikodespotéō. These are not classical words, but occur in astrology and everyday life. In the NT oikodespótēs occurs 12 times (especially in Matthew, e.g., 10:25; 13:27, 52, etc.; cf. Lk. 13:25; Mk. 14:14). The meaning is "master of the house" (sometimes with the emphatic addition ánthrōpos, Mt. 13:27 etc.). The parables illustrate God's action by that of the householder. The only instance of the verb is in 1 Tim. 5:14: younger widows are to marry and "rule their households," an example of the family virtues that are stressed in the Pastorals.

→ kýrios [K. H. RENGSTORF, II, 44-49]

déchomai [to accept, receive], dochḗ [receiving (a guest)], apodéchomai [to welcome], apodochḗ [acceptance], ekdéchomai [to accept, await], apekdéchomai [to accept, await], eisdéchomai [to receive, welcome], prosdéchomai [to accept, await], dektós [acceptable], apódektos [acceptable], euprósdektos [acceptable] déchomai.

A. déchomai outside the NT.

a. The first sense is "to accept," e.g., letters, gifts, payments, even the body by the soul. In pagan religion prophecy is received through, e.g., flights of birds, and offerings are accepted by the gods. In the OT Zephaniah demands an acceptance of God's dealings in punishment and correction (3:7); cf. the cup of wrath in Jer. 25:28. A special use in this regard is for the "bearing away" of sin (Gen. 50:17); punishment for sin is "received," however, in Is. 40:2.

b. "To receive," in the sense "to welcome," "to extend hospitality," is a further use which is common in the NT (cf. Lk. 9:53; Gal. 4:12; 2 Cor. 7:15).

c. "To receive, hear, or understand what someone is saying" is another usage, found in relation to divine commands in the OT, with a volitional as well as an intellectual component.

d. A cultic use in the LXX is for "to receive favorably," e.g., prayer or sacrifice. This adds a theocentric element where the Hebrew equivalent is "to find favor."

B. déchomai in the NT.

1. In Mt. 10:40ff. special importance is attached to receiving the disciples, for since they are the envoys of Jesus, receiving them is receiving him, and therefore God. Through the disciples Jesus himself knocks at the heart's door. They are the bearers of Christ. Christ is present in them; they continue and extend his mission. More than simple hospitality is involved, and therefore the love expended on them will bring a special reward. The same applies to receiving a child in Christ's name (Mt. 18:5-6), for Christ himself comes in the person of the child, and what is done for the child is done for him. This gives even such an unassuming act a unique significance.

2. In a related sense the NT speaks about receiving the gospel or the Word of God (Acts 8:14; 11:1; 17:11; cf. Jms. 1:21; 1 Th. 1:6; 2:13). One may also receive its content, i.e., the kingdom of God (Mk. 10:15), the grace of God (2 Cor. 6:1), or love of the truth (2 Th. 2:10). In this sense déchomai is equivalent to faith. It brings out the fact that in relation to God we can only receive. In hearing the gospel, however, we are liberated for it. By the Spirit (1 Cor. 2:14), the understanding is opened and we are set in the freedom of decision in which God's grace or kingdom may be ours.

dochḗ. From "receiving a guest," this word comes to denote the "meal" or "feast" that is linked with hospitality. Only Luke uses it in the NT, for the great feast that Levi holds in 5:29, and for the feast to which the poor and needy are to be asked according to Jesus in 14:13. It may be noted that as Jesus accepts hospitality from tax collectors (15:1), he demands that table fellowship be extended to the outcast and needy.

apodéchomai. This compound has much the same sense as the simple form. In the NT it occurs only in Luke, for the welcome that Jesus gives the crowd in 9:11, for the crowd's welcoming of Jesus in 8:40, for the reception of Paul in Acts 18:27; 21:17, and for Paul's welcoming of all who come to him in Acts 28:30.

apodochḗ. The meaning is "acceptance" with a sense of approval and appreciation. In the NT two sayings which sum up the gospel are said to be sure and worthy of full acceptance or approval, namely, that Christ came into the world to save sinners (1:15), and that godliness has promise both for this life and for the life to come, since it builds on the living God and Savior (4:8ff.).

ek-, apekdéchomai. ekdéchomai means a. "to accept" and b. "to await." apekdéchomai is also used for "to await," but also means "to deduce (wrongly)." In the NT Paul has apekdéchomai for expectation of the end (Rom. 8:25). This expectation is focused on the transformation when the adoption enjoyed by faith will be manifested with the resurrection (8:14, 23) and creation will reach the goal for which it, too, is waiting (8:19). This consummation will come with Christ's return, so that Christ himself is the content of expectation (Phil. 3:20). He is so as the hope of righteousness (Gal. 5:5). On the basis of the gospel that is already received (cf. déchomai), apekdéchomai thus characterizes Christian life as one of expectation of the great climax which gives not only this life but also the whole of creation its meaning. Hebrews uses ekdéchomai as well as apekdéchomai for the same eschatological expectation (10:13; 9:28). Jms. 5:7 has the former in the comparison in Jms. 5:7 and 1 Peter, the latter in the reference to God's patient waiting in Noah's day.

eisdéchomai. This means "to receive someone" either to a place or into a circle. The LXX has it for reception of the people into fellowship with God (Mic. 4:6 etc.). In the NT the only instance is in 2 Cor. 6:17 (based on Is. 52:11 and Zeph. 3:20): In the new covenant God's people everywhere are received into fellowship with God, so that the promise of the prophets is fulfilled without national restriction.

prosdéchomai. This has the two senses a. "to receive someone" or "accept something," and b. "to await." The latter is the main sense in the NT.

1. It is used for those who await God's kingdom: Joseph in Mk. 15:43, Simeon in Lk. 2:38. The gospel is that the Messiah has come and waiting is over.

2. It is also used for Christian expectation of the resurrection (Acts 24:15), eternal glory (Tit. 2:13), and Christ's mercy in the judgment (Jude 21). Jesus tells his disciples to be as those who wait for their master (Lk. 12:36).

dektós, apo-*, *euprósdektos. dektós means “what one can accept,” hence in the LXX “acceptable,” “pleasing.” apo- and euprósdektos have the same meaning.

1. In the LXX the terms have a cultic reference. Sacrifices that are pleasing to God are effectual (Lev. 1:3), but when the people backslide their offerings are not acceptable (Jer. 6:20) and will become so only in the last time of conversion (Is. 56:7). The acts and prayers of the righteous are also acceptable in Prov. 16:7; so are the righteous themselves (11:20). In the NT Paul says that his ministry is an acceptable sacrifice (Phil. 4:20). So is the fruit of his ministry (Rom. 15:16). The Christian community is a holy priesthood offering acceptable spiritual sacrifices to God through Christ (1 Pet. 2:5). With no cultic association, all who do right are acceptable to God (Acts 10:35). On the other hand, prophets are not acceptable in their own country (Lk. 4:24). What is acceptable is equated with what is good in 1 Tim. 2:3.

2. The word has a messianic sense in Is. 61:2: The messianic age is the time chosen by God as the time of the divine presence and salvation. This time comes with Jesus (Lk. 4:18ff.). The acceptable time of divine election and presence is that of Christ’s coming. This is for Paul the time of God’s hearing and helping (Is. 48:8ff.), i.e., the acceptable time, the day of salvation (2 Cor. 6:2). [W. GRUNDMANN, II, 50-59]

déō [to bind, tie], (lýō [to untie, set free])

1. déō is common in the NT for “to bind” or “bind together” (e.g., Mt. 13:30), “to wrap” (Jn. 11:44), “to chain” (Mk. 5:3-4), and hence “to imprison” (Mk. 6:17 etc.). It expresses supernatural binding in Lk. 13:16; Acts 20:22; cf. the chaining of Satan in Rev. 20:2. It is also used figuratively for the marriage bond (Rom. 7:2; 1 Cor. 7:26, 39). God’s word is not bound (2 Tim. 2:9).

2. Behind the deín and lýein of Mt. 16:19; 18:18 there is no idea of magic, but the rabbinic terminology for declaring forbidden or permitted, and hence for removing or imposing an obligation. On the other hand, the disciples are not to be rabbis (Mt. 23:8), and another if less common use of the rabbinic terms is for imposing or removing a ban. This fits in with Mt. 18:17, offers a parallel to Jn. 20:23, and is the almost unanimous interpretation of the fathers. [F. BÜSCHEL, II, 60-61]

dēlóō [to show, declare]

delóō is the common Greek word for “to show, declare, impart, demonstrate.” It can be used for the communication of cultic mysteries and revelation by dreams and visions. In the LXX God declares his name, plans, secrets, and demands (Ex. 6:3; 33:12; Dan. 2:28-29; 1 Kgs. 8:36). It can also indicate the divine act of revelation in judgment and grace (Jer. 16:21). In the NT it denotes the (future) divine act of revelation only in 1 Cor. 3:13, when the day of testing will show the quality of our work. More often it refers to the instruction given by the Spirit (1 Pet. 1:11) or the Lord (2 Pet. 1:14). Yet one cannot make any sharp distinction from apokalýptein (cf. Mt. 11:26 and par.; 1 Cor 14:30; 1 Pet. 1: 12). In the Stoics, Josephus, and the fathers we find the sense “to interpret” (the allegorical interpretation of the OT in Barn. 9.8, and the elucidation of puzzling symbols in Hermas Similitudes 5.4.1ff.). [R. BULTMANN, II, 61-62]

dēmiourgós [builder, maker]

Strictly “one who pursues public affairs,” then “builder, artisan,” then “architect of the world.” It has only a secular sense in the LXX, and the only NT instance is in Heb. 11:10 where God is the builder and “maker” of the eternal city. For the relation to ktístēs, see ktízō. [W. FOERSTER, II, 62]

→ ktízō

dḗmos [people], ekdēméō [to be abroad], endēméō [to be at home], parepídēmos [sojourner]

dḗmos. Originally "portion," then a. "district," b. "territory," c. "people" of a land or city (sometimes, but not always, derogatory: "mob"). In the LXX it first means "race," "family," later "people." In the NT it means the "people" of a place; cf. Acts 12:22 (Jerusalem), 17:5 (Thessalonica), 19:30, 33 (Ephesus).

ekdēméō, endēméō. These two terms denote being abroad and staying at home. Not used in the LXX, they occur in the NT in 2 Cor. 5:6ff. to express the thoughts (1) that bodily existence is absence from the Lord, and (2) that full fellowship with the Lord is possible only apart from this existence. We and the Lord are in separate spheres. Faith overcomes the separation (v. 7) but is not the final reality. We thus desire to be out of the present sphere and at home with the Lord so as to enjoy the full fellowship of sight. Nevertheless, even in the present sphere the desire to please the Lord gives direction to life (v. 9).

parepídēmos. This rare term has the sense of "one who is (temporarily) a resident alien." It occurs in the NT in 1 Pet. 1:1; 2:11: Christians are only temporary residents on earth and must not let their lives be shaped by its interests. They are a Christian diaspora whose true home is the place of their election. Heb. 11:13 applies the same term to the OT examples of faith. Hellenistic thought has a similar idea of earthly life as a sojourn but with a dualistic nuance. [W. GRUNDMANN, II, 63-65]

diá [through, during, with, etc.]

A. diá with Genitive.

1. Spatial "through" or "through . . . to" (Mt. 7:13; Mk. 10:25; Jn. 10:1; Rom. 15:28).

2. Temporal a. "through a whole period" (Lk. 5:5) b. "during part of a period" (Acts 5:19, 16:9) c. "after a time" (Mk 2:1. Gal. 2:1). "Within" occurs in Mk. 14:38.

3 Modal a of manner "through" "in" "with" (Lk. 8:4. Jn. 19:23; Rom. 8:25), b. of accompanying circumstance "with," "among," "in spite of" (Acts 14:22; 2 Cor. 2:4; Rom. 2:27); the reference in 1 Jn. 5:6 seems to be neither to Christ's baptism and death, nor to baptism and the eucharist, but to baptism as a sprinkling with Christ's blood (cf. 1 Pet. 1:2). There is a personal genitive in 2 Tim. 2:2.

4. Instrumental a. with genitive of cause "by means of," "with," "through" (Rom. 3:27, the law; 3:22, faith; Acts 15:11, grace; Rom. 5:10; Col. 1:20, Christ's death; perhaps 1 Tim. 2:15, childbearing; possibly too Mk. 6:2, Christ's hands; Acts 11:28, the Spirit), b. with genitive of person "through the mediation of" (Mt. 1:22, the prophet; Gal. 3:19, angels; references such as Jn. 1:3; Acts 10:36; Col. 1:20, etc. in which Christ mediates God's action in creation, miracles, judgment, etc., and also Jn. 10:9; 14:6; Heb. 7:25; Rom. 5:2 in which he is a Mediator for us, although not in the sense that it is we who set him in motion; cf. also believing through him in Jn. 1:7; Acts 3:16; 1 Pet. 1:21).

5. Causal a. "in consequence of," "on account of," "on the basis of" (Rom. 8:3, the flesh; 2 Cor. 9:13, the proof of the service; 1 Cor. 1:1, the will of God; Rom. 12:1, the mercies of God; 15:30, Christ and the love of the Spirit; 2 Cor. 10:1, the meekness and gentleness of Christ), b. "by," "for the sake of" with a personal reference (Mk. 14:21; Acts 12:9, etc.), and many references to Christ in which Christ is the author of authority (Rom. 1:5), fruit (Phil. 1:11), comfort (2 Cor. 1:5), peace with God (Rom. 5:1), triumph (Rom. 8:37), acceptance with God (Heb. 13:21, resurrection life (1 Cor. 15:21), final deliverance (1 Th. 5:9); cf. also Rom. 1:8; 2 Cor. 1:20; 1 Pet. 4:11; Heb. 13:15 in which the initiative lies with Christ, so that we never find verbs of asking with the formula "through Christ"; it expresses the constitutive significance of Christ for Christians.

B. diá with Accusative.

1. Spatially "through... to" (cf. Lk. 17:11, though in view of the order [Samaria and Galilee] "through the borders," i.e., "between," seems more likely here).

2. Modally, Gal. 4:13: "in" bodily infirmity. The genitive would be more correct for this, hence the translation "because of" is sometimes preferred, but it yields no real sense.

3. Causally "on account of," "for the sake of," with a certain final element when the accusative of person is used (e.g., Mk. 2:27; 1 Cor. 8:11), and sometimes the accusative of thing (e.g., Mt. 15:3, 6; 1 Cor. 9:23; Phil. 2:30). The double diá in Rom. 4:25 offers some difficulty in view of the tension between a purely causal rendering of the first half and the parallelism of the statement. The point is perhaps that Christ died "because of our sins and in order to expiate them" (cf. 1 Tim. 1:16). In Rom. 11:28 the Jews are enemies in order that salvation may come to the Gentiles but beloved on account of the fathers; the parallelism here is purely rhetorical. [A. OEPKE, II, 65-70]

diabállō [to accuse], diábolos [the devil, Satan]

diabállō. The basic sense is "to separate from," "to be set in opposition," "to be hated" (passive), "to accuse," "to repudiate," "to give false information." The only NT instance is with reference to the unjust steward in Lk. 16:1: "accused."

diábolos.

A. Linguistic.

1. The main use is for complaint or calumniation, i.e., "calumniator," "talebearer."

2. Josephus has diabolḗ for calumniation or accusation, but not diábolos.

3. The LXX, too, has diabolḗ for calumniation, enmity, and diábolos for accuser, and it also uses diábolos for the devil as the accuser, adversary, or seducer (1 Chr. 21:1; Job 1; Zech. 3:1ff.). [W. FOERSTER, II, 71-73]

B. The OT View of Satan.

1. The śāṭān is basically the enemy (cf. 1 Sam. 29:4; Ps. 71:13), but specifically the legal accuser (Zech. 3:1) who is placed at the right hand of the accused (cf. Ps. 109:6). Ezek. 21:28-29; 29:16 express the same concept in another term (cf. 1 Kgs. 17:18). On the prophetic view the enemies that God raises up against Israel are also accusers on God's behalf (cf. 1 Kgs. 11:14ff.).

2. Job offers the picture of a heavenly accuser—not a demonic being, but an official prosecutor who comes before God at special times and is part of his entourage. This accuser can act against Job only with God's approval and on God's behalf. A sinister element enters in, however, with his power to use natural disasters and sickness. In Zech. 3:1ff. we again have the accuser at a trial, although here grace overrules law and the accusation is quashed. The OT references to śāṭān are infrequent and the concept is not central. Only in 1 Chr. 21:1 (and possibly 1 Kgs. 22:19ff.) does the idea of a tempter occur. The legal element is still present in 1 Chr. 21:1 but Satan (now a proper name) is hostile and harmful. As distinct from Persian dualism, Satan is still under God and the event recorded is not removed from the divine plan of salvation. The OT Satan embodies a threat from God's world, whether as divine prosecutor or as destructive principle. In postcanonical works we find an absolutizing tendency in which Satan is the chief of a hostile kingdom and an absolute principle of evil. Behind this are many motifs, e.g., the ancient dragon, the serpent of paradise, and marriage with angels, in addition to the impact of Persian ideas. [G. VON RAD, II, 73-75]

C. The Later Jewish View of Satan. The few OT references undergo considerable development in pre-NT Judaism. The following points may be noted: a. Azazel and his hosts are subjugated to Satan; b. demons are autonomous; c. the main function of Satan is still that of prosecutor; and d. there is no fall of Satan from heaven. In the main, Satan aims to disrupt the relation between God and humanity, or Israel, by temptation (e.g., of Abraham or David), by accusation before God, and by interference in Israel's history.

Satan may be resisted by good decisions, human merit or suffering, external aid (Moses, Michael, or the angels), and even by God himself. Satan is not the lord of this world, and although he is sometimes linked with the evil impulse, this is not a force that enslaves us. In some works Satan does not occur at all, being replaced by, e.g., angelic witnesses or several satans. Since all these ideas are fluid, Satan can sometimes be depicted as an exalted angel expelled from heaven, linked with legends about demons and the evil impulse, and even related in Gnostic fashion to the material world, but these are deviations from the main tradition. In this context one should consider names like Sammael and Azazel.

D. The NT View of Satan. As regards names, we find Belíar in 2 Cor. 6:15, Satanás and diábolos in Revelation, and such terms as ho ponērós, árchōn toú kósmou toútou, theós toú aiṓnos toútou, árchōn tḗs exousías toú aéros, as well as drákōn and óphis. Satanás is perhaps closer to Palestinian usage than diábolos; the two alternate in John and Revelation, while Paul usually has Satanás but diábolos occurs in Ephesians and the Pastorals. The two main features of the NT concept are the antithesis between God and Satan and the presence of God's kingdom in Christ. In opposition to God Satan is prince or even god of this world (Lk. 4:6; 2 Cor. 4:4), claiming the honor that belongs to God. The unredeemed are under his lordship (Mt. 6:13; Mk. 3:27; Acts 26:18; Col. 1:13). They belong to him (Jn. 6:70; 8:44; 1 Jn. 3:8; Acts 13:10). Their works are works of the diábolos (1 Jn. 3:8). His aim is to separate from God. A murderer (Jn. 8:44) and liar (1 Jn. 3:8), he uses various hurtful processes (Mk. 3:23ff.; Lk. 13:11, etc.). The demons are subject to him. His ultimate weapon is death (Heb. 2:14). He is behind paganism and magic (Acts 13:10). If he is still the accuser, the whole of this aeon is finally his. Nevertheless, with Christ the kingdom of God destroys the devil's kingdom, and Satan is cast from heaven (Rev. 12; Jn. 12:31; Lk. 10:18), so that he loses the right of accusation. This does not happen without a struggle against Christ, as at the temptation (Mt. 4:1ff.), and at the end (Lk. 22:31). Conflict continues with the community (cf. Acts 5:3, and the warnings of Rom. 16:20; 1 Cor. 7:5; 1 Th. 2:18; Eph. 4:27, etc.). Satan especially desires to snatch away the seed that is sown (Mk. 4:15). But the battle has been won (1 Jn. 2:13), and the church may thus resist with confidence (Eph. 6:10ff.). In the end-time Satan will summon up antichrist and enjoy some temporary success (Rev. 13:2; 2 Th. 2:9-10), but he will then be bound for the millennial period and after another brief interlude destroyed. While Satan is given certain powers by God, and can prevent journeys (1 Th. 2:18) or tempt believers (1 Tim. 5:15), the community is so secure in faith that the blows of his angel (2 Cor. 12:7) and delivering up to Satan (1 Cor. 5:5; 1 Tim. 1:20) can come within God's gracious operation. In 1 Tim. 3:11 and 2 Tim. 3:3 the meaning is "calumniator." "Devil," however, is the more probable sense in Jn. 6:70 and Eph. 4:26-27. This is also suggested by the use of the article and the singular in 1 Tim. 3:6-7, although "calumniator" is also possible here.

→ Satanás [W. FOERSTER, II, 75-81]

diangéllō* → angéllō; diagongýzō → gongýzō; diathḗkē → diatithēmi; diairéō, diaíresis → *hairéomai

diakonéō [to serve], díakonía [service], diákonos [servant, deacon] diakonéō. This word for service, as distinct from douleúō (to serve as a slave), therapeúō (to serve willingly), latreúō (to serve for wages), and leitourgéō (to do public service), carries the basic nuance of personal service.

A. diakonéō outside the NT.

1. The concrete sense is basic: a. “to wait at table,” b. “to care for,” and c. (comprehensively) “to serve.” For the Greeks service is undignified; we are born to rule, not to serve. Service acquires value only when it promotes individual development, or the development of the whole as service of the state (or ultimately as service of God). If this demands some renunciation, the idea of self-sacrificial service finds little place.

2. In Judaism, service is not thought to be unworthy; hence a deeper understanding of it develops. The LXX does not use diakoneín, but has leitourgeín, latreúein, and even douleúein. Philo has diakoneín for “to serve” with an echo of waiting at table. Josephus has it for “to wait at table,” “to obey,” and even “to render priestly service”. The commandment to love one’s neighbor offers a solid basis for sacrificial service, but in later Judaism tends to be weakened by the distinction between the righteous and the unrighteous and the construing of service as meritorious rather than sacrificial.

B. diakoneín in the NT. By exalting service and relating it to love of God, Jesus both sets forth a completely different view from that of the Greeks and purifies the Jewish concept.

1. The sense “to wait at table” occurs in Lk. 17:8; Jn. 12:2. An astonishing reversal takes place when the returning master rewards his servants by waiting on them (Lk. 12:37). Jesus himself is similarly present as one who serves (Lk. 22:27). Hence when he asks who is greater, the one who sits at table or the one who serves, the obvious answer that the Greeks would give is wrong. Yet Jesus does not substitute an answer that is theoretically opposite. Instead he points to himself, for as the Son of Man who is also Lord of the kingdom, he institutes a new pattern of human relationships which extends even to waiting at table or washing the feet (Jn. 13:4ff.). In Acts 6:2 diakoneín means “to supervise the meal,” i.e., its whole provision, preparation, and organization. This diakoneín as love in action is set in tension with the diakonía toú lógou as the proclamation of love. Most likely what was involved was not just the distribution of portions to those in need but the arranging of common meals, and the radical issue might well have been that of table fellowship rather than wrangling about the better portions; if so, the appointment of the Hellenistic Seven takes on added significance. diakoneín is also used for Martha’s serving in Lk. 10:40 (cf. Jn. 12:2) and that of Peter’s mother-in-law in Mk. 1:31. When the angels serve Jesus in Mk. 1:13; Mt. 4:11, they, too, are probably bringing him food after the period of fasting.

2. The wider sense “to serve” reflects the same transvaluation of values as the narrower meaning. Waiting at table may well be included in Lk. 8:3, but the term covers many activities in Mt. 25:42ff. Here service of others is service of Christ and involves personal commitment. Worldly rulers lord it over their subjects but the concern of the disciples is with God’s kingdom, the way to which leads through suffering and death that has service as its point. Hence the only path of greatness for Christians is to become the servants and even the slaves of all (Mk. 9:35; 10:44). More than table service is now involved; all kinds of sacrificial activity on behalf of others, as exemplified by Christ’s own self-offering, are required. Service of others is service of God, and it may entail service even to the point of death itself (Jn. 12:25-26).

3. The life of the community is thus a life of serving. Every chárisma is given (1 Pet. 4:10) in stewardship, and the charísmata comprise gifts of word and gifts of action, the latter especially being described as diakoneín. Timothy, Erastas, Onesimus, and Onesiphorus (Acts 19:22; Phlm. 13; 2 Tim. 1:18) offer examples. The prophets rendered an advance service (1 Pet. 1:10ff.), and the apostles also do service (cf. 2 Cor. 3:3: “a letter diakonētheísa by us”). This service cannot be proud, self-righteous service; it is discharged only by God’s power and to his glory.

4. A particular service of Paul's is the collection for Jerusalem (2 Cor. 8:19). Thus he uses diakonṓn when he says that he goes to Jerusalem with help for the saints (Rom. 15:25). This is a single instance of the more general service of the saints which is commended in Heb. 6:10

5. In 1 Tim. 3:10, 13 diakoneín has the official sense "to serve as a deacon."

diakonía.

1. In the NT this first means "waiting at table," "providing for physical sustenance", or "supervising meals" (Lk. 10:40; Acts 6:1).

2. A wider meaning is "the discharge of a loving service." The diakonía of Stephanas is an example (1 Cor. 16:15). It is linked with works, faith, love, and patience in Rev. 2:19. All that edifies is covered in Eph. 4:11-12. There are various ministries (1 Cor. 12:4ff.), but all are rendered to the Lord. Acts of care must have been included (1 Cor. 12:28). diakonía comes between prophēteía and didaskalía in Rom. 12:7, but preaching is itself diakonía in Acts 6:4, i.e., the offering of the gospel as the bread of life. Preachers, then, have a ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:18-19). The angels are a model (Heb. 1:14). If trying to live by the law is a ministry of death, faith in the gospel is a ministry of the Spirit or of righteousness (2 Cor. 3:7ff.).

3. A more specific sense is "the discharge of certain obligations," e.g., by the apostles (Rom. 11:13; 2 Cor. 4:1), evangelists (2 Tim. 4:5), or assistants such as Mark (2 Tim. 4:11). Activity in office is the point in Col. 4:17, though whether Archippus is a deacon or not is uncertain.

4. The collection is a diakonía (Rom. 15:31; 2 Cor. 8:1ff.; cf. Acts 11:29-30); it is no incidental matter, but a true act of Christian love.

diákonos.

A. General Uses of diákonos.

1. "Waiter at a meal" (Jn. 2:5, 9).

2. "Servant of a master" (Mt. 22:13). Christians are servants of Christ (Jn. 12:26), but as such must serve one another (Mk. 9:35; Mt. 20:26).

3. Figuratively "servant of a spiritual power" (2 Cor. 11:14-15; Eph. 3:6-7; Gal. 2:17). In Rom. 15:8 the point is that Christ is a servant of Israel. In Gal. 2:17 the idea might be "promoter" (by allowing table fellowship with Gentiles, Christ is extending the realm of lawbreakers), but "servant" is possible if the thought is that of Christ indwelling the believer who is found a sinner.

4. As a diákonos of the gospel, the apostle is a servant of Christ (2 Cor. 11:23) or of God in a special way and with special cares and responsibilities (2 Cor. 6:3ff.). Paul often uses doúlos in this connection (Rom. 1:1 etc.; Tit. 1:1).

5. By his ministry Timothy, too, is a servant of God (1 Th. 3:1ff.) or of Christ (1 Tim. 4:6). Epaphras is a fellow servant (Col. 1:7), and Tychicus a servant in the Lord (Eph. 6:1).

6. Pagan authorities are servants of God appointed to maintain order (Rom. 13:1 ff.).

7. Paul calls himself a diákonos of the church (Col. 1:25) because of his divine commission. He and Apollos are servants of God and the church as they use their gifts to bring people to faith (1 Cor. 3:5).

B. The Deacon as a Church Official.

1. Sometimes diákonos is used for the bearer of a specific office (translated diaconus, not minister, in the Vulgate) (cf. Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:8, 12). In Phil. 1:1 deacons are mentioned along with bishops. It is unlikely that these are two terms for the same people, but we are not told what the offices involve. Deacons are also found alongside bishops in 1 Tim. 3, which tells us that they are to be blameless, temperate, with one wife, ruling their houses well, not double-tongued or avaricious, holding the faith with a clear conscience. That their duties were those of administration and service may be deduced from the title, the qualities demanded, their relation to bishops, and the use of diakonía in the NT. That they took their origin from the Seven of Acts 6 is unlikely in view of the work of the Seven in evangelizing and preaching, but there may be an indirect connection. Two offices perhaps arose on the model of the archisynágōgos and hypērétēs in the synagogue, although these served only in worship, and direction of the synagogue was in the hands of the elders. The terms, unlike the parallel presbýteros, were taken from the Gentile world, being adapted from a mainly secular use to describe developing functions in the churches. In the secular world diákonos could be used to describe such varied people as messengers, stewards, bakers, assistant helmsmen, and even statesmen. The use in the LXX was also secular, as in Prov. 10:4. Josephus, however, calls himself a diákonos of God, and for Epictetus the Cynic is a servant of God. Cultic connections can also be seen on inscriptions, but usually with some reference to the serving of food. In the church this original sense persists, since providing food is a model of practical service and a common meal stands at the heart of worship. Like bishops, deacons emerge fully with the passing of the first apostles, prophets, and teachers (cf. 1 Clem. 42.1ff. and its use of Is. 60:17; also Did. 15.1; Hermas Visions 3.5.1). With the development of a single bishop, deacons become more subordinate to the bishop, and a threefold structure is worked out, with more explicit directions for the work of deacons, and in Rome, e.g., the allocation of seven districts to the seven deacons.

2. An order of deaconesses also arises. Phoebe is a diákonos in Rom. 16:1; the reference is probably to an office, although some see more general service. In 1 Tim. 3:11 we may have either deaconesses or the wives of deacons. Later an order has in fact developed in which widows play a special part, and in some places virgins. This order was never strong in the west, and decayed in the Middle Ages. [H. W. BEYER, II, 81-93]

diakrínō, diákrisis → krínō; diallássō → allássō

dialégomai [to converse], dialogízomai [to ponder, discuss], dialogismós [discussion, doubt] dialégomai. From the basic sense “to converse,” we go to a. “to negotiate,” b. “to address,” c. “to speak.” The LXX uses the word for a. “to speak” (Is. 63:1), and b. “to treat with” (Ex. 6:27) or even “contend with” (Judg. 8:1). In Josephus dialégomai means a. “to discuss,” b. “to make a statement,” and c. “to treat of something.” In Philo it refers either to conversation or to divine or human speech. Discussion is not at issue in the NT, where 1. Heb. 12:25 has in view God’s address, 2. Acts 17:2; 18:4, 19 the public lectures Paul gave, and 3. Mt. 9:34 and Jude 9 disputing—in the former case that of the disciples among themselves, in the latter the dispute between Michael and the devil about the body of Moses.

dialogízomai.

A. dialogízomai in the Greek and Hellenistic World. The following are the main senses: 1. “to balance accounts,” 2. “to ponder,” and 3. “to discuss” (sometimes technically for “to hold a convention” for administrative or judicial purposes).

B. dialogízomai in the NT.

1. The first meaning is “to ponder” (Mark and Luke). The addition en taís kardíais makes this clear in Mk. 2:6. Lk. 3:15; it is unnecessary in Lk. 1:29; 12:17.

2. The second meaning is "to converse, discuss" (e.g., Mk. 8: 16; 11:31; Lk. 20:14). The absence of en taís kardíais shows that this is the probable sense in Lk. 5:21; in v. 22 Jesus traces back the external utterance to the internal source.

dialogismós.

A. dialogismós in the Greek and Hellenistic World. The meanings are 1. "reckoning," 2. "deliberation," with the nuances "thought" and "plan," 3. "discussion," 4. "convention," and 5. "judicial inquiry."

B. dialogismós in the NT.

1. "Evil thoughts" is the predominant sense in the NT (Lk. 2:35; Mk. 7:21; Lk. 9:47; Rom. 1:21). In view of the more flexible LXX use, we see here how deep is the NT conviction that our sinful nature extends to our thinking and our very heart.

2. Sometimes the term denotes "anxious reflection" or "doubt" (Lk. 24:38: torturing doubts; Rom. 14:1: worrying about trifles; Phil. 2:14: murmuring; 1 Tim. 2:8: probably questioning rather than contention).

3. "Discussion" or "argument" is probably the sense in Lk. 9:46.

4. "Bad decisions" rather than deliberations or thoughts fits best in Jms. 2:4. [G. SCHRENK, II, 93-98]

diamartýromai → martyréō*; *dianóēma, diánoia → noéō

[2]

diamartýromai → martyréō; dianóēma, diánoia → noéō

diasporá [dispersion]

A. diasporá outside the NT.

1. Outside the biblical sphere the only use seems to be for the dispersion that we are to leave behind in a movement toward divine harmony.

2. The LXX uses the term for the dispersion of Israel among the Gentiles (Dt. 30:4; Neh. 1:9), or for the people as thus dispersed. There is no technical Hebrew term corresponding to the technical use of the Greek diasporá; such varied expressions occur as leading away, deportation, and exile.

3. The milder Greek term probably developed because passage of time softened the harsh experience, voluntary emigration took place, and the final benefits mitigated the idea of divine judgment (Is. 35:8; Jer. 23:24). Jews are recorded in some 150 places outside Palestine, are enabled to gain new adherents, and thus regain a sense of pride. Only with the loss of a national center after A.D. 70 does the wound of expatriation become more severe again in spite of the attempts of Josephus to gloss over its significance.

4. Philo in his one use of the term seems to be psychologizing the actual situation (as he does Abraham's migration from Ur); he divests the idea of eschatological significance and understands it in an ethical sense.

B. diasporá in the NT.

1. The NT has the customary use in Jn. 7:35, when it is asked whether Jesus will go to the dispersion and teach the Greeks (either Hellenistic Jews or Greeks among whom the Jews of the dispersion reside).

2. In Jms. 1:1 and 1 Pet. 1:1 a question arises whether the authors have in mind Christian Jews, in which case the sense is literal, or Gentile Christians, or Christians in general, in which case it is probably figurative. In Jms. 1:1 the "twelve tribes" are most likely Christians, who are now the people of God with the heavenly Jerusalem as their true home, so that at present they, too, are dispersed among the nations. If this is the reference, the recipients are simply Christians, both Jews and Gentiles. In 1 Pet. 1:1 the nature of the genitive (without article) causes some difficulty; it may be partitive if Jewish Christians are being singled out, or epexegetical or qualitative if the reference is to all Christians. In any case, the deeper meaning is probably theological, as in Jms. 1:1. “Exiles” and “dispersion” are not tautological; the one word looks to the land in which the recipients are strangers, the other to the land which is their true home. [K. L. Schmidt, II, 98-104]

---

[2]Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (119). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

diastolḗ → stéllomai; diastréphō → stréphō; diatagē, diatássō → tássō

diatíthēmi [to control, arrange], diathḗkē [testament, covenant]

diatíthēmi. This word has such varied meanings as “to distribute,” “to establish,” “to dispose,” “to handle,” “to put up for sale,” “to expound,” “to lecture.” The only senses that are important in relation to the NT are a. “to control by free choice,” b. “to make a testamentary disposition,” and c. “to make an arrangement.” The LXX mainly has sense c. but with a clear suggestion of disposing (cf. Gen. 9:17).

1. In the NT we find “to determine,” “appoint” in the eschatological promise of Lk. 22:29. No idea of making a will is present. As the Father by free resolve has ordained a kingdom for Jesus, so by a similar free resolve he has ordained that the disciples should reign with him. Elsewhere the term is used with diathēkē (Acts 3:25; Heb. 8:10) to denote God’s sovereign disposition in salvation history.

2. In Heb. 9:16,17 ho diathémenos means “the testator.” [J. Behm, II, 104-06]

diathḗkē.

A. The OT Term bərîṯ.

1. Equivalents to the LXX diathēkē. The LXX mostly uses diathḗkē (270 times) for Heb. bərîṯ and only occasionally for other words, normally where there is the implication of a legal relationship (cf. “testimony” in Ex. 27:21, or “law” in Josh. 4:16).

2. Etymology and Terminology of bərîṯ Attempts to establish the etymology have been unsuccessful. A connection has been seen with bārâ, “to eat bread with,” but in actual usage no connection with meals can be established. Nor is there much support for a basis in a similar dubiously attested root meaning “to perceive” or “to determine” (1 Sam. 17:8). The Akkadian birītu (“bond”) calls for consideration but has no sure backing. Nor does the usage offer much help. “Cutting” suggests a sacrifice. The covenant may be “with” or “between.” Terms such as “to be in,” “to break,” “to transgress” are common but are too colorless to bring out the local sense, and “to establish,” “to keep,” and “to maintain” show merely that we have something fixed and valid.

3. The Concept of the Covenant in the OT. Two main groups of statements call for discussion, those in which the covenant is between God and humans, and those in which it is between humans. There are also some figurative instances. In view of the two types of covenant, it is tempting to see a distinction between religious and secular covenants, but since the former follow the same legal pattern as the latter, and the latter have sacral assurances, it is better to seek the distinction in the purpose and the resultant nature of the covenants. When humans alone are concerned, the covenant is legally determined; when God is a participant, the legal notion is used to clarify a theological situation. We thus have a legal covenant on the one hand and a theological covenant on the other (although also with a legal aspect). The point of the theological covenant, however, is not merely to bring legal order into religion; to the extent that it does this, it still expresses a genuine insight of faith. Analysis of the covenant leads us to the living basis of OT religion, since it raises the question of our standing with God. The covenant alone, of course, does not answer this question, nor should we use it as a kind of common denominator of Israel’s history. Yet it is a distinctive concept, much used by those who, like Ezekiel, have legal interests, less so by the preexilic prophets. Its prominence is due to its simplicity as a concept which crystallizes decisive historical experiences and preserves the truth in them.

4. The Covenant as a Legal Institution. As regards human covenants, the example of David and Jonathan is instructive. When Jonathan covenanted “with” David, he placed under legal guarantee a spontaneous love which seemed to demand self-commitment for its definitive confirmation. The legal concept thus supports the deep friendship. While simply giving recognition and confirmation to it, it also makes it a legal fellowship with sacral guarantees. It is thus contracted in the presence of Yahweh and with the taking of a mutual oath. Personal exchange precedes it (1 Sam. 18:4), so that David becomes as Jonathan himself. In many instances, of course, the element of affection is less strong and hence the legal aspect is the more prominent. Thus Laban proposes a covenant with Jacob because of the mutual lack of trust (Gen. 31:44ff.). A cairn is built to record the event. An appeal is also made to God as witness or judge. An oath is taken, and relatives are invited to a sacral meal. The following points are important: a. the use of the word "to cut"; b. the divine attestation; c. details of the agreement; d. the oath; e. the sacrifice; and f. the sharing of a common meal. There might be variations in individual cases, but solemn agreements would always follow a similar pattern. The social significance of the covenant is high, since it was in virtue of it that the tribes came together and the monarchy was established. Blood relationship is the first bond, but this is extended by the legal fellowship embodied in the written covenant. Where blood relationship is plain, the legal bond exists already; where it is less plain or absent, an analogous legal relationship is set up by the covenant, which makes the participants brothers and sisters with a totality no less valid than that of blood relationship. Hence no firmer guarantee of peace, security, and loyalty can be established, especially since regard for the covenant is also a religious duty (cf. Am. 1:9). The significance of blood in the ritual may be connected with kinship (cf. Ex. 24:8; Zech. 9:11). The ritual of Gen. 15:8ff. seems to support this. Here Yahweh himself makes covenant with Abraham to allay the latter's insecurity, but the procedure is similar to that which was probably followed in a human covenant (cf. Jer. 34:18b, where the judgment for falsity to the covenant corresponds to the cutting up of the calf in the ceremony). Whether or not sacrifice is involved here may be debated, but in time the ritual is less important; the covenant itself becomes the true heart of the matter as relations become more complex. The covenant with Assyria in Hos. 12:1 represents an international extension which weakens the original significance, since different divine authorities are appealed to and the responsibility of the participants is consequently diminished. The emergence of the covenantal aspect brings to light the fact that usually the participants are not equals; the granting or guaranteeing of security plays an important part, and this means that there is often an initiative on the one side whereby an imposition of will takes place. This is especially important when we come to the theological covenant.

5. The Theological Covenant. This arises when God is one of the participants and not merely a guarantor. Parallels to the OT exist wherever a family relationship with the deity is discerned (cf. a phrase like "Baal of the covenant" in Judg. 8:33, and also the national or social compacts between kings and gods), but nowhere except in the OT does this ordering of the relation between God and his people become a comprehensive system with ultimately universal implications. The concept arises early, for the confederation that was liberated from Egypt seems to have derived its strength from the idea of a theological covenant with Yahweh with its fixed promises and obligations. Such an idea presupposes an actual event whereby God elected Israel, and Israel in return elected God (cf. Ex. 24:8; 34:10; Josh. 24). If in Josh. 24 it is Joshua rather than God who takes the initiative, he does so only because God is already the God of Israel who brought Abraham out of Ur, freed the tribes from Egypt, and gave them the promised land. Israel is thus bound to acknowledge Yahweh. When it does so, a covenant is made "with" the people, the terms are written in a book, and a stone is erected in witness. Since God is king, this covenant has all the poetry of kingship, the theocracy is legally recognized, and yet at the same time, since it is God who is king, the divine initiative and legal obligation have an added force. The transcendent events attending the conclusion of the covenant at Sinai express the added solemnity even though the meal that is held in the divine presence preserves the thought that close fellowship with God is instituted and confirmed. The narrative in Ex. 24 admirably expresses the fact that something new is introduced which runs quite contrary to ordinary religious experience. The basic thought is that God is willing to act to give his people shalom. God gives Israel the assurance that he will be her God if she walks in his ways, and Israel declares that she will be his people, and keep his laws, on the understanding that he will set her high above all nations (Dt. 26:17-18). If a pedagogic element seems to be present here, which almost assumes the parity of the partners, we also find a healthy stress on the knowledge of God that accepts his will and sees that its aim is fellowship, so that God's dealings are not incalculable, and the impulse to approach God is freed from paralysis and referred to the norm of the command. What is echoed here is the experience of Judg. 6:24: The Lord is shalom. This is presupposed even when Hosea transfers the concept to the more emotional sphere of marriage, when Amos questions the privileges of a disobedient Israel, and when Jeremiah (30-31), seeing the danger of clinging to God purely on the ground of legal obligation, looks forward to the new covenant in which the law is written on the heart and its observance is thus self-evident. [G. Quell, II, 106-24]

B. The Greek Term diathḗkē.

1. This word is used in classical and Hellenistic Greek for "order," "institution."

2. It is also a technical term in law for "last will and testament"; in the Hellenistic period the testator has full powers and his orders are binding.

3. Aristophanes uses the term once for "agreement" or "treaty."

4. Dubiously attested is "ordinance" or "disposition," but there are hints that this was a common sense before it narrowed down to "last will and testament."

C. The Transition from bərîṯ to diathḗkē in the LXX and Jewish Literature.

1. In using diathḗkē for bərîṯ the LXX has a covenant or legal compact in view. It seldom uses the real Greek word for "treaty," i.e., synthḗkē. When God is the author of a diathḗkē, a treaty relationship is at issue, but the link with such words as nómos, entolaí, and krímata shows that an "ordinance" is often what is really meant. Even when a treaty relationship is suggested, God's disposing is the dominant factor. This is due in part to the meaning of the Greek word, but also to the fact that the translators see that the Hebrew term itself goes beyond the idea of a contract and conveys the idea of a binding expression of the divine will. To be sure, diathḗkē brings out this element more strongly, so that the new covenant of Jer. 31:31ff. can be conceived of only as a divine gift of grace, a declaration of God's saving will in relation to which Israel can be only a recipient. We thus have a significant development of the Hebrew term even though its essential content is preserved.

2. The apocrypha and pseudepigrapha present a similar picture, relating diathḗkē to the law, using synthḗkē for "treaty," construing the holy covenant as God's revealed will, and finding its content in the promised salvation. Thus a combination of legalism and eschatological hope marks the use of bərîṯ in the Damascus Document.

3. Philo uses synthḗkē for "treaty" and reserves diathḗkē for the divine "disposing." In his allegorizing he imports the Greek sense of "last will and testament," but he realizes that this is not the true sense in the LXX, and the LXX concept of God's gracious will (revealed in history) shines through the enveloping imagery.

4. Rabbinic Judaism maintains the legal side, considers the many covenants, relates the covenant to circumcision, reflects on the blood of the covenant, and in connection with Jer. 31:31ff. stresses the writing of the law on the heart.

D. The NT term diathḗkē.

1. diathḗkē in Paul. Of the 33 NT instances nine are in Paul. (Seventeen of the others are in Hebrews, four in the Synoptics, two in Acts, and one in Revelation.) In Gal. 3:15ff. the legal language shows that Paul is borrowing an illustration from Hellenistic law; as a valid will cannot be contested or altered, so God's original "testament" cannot be changed by the law. The point is not that God's diathḗkē is like a human will, simply that it has the same inviolability. In Rom. 11:27 God's saving disposition in history is obviously the meaning. The covenants of Rom. 9:4 are the declarations of God's will in the OT with their promises and commands. In Eph. 2:12, again, the covenants are covenants of promise. In 2 Cor. 3:6 the new covenant of which Paul is a minister is related to the gospel and marked by the Spirit, so that we are reminded of Jer. 31:31ff. The old covenant, too, is God's. Hence it has its own glory and has been transcended only because its provisional conditions cannot be met. The same comparison occurs in the typology of Gal. 4:24ff.: the slave Hagar represents the Sinai covenant which reduces to bondage, the free Sarah the heavenly covenant which grants liberation. Both are orders in the divine history; they are distinguished only by the different conditions prevailing in them. In Paul, then, the covenant is understood strongly in terms of divine operation and unconditional validity. The one divine will governs salvation history and climaxes in Christ who is both the télos nómou (Rom. 10:4) and the fulfilment of every promise (2 Cor. 1:20).

2. diathḗkē in Hebrews. In Hebrews the situation is much the same as in Paul. With other legal terms, diathḗkē is used by way of illustration in the popular sense of "last will and testament" in 9:16-17. Yet even here the new covenant of which Christ is a mediator bears the distinctive OT sense, for it involves redemption from the sins committed under the first covenant. The idea of a will is introduced only as a comparison to show why the death of Christ is necessary for the fulfilment of the covenant. Obviously the comparison cannot be pressed, and it certainly does not fix the meaning of diathḗkē elsewhere, e.g., in 8:8ff.; 9:15; 12:24. The central concept in Hebrews is that of the new covenant. This replaces the old covenant which was given at Sinai (9:20), was linked to the cultus (9:14), and involved transgressions (9:15). It carries the gifts of salvation whose guarantor is Christ. His blood, then, is the blood of the covenant (10:29; cf. Ex. 24:6). By his heavenly priesthood he fulfils the first and imperfect covenant. The two declarations of God's saving will, in their relationship and distinction, are typologically construed.

3. diathḗkē in the Synoptists. Only Luke (including Acts) uses diathḗkē to any extent. In Lk. 1:72 the context shows that the reference, as in the OT, is to the declaration of God's will in promise, salvation, and self-commitment. The age of salvation means mercy in remembrance of the diathḗkē, and thus testifies to God's rule over time and history. The use in Acts 3:25 is similar; God's saving will is a reality in Jesus. Acts 7:8 bears a reference to circumcision (Gen. 17:10). In Mk. 14:24 (cf. Mt. 26:28; Lk. 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25) Jesus calls the wine at the Lord's Supper the blood of the diathḗkē, or the new diathḗkē in his blood. The point is that the blood, or death, of Jesus establishes the new diathḗkē and the wine represents it. The saying is based on Jer. 31:31ff. (and possibly Is. 42:6; 49:8). There is no idea of a last will and testament. Jesus by his death effects God's saving will. The new covenant is correlative to the kingdom. As the kingdom expresses God's lordship, the covenant expresses the saving will of God that constitutes its goal and insures its validity. In both form and content, then, the NT use of diathḗkē follows the OT use except that we now pass from prophecy to fulfilment. The diathḗkē is God's disposing, the mighty declaration of his will in history, by which he orders the relation between himself and us according to his saving purpose, and which carries with it the authority of the divine ordering. [J. Behm, II, 124-34]

diaphérō → phérō; diaphtheírō, diaphthorá → phtheírō

didáskō [to teach], didáskalos [teacher], nomodidáskalos [teacher of the law], kalodidáskalos [teacher of what is good], pseudodidáskalos [false teacher], didaskalía [teaching], heterodidaskaléō [to teach strange doctrine], didachḗ [teaching], didaktós [taught], didaktikós [able to teach] didáskō.

A. didáskō outside the NT.

1. Common from Homer, this word denotes teaching and learning in the wide sense of imparting theoretical and practical knowledge with the highest possible development of the pupil as the goal. There is little religious use, and the term has a strong intellectual and authoritative bearing. Thus it can also mean "to demonstrate." When used in connection with choral training, it comes almost to have the sense "to perform."

2. It occurs some 100 times in the LXX (mostly for the root lmd). While various kinds of instruction can be meant (cf. 2 Sam. 22:35; Dt. 31:19), God's will is the special object, with a volitional as well as an intellectual reference. God himself, the head of a house, or the righteous may do the teaching. As distinct from secular usage, where the aim is to develop talents, the OT relates teaching to the totality of the person.

3. In later Judaism teaching signifies instruction in the law for the right ordering of the relation to God and neighbor. The secular use may still be found (e.g., teaching a trade), but to give teaching in the law, or even to give a scholarly exegetical opinion, is the predominant sense.

B. didáskō in the NT. Of some 95 instances, almost two thirds are in the Gospels and Acts (and only ten in Paul). The unambiguous meaning is "to teach."

1. The didáskein of Jesus according to the Synoptists.

a. didáskein is one of the main functions of Jesus (Mt. 4:23; 9:35; 11:1). He teaches in the synagogues (Mt. 9:35) and the temple (Mk. 12:35) as well as outside.

b. The form of his teaching is that of a typical teacher of the age. At Nazareth he reads Scripture, seats himself, and expounds the passage (Lk. 4:16ff.). He also sits to teach in Mt. 5:1ff.; Mk. 9:35; Lk. 5:3.

c. The material of Jesus is also traditional. He starts from Scripture in Lk. 4:16ff.; Mt. 5:21ff. Yet he does not stop at the law and opposes casuistic exposition. He aims to order all life in relation to God and neighbor (Mt. 22:37ff.), appeals to the will, and calls for decision for or against God. Like the rabbis, he finds a revelation of God's will in Scripture (cf. Mt. 5:17-18). The main difference lies in his own self-awareness as the Son. It is in virtue of his person that his teaching causes astonishment (Mk. 1:22; Mt. 7:28-29). Thus, while he will not absolutize the law, he follows its true line of teaching by claiming the whole person with a view to education and reformation. In this sense he is the end of the law (Rom. 10:4), and the Gospels can refer to teaching in the absolute when they speak of the teaching ministry of Jesus. While this is the common rabbinic use, it would sound odd to Greek ears. Yet even Luke has it, for the connection with Jesus himself gives his teaching an absolute sense.

d. A novel feature in the Gospels is the absence of the intellectual emphasis which is common everywhere else among Greek writers (classical, postclassical, Hellenistic, and even Jewish Hellenistic), and which develops in rabbinic exegesis in an effort to check the disintegrating force of Hellenism, so that in some circles studying the law can be ranked higher than doing it. In this respect Jesus with his total claim represents what is perhaps a truer fulfilment of the OT concept.

2. didáskein in the Johannine Writings.

a. Many of the passages here follow the same pattern of use as in the Synoptic Gospels. There are, however, some distinctive verses. In Jn. 9:34 the idea that the man born blind might teach them is indignantly rejected by the opponents of Jesus. In Rev. 2:14, 20 the reference is to the teaching of Balaam and Jezebel. Other verses, which need separate treatment, deal with the teaching of God and the Spirit.

b. In Jn. 8:28; 14:26; 1 Jn. 2:27 the use of didáskein suggests the presence of direct inspiration or revelation. No Hellenistic models have been found for this; it is best to understand it in the light of the teaching of Jesus. Thus the idea in Jn. 8:28 is that of the unity of will of the Father and the Son. In 14:26 the disciples are given a share in this as they continue the ministry of Jesus. In 1 Jn 2:27 this teaching by anointing (the Spirit) offers a safeguard against false teachers who also raise total claims. If the meaning in these verses verges on "to reveal," it is because the subject of teaching is Jesus himself. Similarly in Lk. 11:1 didáskein expresses the thought of a readiness for total subjection to the direction of Jesus and is thus parallel to the confession in Mt. 16:13ff. and Jn. 6:60ff.

3. The didáskein of Early Christianity.

a. Even during the life of Jesus, the disciples, too, begin to teach (Mk. 6:30). It becomes part of their commission in Mt. 28:20 as a presupposition of either baptízein or mathēteúein and with Jesus' own didachḗ as its content. In Acts 4 the apostles teach in the name of Jesus (v. 18), proclaiming resurrection (v. 2). If this involves OT interpretation, it culminates in a call to repentance. In outward form, they, too, follow Jewish practice (cf. Acts 5:25). Exegesis and exhortation form the main body of teaching, even at times to the point of instruction in the law (Rom. 2:21; Acts 15:1). In this respect a new beginning has to be made in view of the fulfilment of the law in Jesus (Heb. 5:12).

b. Christian teaching, then, aims primarily to show from Scripture that Jesus is the promised Messiah. In this sense it is "teaching about the Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts 8:31). The combination with kērýssein here gives a comprehensive picture of the apostles' work. They impart facts, but in such a way that one must either accept them or reject Scripture. Opponents, of course, saw here a teaching contrary to Moses and the law (Acts 21:21, 28). The word of God that Paul taught in Acts 18:11 probably has the same sense, not of the general message of salvation, but of the message of salvation on the basis and in the light of OT Scripture.

c. If Paul uses the term didáskein infrequently, this is probably because he worked in circles where the OT was less known. For him, therefore, teaching is the instruction that is given to churches at their founding (2 Th. 2:15; Col. 2:7; Eph. 4:21) so as to strengthen them against Jewish attacks. In Rom. 12:7 the setting is edification and thus the reference is probably to those who give directions for Christian life. In Col. 1:28; 3:16 didáskein occurs with noutheteín in a pastoral and ethical connection. It is used similarly in 1 Tim. 4:11; 6:2; 2 Tim. 2:2; Tit. 1:11 except that now there are official teachers. Tit. 1:11 shows that the link with Scripture is still intact. If Paul does not seem to make the OT a book of ethical instruction, he obviously uses it in his own teaching (cf. Rom. 3:31). But he seeks to base his didáskein primarily on that of Jesus (cf. Gal. 5:14), on his love and self-sacrifice even to the death of the cross (Phil. 2:1ff.). In this way he prevents disruption through the interposition of particular teachers (cf. Mt. 23:8).

didáskalos (→ rhabbí).

A. The Usage and Character of didáskalos among the Greeks.

1. The Usage. This word is attested from the Homeric hymns, the feminine also occurring. It means "instructor" as a. "schoolmaster" or b. "chorus master." Since dramatists often acted as players and directors, it also came to have the sense of "poet."

2. The Character of the Word. The rational and technical element is strong from the outset. The teaching of skills and development of aptitudes is especially included. The word is apposite wherever systematic instruction is given. Thus Philo can apply it to a priest giving instructions about leprosy, and for him God, too, is the teacher of the wise, with a strongly intellectualistic bias.

3. The Consequences of the Character of the Word for the Use of didáskalos. The character of the word enables us to see why Socrates rejects the term, Epictetus adopts it, and the LXX for the most part avoids it.

a. Socrates in Plato Apologia 33ab will not be called a didáskalos because he does not want his statements to be made into a binding system. He does not disparage the intellectual, but aims to carry the person beyond this to moral action. He also seeks to do this for everyone, and thus resists the formation of schools.

b. In contrast Epictetus is proud to be called a didáskalos, for as the teacher of a system he is helping to bring his followers to perfection (Dissertationes 1.9.12).

c. The LXX has didáskalos only in Esth. 6:1 and 2 Macc. 1:10. In Esther the use is the regular Greek one, but in Maccabees Aristobulus is called didáskalos as an expositor of the law, so that the word has a special meaning (parallel to didáskōn) as one who gives direction in the way of God. The general use for paid or official teachers worked against its more widespread adoption in this sense.

B. didáskalos in the NT.

1. The Usage.

a. The term occurs 58 times in the NT. 48 instances are in the Gospels, 41 refer to Jesus (29 in direct address), one to the Baptist, one to Nicodemus, one to the teachers among whom the boy Jesus sat, two to the teacher in relation to the disciple. Elsewhere there are references to didáskaloi as a group in the churches (Acts 13:1; 1 Cor. 12:28-29; Eph. 4:11). The author calls himself a didáskalos in 1 Tim. 2:7,; 2 Tim. 1:11. In Rom. 2:20; 2 Tim. 4:3; Heb. 5:12 the context gives us the sense.

b. The usage shows that when Jesus is addressed as didáskalos, the term, unlike kyrios, does not denote any special respect. The relation between teacher and disciple as set forth in Mt. 10:24-25 is in accord with the usual rabbinic pattern. The teacher here is one who expounds the divine will as laid down in Scripture. When the term is applied to others such as the Baptist or Nicodemus, it consistently means a person who indicates the way of God from the law.

2. Jesus as didáskalos.

a. The addressing of Jesus as didáskalos shows that outwardly he fits the picture of a rabbinic teacher. He teaches as the latter does, and has a similar band of students around him. The parallel use of rhabbí in Jn. 1:38; Mt. 26:25; Jn. 3:2 helps to confirm this. So does the performance by the disciples of many of the duties of disciples, e.g., rowing the boat (Mk. 4:35ff.), handing out food (Mk. 5:37ff.), procuring the donkey (Mk. 11:1ff.), and preparing the Passover (Mt. 26:17ff.). Others, too, honor Jesus as a teacher, e.g., Peter's mother-in-law (Mt. 8:15), Martha (Lk. 10:40), and the ministering women (Lk. 8:3).

b. Jesus, then, does not arouse hostility by his manner or by what he teaches, for even scribal circles recognize that he teaches God's way in truth (Mt. 22:16). To be sure, he has not received official instruction, but he might still have founded a school, debated his opinions, and been widely tolerated. He does not do this, and consequently stirs up violent opposition, because he raises an absolute claim, and does this, not just as a prophet, but in his own name, associating himself directly with God as the responsible bearer of his will who is one with him. He offers himself both as the one who fulfils the law and as the way to its fulfilment (Mt. 5:17, 20).

c. The person of Jesus gives didáskalos a new weight. It stamps him as the new Moses who gives the law a universal sweep. This explains why he can simply be called ho didáskaos (Mt. 26:18), and why the term is not appropriated by the disciple. Acceptance of the rule of Mt. 23:8 is not just a formality. It is a recognition that salvation is only in Jesus, that he is the absolute didáskalos, and that Moses finds himself fulfilled in him (Jn. 5:45-46). If the term plays little part in primitive Christian proclamation, it is because an event (the crucifixion and resurrection) is the central thing rather than a body of teachings.

3. The didáskaloi of the Early Christian Community.

a. The references to Christian didáskaloi in Acts and the epistles are in keeping with Jewish and early Christian usage. Thus in Jms. 3:1, especially if the letter is early or derives from rabbinic Judaism, the meaning is the expositor of the law who makes a right fulfilment possible.

b. In 1 Cor. 12:28-29, Eph. 4:1, and Acts 13:1 didáskaloi are mentioned after or with (apostles and) prophets. Again they are expositors who edify by their clearer understanding. The order is material, not hierarchical. The apostles are giving way to pastors and the evangelists to teachers. Similarly in 1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11 the work of teaching constitutes a part of Paul's apostleship which the teachers will continue.

c. A change takes place in the early church when in Alexandria, e.g., a new intellectualization takes place with the invasion of Greek wisdom and the teacher is the one who represents an intellectual Christianity and gives instruction in it.

nomodidáskalos (→ nomikós). This word, not found in secular Greek, the LXX, Josephus, or Philo, occurs three times in the NT. The scribes are "teachers of the law" in Lk. 5:17; so is Gamaliel in Acts 5:34; the term is then used ironically in 1 Tim. 1:7 for legalists who do not know what the law is all about and hence are not really called to teach it.

kalodidáskalos. Not attested outside the NT, this term occurs only in Tit. 2:3; the older women are to be "teachers of what is good," especially to younger women.

pseudodidáskalos. Not found prior to the NT, this occurs only in 2 Pet. 2:1, with pseudoprophḗtai. The "pseudo-" suggests that both their claim and their teaching are false, as is shown by their rejection of Christ's dominion over their lives.

didaskalía.

A. didaskalía outside the NT.

1. The word is common for “teaching,” “teaching activity,” “rehearsing,” and even “drama”; it has a strongly intellectual character.

2. Philo often has the term for objective teaching.

3. In three instances (Prov. 2:17; Sir. 24:33; 39:8) the LXX uses the word for divine instruction; once in the plural (Is. 29:13) it denotes human teachings that have no claim to absoluteness. (In Prov. 2:17 the LXX misreads the Hebrew.)

B. didaskalía in the NT.

1. The plural occurs in Mt. 15:9; Mk. 7:7 when Jesus quotes Is. 29:13 against the Pharisees and scribes. Col. 2:22 and 1 Tim. 4:1 also use the plural for other than divine teachings (i.e., human or demonic).

2. The singular occurs when God’s revealed will lies behind the teaching. Thus “teaching” (the activity) serves the community in Rom. 12:7. Scripture was written for our “instruction,” according to Rom. 15:4. The point in Eph. 4:14 is that we must be on guard against every variable wind which claims to be teaching, and hence to be God’s will. Doctrine here is not the individual error as such.

3. didaskalía is common in the Pastorals (15 of the 21 NT instances). The relation to God’s historical revelation (attested in Scripture and fulfilled in Christ) is plain in 1 Tim. 4:13; 2 Tim. 3:16 (possibly Tit. 2:10). “Sound doctrine” in 1 Tim. 1:10 etc. also means the teaching that relates to God’s saving acts and thus leads to salvation. “Good doctrine” in 1 Tim. 4:6 has the same sense but with a greater stress on content and practical effect. In general didaskalía is not a suitable word in Judaism and the NT, since the didáskalos has no didaskalía of his own. But it fits well in the Pastorals, where the readers tend to reject the didáskalos for false teachers and thus to reject the didáskalia which he is commissioned to proclaim and from which he cannot be separated.

4. In the early church the word comes to mean the “sum of teaching” which has come down from the apostles. The kerygma thus tends to ossify into dogma.

heterodidaskaléō. This word, which implies a heterodidáskalos (cf. Gal. 1:9), occurs only in 1 Tim. 1:3; 6:3 with reference to those who disseminate a different teaching, making peripheral matters the main issue (1:4ff.) and with a Judaizing stress on the law (v. 7).

didachḗ. This word means “teaching,” “instruction” as a fact. Its only LXX use is in the title of Ps. 60. In the NT it refers to the whole didáskein of Jesus in Mt. 7:28 etc., i.e., his proclaiming God’s will in both form and content. This is also the meaning in Jn. 7:16-17. The same applies when the didachē of the Pharisees and Sadducees is at issue in Mt. 16:12, of the apostles in Acts 5:28, of those who taught the Roman church in Rom. 6:17; 16:17, and of Paul in 1 Cor. 14:6. 2 Jn. 9-10 follows the same pattern, as does Revelation when speaking of the didachē of Balaam, the Nicolaitans, and Jezebel in 2:14, 15, 24. In Heb. 6:2, however, didachē means an established and formulated doctrine, and in 13:4 (plural) specific errors against which a warning is issued. The post-apostolic fathers build on this sense, but in the main the NT stress is on God’s teaching through Jesus and the apostles, with a consequent enhancing of the Christian sense of mission in its teaching ministry.

didaktós. This word has three senses: a. “taught,” b. “learned,” and c. “teachable.” It is used in the absolute in Jn. 6:45 (quoting Is. 54:13): “taught by God.” In 1 Cor. 2:13 the repeated didaktós (not taught by human wisdom but taught by the Spirit) shows that Paul relates his distinctiveness to the source of his teaching.

didaktikós. Outside the NT, this term occurs only in Philo with reference to the learning of Abraham. In 1 Tim. 3:2; 2 Tim. 2:24 it is one of the requirements in a bishop. At a time when false teachers are arising, they must be “able to teach.” [K. H. Rengstorf, H, 135-65]

dídōmi [to give], dṓron [gift], dōréomai [to give], dṓrēma [gift], dōreá [gift], dōreán [in vain], apodídōmi [to give back], antapodídōmi [to repay], antapódosis [retribution], antapódoma [repayment], paradídōmi [to hand over], paradosis [tradition]

dídōmi. Since love is depicted as a gift in the NT, dídōmi is a common term, especially in John. Jesus is what he is by God's gift. God gives him his works (5:36), disciples (6:37), name (17:11), all things (3:35). Jesus himself gives his life (Mk. 10:45), himself (Gal. 1:4), his body (Lk. 22:19).

dōron, dōréomai, dṓrēma, dōreá. Philo regards this group as more lofty than dóma, dósis, but while the latter are rare in the NT, the distinction is fluid; cf. dóma for the divine gift in Eph. 4:8. dṓron is used for human gifts (Mt. 2:11), sacrifices (Mt. 5:33), money gifts (Lk. 21:1), and God's gifts (Eph. 2:8). dōréomai means,"to give" (cf. Mk. 15:45; 2 Pet. 1:3). dṓrēma means "what is given" and describes God's gifts in Rom. 5:16; Jms. 1:17. dōreá also means "gift" but with a legal nuance. It denotes God's gifts in the NT, e.g., the Spirit in Acts 2:38; 8:20, etc.; Heb. 6:4, or more generally the gifts of God or Christ in Rom. 5:15; 2 Cor. 9:15; Eph. 3:7, but always with an implication of grace.

dōreán. "In vain.", The basic sense is "for nothing" (Mt. 10:8; Rom. 3:24; 2 Cor. 11:7; 2 Th. 3:8; Rev. 21:6). Other meanings are "without cause" (Jn. 15:25) and "to no effect" (Gal. 2:21).

apodídomi.

1.a. "To give or do something in fulfilment of an obligation or expectation," e.g., Mt. 20:8 (reward), 21:41 (fruits), Mk. 12:17 (taxes), Mt. 27:58 (Jesus' body), Heb. 12:11 (fruit). b. "To repay as reward or punishment": divine retribution in Mt. 6:4; Rom. 2:6; Rev. 22:12; human retribution in 1 Tim. 5:4. c. "To give back what has been received or kept" (Lk. 4:20 etc.). d. "To sell" (Acts 5:8; 7:9; Heb. 12:16.

2. The thought of divine retribution in the NT sets us impressively under threat and promise. This retribution is future and carries the promise of love and forgiveness as well as judgment. It brings out the personal nature of the relation with God. We do not do good for good's sake but out of love of God and in recognition that we are his. It thus belongs to our very being to be subject to retribution. It is love that posits a creature that is under retribution. Only because of sin does retribution work against us. But since the root is in love, forgiveness is not incompatible with retribution. How God conjoins the two is the secret of his majesty, with which faith enjoys fellowship, but only in subjection to its holiness.

antapodídōmi, antapódosis, antapódoma. The antí- here strengthens the idea of recompense (cf. rendering thanks in 1 Th. 3:9, repaying love in Lk. 14:14, divine repayment in Rom. 12:19; Heb. 10:30). The derived noun antapódosis denotes the final divine retribution in Col. 3:24, while antapódoma is used for God's repayment in the quotation in Rom. 11:9.

paradídomi.

1. This word is common in the passion story for the handing over of Jesus, e.g., by Judas in Mk. 14:10, by the Sanhedrin to Pilate in Mk. 15:1, by Pilate to the people's will in Lk. 23:25 and to the soldiers for execution in Mk. 15:15. There are parallels in other trials (cf. Mt. 10:17; Acts 12:4).

2. The word has a similar sense in the formula "to hand over to Satan" in 1 Cor. 5:5; 1 Tim. 1:20. Paul probably adopted this phrase; the idea that Satan executes divine judgment is in accord with Jewish belief.

3. The term also occurs for God's judgment on sinners in Rom. 1:24ff.; Acts 7:42; cf. Eph. 4:19.

4. "To give up one's spirit, body, or self" (Jn. 19:30; 1 Cor. 13:3; Gal. 2:20; cf. Rom. 8:32; 4:25) expresses willingness to die, or sacrificial love. The apostles are also "given up to death" (2 Cor. 4:11), though this is never said of Jesus.

5. In Mt. 11:27; Lk. 10:22 the word expresses the authoritative position of Jesus as Messiah or Son of God. All things (not just knowledge) are delivered to him by the Father; recognition of this is what is hidden from the wise and revealed to babes. Conversely, Christ hands back the kingdom to the Father according to 1 Cor. 15:24.

6. paradoúnai is a technical term when the object is teaching, e.g., tradition in Acts 6:14 (cf. Mk. 7:13), Christian tradition in Rom. 6:17; 1 Cor. 11:2, the holy commandments in 2 Pet. 2:21, the faith in Jude 3, the matter of the gospel in Lk. 1:2, the commands of the council in Acts 16:4. This paradoúnai is oral.

7. The sense "to commend to" occurs in Acts 14:26 (grace) and 1 Pet. 2:23 (the Judge).

parádosis.

1. This word for "tradition" means "what is transmitted" rather than "transmission" in the NT. It has an unfavorable sense when used of the tradition that is added to the law, e.g., that of the elders in Mk. 7:3, 5, or of men in Mk. 7:8. Jesus rejects the validity of additions to the divine law. The use is more comprehensive in Gal. 1:14, embracing written as well as unwritten traditions.

2. Christian teaching is also tradition in 1 Cor. 11:2; 2 Th. 2:15. It must be adhered to by the churches (1 Cor. 15:2). To be valid it must be handed down (1 Cor. 15:3) and must derive from the Lord (11:23), i.e., it must have divine authority. One may see from 1 Cor. 15:3ff. and 11:23ff. that it is older than Paul and is already acquiring a fixed form in his day. [F. Büschel, II, 166-73]

diermēneutḗs, -neúō, -neía → hermēneúō

díkē [justice], díkaios [just, righteous], dikaiosýnē [justification, righteousness], dikaióō [to justify], dikaíōma [regulation], dikaíōsis [justification], dikaiokrisía [righteous judgment]

The Concept of Law in the OT. This concept influenced all social relationships so strongly that it affected theological reflection on the fellowship between God and man. Law is the basis of the OT view of God, and the religious use of legal concepts helps in turn to ethicize the law. Many terms are used to express the relations between God and man, and the conduct governed by these relations.

1. The richness of the Hebrew usage is well expressed by the díkē group, especially dikaiosýnē and díkaios. (For the relevant Hebrew terms, the statistical distribution, and the equivalents, see TDNT, II, 174-75.)

2. It is a basic tenet in the OT that God posits law and is bound to it. Recognition of this is a unifying factor in Israel's faith. All law comes from God, and hence God's authority extends to all Israel's historical relationships. God's law is an order of life that cannot be changed or challenged. It is righteous because he is righteous. His ways are right; they thus give us life and security. He is a righteous ruler and judge, as shown already in the victory celebrated in Judg. 5:11. His righteousness extends to other nations, so that order is seen in the world. The righteous can thus appeal to him with confidence when they are the victims of hostility and oppression (Ps. 5:8).

3. God's righteousness is not just static but dynamic. He establishes as righteous those who seek his righteousness. The righteous, then, are those who show fidelity to God's command (Hab. 2:4) and whom God vindicates against their enemies. This vindication may not be synonymous with success. Misfortunes suggest at times that God's judgment means condemnation. Refuge must then be sought in God. But even from this place of refuge a sense of right may be discerned in God (Ps. 62:7ff.). The torment of doubting God's righteousness constitutes the grief of Job. We have to be able to take God's right for granted in his dealings with us, even if it must sometimes be projected into a higher sphere than that of human understanding. [G. Quell, II, 174-78]

díkē.

A. The Idea of Law in the Classical and Hellenlstic Greek World. Law, religious, political, and ethical, forms the basis and center of Greek thought and society. The starting point is the goddess Dikē. This goddess then becomes the divine, universal, and triumphant principle of law in Solon. With Theognis righteousness transcends mere justice and comprehends all political and ethical norms. The etymology of díkē, while much debated, seems to support this broader usage. The root means "to give direction," "to indicate," "to posit," "to establish." Hence díkē itself has the sense both of indicating and of what is indicated or established. We thus have the following development. 1. What is established becomes a state or manner, so that díkē means a. what is customary, b. what is proper, and c. what has to be. 2. Legally, what is established is what is laid down by law as a. law, b. legal case or plea or decision, and c. punishment.

B. díkē in the NT. Apart from the variant in Acts 25:15, díkē occurs only three times in the NT, always for punishment. It is retributive justice (even perhaps Dikē) in Acts 28:4, and eternal judgment in 2 Th. 1:9 and Jude 7.

díkaios.

A. díkaios in the Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. General Usage and Meaning. Linked with díkē, díkaios suggests a. conforming to custom, b. fulfilling obligations, and c. observing legal norms. There is also d. an ethical use whereby díkaios, having significance for the whole of life, relates to the four cardinal virtues. The use here is static; even in Plato it ultimately refers to inner order. In Josephus díkaios means virtuous (with a hint of faithfulness to the law). In Philo the righteous have achieved a healing righteousness and are the true prop of the human race. Both Josephus and Philo use díkaios to describe the OT saints, and they can both say (Josephus less frequently) that God himself is díkaios. In the further development of the concept e. comparatives and superlatives become common. The word is also often used f. to describe things as “good,” “right,” “legal,” or “exact,” “correct” (weights etc.), and even “fertile” (the earth). g. We also find a neuter use tó díkaion or tá díkaia for “what is lawful or right” (e.g., what is due, or retribution, or duty). Along these lines the term may characterize OT law, or law in general, or natural law. h. díkaios may be used with several verbs in such phrases as speaking or doing what is right. i. díkaión estin is a common phrase for “it is right, or fitting, or meritorious.”

2. díkaios in the LXX. While the usage here is similar to that elsewhere, OT motifs also exercise a strong influence. The díkaios is the person who fulfils obligations to God and the theocratic society. We have a righteous cause before God only as we meet the demands of God. In the background, God himself is righteous; he is consistent in himself and unswervingly faithful to his covenant promises. He does not merely dispense justice as the righteous God; he also grants salvation (Ps. 116:5).

B. The Righteous in the Synagogue.

1. The Righteous. A distinction is made here between the righteous and the ungodly which serves the concept of rewards and counts on human ability to keep the law. The righteous are those whose merits outweigh their faults. A more detailed division lists those who keep the law fully, those who do more bad than good, those who do equal good and bad, and finally the penitent. The patriarchs are put in the first class, and many teachers are listed among the righteous. The prayers of the righteous turn God’s thoughts from severity to mercy.

2. The Messiah as the Righteous. The Messiah is righteous because his whole nature and action conform to God’s will. He is often called “our righteousness.” Applied to him are Jer. 23:5; 33:15; Zech. 9:9, and only later Is. 53:11b. The messianic age will be an age of righteousness (Eth. En. 38:2). Revelation in the coming time of salvation will be particularly for the righteous.

C. díkaios in the NT. NT use draws on the OT and differs sharply from the Greek use (based on the idea of virtue) except in customary or traditional modes of expression which are not closely connected in any case with the Greek conception.

1. Greek and Hellenistic Contacts. When Pilate’s wife calls Jesus díkaios in Mt. 27:19, she probably means no more than “innocent” or “morally righteous.” The same applies to Pilate’s saying in Mt. 27:4, that of the centurion in Lk. 23:47, and Herod’s saying in Mk. 6:20. Formally Paul echoes Greek terminology in Phil. 4:8 but obviously he has in mind action in accordance with God’s will. The same is true in Tit. 2:12. Everyday usage may be found in 2 Pet. 1:13; Lk. 12:57; Mt. 20:4; Phil. 1:7, but added depth is given by “in the sight of God” in Acts 4:19 (cf. 2 Th. 1:6).

2. The Dependence on the OT and Its Supersession.

a. In content the NT draws largely on the OT. Thus God is díkaios in his judgments (cf. Rev. 16:5; 1 Pet. 2:23; Jn. 17:25). Hence his law is also just (Rom. 7:12). But his justice is shown above all in the atoning death of Jesus (Rom. 3:26). God is thus righteous as he who both judges and saves (cf. also 1 Jn. 1:9). This thought rests on the OT but with Christ's sacrifice as the new factor.

b. When applied to Christ as Messiah, díkaios refers first to his fulfilment of God's will (Acts 3:13-14; 7:52). But again his innocent death is supremely in view (cf. Mt. 27:4; cf. Acts 22:14). The vicarious nature of this death ("the just for the unjust") comes out in 1 Pet. 3:18 (cf. 1 Jn. 2:1). Yet those who belong to this righteous one must themselves do right (1 Jn. 2:29). Seeking only God's will, he pronounces just judgment, not going only by appearance (Jn. 5:30; 7:24; cf. 2 Tim. 4:8).

c. díkaios can be used for the patriarchs (Mt. 23:35), the OT saints (2 Pet. 2:7), and the prophets (Mt. 13:17); cf. the innocent blood of the martyrs (Mt. 23:35). Fidelity to the law is often at issue, but with a stress on the relationship with God in the parents of the Baptist (Lk. 1:6), Simeon (Lk. 2:25), and Cornelius (Acts 10:22). Joseph deals righteously with Mary in Mt. 1:19. The NT adopts the distinction between the díkaios and hamartōlós (or ádikos) but gives it an ironical twist, since all are called to conversion, and while righteous zeal finds recognition (cf. Rom. 5:7), there is a stern rejection of mere appearance or complacency (Mt. 23:28; Lk. 20:20; 18:9). There will be a resurrection of the just (Lk. 14:14), but the context shows that love constitutes the díkaios.

d. díkaios sometimes denotes the disciple as a person who truly keeps the law or does God's will. One who receives the righteous receives the reward of the righteous (Mt. 10:41). The díkaioi will be separated from the ponēroí (Mt. 13:49). The díkaioi at the last judgment are those who have practiced love (Mt. 25:37). James has disciples in mind when he says that the righteous are oppressed by the rich (5:6) and that their prayers have great power (5:16). What is said about the OT saints is similarly transferred to Christians in 1 Pet. 3:12; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 22:11. It is Paul who tells us how they become díkaioi.

e. Paul can accept the distinction between the righteous and the wicked. The díkaios is one who as a doer of the law will be vindicated by God's sentence (Rom. 2:13). On the other hand, no one is righteous by doing the law, for all are under sin (3:10). One becomes díkaios by receiving God's dikaiosýnē as the power and salvation of God. This reception is by faith. In support Paul adduces Hab. 2:4 (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11). Only the díkaios will attain to life; but life can be attained only by faith, hence the díkaios is the one who is justified by faith. Rom. 5:19 looks ahead to the judgment, when sinners will be presented or made righteous by God's sentence. In 1 Th. 2:10, however, present conduct is the theme; we are righteous as we act according to divine law. In 1 Tim. 1:9, in contrast to a false use of the law, Christians are díkaioi because they use their freedom in a way that comports with the divine norm. The bishop must be díkaios (Tit. 1:8) in the same sense, unless the point is that he should reach just decisions.

dikaiosýnē.

A. Secular and General Religious Usage.

1. dikaiosýnē in Greek Ethics. Words with -sýnē develop with abstract thought, and dikaiosýnē, closely related to the Greek sense of law, occurs commonly as a virtue. It denotes a. the civic virtue of observance of law and fulfilment of duty, b. virtue as such, c. one of the cardinal virtues, and d., in mysticism, the power of virtue with which the initiate is invested.

2. The Legal View of the Term. The idea in law is that of distributive justice, i.e., allotting what is due.

3. dikaiosýnē in Josephus and Philo.

a. Josephus has the term for divine justice and human virtue (as a part of piety).

b. Philo speaks of the righteousness of God in the sense of his revelation when he inquires into what is right. He has a highly developed ethical conception in which dikaiosýnē is the chief cardinal virtue which originates in the soul when its three parts achieve harmony, and whose work is healing, peace, and joy. It is meritorious, although in the last resort God himself gives it.

B. Righteousness in the LXX.

1. The Righteousness of God. How far does dikaiosýnē do justice to the Hebrew concept of ṣeḏeq with its strong legal and covenantal component? In the later chapters of Isaiah the idea of a legal dispute is present; God intervenes judicially for the oppressed, so that salvation is closely linked with righteousness. God's righteousness in his judicial reign means that in covenant faithfulness he saves his people. On the whole the LXX expresses this well with its use of dikaiosýnē, while also relating it to divine judgment.

2. The Righteousness of Man. The meaning here is observance of God's will (Is. 5:7). There is a close link with truth, e.g., in Wis. 5:6.

C. Righteonsness in the Synagogue.

1. The Righteousness of God. The rabbis do not speak about God's righteousness along the lines of Rom. 3:21. (Dt. 33:21 is construed differently.) The Messiah is called righteousness with a connotation of mercy.

2. Righteousness as Human Action. For the rabbis this is especially almsgiving or benevolence, which is one of the most meritorious of works.

3. The Basis of the Rabbinic View. The underlying idea, discernible in the LXX, is that every observance of the law is meritorious. Standing before God depends on whether the good or bad predominates. Alms and works of charity are especially helpful. The last judgment decides whether merit or transgression is greater.

4. The Relation of the Justice of God to His Mercy. In Psalms of Solomon, Jubilees, and the like God's righteousness and mercy are related. God may exercise unexpected mercy in virtue of his righteousness. The rabbis, too, state that the measure of mercy is greater than that of strict justice. Righteousness, then, is thought of as mercy. As mercy is better than legal rigidity even in human justice, so it is with God. Yet uncertainty remains when divine justice and mercy are balanced against one another, for in the first instance the two are sharply contrasted.

D. dikaiosýnē in the Non-Pauline writings of the NT.

1. dikaiosýnē as Just Judgment and Rule. The word can sometimes denote God's just judgment at Christ's return (Acts 17:31; Rev. 19:11; cf. Mk. 16). In 2 Pet. 1:1 it has the sense of God's just rule in guiding the community. The justice of rulers is the point in Heb. 11:33. An odd use is in Heb. 5:13, which seems to indicate that a child cannot understand correct speech.

2. dikaiosýnē as Right Conduct before God. Except in Paul's formula dikaiosýnē theoú, the main use is for right conduct that accords with God's will and is pleasing to him. The fact that the relation to God is in view brings this into line with OT thinking.

a. Matthew. This is the consistent usage in Matthew. Jesus is baptized so as to do what is right with God (3:15). The hungering and thirsting of 5:6 is for a right state before God. Yet this righteousness is God's gift (6:33). It is to be sought with his kingdom. It brings persecution (5:10). It includes the practice of piety (6:1). The way in which the Baptist came is that of right conduct (21:32).

b. Luke. The word has the same sense in Luke. Holiness and righteousness are conjoined in the messianic expectation of 1:75. In Acts God seeks and recognizes uprightness, i.e., what is pleasing to him, even among pagans (13:10; 24:25), although this doing of righteousness does not avail to salvation.

c. Peter. The picture is similar here. Forgiveness is the presupposition of a life of uprightness (2:24). Suffering comes for the sake of this (3:14). Noah represents it (2 Pet. 2:5). The libertines leave the way of righteousness (2:21), but the new world will be governed by it (3:13).

d. Hebrews. The same applies here. Christ's exaltation rewards his righteousness in 1:9. Melchizedek is devoted to righteousness in 7:2 (and thus typifies Christ). Noah inherits righteousness, i.e., an acceptable life as the fruit of faith, in 11:7. Conformity to God's will results from training, according to 12:11.

e. John. The main difference in John is a more consistent christological understanding; all righteousness is linked to Christ the díkaios (cf. Jn. 16:8, 10). Doing right in 1 Jn. 2:29 demonstrates what Christ embodies as díkaios. Its main content is love for one another (3:10). Thus, as Matthew finds in righteousness a gift of God, and Peter bases it on forgiveness, John finds it to be possible only through commitment to Christ.

3. dikaiosýnē in James. In Jms. 1:20 the righteousness of God is right conduct that is given its distinctive form by God. Life in agreement with God's will is viewed as a fruit in 3:18. How we can be righteous before God is dealt with in 2:23-24. The concern here is to combat a dead orthodoxy that divides faith and works. The works that justify are not legalistic observances but the works of loving obedience that Paul calls the fruit of the Spirit. Abraham was justified by a faith which found fulfilment in works. If Paul could hardly have stated the matter in this way, we have to remember that this formulation is more popular in character, and that the practical concern, namely, that the only valid faith is one that produces works, is very much in line with the total proclamation of the NT, including that of Paul himself.

E. dikaiosýnē in Paul.

1. Origin and Presupposition of the Pauline Message of Justification. Legal righteousness forms the starting point. The law is a law of righteousness because it demands righteousness (Rom. 9:30). Those who do righteousness live by it (10:5). But this is impossible except for the relative blamelessness of Phil. 3:6. dikaiosýnē cannot be achieved by way of law (Gal. 2:21). Salvation is by divine mercy, not in virtue of deeds that we have done in righteousness (Tit. 3:5). In the struggle to understand this, which leads him into conflict with a legalistic Judaism, Paul comes to a new and comprehensive concept of the righteousness of God which offers a new insight into the relation of the law and Christ. The roots are to be found in the OT teaching concerning the judgment of God, the sinful bondage of humanity, the collapse of synagogue piety, and the dependence on God's gracious intervention in Christ if there are to be righteous people who enter into true fellowship with God.

2. The Meaning of the Pauline Use of dikaiosýnē theoú and the Main Elements in the Doctrine of Justification. As used by Paul, the theoú in the term dikaiosýnē theoú is a subjective genitive. This is God's righteousness, into which we are set. It is a conjunction of judgment and grace which God demonstrates by showing righteousness, imparting it as forgiveness, and drawing us into his kingdom, as the last judgment will fully manifest.

a. The Whole of Humanity. This righteousness of God is not just an individual experience; it is a universal happening in Christ on behalf of the whole race.

b. The Divine Action. It is not just an attribute but shows God at work with an efficacy no less than that of his wrath (cf. 1:17; 3:5, 17, 25-26).

c. The Center in the Cross. It is in the cross that the saving action takes place. But the resurrection is closely associated with the crucifixion, so that justification is not just a declaration, but has a historical core. For this reason Christ may be called our dikaiosýnē (1 Cor. 1:30; cf. Rom. 10:4).

d. God Both Is and Demonstrates Righteousness. God is righteous (Rom. 3:25), but his righteousness is an expression of grace that also displays his justice in the concrete form of an act of atonement (Gal. 3:13; 2 Cor. 5:21; Rom. 8:3). Thus justice and grace are actively united for all time and at the deepest level. This means that antinomian laxity is excluded, for forgiveness is an act of judgment which expresses God's uncompromising No to sin. God's righteousness is judicial and gracious at the same time in the one act of salvation in Christ.

e. Forensic Justification. God's righteousness means justification. Righteousness is forensically ascribed to believers. God's judgment achieves this by remission. The justification is no mere "as if," for God's sentence is sovereign. Nor is it the attainment of moral rectitude. The justified are "right" before God. The forensic element, of course, is only a figure, for we are not in the sphere of human justice, but are dealing with the divine Judge who is also unlimited King. We have thus to transpose the legal aspect into the divine key. An act of grace replaces ordinary legal procedure. But this grace, as the legal concept shows, is not capricious. It conforms to true right. The image of God as Judge is tenable inasmuch as human law does to some extent express imperishable divine norms. But it must be understood in terms of the divine act that strictly finds no human parallel.

f. The Relationship to the Term áphesis, the dōreá Now Imparted, and the State of Justification. Paul sometimes uses words like aphiénai or katallássein (Rom. 4:7; 5:9-10), but he uses dikaiosýnē to show that forgiveness has its basis in the divine right. dikaiosýnē is also given and imparted now (Rom. 3:24-25; 5:1; 8:30; 9:30; 1 Cor. 6:11), so that it is God's action as radical deliverance. It is dōreá both imparted and received (Rom. 5:17). This imparting governs the whole life of faith; hence one can call justification a state (Phil. 3:9). At the same time, God's righteousness is always that which he displays as well as that which he imparts. Multiplicity in the use of the phrase is justified because the righteousness is always finally and exclusively God's.

g. dikaiosýnē and pístis. We are drawn into this righteousness by faith. This is the individual side, though it is not individualistic, for individuals become members of the body, and everything depends on the objective divine act. Thus believers are justified when they are washed and receive the Spirit (1 Cor. 6:11), yet not magically (1 Cor. 1:17), for dikaiosýnē precedes the sacrament (Rom. 4:11). God's pardoning dikaiosýnē issues an authoritative summons which does not make the divine act dependent on the human response but which means that the divine objectivity of salvation is that of a saving relationship, so that "by faith" is used adverbially to define it (Rom. 3:21; cf. 3:26-27). This faith, of course, is not itself to be set in isolation as a psychological force or a virtue or a meritorious work. It is related to its object and is a gift of divine grace, so that logízesthai ("to reckon") implies the very opposite of merit.

h. dikaiosýnē as the Object of Hope. Present salvation also implies future salvation. Justification is here already, declared in history and grasped in faith as a present reality. Yet its promise transcends time, so that here and now it has an interim character. Faith, then, involves a hope that looks forward confidently to the final sentence but also impels to resolute action. dikaiosýnē is an object of hope in Gal. 5:5, and the verb dikaióō is often in the future tense (cf. Gal. 2:16; Rom. 3:20; 5:19), or carries a reference to the last judgment (Rom. 5:19; cf. also 10:4ff.). For Paul a last judgment by works does not contradict justification by faith. Judgment has for him a radical depth as the essential background of justification. He can thus preserve a tension between solid confidence and false security. Justification brings us up against the full seriousness of God as this is expressed at the cross. The absolute norms attested by the last judgment both give the cross its validity and impel us to obedience, thus offering full protection against any antinomian perversion.

i. Justification and Mysticism. Justification and the pneúma are closely linked in 1 Cor. 6:11; Rom. 10:8-9; Gal. 5:5; cf. also Gal. 3:2, 5 and Rom. 3:28. Justifying faith is also closely linked with union with Christ (Gal. 2:16ff.; cf. 2 Cor. 5:21), where in virtue of Christ's vicarious work we are God's righteousness "in him." Justification, however, safeguards us against any idea of mystical union with God. The expressions are figurative, like the legal phrases; the linking of legal and mystical phraseology shows us that only pneumatology can fulfil the work of justification.

j. dikaiosýnē as the Power of the New Life. God's justifying action is not quietistic. It leads to the rule of grace (Rom. 5:12ff.), which is the rule of righteousness. Believers are drawn into the movement of God's righteous rule. This is a movement toward eternal life, so that dikaiosýnē and life are interwoven (Rom. 5:17, 21). Through the Spirit, our spirits are alive on account of righteousness (Rom. 8:10-11). For Paul the process of salvation is not a closed one. There is an obedience that leads to righteousness (Rom. 6:16). The pardoning righteousness that is given commits us to righteousness as a living power that breaks the bondage of sin. Hence, while righteousness is not a state or quality, it becomes right action in Rom. 6:16; cf. 2 Cor. 6:7, 14, the fruit of righteousness in Phil. 1:11, righteousness as the substance of the fruit of light in Eph. 5:9, the breastplate of righteousness in Eph. 6:14, training in righteousness in 2 Tim. 3:16, and the crown of righteousness in 2 Tim. 4:8. Justification means subjection to the living power of the creative divine righteousness.

k. The Relation of dikaiosýnē to aretē in Pauline Writings. The Hellenistic concept of virtue does not occur in the NT, but with the stress on éthos as opposed to gnōsis the Pastorals bring out the element of truth in it when they list dikaiosýnē with such exercises as faith, love, peace, and patience (cf. 1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:22). Faith and love, however, show the difference of content.

dikaióō.

A. dikaióō in Greek and Hellenistic writings (including Josephus and Philo).

1. A first meaning (from Pindar) is "to validate," "to establish as right."

2. We then find the more general meaning "to regard as right," with such nuances as "to judge," "to grant," "to agree," "to desire," "to demand."

3. Another sense is "to treat someone rightly," "to secure justice for someone," either negatively as in "to pass sentence," "to condemn or punish," "to pass sentence of death," or positively as in "to represent someone's cause."

4. In mysticism, we find the sense "to become sinless."

B. dikaióō in the LXX, Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, and the Synagogue. In the LXX the use is forensic but mostly in the positive sense "to pronounce righteous," "to vindicate." Thus we find 1. "to acquit," "to prove innocent," "to champion someone's cause," and occasionally "to make pure." We also find 2. a use for divine or human vindication. Intransitively in the passive the meaning in Gen. 44:16 is 3. "to justify oneself." (For details see TDNT, II, 212-14.)

C. dikaióō in the NT. In general we almost always find a legal connection here. 1. An unusual meaning in Rev. 22:11 is "to exercise righteousness."

2. Divine vindication is a common reference (Lk. 7:29; Mt. 11:19; Rom. 3:4; 1 Tim. 3:16).

3. "To justify oneself" occurs in Lk. 10:29 (a weaker application) and Lk. 16:15.

4. "Acquitted" or "declared righteous" is the meaning in Lk. 18:4, and with a clear reference to the last judgment in Mt. 12:37.

5. In Paul we first find a. a legal use. The wicked are justified by faith on the basis of God's gracious action in Christ. This justifying is a saving acquittal which takes place in the present. It has the objectivity of relationship, enacted at the cross and apprehended in faith. The sense in Gal. 2:16-17 is that of being righteous in God's eyes. The idea of judgment is always present, but dikaioún is a present act of grace through Christ. Yet Paul's use of the term b. also makes a contribution to the question of experience (cf. Gal. 3:8, 11; Rom. 3:24). Once-for-all justification at the cross and personal justification in faith go together. Justification is a finished work of grace, yet the term "by faith" (cf. Gal. 2:16; 3:8, 11) shows that it is also a continuing present, so that we cannot sever the objective act and subjective apprehension. As regards the last judgment, Paul relates dikaioún c. to a sentence that is passed in our favor on the whole of our life's work (cf. 1 Cor. 4:4). Whether or not this is always meant when the future is used is by no means certain. The reference is undoubtedly to the last judgment in Rom. 2:13, but in context the point here is that no one can stand before God as the righteous Judge. Rom. 5:19 probably has an eschatological reference, but here the divine justification enacted at the cross and known as a continuing gift will be consummated in definitive acquittal (cf. Rom. 8:24, 33). With apó, d., the verb has the sense of liberation from, as in Acts 13:38-39 (where forensic justification is again the issue). Paul has this usage in Rom. 6:7: crucifixion with Christ means liberation from sin. The basis here is the rabbinic idea of expiation through death. This shows how closely Paul links justification and atonement. The new feature is that this liberating death is that of identification with Christ in his vicarious death.

6. dikaióō in James. James speaks three times about being justified by works. The reference is to present justification. Abraham is a righteous man whose works are recognized. This is not said in polemic against Paulinism but in order to stress that true faith is not idle but active (Jms. 2:21ff.).

dikaíōma.

A. dikaíōma outside the NT. This term has such varied (legal) senses as a. “ground or claim,” b. “written proof,” “document,” “validation,” c. “decree,” “statute,” “ordinance,” d. “sentence,” “punishment,” and e. “right action” (sometimes as “restitution”).

B. dikaíōma in the NT.

1. The most common sense in the NT is “statute,” “ordinance,” especially the divine ordinances in Lk. 1:6; Rom. 2:26; Heb. 9:1 (cultic regulations), or God’s moral decree in Rom. 1:32, or the whole law of God in Rom. 8:4.

2. The word is then used for a “right action” in fulfilment of a legal requirement.

a. With reference to Christ it occurs in this sense in Rom. 5:18 (materially cf. Phil. 2:8). The idea that the meaning here is “sentence of justification” (as in v. 16) hardly meets the parallelism and would entail a subjectivizing of dikaíōsis zōḗs.

b. The reference in Rev. 15:4 is to God: his “righteous acts” (or judgments).

c. The “righteous deeds” of the saints are meant in Rev. 19:8.

3. What is at issue in Rom. 5:16 is the “sentence of justification” (katákrima being the opposite). Paul can easily change the sense in v. 18, and thus show that Christ’s righteous life underlies our justification, because of the different antonym.

dikaíōsis.

A. dikaíōsis in Greek Generally. This rare word denotes the validation of the legal norm by punishment, defense, or demand, or it may denote the execution of personal preference. We thus find it for a. “punishment,” b. “vindication,” c. “demand,” d. “arbitrary judgment,” and e. “statute.”

B. dikaíōsis in the NT. In Rom. 4:25 it has the sense of justification by divine acquittal. The second diá here denotes the goal. The point is not that the resurrection is needed to actualize justification. For Paul Christ’s crucifixion and resurrection are indissolubly united, so that the parallelism of the statement corresponds to the parallelism of the matter. The death is on account of our sins, the resurrection with a view to our justification. In Rom. 5:18 the sentence of justification is again at issue. It is once more related to life as its goal. This life begins here and now, but carries a forward look to the consummation (just as sin will finally result in condemnation).

dikaiokrisía. This rare and late term denotes “righteous judgment,” whether as a quality or with reference to the last judgment. In the NT it occurs only in Rom. 2:5, where it refers very definitely to the day of wrath when God, in contrast to those who do the evils they condemn, will judge righteously. 2 Th. 1:5 has dikaías kríseōs as two words. That God’s judgment is righteous will be revealed in that the persecuted will be granted rest but their persecutors will receive appropriate retribution. [G. Schrenk, II, 178-225]

diórthōsis → orthós; dikostasía → aphístēmi

dichotoméō [to cut in two]

In Mt. 24:51 the reference is obviously to punishment. Behind the term, which means “to cleave,” is the ancient penalty of cutting in two with the sword or saw. [H. Schlier, II, 225-26]

dipsáō [to be thirsty, long for], dípsos [thirst, longing]

1. Literally “thirsting.” “I thirst” in Jn. 19:28 realistically depicts Jesus’ desire for refreshment on the cross. We are to help the thirsty (Rom. 12:20). The apostles suffer thirst (1 Cor. 4:11). In heaven there will be no more thirst (Rev. 7:16).

2. Figuratively “passionate longing for a spiritual good” (Mt. 5:6), especially salvation (Jn. 7:37). This longing is met in Christ (Jn. 4:14; 6:35).

The idea that giving drink to the thirsty is an act that is pleasing to God is common in the ancient Near East. For a figurative use in the OT cf. Am. 8:11; Ps. 42:2. [J. Behm, II, 226-27]

Additional Note: dipsáō and cognates in the LXX.

1. The LXX formulates the idea of yearning for salvation. The typology of God's supply of water in the desert (a thirsty land) is important here.

2. Thirst as a figure for the longing for salvation also occurs in Is. 41:18 etc. with a transition to the idea of eating and drinking in God's kingdom (Lk. 22:30).

3. Thirst also depicts the torments of the damned (cf. Lk. 16:24) on the basis of the idea that thirst, and death from it, is a divine punishment. [G. Bertram, II, 227-29]

dípsychos → psychḗ

diṓkō [to impel, follow zealously]

1. "To impel" as a. "to set in motion" (intransitive "to ride," "march," "row," or, generally, "hasten") and b. "to persecute," "expel," in the papyri "to accuse," common in the Psalms for religious persecution. In the NT we find 1.a. in Lk. 17:23: "Do not run after them," and Phil. 3:12: "I hasten toward the goal." But 1.b. is more common for religious persecution (e.g., Mt. 10:23; 23:34; Jn. 5:16; Acts 7:52). Persecution is a test (Mt. 5:44) and a privilege (Mt. 5:10 etc.).

2. "To follow zealously" as a. "to attach oneself to a person" or b. "to pursue or promote a cause." Only 2.b. occurs in the NT. In Rom. 9:30-31 the Jews, unlike the Gentiles, pursue righteousness. Elsewhere Christians are to pursue righteousness (1 Tim. 6:11), the good (1 Th. 5:15), peace (1 Pet. 3:11), love (1 Cor. 14:1), and hospitality (Rom. 12:13). [A. Oepke, II, 229-30]

dógma [decree doctrine] dogmatízō [to decree]

The basic meaning is "what seems to be right": a. "opinion," b. "principle," c. "resolution," d. "decree," and e. "the law." The verb means "to affirm an opinion," "to establish a decree," "to publish an edict."

1. In the NT sense d. occurs in Lk. 2:1; Acts 17:7; Heb. 11:23.

2. In Col. 2:14 the reference might be to the new edict of God but in 2:20 we definitely have legal ordinances (sense e.), so that the real point in 2:14 is that Christ has canceled these. Eph. 2:15 carries a similar reference to the ordinances of the law.

3. In Acts 16:4 the term is used for the resolutions of the apostolic council. The apostolic fathers then adopt the term for the teachings of Jesus. [G. Kittel, II, 230-32]

dokéō [to believe, seem], dóxa [glory], doxázō [to glorify], syndoxázō [to share in glory], éndoxos [glorious], endoxázō [to be glorified], parádoxos [wonderful, contrary to belief]

The problem with this group in the LXX and NT is that dokéō retains the Greek sense but the noun takes on a specific religious sense shared by the verb doxázō.

dokéō.

1. The first sense is "to believe," "to think."

2. We then find "to appear," "to have the appearance" (Acts 17:18) (cf. "it seems to me," as in Lk. 1:3; Acts 15:22ff.). dokeín is contrasted with eínai in Greek thought.

3. A further sense is "to count for something," "to be of repute" (cf. Mk. 10:42; Gal. 2:2, 6b—perhaps here a slogan of Paul's opponents).

dóxa.

A. The Greek Use of dóxa.

1. This means "opinion" as a. what I think, and b. what others think of me. As a. it may imply expectation or be a philosophical opinion or tenet, though it can also be a mere conjecture. As b. it usually denotes good standing or reputation, although an unfavorable adjective may change this. Dóxa as a name has sometimes been linked with light or radiance (cf. the LXX and NT), but it most likely signifies one who stands in good repute.

2. In Josephus and Philo the word has the senses a. "opinion or tenet," b. "honor or glory," c. "splendor," and d. "divine radiance."

B. The NT Use of dóxa, I. Here sense a. (“opinion”) has disappeared. Sense b. (“repute”) occurs, as in Lk. 14:10; 1 Cor. 11:15; 1 Th. 2:6. Sense c. (“splendor”) may be found in Mt. 4:8; 6:29; Rev. 21:24; cf. 1 Pet. 1:24; 1 Cor. 15:40-41. We also find the meaning “reflection” or “image” in 1 Cor. 11:7. [G. Kittel, II, 232-37]

C. kāḇôḏ in the OT.

1. The Hebrew term kāḇôḏ has the root sense of something weighty which gives importance, e.g., wealth (Gen. 13:2; 31:1) or honor (Gen. 45:13).

2. In relation to God it denotes that which makes God impressive. Since God is invisible, it necessarily carries a reference to his self-manifestation.

a. This may be in natural phenomena (cf. Ps. 97:1ff.; Ezek. 1:1ff.; Ps. 29). Yet God cannot be equated with these as though he were, e.g., the God of thunder and every thunderstorm manifested his glory.

b. Ps. 19 makes it plain that God’s kāḇôḏ belongs to the higher regions of heaven. Yet if God dwells in heaven, he comes down to the tent of meeting. Thus in Ex. 40:34ff. a cloud covers the tent and God’s kāḇôḏ fills its interior as a kind of radiant substance from which emanates the fire that consumes the sacrifice. In Ex. 24:15ff. God’s kāḇôḏ is also like a devouring fire (on the mountain), and Moses’ face is radiant after speaking with God.

c. Ezekiel has personal visions of the divine kāḇôḏ in which it is accompanied by the cherubim, rides on a throne, has human shape, bears very strongly the character of light, and both leaves the first temple and returns to the second.

d. In some passages the kāḇôḏ of God has the more general sense of “honor,” as in Pss. 24:8; 138:5; 66:2. Often God’s glory is linked to his name or there is a demand to give God the glory that is his due, i.e., to recognize the import of his deity. God will not give his glory to another. God’s glory is also a theme of hope, as in Pss. 72:19; 57:5, 11; Is. 66:18-19. In this regard God’s glory is connected with his act of salvation (Is. 40:3ff.). In this act God will be glory for Israel (Zech. 2:8-9) and Israel will be to God’s glory (Is. 43:7). [G. von Rad, II, 238-42]

D. dóxa in the LXX and Hellenistic Apocrypha. In this area dóxa is a common word. It represents 25 Hebrew terms, but predominantly kāḇôḏ. It becomes identical with kāḇôḏ and hence does not bear the ordinary senses of dóxa in secular Greek usage.

a. In the OT the only possible instance of “opinion” is in Eccl. 10:1. In the apocrypha the only examples, apart from Sir. 8:14, are in 4 Maccabees.

b. “Honor” or “reputation” is also rare in the OT; indeed, it is used less in this sense than kāḇôḏ. The few instances are in Proverbs (cf. also Wisdom, Sirach, Maccabees).

c. We find some instances of the meaning “splendor” (which merges into “honor” as in Is. 17:4) and the use of dóxa for other Hebrew words for God’s power (cf. Is. 30:30; 40:26). The glory of God’s majesty is a well-known refrain in Is. 2:10, 19, 21; cf. also Ex. 33:22; Ps. 102:15.

d. The primary sense, then, is the divine glory which comes to expression in God’s acts in creation and history. dóxa is the divine nature in its invisibility or its perceptible manifestation, as at the giving of the law, or in the tent or temple. God is the God or King of glory (Pss. 24:7ff.; 29:3). To give him glory is not to impart something he does not have but to acknowledge the honor that is his due (Is. 42). A term that was initially subjective (“opinion”) is thus adapted to express something that is absolutely objective, the reality of God.

e. In the apocrypha, LXX usage is followed except for a slight regression in favor of the sense of human honor or magnificence (as in Proverbs).

E. kāḇôḏ in Palestinian Judaism.

1. The Targums translate kāḇôḏ by yəqārā’, and often have it to avoid anthropomorphisms.

2. kāḇôḏ is important in rabbinic Judaism for either human or divine honor. God recognizes true human honor. In God’s case, his glory is his nature. Moses has a share of this, and imparts a lesser share to Joshua.

The glory that God grants to rulers or to those who fear him is no more than power or dignity. Yet the first man had a part in God's glory, and if this was lost at the fall, its restoration is the goal of salvation history (cf. expositions of Dan. 12:3). The Messiah in particular will be invested with God's glory and will restore the radiance lost with the fall. On the other hand, eternal bliss is more commonly depicted as contemplation of the divine glory than participation in it.

3. These various ideas are all particularly strong in apocalyptic: alienation from God's glory, the manifestation of this glory at the judgment, the bliss of contemplating it, the seating of the Messiah on the throne of glory, and the final glory of the righteous.

F. The NT Use of dóxa, II.

1. dóxa as the Divine Mode of Being. While the term can denote "reputation" or "power," its main use in the NT is shaped by the OT; it thus becomes a biblical term rather than a Greek one. While individual nuances may embrace divine honor, splendor, power, or radiance, what is always expressed is the divine mode of being, although with varying stress on the element of visible manifestation (cf. Lk. 2:9; 9:31-32; Acts 22:11; Rev. 15:8; 21:23). In the NT again, giving God glory means acknowledging (Acts 12:23) or extolling (Lk. 2:14) what is already a reality. NT doxologies, then, presuppose an estin (Gal. 1:5; 1 Pet. 4:11). A peculiarity in John is the almost naive juxtaposition of the use for God's glory and a use for the honor or praise that may be given either by men or God (12:41, 43).

2. The dóxa of Jesus. The NT takes a decisive step by relating dóxa to Christ in the same way as to God. dóxa then reflects all the dynamism of the relation of God and Christ. Thus Christ is raised by the glory of the Father (Rom. 6:4). He is taken up into glory (1 Tim. 3:16). He is at the right hand of glory (Acts 7:55). Glory is ascribed to him as to God (cf. Lk. 2:14 and Heb. 13:21). He is the Lord of glory (1 Cor. 2:8; Jms. 2:1). The eschatological hope (cf. Is. 40:5) is the appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ (Tit. 2:13). Most of these references are to the risen Christ, but the revelation of glory at his birth points already to his coming from above (Lk. 2:9). In John, faith also sees the glory of the incarnate Christ (1:14; 2:11; 11:40). This dóxa of Christ is not visible in itself. He has to be glorified (Jn. 7:39; cf. 12:23; 13:31; 16:14; the prayer in 17:1, 5). The entry into glory is at the cross (13:31), where God's dóxa is acknowledged, but there is also participation in it. It is in the light of the passion that believers, by the Spirit, see Christ's glory.

3. The Believer and dóxa. In the OT the stress lies on seeing the divine dóxa (Lev. 9:6; Is. 6:1; 35:2). For the rabbis, too, eternal felicity is contemplation of God's glory. In the NT, however, the emphasis shifts to participation. The righteous will shine, as in Dan. 12:3 (Mt. 13:43). The body is transformed in the resurrection into a body of glory (Phil. 3:21). We are glorified together with Christ (Rom. 8:17; Col. 1:27; 3:4). This is part of the parallelism of Christ's resurrection and ours. Participation in dóxa is by participation in Christ. Eternal glory is the goal of our calling (1 Pet. 5:10). In this sinful aeon we fall short of God's glory (Rom. 3:23). But glory is to be revealed to us, and we are to enjoy the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. 8:18, 21). What is sown in dishonor is raised in glory (1 Cor. 15:43). Yet the future glory has its roots in the divine purpose and action, so that we may be said to be already glorified (Rom. 8:29-30; 1 Cor. 2:7). The Spirit is the pledge of the new thing that brings glory (cf. Eph. 3:16; 1 Pet. 4:14). This is especially clear in 2 Cor. 3:7ff., which a. contrasts the glory of Moses with the new and greater glory of Christ and b. shows how, beholding the glory of the Lord, believers are changed from glory to glory. The movement here is from present glory to an eschatological consummation of glory. It is effected by the ministry of the gospel as this gives the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (4:6). Along the same lines, Jn. 17 says that the disciples will see the glory of Christ (v. 24), that he is glorified in them (v. 10), and that he gives to them the glory the Father has given to him (v. 22).

4. The dóxa of the Angels. As the cherubim bear the divine glory in Ezek. 9:3 etc., and Judaism ascribes glory to the angels, so Heb. 9:5 refers to the cherubim of glory, Rev. 18:1 mentions the glory of the angel, and Jude 8 and 2 Pet. 2:10 call the angelic powers dóxai ("glorious ones").

G. Hellenistic Gnosticism. The magical papyri and similar writings also use dóxa in a special way for "power" or "radiance." That there is a connection between this and biblical usage is most probable, but the later dating of these texts suggests that they depend on Jewish influence (probably in Egypt) rather than vice versa. The same applies to Mandaean and Manichean works. If some Iranian influence may be detected in the whole usage, it will have to be sought in the distinctive OT use of kāḇôḏ, which is the unquestionable source of the NT view of dóxa.

doxázō, syndoxázō. The verb shares the linguistic history of the noun. Outside the Bible it means a. "to have an opinion," "to believe," "to suspect," and b. "to praise," "to value," "to honor." Sense a. does not occur in the LXX, but sense b. is common. The same applies in the NT, where "to honor" occurs in Mt. 5:16; 6:2. But the verb then has the special biblical sense "to give or have a share in the divine glory" (cf. Rom. 8:17, 30; 2 Cor. 3:10; Jn. 17).

éndoxos, endoxázomai. In secular Greek éndoxos means a. "according to the customary opinion," a sense which does not occur in the Greek Bible, and b. "honored," "renowned," "magnificent," in which it is used in different ways for honorable people, the glories of Jerusalem, the wonderful acts of God, praise of God, the name of God, and God himself. The verb endoxázomai, which is peculiar to the Bible, can refer to human distinction but denotes mainly the magnifying of God's majesty either in those who serve him or in his acts of retribution (Is. 49:3; Ex. 14:4). In the NT the adjective always has the common sense of "honorable" or "magnificent" or "glorious" (clothing in Lk. 7:25; the works of Jesus in Lk. 13:17; the Corinthians in 1 Cor. 4:10; the church in Eph. 5:27). The verb occurs in the NT only in 2 Th. 1, which adapts OT formulas to Christ when it says in v. 10 that Christ will be glorified in his saints and entreats in v. 12 that the name of the Lord Jesus may be glorified in them.

parádoxos. This word, which is common in secular Greek for "an unusual event contrary to belief or expectation," occurs in the NT only in Lk. 5:26, in the ordinary sense, to denote the unusual element in the works done by Jesus. [G. Kittel, II, 242-55]

dókimos [tested, precious], adókimos [inauthentic], dokimḗ [testing], dokímion [tested], dokimázō [to test], apodokimázō [to reject], dokimasía [testing]

From the stem word dokḗ ("watching"), dókimos means "tested," and thus a. "reliable," and b. "esteemed," "valuable" (whether persons or things). adókimos is the opposite, used of persons. The rare dokimḗ means "testing." dokímion has the sense of "tested," "genuine," dokimázein means "to test," apodokimázein "to throw out in the test," and dokimasía "testing." The NT gives the group a special application in view of the situation of Christians. Set between salvation on the one side and judgment on the other, they seek attestation.

1. Human life stands under a divine testing which climaxes in the judgment (1 Cor. 3:13; Jms. 1:12). The judgment, however, gathers up the divine testing in history (1 Th. 2:4). The background of this view of testing is to be found in the OT, the last judgment in, e.g., Jer. 11:20, present testing in, e.g., Pss. 17:3; 26:2.

2. The future judgment and the present divine scrutiny fashion a corresponding mode of life. a. Attestation is an urgent question in 1 and 2 Corinthians. The Corinthians do not find in Paul the proof of power that they seek (2 Cor. 13:3). He reminds them that what counts is not human but divine commendation (2 Cor. 10:18). This gives added point to the question of attestation. b. Attestation will be manifested in affliction, i.e., the pressure put on the church in this period when it does not yet see salvation and is exposed to assault from secular and demonic powers. Suffering produces endurance, endurance dokimḗ, and dokimḗ hope (Rom. 5:3-4). The Macedonians remain joyous and generous in a severe dokimḗ of affliction (2 Cor. 8:2). Cf. also Jms. 1:2-3; 1 Pet. 1:6-7: in the former tó dokímion is probably "testing," while in the latter it has the more likely sense of "genuineness," but the thought is essentially the same in both. The testing sifts out the dókimoi (1 Cor. 11:19), i.e., authentic believers who shun factions, glorify God by obedience (2 Cor. 9:13), attest their love in the collection (2 Cor. 8:8), and, even though the apostle himself may seem to have failed, meet the test themselves by doing good (2 Cor. 13:5ff.). c. The presupposition here is that only believers can meet the test of judgment. Apart from Christ, people are given up to a mind that is adókimos (Rom. 1:28), i.e., to an outlook which, since they themselves did not see fit to acknowledge God (edokímasan), is unattested or inauthentic.

3. Set under God's searching eye, Christians come under the twofold testing denoted by the verb dokimázein. a. They must learn the will of God by testing (cf. Rom. 12:2; Eph. 5:9-10; Phil. 1:10; 1 Th. 5:21). This protects them from caprice and brings them seriously under God's will for their lives. In the same way they are to test the spirits (1 Jn. 4:1). b. At the same time, they are to test themselves (2 Cor. 13:5). In particular, the disorderly Corinthians are to examine themselves when they come to the Lord's table (1 Cor. 11:28). c. Jesus also demands that his followers should test the times, reproaching the people because they can interpret material phenomena but not detect the signs of God's direction of history (Lk. 12:56).

4. In Mt. 21:42 and parallels, quoting Ps. 118:22, Jesus describes himself as the "rejected" stone which has become the head of the corner (cf. 1 Pet. 2:4, 7). We are now exposed to human testing, but what finally counts is the divine test. [W. Grundmann, II, 255-60]

doúlos [slave], sýndoulos [fellow slave], doúlē [female slave], douleúō [to be a slave], douleía [slavery], doulóō [to enslave], katadoulóō [to enslave], doulagōgéō [to enslave], ophthalmodoulía [eye-service] doúlos, sýndoulos, doúlē, douleúō, douleía. All these words have to do with slavery. In distinction from parallel groups, they denote compulsory service. oikétēs comes closest, but it stresses the social position of the slave, while doúlos stresses dependence on the lord.

A. The Word Group among the Greeks.

1. Greeks have a strong sense of freedom. Personal dignity consists of freedom. There is thus a violent aversion to bondage. Service may be rendered to the state, but by free choice. Slavery is scorned and rejected. This explains the fierceness with which the Greeks fought for political independence. The only slavery Plato will allow is to the laws. The laws, however, represent the goal of humanity, so that slavery to law is in no way derogatory. Aristotle shows a similar scorn for slavery; for him slaves have no part in the state or true service to it. The Stoics have a broader view of service. Zeus himself summons us to it, so that, while free in relation to all people, we are unconditionally bound to all. Yet the Stoic would never call himself the doúlos theoú; he moves through the world as basileús and despótēs, the very opposite of the doúlos. This is the characteristic of the wise. Those who are not wise are slaves, no matter what the form of their bondage (cf. Epictetus, Plutarch, and Philo).

2. This survey shows that the group has no religious significance for the Greeks. It acquires this as Near Eastern religions win new adherents and in so doing change the Greek view of God and our relationship to him. The only apparent exceptions are in Euripides, but these are special instances, e.g., the need to yield to Dionysus, or Orestes' evasion of responsibility by claiming that he is enslaved to the gods. In Greek religion the relationship to the gods is in general a family relationship in which Zeus is father of both gods and humans. Kneeling is no part of religious ceremonial for the Greeks except before chthonic deities, and here only for the sake of proximity. The worshipper is phílos rather than doúlos, so that it makes no sense to describe service of the gods, or life under the eyes of the gods, as douleía.

B. The Word Group on Jewish Soil. In the Greek Bible, however, the group very largely crowds out the various parallels. The reason lies in its use for the root ʻbd.

1. The relation to this root shows that doúlos emphatically denotes the slave and the status of slavery. Thus país is used for this root when the normal relationship of a slave is at issue, but doúlos when the thought is that of the illegality and unreason of the service. The group then denotes Israel's bondage in Egypt (Ex. 13:3; 14:5; Lev. 26:45, etc.). Jacob accepts the state of a doúlos with Laban (Gen. 29:18). When one people falls subject to another, douleúein is the proper word to describe it (Judg. 3:8; 1 Sam. 17:9). In contrast, país is the proper word in Is. 53 (The Servant of the Lord), since this service is rendered on the basis of an essential relation in the household.

2. Since the group denotes restrictive service, it is the proper term for the relation of ruler and subjects, for it expresses both the power demanded on the one side and the subjection and bondage experienced on the other. Saul's courtiers are his doúloi in 1 Sam. 18:5, Joab is David's doúlos in 2 Sam. 14:9-10, and the whole people douleúei the king in 1 Kgs. 12:7 (where Rehoboam himself is advised to be a doúlos to the people in order the more surely to win their douleía). An interesting point is that while subordinates use the terms about themselves, rulers do not describe the relationship by the group. An element of decision, whether voluntary or compulsory, is thus assumed.

3. The climax of development is reached when the group comes to be used for the relationship to God. This also involves the sharpest antithesis to Greek and Hellenistic thought. douleúein in the LXX is the most common term for the service of God, not just in isolated acts, but in total commitment. The group may also be used for service of Baalim or other gods (Judg. 10:6, 13), but the only right thing for the elect people is exclusive service of the Lord (Judg. 10:16; Ps. 2:11, etc.). For this reason doúloi is a title of honor when conferred on such outstanding figures as Moses (Josh. 14:7), Joshua (Judg. 2:8) Abraham (Ps. 105:42) David (Ps. 89:3), and Jacob (representing Israel, Is. 48:20). The opposite of douleúein is disobedience.

4. The Jewish world shares this view of divine service with other Near Eastern peoples, among all of whom the concept of God is one of absolute majesty and supremacy. The uniqueness of Israel is that its whole history is a revelation of God's total claim on the people and on each of its members in virtue of a special status. If the mystery religions also have a concept of slavery to the gods, this is entered into only by the appropriate rituals. Philo adopts the OT view except that for him the use is figurative, the self-sufficiency of God is stressed, and exaltation through the service of God becomes an important factor; the opposite of this service is dependence on creation and a corresponding lack of any spiritual relationship.

C. The Word Group in the NT.

1. Secular Usage.

a. Apart from some instances in the parables, in which the use is hardly a strict one, the word occurs in the ordinary sense only when the position of slaves is at issue, e.g., in Col. 3:22ff.; Eph. 6:8-9. The usage here falls wholly within the contemporary social framework. In the parables this is also true, but the total commitment of doúloi and the total claim of the kýrios serve here to illustrate the unconditional lordship of God and the unconditional responsibility of believers to him. Thus if slaves have two masters, as might happen, they cannot show the same commitment to both. Similarly, one cannot be a true doúlos of God without throwing off mammon (Mt. 6:24).

b. While the NT offers the typical picture of the doúlos, it does not hint at scorn or disparagement. It differs in this regard not only from the Greek world but also from Judaism, which tends to accept the lower social, cultic, and ethical status of slaves, to put slaves wholly under the control of their masters, and to regard the term "slave" as a deadly insult.

c. Slaves, then, are fully integrated into the community. If they have the chance of freedom, they are to take it (1 Cor. 7:21). But in any case they come with all believers under the common law of love which in the long run, if applied, necessarily means the end of slavery among Christians. If there is no campaign to abolish slavery, this is not due to otherworldiness, or a situation of eschatological tension, but rather to the fact that redemption, like sin, takes place within existing social structures, so that the first priority is not to change the structures but to achieve a life which is conformable to that of Jesus. Such a life will in due time break down the structures, because the fellowship of a common participation in Christ relativizes social distinctions. Thus Paul points out that Philemon and Onesimus are now brothers (v. 16). He also stresses that the relation to God takes precedence over the mutual relations of slaves and masters (Eph. 6:5ff.; Col. 3:22ff.; 1 Tim. 6:1; Tit. 2:9). Christians lie under this obligation even when their masters (or slaves) are not believers. The overriding freedom of faith that this expresses bears a superficial resemblance to the Stoic's independence of external circumstances, but differs from it in three ways: a. there is no sense of superiority; b. it rests on an act which makes slave and master brothers; and c. this act is the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ for both.

2. Christians as doúloi of God and Christ.

a. The formula doúlos theoú is rare in the NT; Christians are mostly called the doúloi of Christ. Where used, as in Lk. 1:38 (doúlē); Acts 2:18; Revelation (cf. 10:7; 15:3), it usually has an OT basis. This applies in Acts 16:17 and probably also in 1 Pet. 2:16, since Christians are thought of here as the Israel of God. Jms. 1:1 and Tit. 1:1 are perhaps adopting a prophetic designation rather than describing absolute commitment to God, since in the usage of Judaism the phrase normally covers only outstanding figures (apart from the whole people). doúlos theoú becomes more popular in the early church with the development of the idea that the church is the true Israel and a desire to distinguish between Christ as Son and believers as servants, but ideas of merit tend to arise as the phrase comes to denote specially dedicated people.

b. More common is the belief that Christians are the doúloi of Christ; Paul in particular represents this conviction. They are already doúloi of a sort prior to conversion, i.e., doúloi to sin etc. (Rom. 6:6ff., 19; Gal. 4:3, 8, 9), and even to the law (Rom. 7:1ff.). The meaning is that they have totally lost their freedom and are dominated by these forces. Jesus by his saving work rescues them from this douleía in a work of liberation (Gal. 3:13; 4:4-5). They thus achieve the freedom of sonship (Gal. 4:5ff.; Rom. 8:15, 23). But sonship does not mean autonomy; it means a new relationship with God. The result is a new service. With his work of redemption Christ has made believers his own possession and now gives them the goals that shape their lives. This new commitment, which is a commitment to righteousness (Rom. 6:19), holiness (1 Th. 3:13), and newness of life (Rom. 6:4), finds expression in the description of Christians as Christ's doúloi (1 Cor. 7:22; Eph. 6:6). This entails confession of what Christ has done and acceptance of its practical consequences. It is also a recognition of the freedom which can come only with commitment to Christ, so that there is no contradiction when John speaks of the freedom which the Son brings (Jn. 8:34ff.), or when he has Jesus say that he calls his disciples, not doúloi, but friends, for these are friends who do what he commands them (Jn. 15:14-15).

c. The phrase doúlos Christoú has a special position when used as a designation, e.g., in the salutations of Paul, James, Jude, and Peter, and also in relation to Epaphras in Col. 4:12. The basis, of course, is the common commitment to Christ, so that the writers, being integrated into the community in subordination to the claim of Christ, cannot seek to dominate it. Yet in this context the term also suggests a specific office (cf. Jms. 1:1; Gal. 1:10) which carries with it the authority of the master himself. In Paul's case (and cf. 2 Pet. 1:1), doúlos Iēsoú Christoú runs parallel to apóstolos Iēsoú Christoú; the latter describes the outward relation, the former the inner relation which underlies it.

3. Jesus Christ as doúlos.

a. When Jesus washes his disciples' feet, he shows that it is his office, too, to serve, not to seek power or glory, for washing the feet is a servile duty (Jn. 13:1ff.). He also shows, of course, what will be the point of the disciples' own lives as his apostles, for a doúlos is not greater than his kýrios, nor an apóstolos than the one who sends him (Jn. 13:16). Paul gives this lesson a more general application when he tells the Galatians that, just because they are called to freedom, they are to serve (douleúein) one another in love (Gal. 5:13).

b. In Phil. 2:7 Jesus is said to take the form of a doúlos. The phrase stands in contrast to the form of God in v. 6 and the title kýrios in v. 11. It thus shows what the incarnation means for Christ in relation to his inherent glory. It represents the low point on his way of kénōsis (cf. Jn. 13:1ff.). There is no necessary allusion to Is. 53 (where país theoú would be the accepted rendering of the Hebrew). Nor do the terms humility (v. 3) and obedience (v. 8) fully encompass what is involved, for being a doúlos involves a new situation (not just an attitude) which is inconceivably different from the prior situation and which carries with it subjection to the death of the cross (v. 8). Paul's exhortation in vv. 1-5 is thus given a kerygmatic basis in vv. 6ff. This servant form is, of course, the scandal of the gospel, but in God's wisdom it is also its glory (vv. 9-11).

doulóō, katadoulóō. These terms are common from Herodotus and occur in the LXX in the sense "to enslave" both literally and figuratively. Except in Acts 7:6 (quoting Gen. 15:13), the NT use is always figurative. Not "bound" in marriage is the point in 1 Cor. 7:15. A definition of slavery is offered in 2 Pet. 2:19: What overcomes us, enslaves us. Though free, Paul has voluntarily forgone his rights for his work's sake in 1 Cor. 9:9. Commitment to God (or his opponents) is at issue in Rom. 6:18 and Gal. 4:3. Judaizers are trying to enslave believers to their legalistic code in 2 Cor. 11:20. In contrast to being enslaved, Christians are freed by Christ to be responsible doúloi of God.

doulagōgéō. This rare word means "to cause to live the life of a slave." Paul uses it in 1 Cor. 9:27 to show that he subordinates his sṓma to his office and will not allow it to be a hindrance to him in discharging this office.

ophthalmodoulía. Not found outside the NT, this term refers in Eph. 6:6 to a douleía of slaves which is outwardly satisfactory but does not express an inner obligation for the sake of God and Christ, so that the eyes of the master are deceived. It also occurs in the plural in Col. 3:22 for the actions that make up this deceitful service. [K. H. Rengstorf, H, 261-80]

dochḗ → déchomai

drákōn [dragon, serpent]

drákōn means "serpent," "dragon," or "sea-monster," and is used for Satan in Rev. 12:3 etc. Serpents were commonly regarded as demonic in ancient mythology. They represented the power of chaos as that which opposes God at the beginning or end of things. In the Greek world serpents were also sacred animals. Revelation, however, does not simply appropriate ancient myth. The drákōn is the key image for Satan throughout the book, and there is a link with the story of the serpent in Gen. 3. Note: The Greek OT sometimes uses drákōn in passages which owe their imagery to the myth of a contest between God and the dragon of chaos, e.g., Job 3:8; Ps. 74:13; Ezek. 29:3; Is. 27:1 (partly perhaps under the influence of Gen. 3:15). Cf. especially Job 26:13 LXX [G. Bertram]. [W. Foerster, II, 281-83]

échidna, óphis, Satanás

drómos → tréchō

dýnamai [to be able], dynatós [able], dynatéō [to be able], adýnatos [unable], adynatéō [to be unable], dýnamis [ability, power], dynástēs [ruler], dynamóō [to give power], endynamóō [to give power]

Words of this stem all have the basic sense of ability or capability. dýnamai means a. "to be able" in a general sense, b. "to be able" with reference to the attitude that makes one able, hence sometimes "to will," and c. (of things) "to be equivalent to," "to count as," "to signify." dynatós means "one who has ability or power," "one who is powerful"; the neuter adjective signifies "what is possible or practicable." dynatéō means "to have great ability." adýnatos means "one who has no ability or strength"; the noun tó adýnaton signifies "impossibility" and adýnatón esti "to be impossible." adynatéō means "not to be able." dýnamis, the most important word in the group, means "ability," then "possibility," then "power" both physical and intellectual or spiritual. dýnastēs has the sense of "one who can do something" and was early used for "ruler" (including God as ruler). dynamóō and endynamóō both mean "to give power," "to make strong," "to strengthen."

A. The Concepts of Power in the Greek and Hellenistic World. The term dýnamis shows that all life in the cosmos is viewed dynamically. dýnamis is a cosmic principle. In Pythagorean teaching number is filled with effective force. Plato calls dýnamis the absolute mark of being. The Stoics refer to a self-originating and self-moving force. noús still underlies dýnamis in Aristotle and the Stoics, but dýnamis is the basic principle in Poseidonius. In Greek philosophy the cosmic principle is the same thing as God. There is thus little reference to the power of God, for God himself is power. The individual gods are dynámeis of the universal force; they personify the capabilities of a neutral deity. In Hellenism the world is a manifestation of the forces that work in and by and on it. To do anything one must know these forces and share in them. Magic is an application of this principle. It seeks contact, not with deity, but with the demonic natural and cosmic forces that stand under deity. Knowing these forces, the magician can mediate them for the good or ill of others. Yet the gods might also intervene directly to help or to heal. This may be seen in the healing miracles of Epidaurus, which are called dymámeis ("acts of power"). Acts of divine punishment bear the same name. Humans are outside the forces that rule the cosmos and have to attain to participation in them, especially with a view to salvation from mortality, or from the bondage of matter. The mystery religions are designed to provide the power of salvation in various forms, e.g., by an initiation which will make it possible to be taken up into the cosmic system of forces. The fundamental concept in the Greek sphere, then, is that of a natural force which, imparted in different ways, controls, moves, and governs the cosmos.

B. The Idea of Power in the OT. The decisive difference in the OT is that the power of a personal God replaces the neutral force of nature that is equated with deity. Traces of a neutral idea of power may be found in the OT (cf. the power of the ark), but unlike the nature gods, Yahweh is a God of history, so that originally naturalistic elements are all subsumed. Nor is power itself the main thing, but the will which it must execute and serve. The exodus is thus the supreme example of divine power (cf. Ex. 15:6, 13; 32:11; Dt. 9:26, etc.). Dt. 3:24 gives classical expression to the significance of the exodus. God's power is demonstrated in this decisive act at the heart of OT faith and worship. This power is to be declared to the nations, and Israel is to be God's people and to obey and serve him. In time of need, she can confidently seek a further deployment of the same power (cf. Neh. 1:10; Is. 10:33). The description of God as the "lord of hosts" (dynámeis is sometimes used for hosts in the LXX) echoes the historical distinctiveness of the OT concept of God and his power, for God is Lord of all the powers, and worship of the powers in the form of astral deities is forbidden (2 Kgs. 17:16; cf. the sharp contrast in Dt. 4:19 and 4:20). To be sure, God manifests himself in the volcano or the storm (Ps. 29), but he does so as the God of history; nature is the theater of his acts and has its origin in his will (cf. Is. 40:26). The same power as fashions history creates and sustains the world (cf. Jer. 27:5; 32:17). It also affects individual destiny. God's superior power (Job 12:13, 16) effects and controls all things, so that in individual need one must look to him for help and draw strength from him (Pss. 46:1; 86:16; cf. Dt. 8:17-18; Is. 41:10). The power of God is not capricious, for it expresses his will and is thus determined by his righteousness (Is. 5:16). Having the inner energy of holiness, it is effective as the power of judgment and grace, and it serves the manifestation and magnification of his glory (Ps. 24:8). All ideas of magic are thus excluded. We are brought into the sphere of a relationship in which obedience, prayer, and sacrifice replace incantations and rituals. The uniqueness of the OT concept of God and his power issues in doxologies which have parallels in other religions but which are distinguished by their reference to the mighty acts of God in history and by the glow of joy in God, of passion, and of experience of God. For examples cf. 1 Chr. 29:10ff.; Pss. 21:13; 59:16; 2 Chr. 20:6; Dan. 3:27-28.

C. Ideas of Power in Rabbinical and Hellenistic Judaism.

1.a. Awareness of the demonstration of God's power in the exodus persists and indeed is heightened by the Maccabean deliverance. God's greatness is seen in creation and his power in the exodus. Yet creation, too, is the work of the word as an instrument of God's power. Individuals may also rely on God's power.

b. An emphasis develops, however, on the eschatological deployment of God's power. This has an OT basis, as in Is. 2:19; Ezek. 20:33. Many things take place now that are against God's will and are due to subjection to other powers. There is thus hope and longing for a decisive manifestation of God's power in a final conflict. The hostile forces which now lie between God and us are thought of as demons and are sometimes called dynámeis, perhaps on the basis of the heavenly hosts of the OT as these are seen in detachment from God. These powers seem to be natural forces personified as angels, i.e., as intermediate beings ruling the realm between heaven and earth. Some are good and magnify God, but others belong to Beliar or Satan, who rules humanity through them. The human race is thus a battlefield of good and bad forces, and paganism worships these intermediate creatures instead of the true and living God. Some influence of Hellenism may be seen in the development of these ideas of demonic dynámei.

c. Yet the supremacy of God remains. God's essence is found in his power, so that when the name of God is avoided, power can be used as a designation, as in Mt. 26:64. This is not a hypostatization, but a paraphrase of the divine name. As regards the saving power of God, it is found in the law. The strength that God gives his people is none other than the law. By the law he creates the world, directs his people, and gives sanctification and power to those who obey it. The law is thus saving power as the revelation of God's will.

2. Philo tends more toward Hellenism by viewing God as pure being and thus making a hypostasis of his power. God is the supreme power, but the powers are independent of God, though they belong to his eternal world and are linked to his lógos and names. Deriving from the OT an ethical view of God, Philo ascribes ethical functions to the powers. They have their source in God's holiness and they serve the one goal of overcoming human pollution. In Philo, then, the Hellenistic view of power unites with the OT view of God.

D. The Concept of Power in the NT.

1. The Fact of Christ. Like all NT concepts, the NT concept of power receives its decisive impress from the fact of Christ. This fact is obviously linked with the OT view of the Messiah, who is consistently related to the strength of God (cf. Is. 9:5; 11:2. Ps. 110:2; Mic. 5:5). This strength is primarily kingly, but prophetic power is also involved (cf. Mic. 3:8; Acts 7:22 [Moses]; Lk. 1:17 [the Baptist]). The prophetic aspect achieves greater prominence in the NT (cf. Lk. 24:19). Yet Christ is more than a prophet endowed with power; his whole being is a unique one that is peculiarly determined by the power of God. This comes to expression in the parallelism of the Holy Spirit and the power of the Most High in the story of the virgin conception. No attempt is made to describe the mode; the incarnation begins with a conception that transcends normal processes of generation. At the birth of Christ a special and unique act of power rightly gives him the title Son of God (Lk. 1:35). On this basis, Christ is the bearer of the special power of the Spirit in his ministry (Lk. 4:14, 36). As God's essence is power, endowment with power is linked to the gift of the Spirit, and this gift confers on Christ his authority (exousía)—an authority which he has the power (dýmamis) to exercise in expelling demons or healing the sick (cf. Lk. 5:17; 6:19; 8:46). For this reason the witness of his disciples is that God anointed Jesus with the Holy Spirit and with power (Acts 10:38). The works he does can also be called dynámeis (cf. Mt. 11:10ff.; Mk. 6:2; Lk. 19:37; also Acts 2:22). These works differ from similar acts of power in the contemporary world in three ways: a. they have no connection with magic; b. they are done by the word, which is the word of the omnipotent God whose kingdom here enters history and overthrows the rule of hostile forces; c. they presuppose faith both in him who does the work and in those on whose behalf they are done, so that a personal relation is demanded (cf. Mt. 13:58; Mk. 9:14ff.). In faith, all things are possible; there is power (Mk. 9:23). For in faith we share God's rule. The mighty works evoke astonishment and praise (Mt. 13:54; Lk. 19:37), and in Herod, perhaps, an uneasy conscience (Mt. 14:2). John's Gospel does not use dynámeis, but with exousía and sēmeíon employs the verb dýnasthai, which shifts the emphasis from the act to the capability (cf. Jn. 3:2). The sēmeia, performed in the fullness of messianic power, are unique acts. Jesus can do them only because God is with him, i.e., he has the power of God in fellowship with the Father. In Jn. 9 the blind man, when cured, testifies to the divine dýnasthai of Jesus (9:33), and some of the Pharisees agree (9:16). Similarly in Jn. 11, when it is asked whether Jesus could not have healed Lazarus (11:37), he shows his unlimited dýnasthai by raising him. It is only in fellowship with Jesus that his disciples also can do things (15:5), but he recognizes at the same time that his own dýnasthai has its source in God (5:19, 30). The special features in John are a. that we have in this dýnasthai the unique Christ event, and b. that the power in this event is the power of God initiating the new aeon. This power finds particular demonstration in the crucifixion and resurrection. Christ's own resurrection backs up his saying in Mt. 22:29. Peter in Acts 2:24 puts this resurrection power very strikingly in the negative: Christ cannot be held by death. The power of death is broken. As God's power empowered Jesus for acts of power, it empowers him for new life. Paul makes this point in 1 Cor. 6:14 and 2 Cor. 13:4. Christ is declared God's Son in power by his resurrection (Rom. 1:4). We thus preach Christ as God's power (1 Cor. 1:24). The resurrection does not make Christ the Son of God, or give him power as such; what he has by it is sonship in full power in contrast with the apparent weakness of the incarnation (2 Cor. 13:4). If Christ is called God's power in the absolute, it is not because he personifies power, but because in him the power of God works victoriously in history and brings it to its goal. In Hebrews this power is called the power of an indestructible life; it is beyond the reach of mortality. With this power the Son is set at God's right hand where he rules the world (1:3). In Revelation this power is identical with glory (1:16). The Lamb that was slain is worthy to receive power (5:12). Christ's people await his coming in power (Mk. 9:1) which will complete his work and establish God's perfect rule with the subjection of every other force (Phil. 3:21). This coming will be a visible one, and Christ will be accompanied by his mighty angels (2 Th. 1:7).

2. The Power of God, Demonic powers, and the Power of Salvation.

a. The Christ event sheds light on the power of God. Christ's power is God's, so that it is depicted as endowment. Christ shares this power by personal fellowship with God. His power is thus the historical power of an eschatological event, as in the OT. God's omnipotence is manifested in the Christ event (Heb. 11:19; cf. Mt. 22:29). God is the dynatós in virtue of his omnipotent rule (Lk. 1:49). All things are possible for him (Mt. 19:26). As faith perceives, all things manifestly declare his eternal power and deity (Rom. 1:20). The NT can thus adopt the OT doxology, as in Mt. 6:13; Rev. 4:11, etc. The doxologies of Rev. 11:17-18 and 12:10 imply acknowledgment that God's power will destroy hostile forces and bring the world to perfection, as the power in the Christ event has already shown.

b. The Christ event also sheds a new light on demonic powers. The NT recognizes these (cf. Mt. 24:29). These are cosmic but also angelic powers. They have lost their force with the resurrection of Christ and will be publicly stripped of it at his return. Between these two events, there is tension. The powers are disarmed, for the new life of believers derives from God and is set under his rule (Eph. 1:20-21; Rom. 8:38-39). Yet they still fight (Rev. 13:2) and have to be brought to submission (1 Cor. 15:24). The antichrist will come with power and spread deception; only Christ's coming again will finally destroy him (2 Th. 2:9).

c. Christ's work also gives a new answer to the question of the power of salvation. When the disciples ask who can be saved, Christ replies that there is no human power to save, only God's omnipotent power (Mt. 19:26). Paul sharply stresses human inability in Rom. 8. Due to our weakness, even the law cannot save from sin and death (v. 3). Hebrews finds the same inability in the cultus (10:1, 4, 11). As Jn. 3:3 says, unless there is a new birth, we cannot see God's kingdom. Of ourselves we cannot bear to hear God's word (Jn. 8:43). No one can come to God unless the Father draws him (6:44). Only God has the power to save, and he puts forth his power in Jesus (Rom. 1:16; 1 Cor. 1:18). This power is not that of mystical initiation or of a mere direction to salvation; it is the power of the word of the cross. It grants salvation by liberating us from the power of darkness and putting us in the kingdom of God's dear Son. It is grounded in the saving act of the Christ event, i.e., in God's mighty work in history. Only in 2 Pet. 1:3-4 do we have a hint of a substantial rather than a dynamic conception when it is said that God's power grants us the things pertaining to life and godliness with a view to our escaping corruption and becoming partakers of the divine nature.

3. The power of the Disciple. As the dýnamis of God, preaching continues Christ's saving work, and the apostles, representing Christ, are endowed with his power. Jesus equips the disciples with power when he sends them out in Lk. 9:1. This power overmatches demonic power (Lk. 10:19). The disciples have it only in faith (Mk. 9:14ff.). It is the power of Christ's own presence by the Spirit (cf. Lk. 24:48ff.; Acts 1:8). A special endowment of power takes place at Pentecost which leads to healing as well as preaching in power (Acts 4:7ff., 33; 6:8, 10). Paul's ministry is effective by the power of signs and wonders, by the power of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 15:19). dynámeis are a mark of the apostolate (Gal. 3:5; 1 Th. 1:5). But the power is that of the Spirit as the mode both of Christ's presence and of the believer's existence. Apostles themselves are witnesses of the cross; they preach in outward weakness but in demonstration of the Spirit and power, so that the faith of their hearers rests in the power of God (1 Cor. 2:1ff.). dýnamis relates to the content of the message, not the form. The goal of preaching is the exhibition of Christ's presence by the Spirit and therefore the exhibition of God's saving power in Christ. It is by the same power that Paul is made a minister (Eph. 3:7). In the interests of the community, the power of Christ can also be judicial, as in 1 Cor. 5:3ff. It should be noted here that Satan can have no power over the believer unless the latter is handed over to him, and that even then the purpose is still one of salvation. In the apostle's own life and ministry, the power of Christ means a continual strengthening (Phil. 4:13; 1 Tim. 1:12; 2 Tim. 4:17). This strengthening takes the form of support, and is thus to be construed, not in terms of mana, but in terms of a personal relation between Christ and his servant.

4. The Community. A community that rests in God's saving power is the goal (1 Cor. 2:1ff.). Believers may be strong as they are "in the Lord" (Eph. 6:10). Rescued from Satan's power, yet still beset by perils, they know the power of Christ to protect and preserve. They are guarded by God's power through faith (1 Pet. 1:5). The apostle's prayer is that they may enjoy the greatness of God's power (Eph. 1:19), or that they may be strengthened with all power (Col. 1:11). This power, grounded in Christ's resurrection, creates the hope of their calling and a glorious inheritance. Christians are to know this power with a view to endurance and patience. It is a power that transforms as well as preserves. By the power of the Spirit they abound in hope (Rom. 15:13). Strengthened with might by the Spirit in the inner man, they grow in fellowship with Christ, in comprehension, and in love of Christ (Eph. 3:14ff.). Born of God, they cannot sin (1 Jn. 3:9), but have a new capacity for love (1 Jn. 4:7). Every good resolve and work of faith may be fulfilled by the power of God (2 Th. 1:11). Members of the community may also have the spiritual gift of performing dynámeis (1 Cor. 12:10). Furthermore, the power at work in the community is ultimately resurrection power (cf. 2 Cor. 13:3ff.). God raised up the Lord and will raise us up by his power (1 Cor. 6:14). The changing of the body of humiliation into a body of glory is grounded in God's omnipotence (Phil. 3:21). No one can snatch believers out of Christ's hand (Jn. 10:28-29). Paul can give up all things to know Christ and the power of his resurrection-the mighty act which creates new and eternal life for his people. This is the source of real dýnamis.

5. Power and Weakness. God's power operates in the weak and corruptible sphere of human existence. It is thus visible only to faith, but for this very reason it is known as divine, not human power. Concealment in apparent weakness is the law of the cross (2 Cor. 13:4). But God's weakness is stronger than men (1 Cor. 1:25), as Paul comes to realize in all the weakness of his apostolic ministry (2 Cor. 12:9-10; cf. Phil. 4:13). The transcendent power belongs to God (2 Cor. 4:7), who gives a spirit, not of timidity, but of power and love and self-control (2 Tim. 1:7). Weakness is the presupposition of the working of divine power. It is the pledge of Christ's presence in which Paul finds freedom from self and reliance on God. By the law of strength in weakness, the resurrection power of God is more abundantly exerted, whether in ministers of the gospel or in the Christian community as a whole. "By the power of God" expresses the reality of faith for the apostolate and all Christian life (2 Cor. 6:7). [W. Grundmann, II, 284-317]

Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (156). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

ō [to go down, arm oneself], ekdýō [to strip], apekdýō [to put off], endýō [to put on], ependýō [to put on in addition], apékdysis [putting off]

dýō. "To submerge," also intransitive "to plunge," "go down" (the sun in Mk. 1:32; 4:40), figurative "to arm oneself."

ekdýō. a. "To strip" (cf. Mt. 27:28), b. "to divest oneself," "to take off." In the NT we find ekdýō in 2 Cor. 5:4, where it can hardly mean that Paul wants to avoid the nakedness of the intermediate state (cf. v. 5; Phil. 1:23), but perhaps refers to the loss of the earthly body when there is no hope of a heavenly body.

apekdýō. In the NT this occurs only in Col. 3:9, where it has the strong sense "fully to put off" with no possible return to the old state, and Col. 2:15, where it does not mean "to divest oneself of," but "to disarm" (opposite of dýō, "to arm oneself").

endýō. a. "To draw on," b. "to put on," "clothe oneself with."

1. In the NT it occurs literally in Mt. 6:25; Mk. 6:9; Acts 12:21; Rev. 19:14.

2. Figuratively we find it in 2 Cor. 5:3; where Paul desires to be clothed with the heavenly body. We also find it with reference to Christian armor in Rom. 13:12; 1 Th. 5:8; Eph. 6:8, 11, investing with qualities in Col. 3:12, and investing with incorruptibility in 1 Cor. 15:53-54. The object is personal in Gal. 3:27: "We have put on Christ," or, as an imperative, in Rom. 13:14: "Put on Christ" (cf. also Col. 3:10: "Seeing...you have put on the new man"). Behind this usage stands the concept of Christ as the second Adam.

ependýō. "To put on over." The only NT use is in 2 Cor. 5:2,4 for investiture with the heavenly body at the parousia.

apékdysis. This occurs only in Col. 2:11, where the sense is figurative (cf. Rom. 6:2-3; Gal. 2:19). [A. OEPKE, II, 318-21]

dṓdeka [twelve], (hekatón tesserákonta téssares [144]), dōdékatas [twelfth], dōdekáphylon [the twelve tribes]

dṓdeka means "twelve," a number which was highly esteemed due to the division of the year into twelve months, and in Israel due to the existence of twelve tribes in the sacral union, which is of theological significance even after the disappearance of some tribes and the fusion of the others into a political society.

1. Twelve is a round number in Mt. 9:20; Acts 19:7; 24:11, and perhaps Mt. 14:20, though here the point might be a basket for each of the twelve disciples. It is of interest that in Mk. 5 the woman has been ill twelve years (v. 25) and Jairus' daughter is twelve years old (v. 42), since the two stories are interwoven.

---

cf. confer, compare

NT New Testament

v. verse

2. In Lk. 2:42 Jesus is twelve years old when he goes to the Passover; the point of the journey seems to have been to familiarize him with the obligations of the feast, since the obligation to keep it came only at the age of thirteen.

3. OT usage is adopted in Acts 7:8; Mt. 19:28 (cf. Jms. 1:1).

4. The use of twelve in Revelation is linked to the OT concept of the twelve tribes as comprising God's people. Thus the twelve stars of 12:1 characterize the woman as a symbol of the daughter of Zion. Twelve also plays an important role in the measurements of the new Jerusalem in ch. 21. Again, in 7:4ff. twelve thousand are sealed from each of the twelve tribes; the figure "twelve" stresses the continuity of the underlying saving will of God, the "thousands" emphasize the size of the community, and the number as a whole brings out the element of order and perfection as God pursues and fulfils his divine way of salvation. These are not just Jewish believers, for the author alters the customary list, leaving out Dan. Interest focuses on the teleology of salvation history as God in faithfulness to himself and his people achieves his purpose in the community as the spiritual Israel. The numbers 12,000 and 144,000 occur in a cosmic sense among the Mandaeans and Manicheans, but if there is a connection, it is more likely that these took the numbers from Revelation, not vice versa.

5. The classical use of dṓdeka is in relation to the innermost group of Jesus' followers: the twelve disciples in Mt. 10:1 etc., the twelve apostles in Mt. 10:2; Lk. 22:14, and the Twelve in Mt. 26:14 etc. These are the same people, but while all apostles would be disciples, not all disciples are apostles, only those who are expressly appointed to be such by Jesus. Jesus himself freely chooses these twelve (Mk. 3:13-14; Lk. 6:12-13; cf. Jn. 6:70). To question the historicity of this selection is to make the existence of the Twelve inexplicable, especially as the inclusion of Judas does not fit well with the theory of their emergence after the resurrection, with Paul's reference to them as the first witnesses of the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:5), or with the reference to the eleven in Mt. 28:16; Mk. 16:14; Lk. 24:9. The choice of the number accords with the divine plan of salvation and the preparation of the community as its goal. It looks back to the ancient constitution of Israel and ahead to the final form of the messianic community. In the Twelve Jesus claims all Israel, so that the Twelve have no independent place but serve as the link between Christ and his people. Except as the first witnesses of the resurrection, they then play no special role as a group. The silence of Paul is important in this regard, and their only joint action in Acts is in the advice they give for the selection of the Seven in Acts 6. When James is put to death, they make no attempt to fill his place, mainly because the emphasis has now shifted to Gentile work in which others participate (cf. Acts 8:5ff.), and the time for the Jewish people to make a decision in relation to them has passed, so that they have thus become representatives of judgment upon it (cf. 19:28). The simple form "the Twelve" shows that a special task is at issue rather than a special dignity. It occurs almost always when the group is tested, when a close relationship to Jesus is stressed, or when there is a combination of the two, as in Mt. 20:17. Their function, of course, is finally a positive one, for in Rev. 21:14 the foundation stones of the city bear their names. The Israel that is gathered from all nations is in fact inconceivable without them, so that even if the claim that Jesus makes through them is initially resisted, it comes to a higher fulfilment with the expanded concept of God's people, and they have a vital function in the church's understanding of herself in relation to God's total plan. [K. H. RENGSTORF, II, 321-28]

→ apóstolos, Israḗl

dōreá, dōreán, dōréomai, dṓrēma, dōron → dídōmi

hebdomḗkonta → heptá*; Hebraíos → Israḗl; engízō → engýs; *engráphō → gráphō

OT Old Testament

ε e

éngyos [guarantee]

Formed from engyáō, “to pledge,” éngyos means “offering security” and ho éngyos “guarantor.” The term occurs figuratively in Heb. 7:22, where Jesus with his life, death, and ascension is the guarantee that the beginning of God’s saving work will be followed by its promised completion. [H. PREISKER, II, 329]

engýs [near], engízō [to bring near], prosengízō [to come near] engízō means “to bring near,” mostly intransitive “to approach.” engýs means a. “near” in space, b. “near” in time, c. “almost” (in counting), d. “similar,” e. “related,” and f. figuratively of a spiritual attitude. engízō is very common in the LXX, e.g., for the nearness of God’s working, for drawing near to God (Ex. 3:5), for the approach of the time of salvation (Is. 50:8), or for the coming of judgment (Joel 1:15). engýs is used for neighbor (Ex. 37:27) or for the relation between God and the righteous (Ps. 33:18). Philo has engízein for encounter with God, as in Allegorical Interpretation of Laws 2.57.

1. NT usage follows Isaiah in speaking of the nearness of God’s kingdom (Mt. 3:2; 10:7; Lk. 10:9, 11) as the time of fulfilment (cf. Mt. 21:34; Mk. 13:28-29). Similarly engízein occurs in connection with Christ’s death (Mt. 26:45) and the destruction of Jerusalem (Lk. 21:20). engýs is significant in Lk. 19:11 inasmuch as the nearness to Jerusalem coincides with the nearness of the decisive event of salvation (cf. Mt. 26:18). The approach of the risen Lord in Lk. 24:15 also has a special significance (cf. Lk. 10:9, 11). In Paul engízein denotes a unique aspect of the Christian life: God’s coming is at hand (Rom. 13:12). Epaphroditus nearly died for Christ’s work in Phil. 3:20. engýs occurs in a brief eschatological message in Phil. 4:5 and with reference to the word in Rom. 10:8 (quoting Dt. 30:14). The Gentiles have drawn near to Christ in Eph. 2:13,17. engízein denotes tense expectation in Heb. 10:25; Jms. 5:8; 1 Pet. 4:7, but is used for drawing near to God in Heb. 7:19 and Jms. 4:8. Judgment is imminent (engýs) upon apostasy in Heb. 6:8, while the time of God’s kingdom is near in Rev. 1:3.

2. engízein and engýs are used in very different ways to indicate time and space, especially in Luke and John. Thus engízein with the dative denotes place and movement in Lk. 7:12; 15:1, etc.; Acts 9:3; 10:9, and similarly with eis in Mk. 11:1; Mt. 21:1; Lk. 18:35, with epí tina in Lk. 10:9, and in the absolute in Lk. 18:40. As regards times, we read of the approach of the hour (Mt. 26:45), the day (Rom. 13:12), the end (Lk. 21:20). engýs is used only for place in Acts (e.g., 1:12), but for time, especially the Passover, in John (2:13; 7:2; 11:55) and for place in John (e.g., 6:19; 11:18, 54; 19:20, 42). Thus the terms have an ordinary sense but also express the hope of the imminent eschatological act of God either in commencement or consummation. [H. PREISKER, II, 330-32]

egeírō [to awaken, rise], égersis [resurrection], exegeírō [to awaken, rise], grēgoréō [to be awake, alert], (agrypnéō [to be awake, keep watch])

LXX Septuagint

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

egeírō.

1.a. “To awaken,” b. “to arouse,” c. “to set up,” d. “to awaken the dead”; also intransitive a. “to wake up,” b. “to stir oneself,” c. “to rise up,” and d. “to rise from the dead.”

2. All these meanings occur in the Bible, with nuances from the Hebrew. Thus we find a. in Mk. 4:38 etc., intransitively in Mt. 1:24, figuratively in Rom. 13:11. For b. cf. Mk. 13:8, the rising up of prophets (Mt. 11:11), rising in judgment (Mt. 12:42). For c. cf. Jn. 2:19-20; Mt. 12:11; the sick in Mk. 1:37 etc., the intransitive in Mt. 17:7. For d. we have individual raisings as signs of the messianic age and the final resurrection, as in Mt. 9:25; Lk. 7:14; Jn. 12:1. Jesus’ own raising is predicted in Mt. 16:21 etc., narrated in Mk. 16:6 etc., and proclaimed in Acts 3:15 etc.; Rom. 4:24 etc.; 1 Cor. 6:14 etc. God has acknowledged and glorified the crucified Lord by raising him (cf. Acts; Rom. 7:4; Phil. 2:9ff.); he has thereby validated his saving work (Rom. 4 and 8; 1 Cor. 15). As distinct from anistánai, egeírein expresses the concreteness of the action. For the resurrection as Jesus’ own act, cf. Jn. 2:19; 10:17-18. The risen body of Jesus has both material (Lk. 24:39ff.; Jn. 20:25ff.) and spiritual features (1 Cor. 15:47; Phil. 2:6, 9; Jn. 20:17). Even linguistically the myth of the dying and rising redeemer-god neither forms the native soil of the gospel nor offers a parallel, for in it egeírein seldom occurs. In addition, the eschatological concept is missing and the NT core is theologically significant history rather than nature myth or speculative myth.

3. The raising of believers with Christ is worked out especially by Paul (cf. Rom. 6:4ff.; Gal. 2:20; Col. 2: 12ff.; Eph. 2:1, 5; 2 Cor. 4: 10ff.). It is related to justification (Rom. 5:18; 8:28ff.) and depicts the new situation in history into which believers are set with Christ (Rom. 6). The new life is the reality of faith (2 Cor. 4:7ff.). It is not a magical change, lies outside human control, and is a divinely posited reality awaiting consummation (Rom. 8:19ff.). Strictly, the resurrection has not yet taken place (2 Tim. 2:18). Though John stresses present possession (3:18; 5:24; 11:18), this does not mean a complete spiritualizing of eschatology (cf. Jn. 5:28-29; 6:39-40; 21:22; 1 Jn. 2:18; 4:17).

4. For the future resurrection of the dead (Lk. 20:37; Acts 26:8; 1 Cor. 15) see anístēmi. The question of the Sadducees in Mk. 12:23 reflects a more materialistic conception; Jesus opposes to it a more spiritual view in vv. 25ff. Paul endorses this in 1 Cor. 6:13; cf. the changing of the sóma in 1 Cor. 15:42ff. Similarly, Johannine theology avoids materialistic expressions while presenting a realistic belief in the resurrection.

égersis. This means a. “stimulation,” “erection” (of walls etc.), “raising” (of the dead), and b. (intransitive) “awakening,” “rising,” “recovery.” The only NT instance is in Mt. 27:53 where it refers to the resurrection of Jesus.

exegeírō. This has most of the senses of the simple form. It is used in Rom. 9:17 in the sense “to cause to appear in history,” “to call into existence,” and in 1 Cor. 6:14 in the sense “to raise from the dead.”

grēgoréō (agrypnéō).

1. This has the literal sense “to watch” in Mk. 14:34; 24:43; Lk. 12:37.

2. It has the figurative sense “to be vigilant” (especially in relation to the parousia) in Mt 24:42; Mk 13:35; 1 Th. 5:6; Rev. 3:3, linked with sobriety in 1 Th. 5:6, prayer in Mk. 14:38; Col. 4:2, concern for salvation in Acts 20:31. agrypnéō (only figurative) is used similarly in Mk. 13:33. Lk. 21:36; Eph. 6:18; Heb. 13:17.

3. The sense “to be alive” occurs only in 1 Th. 5:10. [A. OEPKE, II, 333-39]

---

vv. verses

enkainízō* → kainós; enkakéō → *kakós

enkombóomai [to clothe oneself]

enkombóomai, meaning "to clothe oneself with," occurs in the NT only in 1 Pet. 5:5, where it has the figurative sense "to make one's essential characteristic." Humility is to be a decisive mark of Christian conduct. [G. DELLING, II, 339]

enkráteia [self-control], (akrasía [self-indulgence]), enkratḗs [self-controlled], (akratḗs [lacking self-control]), enkrateúomai [to exercise self-control]

1. This group takes its sense from the stem krat- denoting power or lordship. Thus enkratḗs means "having power over all things and the self," enkráteia means "dominion over the self or something," with the nuances of "steadfastness" and "self-control" (opposite akrasía), and enkrateúesthai means "to compose oneself."

2. enkráteia is an important term in philosophical ethics. Socrates regards it as a cardinal virtue, and Aristotle and the Stoics discuss it fully, though the latter subordinate it to sōphrosýnē. The idea is that of people who freely control all things, maintaining freedom in self-restraint.

3. Philo has a high regard for enkráteia as superiority expressed in self-restraint. He links it to an asceticism deriving from dualism. The Essenes, too, value it highly, and it has religious significance in the Hermetic writings.

4. The term plays little role in the Bible. In the LXX it is found for "restraint" only in such passages as Sir 18:30; Wis. 8:21; 4 Macc. 5:34. It does not occur in the Gospels. Paul has it in 1 Cor. 9:25 for athletic "self-control" with a view, not to salvation, but to service. Closer to Hellenistic use is 1 Cor. 7:9, where it means sexual "self-control," yet here, too, there is no extolling of asceticism as though marital sex were wrong. The sparse use of this ethical term is due to three things: (1) for Christians life is directed by God's command, so that there is no place for autonomous self-mastery; (2) belief in creation excludes dualism, for all things are good as they come from God; and (3) salvation in Christ leaves no place for meriting salvation by asceticism. [W. GRUNDMANN, II, 339-42]

enkrínō* → *krinō

egṓ [I]

The NT uses egṓ in I-formulas. The term has religious significance in proclamations of God (the theological egṓ), the self-witness of Christ (the christological egṓ), and self-utterances of the Christian (the anthropological egṓ).

A. The Theological egṓ.

1. Divine Proclamatioms in the Ancient Near East and Hellenism. The I-style is common in the ancient Near East, e.g., in Babylonian liturgies, Egyptian papyri, the Avesta, and cf. also the hymnal predication: "I am Isis." The point of such proclamations is the self-representation, self-glorification, and self-commendation of the deity, so that they have a monotheistic thrust.

2. Divine Proclamations in the OT and Apocalyptic Judaism. The I-style acquires a specific ring on the lips of the self-revealing God of Israel. The divine name is paraphrased as "I am who I am" (Ex. 3:14). The decalogue opens with an exclusive "I am" (Ex. 20:2ff.). Even more exclusive is the great revelation of Dt.

32:39ff. In Is. 40ff. God presents himself as the ultimate Subject who will tolerate no other god, whose will is supreme, who has the first and final word, who manifests his omnipotent will and being in incessant action, and upon whose revealing and reconciling grace we are totally dependent. The I-style continues in Jewish apocalyptic, especially in the Apocalypse of Abraham.

3. I-Speeches of God in the NT. The NT maintains the belief that God is absolute Subject, but offers few I-declarations on God's part except in quotations, e.g., Is. 45:23 in Rom. 14:11, Dt. 32:35 in Rom. 12:19, Ps. 2:7 in Acts 13:33; Heb. 5:5, and Ex. 3:14 in expanded form in Rev. 1:8.

B. The Christological egṓ.

1. Ruler and Savior Sayings in the Ancient Near East and Hellenism. Ancient Near Eastern rulers, e.g., Hammurabi, Akhnaton, and Cyrus, issue I-proclamations. In Hellenism the Diadochi continue this style. In particular, however, religious saviors use it in their propaganda both in speech and writing. Thus we find it in the Mandaean writings and the Koran, but its overuse by popular prophets and preachers tended to rob it of credibility (cf. Celsus in Origen Against Celsus 7.8-9).

2. The I of God's Representatives in the OT and Judaism.

a. Among rulers, Nehemiah lists what he has done for God's people, but self-predications as god or lord are regarded as arrogant and offensive in view of God's sole deity, so that God punishes the pretensions of Tyre (Ezek. 28:2, 9) or Pompey. The prophets call for a hearing as God's mouthpiece, but this is a God-consciousness, not an I-consciousness (though cf. "me Daniel" in Dan. 7:28; 8:1).

b. The I-style of Isaiah is adopted in the I-sayings of heavenly wisdom in Prov. 8; these are imitated by folly in 9:4-5, 16. Angels can use the same style as God's messengers, e.g., in Apoc. Abr. 10; Test. Abr. 13.

c. Others like the Damascus Teacher adopt the same style, as does the Baptist in Jn. 1:23, although in contrast to Simon in Acts 8:9-10 he is not pointing to himself but away from himself to another (Mt. 3:11).

d. The rabbis avoid this style, fighting against the real or apparent pretension of I-sayings in the name of monotheism (cf. Gamaliel's caution in Acts 5:36-37).

3. egṓ in the Synoptic Sayings of Jesus. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus uses egṓ infrequently. It occurs when he quotes Is. 61 in Lk. 4:18, but the three most important instances are in the Sermon on the Mount, where five times he utters a sharp egṓ dé légō hymín relating his new demand to his person and mission, in the cry of jubilation in Lk. 10:22, where he is the sole mediator of salvation and knowledge who stands in a unique relation to the Father and through whom all the Father's work is done, and in the Savior's call in Mt. 11:28ff., where he occupies a central place between God and us, gathering up all previous intermediaries into himself as he stands at the heart of the times. The central position of Christ between the Father and believers comes out in other sayings, e.g., when he sends out the disciples with the egṓ of divine authority in Mt. 10:16, when he gives the promise of his abiding presence in Mt. 28:20, when he intercedes for his people in Lk. 22:32, and when he commissions the seventy as his representatives in Lk. 10:16. As Christ meets us in his messengers, so he meets us in the lowly (Mk. 9:37). To receive a child is to receive Christ, and to receive Christ is to receive God. Christ himself is the absolute point of intersection between God and us, so that the christological egṓ of the Synoptists expresses his claim to absoluteness in brief.

4. egṓ in the Speeches of Christ in John. John carries this line of thought a step further, for here the egṓ points a contrast (5:43), is often indispensable (10:25), and gives the sayings of Jesus a solemn, almost liturgical ring (e.g., 9:39). Many of the I-sayings refer to the relation to the Father (cf. "my Father," "I came forth from God" in 8:42, "I do what is pleasing to him" in 8:29, the Father is "with him" in 8:29, the Father is in me and I in the Father in 10:38, I and the Father “are one” in 10:30). The “we” of ch. 17 expresses this relation most fully, and drawing the disciples into this fellowship is the great theme of the discourses in vv. 14ff. Nor is this extension restricted to the Twelve, for a general offer is issued in 7:37. Indeed, the Christ event is shown to have a cosmic reach in a series of I-sayings which go beyond anything that is previously found, even including divine I-proclamations. These are the statements in which the egṓ is linked with such impersonal predicative nouns as light, bread, vine, door, way, truth, resurrection, and life. In such sayings Jesus does not equate himself with such things but claims to be such things in an absolute sense, so that everything significant in the world helps to characterize the uniqueness of this egṓ. Yet the point of such predication is to bring out his significance for the human race; light, bread, etc. are signs of his power and glory as he brings true light, bread, etc. to those who believe in him and thus sets them in the true reality of fellowship with himself, which means union with God.

---

Apoc. Apocrypha

5. egṓ in the Sayings of Christ in the Apocalypse. In Revelation, too, we find many christological I-sayings with a solemn ring, as in 22:16. The opening letters are from Christ himself, and if the third person is used in the introductory formulas (2:1 etc.), he can speak directly at the end (2:27-28), and closes the series with the great promise of a share in his own victory (3:21). In Revelation the main thrust of the I-sayings is the union of God and Christ. OT I-sayings are borrowed for this purpose, as in 1:8, 17 (cf. Is. 44:6). What God says in 21:6, Christ can say in 22:13. Yet Christ is not replacing God, nor are the two commingled, nor are there two different gods. Christ has been instituted the bearer of the divine office for the whole of this world and its history.

6. egṓ eimi (→ eimi). The occasional use of egṓ eimi without a predicate demands separate notice. It derives from the OT “I am” (Ex. 3:14; Dt. 32:39; Is. 41:4). Sometimes, of course, the meaning is the ordinary one “I am he,” as when the blind man identifies himself in Jn. 9:9, or Jesus does the same in Jn. 18:5 and Mk. 6:50, or gives the answer “I am” to the question of Mk. 14:61. On the other hand, there are messianic overtones in the last two instances. egṓ eimi has a fixed significance, as we learn from the warning of Mk. 13:6; the “I am he” of messianic pretenders must be rejected and the decisive “I am he” of Christ’s own final self-manifestation awaited. This sheds light on the central passage in Jn. 8:24ff. A chain of I-sayings precedes this in vv. 12, 18, 21. Decision for or against Christ means life or death (v. 24). But who is this one who says “I am”? He does not answer directly. The Father will bear witness (v. 18). He who sent him is with him (v. 29). The I of the Son is linked with that of the Father in a unity of action (v. 29). From the very beginning Jesus is the acting Subject of the history of God (v. 58), which contributes at every step to the manifestation and glorification of the Son. The final thrust of the simple egṓ eimi is that Christ’s egṓ is the Subject of this history which is his powerful self-proclamation and in whose every victory Christ calls: “I am he.” The I-sayings, then, may well go back to ancient Near Eastern models uniquely modified by the OT, but Christ claims all I-predications for himself and reveals himself to be God’s definitive representative in the absolute egṓ eimi—the purest and fullest expression of his incomparable significance.

C. The Anthropological egṓ.

1. I and We in the Writings of Luke. A personal note is sounded in the prefaces to Luke and Acts (Lk. 1:3; Acts 1:1). Acts also includes some “we” passages which naturally suggest that the author was personally present on such occasions, although some scholars see here a literary device to give the record greater vitality and variety.

2. We and I in the Johannine Writings. In contrast to Luke’s preface, that of John contains a confessional “we” (Jn. 1:14, 16). The author is not trying to write a more accurate account but in the name of many believers he is offering testimony. The same "we" occurs in 1 Jn. 1:4, then in 1 Jn. 4:14, 16 etc., and in demarcation from false teachers in 2:19. Above this "we" stands the God who elects, knows, and keeps us (3:19-20). But the author can also write authoritatively in the singular (2:7 etc.). This is very pronounced at the end in 5:13. The author of 2 John begins in the singular but then asserts unity with all who know the truth and blends himself with these in a comprehensive "in us" and "with us" (vv. 1-2). 3 John is wholly in the singular. Revelation cleverly interweaves I and we in 1:9 ("I John, your brother"). This first egṓ comes between the I-sayings of God and Christ (vv. 8, 17), and John's last egṓ comes after Christ's last egṓ in 22:16ff. If the author has a strong self-consciousness, it is a consciousness of office, and ultimately a God-consciousness.

3. We and I in Paul. Many of Paul's letters are personal (e.g., Philemon, Philippians, Romans), but he often associates others with himself either stylistically or with some special nuance, e.g., to add authority in 1 Cor. 11:16. He uses the singular to state his own position or to clarify his status, often with an emphatic egṓ which in 1 Cor. 7 differentiates him from the Lord and in Gal. 6:17 asserts his authority over against his opponents. The first person, both singular and plural, is important in exhortation, often in the cohortative, which is less sharp than the imperative (cf. 1 Th. 5:5ff.; Rom. 6:1ff.). Hypothetical "I" and "we" sentences serve the same goal, as in 1 Cor. 13:1ff. Gal. 2:15ff. begins with a statement in "we" style, moves on to a "we" hypothesis in v. 17, then a hypothetical "I" statement in v. 18, but then concludes with "I" statements, not because this is a private opinion, but because Paul has taken seriously the new situation of vv. 15-16 which Peter and the others must accept and work out as he has done.

4. The I of Rom. 7. The common reference of the I of Rom. 7 to the preconversion Paul is challenged by his statement in Phil. 3:6. A general reference to those who are under the law, however, is broken by a closer analysis of the I-style, which is comparable to that of Gal. 2. The context is that of salvation history. To demonic pressure against God, God has given the decisive response of the Christ event which is now being worked out in human will and destiny. Paul (with a "we") refers to this turning point in 7:5-6. He then develops this "we" statement in the "I" statements of vv. 7ff. Prior to the law, sin is dead (v. 8). The law, in itself holy and good, then enters human history, but what is meant for life proves to be death (v. 10). For evil opposes God and turns the work of the law into its opposite. But God uses this very fact to bring to light our dormant sickness. The law plunges us into a conflict within the egṓ; we want to keep the law, but indwelling sin controls us, so that we break it. We may disclaim responsibility (vv. 17, 20), joyfully assenting to God's law with the noús, but we are impotent under the sway of another law that reigns in our members. We are thus forced to issue a passionate cry for redemption from this fatal state—a cry which leads on to a fuller description of the meaning of the Christ event in ch. 8, for our twofold determination by God's law and the law of sin (7:25) has in fact been overcome by God's victorious action in Christ. A new law has thus replaced both the law of God and the law of sin, namely, the law of the Spirit of life in Christ, a law which means freedom, not bondage (8:2ff.). The pneumatic I is the new anthropological fact for Christians. Relative to the Christ event, this implies that Christ has destroyed sin, that he now dwells in us, and that we stand under a new reign and sign in which we are now able not to sin as previously we were not able not to sin. Relative to God, it implies that his plan has been realized, that we are brought to our deepest selves, that we enjoy spiritual fellowship with him, and that we are wholly dependent upon God but find assurance in this very dependence. Relative to our somatic being, it implies that we have as yet only the firstfruits of the new life, that we still await our full redemption, but that this firstfruits is a pledge, so that we may confidently expect our final liberation and the accompanying redemption of creation. The new anthropological situation thus has the scope of a comprehensive renewal which Christ initiates and for which the pneumatic I is the point of departure. There is thus a continuous sequence of thought from 7:7 to 8, but in 8:2 Paul changes from egṓ to se and in 8:4 he alternates between "we" and "you," thus showing that the egṓ of ch. 7, while it includes Paul, embraces many others as well. But if Paul is included, what about Phil. 3:6? The difference is one of standpoint. In Phil. 3:6 (and also Gal. 2:15), Paul speaks from the standpoint of a pre-Christian Jew. In Rom. 7 (and Gal. 2:19; Phil. 3:7), he speaks from a Christian standpoint. From this angle the blamelessness is shown to be an illusion which carries the risk of sinful self-glory. In Christ, Paul sees the hopelessness of his previous situation. He does so in solidarity with his people. Fulfilling the movement of his people from its real crisis to Christ, he is, as it were, its firstfruits; this gives the egṓ of Rom. 7 its distinctive sense. [E. STAUFFER, II, 343-62]

hedraíos [steadfast], hedraíōma [bulwark]

hedraíos means first "seated," "settled," then "steadfast," "solid," and in the OT "permanent," e.g., God's throne, or God himself, or the mountains, or the throne of David, or the human heart if God keeps it, or human work if God accepts it. There are only three instances in the NT. In 1 Cor. 7:37 the self-controlled person is inwardly secure. In 1 Cor. 15:58 Christians are to be steadfast and immovable in the light of the resurrection. In Col. 1:23 believers must be stable and steadfast, continuing in the faith and not shifting away from the hope of the gospel as apostasy threatens. The noun hedraíōma occurs in 1 Tim. 3:15. The church is here a solid defense against the confusion of myths, offering individual faith and thought a sure ground with its confession (v. 16). [E. STAUFFER, II, 362-64]

ethelothrēskeía* → *thrēskós

éthnos [people, nation], ethnikós [Gentile]

A. A People and Peoples in the LXX.

1. The main Hebrew terms for "people," 'am and gôy, both denote human groups, but historically the former comes to be used for the holy people and the latter (in the plural) for the Gentiles. In the LXX dḗmos is rare, being used only for smaller clanlike societies. laós is the rendering of 'am and éthnos of gôy. There is a marked tendency to avoid the plural laoí, but éthnē is common for the plural "peoples." (For statistics see TDNT, II, 365.)

2. In many passages there is intentional differentiation. (For details see TDNT, II, 366-67.)

3. When éthnē denotes the Gentiles, it often has no sense of a plurality of peoples. The term describes those who do not belong to the chosen people. Yet God is the King of all peoples (Jer. 10:7). They all descend from the first patriarchs (cf. Gen. 10). Their division is by divine ordinance and must not be resisted (Gen. 11; Dt. 32:8). The nations are important in the prophetic view of history as agents of God's wrath (Hos. 8:10) which are themselves under wrath (Is. 8:9) but which will also finally receive salvation. Yet in Jewish piety, and in the hope of universal mission, the specific concept of peoples is merged into the general one of Gentiles (cf. Is. 66:17ff.). In the postexilic period the term can be used for Gentiles dwelling in the land (Ezr. 10:2; Neh. 10:31), and it thus takes on a derogatory sense, i.e., the common people (rendered óchlos in Greek) (cf. Jn. 7:49). Nevertheless, even though éthnē implies a negative judgment from the Jewish standpoint, this judgment has no final validity in face of the promise of universal revelation (cf. in the NT Mt. 28:19; Rev. 14:6). [G. BERTRAM, II, 364-69]

B. éthnos in the NT.

---

i.e. id est, that is

1. éthnos, which probably comes from éthos, means “mass,” “multitude,” “host,” and may be used for a “herd” or “swarm” as well as a human group. Applied to humans, it means a “people” but is a weaker term than, e.g., laós or glṓssa. Of some 160 NT instances, 40 are quotations from the OT. This does not affect the general usage but may give a special nuance in context.

2. In 64 passages éthnos has no specialized sense. The reference is to a people or peoples (including the Jewish people; cf. Acts 10:22; 1 Pet. 2:9, éthnos being used interchangeably with laós in this regard). pánta éthnē denotes all nations.

3. In some cases, however, one senses that Israel is not included among the nations. Thus in Rom. 15:11 (based on Ps. 117:1) the call to praise God hardly need go out to Israel. Again, Israel does not have to be included in the promise of Gal. 3:8. In other passages too, e.g., Mt. 4:15; Lk. 21:24; Acts 4:25; Rom. 1:5; Rev. 10:11, the reference seems to be to the non-Jewish nations, i.e., the Gentiles, though whether or not éthnē is here a technical term for Gentiles may be debated.

4. In some 100 passages éthnē is undoubtedly a technical term for the Gentiles as distinct from Jews or Christians. The distinction from Jews is plain in, e.g., Mt. 6:32; Lk. 12:30; Mt. 20:19; Acts 14:16; Eph. 2:12; 1 Cor. 1:23. Gentile Christians are still éthnē in Rom. 11:13; Eph. 3:1. Yet a distinction from Christians may also be seen in view of the status of the church as the true Israel, e.g., in 1 Cor. 5:1; 12:2; 1 Th. 4:5; 1 Pet. 2:12; 3 Jn. 7. John does not have éthnē for Gentiles, since obdurate Jews are themselves éthnē.

5. The quotation of many OT passages shows how the OT influences this primarily ethico-religious distinction (cf. 1 Th. 4:5 and Jer. 10:25). In this regard, then, the NT differs from the Greeks, for while the latter often use éthnos disparagingly to describe non-Greek peoples (as distinct from Héllēnes), this is on the basis of national or cultural differentiation, not theological.

6. The biblical view persists in the early fathers (cf. Mart. Pol. 9.2).

ethnikós. This occurs five times in the NT (Mt. 5:47; 6:7; 18:17; 3 Jn. 7; Gal. 2:14). “Gentile” is the obvious sense in Mt. 5:47; 6:7; 18:17. National distinction is not at issue but the inner mark of Gentiles. Adverbially “like Gentiles” in Gal. 2:14 again denotes the religious distinction, but in this instance Paul defends “living like Gentiles” to show that Jews are not justified as such, but both Jews and Gentiles are justified only by the one Lord who summons both to himself.

→ Héllēn [K. L. SCHMIDT, II, 369-72]

éthos [habit, custom]

a. “Habit,” “use”; b. “custom,” “cultic ordinance,” “law” (used for Jewish laws in the LXX). The NT has both senses. In Lk. 22:39 the obvious reference is to a habit of Jesus, i.e., to retire to the Mount of Olives for prayer. In Acts 25:16 éthos denotes a custom in Roman justice and in Heb. 10:25 the bad custom of nonattendance at community gatherings. The burial law of the Jews is at issue in Jn. 19:40, and this leads on to the common use in Luke for the cultic law of Judaism, whether with reference to individual ordinances (Lk. 1:9; 2:42) or to the whole of the cultic law (Acts 6:14; 15:1; 16:21; 21:21; 26:3; 28:17). [H. PREISKER, II, 372-73]

eídon → horáō

eídos [form, appearance], eidéa (idéa) [form, appearance]

1. “What is visible,” “figure,” “appearance,” whether in persons, objects, or God (cf. Gen. 32:30-31). In Num. 12:8 rabbinic exegesis takes it that Moses saw the speech of God (cf. Jn. 5:37).

2. In 2 Cor. 5:7 “sight” does not seem to be very apposite, since there is no parallel for the presupposed active use. The point is that we are to walk in a sphere in which there is no visible form. But what form? It might be that of the Lord whose eídos we shall see only in the next aeon (cf. 1 Cor. 13:12b). More probably it is the form of the Christian which is now only provisional and which will be enjoyed in its full and true sense only when we are at home with the Lord (v. 8; cf. 1 Jn. 3:2).

3. eídos often denotes “manner,” and this is perhaps the sense in 1 Th. 5:22. The link with v. 21 certainly favors “every form” of evil over “every appearance,” especially if v. 21 contains a reference to money changers (as the early church supposed): “As good money changers, test all things; keep the good and reject the bad.” (Cf. the use of eídos for “mint.”) [G. KITTEL, II, 373-75]

eídōlon [idol], eidōlóthyton [meat offered to idols], eidōleíon [temple of an idol], kateídōlos [full of idols], eidōlolátrēs [idolater], eidōlolatría [idolatry]

eídōlon.

1. This means “picture,” “copy.” It can be used for images of gods, but is not the usual term for cultic images (or human statues). When used for images, the idea is that of a reflection of the deity. The term can also denote shades or apparitions (beings in the underworld are only copies of people). Another sense is the image evoked by an object (which may be illusory).

2. The LXX uses the term in a derogatory sense for images of the gods, or idols. In this regard it is referring polemically to the deities themselves, which are empty, and which thus express the unreality of pagan belief. The main point is not that another god is worshipped but that this is an unreal god. The Greeks do not follow this usage, so that the LXX here coins a new expression out of a familiar term.

3. NT usage rests on that of the LXX. The word and its derivatives occur only in Acts 7:41; 15:20, the Pauline writings, 1 Jn. 5:21, Peter, and Rev. 9:20. Paul obviously does not regard idols as true gods (1 Th. 1:9). They are not divine by nature but the products of human sin and folly (Gal. 4:8; Rom. 1:23). Demons lie behind them (1 Cor. 10:19; cf. Dt. 32:17), though demons are not what pagans believe their gods to be (cf. 1 Cor. 8:5).

eidōlóthyton. This adjectival noun, the Jewish term for hieróthyton, denotes meat deriving from pagan sacrifice (cf. 1 Cor. 10:28). Jews were forbidden to eat this or to trade in it because of its defiling effect. This strict prohibition reflects the firm rejection of every kind of religious syncretism. It does not rest on superstition but on regard for the first commandment. Paul allows such meat to be eaten but only apart from the cultic act (1 Cor. 10:14ff.) and according to the law of love (8:1ff.). He appeals to Ps. 24:1 (10:26) and the overcoming of legalism by faith. The apostolic decree, however, advises against eating meat sacrificed to idols (Acts 15:29; 21:15), and Rev. 2:14, 20 condemns it when it is an expression of the same libertinism as is reflected in licentiousness.

eidōleíon. This term, found only in the Greek Bible and the NT (1 Cor. 8:10), is a scornful word for the pagan temple as a house of idols.

kateídōlos. Found only in Acts 17:16, this word means either “rich in idols” or “idolatrous”; either fits well with vv. 22-23.

eidōlolátrēs, eidōlolatría. These terms occur only in the NT; eidōlolatría (which is more correct than eidōlolatreía) is the pagan opposite of Jewish latreía. The words denote a gross sin and come in the lists of vices in 1 Cor. 5:10-11; 6:9; Gal. 5:20; Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5; 1 Pet. 4:3; Rev. 21:8. eidōlolatría is equated with pleonexía in Col. 3:5; Eph. 5:5; cf. mammon as an idol in Mt. 6:24. Participating in pagan feasts is eidōlolatría in 1 Cor. 10:7, 14. [F. BÜSCHEL, II, 375-80]

eikḗ [in vain]

This adverbial term means "at random," "for no objective reason," "simply," "in vain." The usual NT sense is "in vain" (Rom. 13:4; 1 Cor. 15:2; Gal. 3:4), but "without basis or reason" is the meaning in Col. 2:18. There is good support for eikḗ as "without a cause" in Mt. 5:22. [F. BÜSCHEL, II, 380-81]

eikṓn [image]

A. The Prohibition of Images in the OT. The belief that God is not to be depicted is intrinsic to the OT (cf. Ex. 20:4). The cultus presents a uniform picture here, and the prohibition is fundamental. God's spiritual nature underlies the belief, yet not in the sense that God is remote from matter, but rather in the sense that he is not under human control. There is thus no literary depiction either (cf. Ex. 24:9-10). The ark has no associated images and is linked only to God's spiritual presence. The dedication of the temple stresses that God dwells in obscurity and governs even the sky's brightest luminary, the sun (1 Kgs. 8:12). God is not equated with such natural phenomena as earthquakes or fires (1 Kgs. 19:11ff.), for again these are his work. The doctrine of creation explains the prohibition of images, for what sense is there in seeking likenesses of God in things that he has made (Ex. 20:4)? Is. 40:12ff. formulates this plainly. A further point is that Israel saw no figure of God when he spoke to her from the fire (Dt. 4:15-16). Making images is thus an act of disobedience (Am. 5:26). The people find this hard to accept, as may be seen from the constant forging of images from the golden calf onward, but the intention is probably to worship God even when praying to idols. The prophets, however, see that making images perverts the religion of Israel, and with the help of such humorous descriptions as that of Is. 44:12ff. they finally establish the prohibition. [G. VON RAD, II, 381-83]

B. Images in Judaism and Christianity.

1. For Jews the prohibition has three practical implications. The first (a.) is the avoidance and removal of all images of alien gods. Jews and Christians have always regarded violation of this rule as apostasy. The pictures of animals and stars on the temple curtain are merely artistic symbols. Similarly, the representation of the sun-chariot by Byzantine artists is purely conventional. The second implication (b.) is the absence of depictions of Yahweh in the cultus. At the most we find only pictures of the hand of God at Isaac's sacrifice and in the lifting up of Ezekiel. The third implication (c.) is that depictions of human beings and animals are also partially avoided. Jewish art especially avoids human figures, since humans are made in God's image, but several exceptions have been found in the depiction of biblical scenes. As regards animals, those that are symbols of a deity are strictly avoided, but in other cases animals serve as harmless decoration. Objects used in worship, e.g., the ark of the law, the horn, the knife of circumcision, and the candlestick, may also be depicted. Art thus serves to present God's acts rather than God himself. There is no intrinsic interest in the appearance of God or the exercises of his worshippers, as in pagan art; the focal point is God and his history.

2. Representations of God are just as objectionable for Christians. The NT never even thinks of giving a picture of Jesus (or indeed the apostles). The crucial thing is not worshipping an image but listening to the word. Only in the period after the NT do we have artistic development by way of religious decoration and Christian symbols to depictions of Christ and the apostles. In the NT the absence of any positive interest also means the lack of any negative opposition.

3. The question of images arises in the NT in the following passages. a. Images on coins are at issue in Mk. 12:16. These are offensive to Jews because they violate the commandment and depict alien rulers, but for practical reasons the coins have to be used. b. The image of the beast must not be worshipped according to Rev. 13:14-15 etc. There is a clash here with the widespread ruler cult, as there had been in Dan. 3:5ff. and continually in Jewish history, e.g., when the Alexandrian mob put images of the emperor in the synagogues in A.D. 38, and as there would be for Christians (cf. Pliny's Letters 10.96). Rev. 13:15 reminds us of priestly devices to make images move. [G. KITTEL, II, 383-88]

C. The Greek Use of eikṓn. Linked with eíkō, "to be like, similar," "to appear," eikṓn means "image" a. as an artistic representation, b. as a mental image, and c. as a likeness or manifestation.

1. In Col. 1:15 Christ is the image of the invisible God. Since a representation of what is invisible is impossible, the meaning here is a revelation with substantial participation, as in Plato and Philo. The eikṓn is not alien to the object, nor present only in the mind, but is in fact its reality and illumines its inner essence. Thus in Platonic cosmology the world is the visible image of the intelligible autozṓon.

2. In popular Greek religion, the god is present in the image, as is shown by the miracles and magic associated with images. The copies have the same powers, feelings, etc. as the originals. Rulers are also gods in visible manifestation. [H. KLEINKNECHT, II, 388-90]

D. The Divine Likeness in the OT.

1. We can understand the divine likeness in the OT only if we remember the distance between God and us. This puts the divine likeness on the margin. Nevertheless it is highly important in relation to human origins, for while we humans are made of earthly materials, God acts more directly in our creation, and precision is given to the special relationship by Gen. 1:28: "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness."

2. Mythical ideas may underlie this, but the only point of mentioning this is to prevent us from taking the phrase in modern terms, e.g., as though it referred to personality or moral capacity. Nor should we read too much into the double statement "in our image and after our likeness." Nor is it a vital question whether spiritual or bodily likeness is at issue. Obviously there is no speculation on God's own form. The main point is to indicate that humans belong by nature to the divine sphere. Yet the image is transmitted by the physical sequence of generations (Gen. 5:1ff.). Ps. 8:5-6 similarly transcends the spiritual/physical alternative, for here humans have a glory of outward appearance, yet their true glory lies, like God's, in the inner force that is native to them. If the OT does not finally say what the divine likeness really consists of, it has much to say about its implications. Humans are to control creation as God's vicegerents (Gen. 1:26). They are thus to represent the divine dominion and majesty (cf. Ps. 8; also Sir. 17:3-4).

3. The OT nowhere speaks about the loss of the divine likeness, but the decline in the length of life suggests degeneration of our native force. [G. VON RAD, II, 390-92]

E. The Divine Likeness in Judaism.

1. In expounding Gen. 1:26-27 rabbinic exegesis tends to focus on the meaning of "let us," whether it refers to consultation with God's own heart, with angels, with the law, or with heaven and earth. No problem is felt with the divine image, nor is there any suggestion of its general loss, only of its diminution or effacement by the sins of specific individuals or groups.

2. The Greek spirit raises the question of the divine image as a metaphysical gift, as in Wis. 2:23-24. Philo associates it with the number seven and also with noús and lógos. He also makes much of a distinction between "in our image," which applies to the heavenly humanity that has no part in mortality or earthliness, and "after our likeness," which applies to the earthly humanity of Gen. 2:7-8.

F. The Metaphorical Use of Image in the NT.

1. In the NT the original is present in the image, which gives it visible manifestation. Thus Heb. 10:1 distinguishes eikṓn from mere skiá : The law has the shadow, but not the true form of the realities at issue. Rom. 1:23 is to the same effect when it uses homoíōma for the copy and eikṓn for the actual figure of the humans, birds, or animals that are put in the place of God (cf. Wis. 13:13).

*2. Christ as the eikṓn toú theoú. In this phrase (2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15), the stress is on the equality of the eikṓn with the original. Christ is in the form of God and equal to God (cf. Phil. 2:6). To see him is to see the Father (Jn. 14:9). "Beloved Son" in Col. 1:13 drives home the point. The phrase comes, of course, from Gen. 1:27. But Christ is the second Adam (1 Cor. 15:45ff.). If he thus plays for Paul the role that lógos plays for Philo, Paul's interest is not in the least speculative. The point for him is that Christ is given to us as God's image so that we may know what God wills and does. The concept of the image of God also makes it perfectly plain who Jesus himself is.

3. Man as Image. In 1 Cor. 11:7 Paul can also apply Gen. 1:27 to the male so as to bring out certain practical consequences for daily conduct. A little later, however, on the basis of Gen. 5:3, he contrasts our present bearing of the image of the earthly man with our future bearing of the image of the heavenly man. The idea here is that our being as the eikṓn of God is restored by union with Christ as eikṓn. This comes out plainly in Rom. 8:29, where our being conformed to Christ is given its distinctive emphasis by the fact that this means participation in his divine likeness. Those who are in Christ's image are in God's image in the true and original sense of Gen. 1:27. This likeness is the goal. 2 Cor. 3:18 carries the same message. Seeing the Lord's glory means sharing it and thus being changed into his likeness. The concern of the Christian life is already the putting on of the new being that is renewed after the image of its Creator (Col. 3:10). When does this restoration of the image in Christ take place? There is undoubtedly an eschatological future in 1 Cor. 15:49b and Rom. 8:29, but this future is linked to something that happens already in 2 Cor. 3:18 and Col. 3:10, so that the restoration is also a goal of ethical action. We have a first instalment of the eikṓn, as of other gifts, so that it now is even though it is still to be. [G. KITTEL, II, 392-97]

heilikrinḗs [pure], heilikríneia [purity]

Formed from heílē ("warmth or light of the sun") and krínō ("to test"), these words mean "tested by sunlight," i.e., "pure," and "purity." In the NT (Phil. 1:10; 2 Pet. 3:1; 1 Cor. 5:8; 2 Cor. 1:12; 2:17) they refer to moral purity. [F. BÜSCHEL, II, 397-98]

eimí [to exist], ho ṓn ["I am"]

1. Already in the LXX ho ṓn is used for God (Ex. 3:14). Philo has it too, and it is a divine predicate in Josephus. In the NT Revelation uses it in the formulas in 11:17; 1:4, 8; 4:8—formulas of worship, salutation, and self-predication. The nondeclinability of ho ṓn and the quasi-participial use of ḗn preserve the sanctity of the divine self-predication. The formulas express God's deity and supratemporality. Similar formulas occur in Judaism. The Greeks also use two- and three-tense formulas to express eternity (cf. Homer, Plato, and an Eleusinian inscription). These possibly came into Revelation by way of the Jewish tradition, though a common source may lie behind the Greek and Jewish traditions.

2. egṓ eimí as a self-designation of Jesus in Jn. 8:58 (cf. 8:24; 13:19) stands in contrast to the genésthai applied to Abraham. Jesus thus claims eternity. As he is equal to the Father (5:18ff.), what is ascribed to the Father is attributed to him too (cf. Is. 43:10 LXX). The context and the egṓ formulation are both Jewish. The point is not Jesus' self-identification as the Messiah ("I am he") but his supratemporal being.

3. For egṓ eimí with nouns of predication, see egṓ. [F. BÜSCHEL, II, 398-400]

→ egṓ

eirḗnē [peace], eirēneúō [to keep peace], eirēnikós [peaceful], eirēnopoiós [peacemaker], eirēnopoiéō [to make peace] eirḗnē.

A. The Greek Concept of eirḗnē. For the Greeks eirḗnē primarily denotes a state, not a relationship or attitude. It is the opposite of pólemos ("war"). It is linked with treaties of peace or the conclusion of peace. It is also the opposite of disturbance. In a negative sense, it may denote a peaceful attitude, i.e., the absence of hostile feelings. In the age of Augustus it carries echoes of redemption, but also implies in everyday reality the legal security of the pax Romana. [W. FOERSTER, II, 400-402]

B. shālôm in the OT.

1. This term is in general use but has a strong religious content. To arrive at its theological sense we must look at it in context and also consider the concept even where the term itself is not used. Its basic sense is not the narrower one of "peace" but the wider one of "well-being." It may be used for the good fortune of the wicked, for health, and for national prosperity, which implies stability. In many passages it denotes friendly relationships, whether between states (1 Kgs. 5:26) or individuals (Zech. 6:13). It is thus linked with covenant; a covenant initiates or seals it (Josh. 9:15; Ezek. 34:25). In Ezekiel it is God who makes the covenant that results in peace, so that the term can finally express the relationship between God and his people (cf. Is. 54:10).

2. shālôm as the Gift of Yahweh. While there is a material content to shālôm, it is always a religious term inasmuch as all blessings are seen to come from God. In all probability, then, the religious significance is primary. This comes to expression in the name of Gideon's altar in Judg. 6:24: "The Lord is peace." God creates peace in the heavens (Job 25:2), but he also pledges peace to us, blesses his people with peace, and wills the welfare of his servants; we are thus to pray for the peace of Jerusalem (cf. Pss. 35:27; 122:6). The peace that God gives is all-sufficient. It carries with it solid blessings, e.g., peace from enemies and wild beasts (cf. Lev. 26:6), but all this is a blessing of salvation in the special sense of occupation of the promised land.

3. shālôm in the Prophetic Message. In the history of prophecy shālôm is a key term inasmuch as true prophets are in conflict with those who promise a false peace. Micaiah ben Imlah, for example, takes his stand against the many prophets of salvation. Micah accuses such prophets of delivering their message for gain (3:5ff.). Jeremiah comes into dramatic encounter with those who say "Peace, peace," when there is no peace (ch. 28). Ezekiel is engaged in the same struggle (Ezek. 13:16). The problem with the false prophets is not that there is no true message of peace but that they construe peace as purely political, ignore the sins of the people, and thus fail to see or proclaim impending judgment. The defeats of 597 and 586 B.C. resolve the conflict and open the door to the promise of true peace from God in the larger and fuller sense. Thus Jeremiah proclaims God's plans of welfare in 29:11 and Ezekiel announces God's covenant of peace in 34:25. As may be seen from Is. 48:18 and 54:13, more than political peace is now at issue, for peace is associated with righteousness. The term still embraces welfare and peace, but it has the more comprehensive implication of salvation in its total range and scope.

4. shālôm as an Element in Eschatological Expectation. The promise of shālôm in the fuller sense brings the term into the orbit of eschatological expectation. The term may not always occur, but when restoration of paradise is prophesied, international peace promised (Is. 2:2ff.), or a humble king of peace awaited (Zech. 9:9-10), we have a proclamation of peace of the widest possible import. No special significance thus attaches to the actual use of the word, as when “prince of peace” is one of the messianic titles in Is. 9:5, for the whole point of the Messiah is that he guards and guarantees enduring peace (cf. v. 7). “He is peace,” as Micah says in 5:5 (if this is the correct reading). An interesting point is that for all its wealth of meaning in the OT, shālôm nowhere denotes specifically an attitude of inward peace. shālôm always finds external manifestation, and in its most common use it is a social rather than an individual term. [G. VON RAD, II, 402-06]

C. eirḗnē in the LXX.

1. Since the LXX mostly uses eirḗnē for the OT shālôm, the content of the Hebrew naturally influences the Greek term, and in turn the LXX usage affects the significance of eirḗnē for Greek-speaking Christians.

2. shālôm comes close to eirḗnē in its Greek sense when it is contrasted to war (Prov. 17:1) or the reference is to a state of peace (Is. 14:30) or to peace between nations (Judg. 4:17). But even in such cases eirḗnē can take on a broader sense, as in Zech. 8:12 or 1 Kgs. 2:13 (in contrast to 2 Kgs. 9:17ff.). This is even more true when shālôm has nothing to do with peace as the opposite of war but implies well-being as distinct from every form of evil, as in salutations, or in relation to the work of physicians (Sir. 38:8), or in the problem posed by the good fortune of the wicked (Ps. 73:3). In such contexts eirḗnē has to denote, not merely rest, but a state of well-being or wholeness, so that one can even be said to die in peace (as distinct from suffering violence). Nor is this well-being restricted to material welfare. It covers good in the widest sense, as when Prov. 3:17 says that the paths of wisdom are paths of peace, or when Ps. 34:14 equates the pursuit of peace with the doing of good.

3. The equation of eirḗnē with ethical good leads on to the use of eirḗnē for the good that comes from God either in this age or in the age of salvation (cf. Is. 45:7), where eirḗnē embraces both the blessings of Lev. 26:3ff. and that of Num. 26:6. Peace in this sense is all that is good. It is the peace of those who love the law (Ps. 119:165). When God speaks it, his salvation is at hand (Ps. 85:8-9). Yet it is not just an inner state, for the soul is bereft of peace when it has forgotten what happiness is (Lam. 3:17).

4. The LXX sometimes uses other terms for shālôm, mostly in greetings or when external welfare is plainly at issue, e.g., Gen. 26:31; 28:21; 29:6; Josh. 10:21; Ex. 18:7. The aim in such cases is to keep more closely to common Greek usage. eirḗnē is also used for other Hebrew terms on occasion, as in 1 Chr. 4:40; Prov. 3:23; Ezek. 34:27; 39:6, 26. (For details, see TDNT, II, 408.)

D. shālôm in Rabbinic Writings. shālôm is a common term in rabbinic works. It occurs in greetings in the general sense of well-being. The rabbis also use it for God’s gift to his people. Peace is the portion of the righteous and the sum of messianic blessings, although with a stress on concord in Israel. Peace is also the opposite of individual or national strife. Along these lines peacemaking holds a high place in rabbinic estimation. Envy and strife are opposed to God’s will, threaten the continuation of the world, and impede the coming of the Messiah. Conflict exists between God and the human race, or even God and Israel when Israel is guilty of idolatry; there is thus a reciprocal relationship with God in which we, too, must act for the establishment of peace.

E. eirḗnē in the Pseudepigrapha, Josephus, and Philo. As concerns the religious use of eirḗnē, the pseudepigrapha present us with the angel of peace. Peace in this connection is salvation expressed in cessation from war; its opposite is divine judgment, not conflict with God. Peace is thus linked with pardon or mercy, but it is also linked with light and thus has a positive implication. Peace can also mean concord between humans. Josephus follows OT and rabbinic usage. Philo is closer to the Greek tradition in his interpretation of peace as primarily political peace or as the inner rest (or absence of desire) that belongs to God and is to be sought from him.

F. eirḗnē in the NT. In the NT eirḗnē is first used in greetings, as in the rabbis (cf. Mk. 5:34; Jms. 2:16; Jn. 20:19); with mercy in 1 and 2 Timothy, 2 John, and Jude; Paul uses "grace and peace"; cf. also Rev. 1:4. Peace also occurs in closing greetings, e.g., in 1 Pet. 5:14; 3 Jn. 15. Parallels to the OT "go in peace" occur in Acts 15:33 and 1 Cor. 16:11, and Simeon's saying in Lk. 2:29 has a similar formal sense. The main meaning in the NT is obviously not the Greek one but salvation in a deeper sense. This embraces human concord, as in Acts 7:26 etc., but also peace with God. Closer to the Greek are the use for the opposite of war in Acts 12:20; 24:2; Mt. 10:34 and Paul's use for peace of soul (cf. Rom. 15:13). The OT basis comes out plainly in such expressions as "making peace" in Jms. 3:18 and "giving a greeting of peace" in Jn. 14:27. Lk. 14:32 possibly contains an Aramaism for offering a greeting rather than seeking conditions, but in context it carries the implication of submission and homage. In the material use of the NT we find peace as a feeling of rest, peace as a state of reconciliation with God, and peace as eschatological salvation; the last of these is basic.

1. eirḗnē in Its Widest Sense as the Normal State of All Things. In 1 Cor. 14:33 peace is for Paul the normal state as distinct from the confusion of unruly prophesying at Corinth. This peace is what God wills, not merely for the soul or for the human race, but for his whole creation.

2. eirḗnē as the Eschatological Salvation of the Whole Person.

a. The shālôm of the OT is the basis here. Thus in Lk. 1:79 eirḗnē is the awaited eschatological salvation. In Lk. 2:14 again peace is the salvation that has now come to the earth. Salvation is also the sense in Lk. 19:42 and 19:38b, and cf. Rev. 12:10; 19:1. In Rev. 12:10 peace is said to have come as a historical event in Christ (cf. Heb. 13:10). Melchizedek as a type of Christ is the king of peace (Heb. 7:2), the gospel is the gospel of peace (Eph. 6:15), and Christ leaves peace with his disciples (Jn. 14:27), the opposite of this being affliction (16:33). When the disciples go out in Christ's name, they offer peace (Lk. 10:5-6; Mt. 10:13). We are to seek this peace (Heb. 12:14). It is a power which protects us (Phil. 4:7) and which rules in the heart (Col. 3:15), although in human relations it may sometimes result in the very opposite of peace (Mt. 10:34-35).

b. In all these passages eirḗnē is materially parallel to zōḗ, and Paul makes this equation in Rom. 8:6. The striving of the flesh is enmity against God and leads to death (v. 7). Life and peace come when the mind is set on the Spirit; this brings salvation. There is a parallel in 2 Pet. 3:14, where eirḗnē is neither inner peace nor grace, but the perfect well-being of reconstitution in God's image. Along these lines Paul calls God the God of peace who will crush Satan (Rom. 16:20) and secure our total salvation (1 Th. 5:23; cf. Heb. 13:20-21). Peace, then, embraces the salvation of the whole person, and in Christ this is already present as the power of God.

3. eirḗnē as Peace with God. Occasionally eirḗnē denotes peace with God. This is the point in Eph. 2:14ff. As the law has both divided Jews and Gentiles and separated Israel from God, so Christ our peace has healed both relationships, for he has broken down the wall of hostility by reconciling us all to God. Peace with God is solely at issue in Rom. 5:1. It is the relationship in which God places believers by his reconciling work in Christ. The context suggests that the indicative "we have" is the true reading in spite of the better attestation of the imperative "let us have."

4. eirḗnē as Peace with One Another. When Paul in Rom. 14:17 says that God's kingdom is peace, he is stating that the rule of God is one in which there is no evil or discord; he can thus exhort us to pursue what makes for peace (v. 19), i.e., to avoid squabbling about meats or days. The saying in 1 Cor. 7:15c is to the same effect. If a pagan partner breaks off a marriage, the Christian must accept this, the reason being ("for," not "but") that God has called us to peace. Peace here again means the avoidance of discord, though it also has the positive content of a divinely willed state of normalcy. In 2 Tim. 2:22 we are not just to foster peace with the devout, since metá here means "along with"; what is in view is staying out of stupid controversies (v. 23), but with a hint of salvation in the context of righteousness, faith, and love. Concord is the obvious sense in Eph. 4:3 and Jms. 3:18, and probably also in 1 Pet. 3:11.

5. eirḗnē as Peace of Soul. Peace of soul is meant in Rom. 15:13, although this peace is possible only through the saving work of God which restores our normal state. In contrast to Stoic galḗnē it is a positive state inseparably connected with joy and faith.

eirēneúō. a. "To live in peace," "to be at peace" as a state; b. "to keep peace," "to live at peace with" as an attitude; c. "to make peace," "to reconcile." In the NT the word is used only for "to keep peace" with en or metá. In Mk. 9:50 severity in self-discipline is perhaps contrasted with being at peace with others. In 1 Th. 5:13 the point seems to be that we should be at peace with one another. This is also what is meant in Rom. 12:18 and 2 Cor. 13:11.

eirēnikós. a. "That which relates to peace"; b. "peaceful"; c. more generally the opposite of unrest. Only sense a. occurs in the LXX. Philo uses the term for the wise who have peace of soul. The only NT instances are in Jms. 3:17 and Heb. 12:11. In the former the meaning is "ready for peace," "peaceful," while in the latter, as an attribute of righteousness, the word means "salutary" (cf. eirḗnē F.2.).

eirēnopoiós. "One who makes peace." The rabbis extol pacification as a work of love and Philo calls God a peacemaker, but the term can also be applied to strong rulers who establish peace by force. The only NT use (Mt. 5:9) is along the lines of the rabbinic view. Blessing is pronounced on those who promote human concord (not general well-being or peace with God); God calls them his children because they are like him.

eirēnopoiéō. "To make peace" (or more generally in Prov. 10:10 LXX "to promote well-being"). In the one NT instance in Col. 1:19 (cf. Eph. 2:14ff.) the idea is that by his reconciling work in Christ God has made peace for all things on earth or in heaven (both with himself and with each other). [W. FOERSTER, II, 406-20]

eis [in, into, until, etc.]

Originally spatial, this word takes on theological significance in the NT.

A. The Spatial Use of eis.

1. The Cosmic and Soteriological Sense. In the NT eis expresses the living connection between divine and cosmic realities. In Greek thought the gods belong to the cosmos. Even dualism makes only a static distinction. Hades is another place; it is not God's world. Even in circles which speak of an ascent of the soul, eis plays only a minor role. Formally the OT speaks in a similar way, as though, when God comes down, he were simply changing place within the same reality (cf. Gen. 18:21; Ex. 3:8). Yet his superiority over all creatures is strongly asserted, as in Ex. 33:18ff.; Is. 6, so that heaven cannot contain him (1 Kgs. 8:27) and his presence is the willed and gracious address of the covenant God (vv. 28ff.). Judaism thus develops an aversion to anthropomorphic statements and carries the divine transcendence almost to the point of straining the link between God and the world except for a firm belief in providence. Thus the LXX paraphrases Ex. 15:3 and Ex. 24:10, Jubilees omits God's walking in the garden in its rendering of Gen. 3, Palestinian Judaism posits a series of heavens, and apocalyptic works begin to place greater weight on the preposition eis, e.g., in the coming of angels to the world, or in relation to apocalyptic vision. The NT inherits the distinction between the divine and human worlds but bridges the gulf with the concept of fulfilment in Christ. In this context eis takes on a new significance as follows.

a. "Into the world" delimits earthly creation from all other reality. We all come into the world (Jn. 1:9). Sin and death come into the world (Rom. 5:12); there is perhaps a hint of a transcendent background here, though cf. "through one man."

b. Divine love comes into the world to bring salvation. The NT links this with the preexistent Son, although faith focuses more on the goal than the origin. In this regard eis is not present in the Synoptics and is rare in Paul (cf. Rom. 10:6; Phil. 2:5ff.). The thought of God's sending, however, gives it great importance in John (cf. 1 Jn. 4:9), as does that of the Logos himself coming into the world (Jn. 11:27). As the Father sent the Son into the world, so the Son sends his disciples (Jn. 17:18). In the light of the incarnation (Jn. 1:14), this derived mission takes on an eternal quality.

c. The Christ who came down for our salvation passes through humiliation into the heavenly world of God. This receives greater emphasis in the NT than preexistence (cf. Lk. 24:5; Acts 1:11; Heb. 9:24; Eph. 4:8ff., and materially Acts 3:21; Rom. 1:4; Phil. 2:9ff.). A prior journey to the nether regions may be presupposed, as in Rom. 10:7 and especially 1 Pet. 3:19; 4:6 (but not Eph. 4:9).

d. The divine act of salvation forces us to decide where our own path is to lead, either through unbelief and disobedience to destruction (Mt. 7:19; 5:29-30; 3:10; Rev. 19:20; Mt. 13:42; 5:25; 8:12; 25:46), or through faith and obedience to life (Mt. 7:14; 25:21; Lk. 16:22; Mt. 5:20; 2 Pet. 1:11), which is present even now (Jn. 5:24); these references usually contain a spatial as well as a stronger or weaker figurative element.

2. The Psychological Sense.

a. eis denotes the intrusion of good or bad influences into the center of personality, e.g., demons in Mt. 9:25, evil from Satan in Jn. 13:2, Satan in Lk. 22:3, a wicked purpose from God himself in judgment in Rev. 17:17, the Spirit of God in 1 Th. 4:8; Gal. 4:6, and cf. the prodigal's return to himself in Lk. 15:17.

b. With verbs of sending or speaking, eis denotes address; cf. Jesus in Mt. 15:24, God in Acts 2:22, the gospel in Mk. 13:10, and cf. also Lk. 7:1; 2 Cor. 10:16; 1 Pet. 1:25. By its regular use of such constructions, which are good Greek but rest on the Hebrew, Christianity shows itself to be a religion of the word.

c. eis may also describe a situation, e.g., being led into temptation (Mt. 6:13), or shut up in disobedience (Rom. 11:32), or having every thought brought captive into Christ's sphere (2 Cor. 10:5). This is perhaps also the point in Rom. 6:17; cf. Rom. 5:2; Gal. 1:6.

B. The Temporal Use of eis.

1. When a point of time is given, the sense is "until" (cf. Mt. 10:22; 2 Tim. 1:12). When a period is mentioned, the sense is "for" (cf. Lk. 12:19).

2. More common in the NT is the use in which an action is performed with a view to some end, e.g., caring for the day in Mk. 6:34, being sealed for the day of redemption in Eph. 4:30, being pure or laying a good foundation for the day of Christ in Phil. 1:10; 1 Tim. 6:1; cf. 1 Pet. 1:5; Gal. 3:23-24. In such cases the reference is usually eschatological.

C. The Modal Use. eis sometimes denotes intensity, e.g., Jn. 13:1 ("to the utmost" as well as "to the end"); Heb. 7:25; 2 Cor. 10:13 (where the distinction between justifiable and unjustifiable boasting is qualitative); 2 Cor. 4:17 ("in excess to excess" in the sense of beyond all comparison).

D. eis in a Logical Connection.

1. Very occasionally eis states a reason, e.g., "in view of" in Rom. 4:20; cf. Mt. 12:41; 2 Cor. 10:16; Gal. 6:4 where, after testing, the self, not others, must provide reason for boasting.

2. eis denotes appointment, as in Mt. 5:22; 1 Cor. 11:22; Col. 2:22; Jms. 5:3; Rev. 22:2.

a. Divine appointment: the angels are appointed to minister to the heirs of salvation (Heb. 1:14), Moses as a witness (Heb. 3:5), Scripture for instruction (Rom. 15:4), Paul to publish good news (Rom. 1:1), believers to salvation (1 Th. 5:9), sonship (Eph. 1:5), or a living hope (1 Pet. 1:3-4), others to destruction or ignoble use (Rom. 9:21ff.; 2 Tim. 2:20).

b. Human appointment: missionaries are appointed to do God's work (Acts 13:2); believers are to take the bread and wine in remembrance of Christ (1 Cor. 11:24-25), and to do all things to God's glory (1 Cor. 10:31).

3. Consecutive and final eis. eis may denote the directing of an action to a specific end, whether intentionally or incidentally.

a. With a noun or pronominal accusative it usually has a final sense (cf. D.2.), as in "for a witness to them" (Mk. 1:44) or "in memory of her" (Mk. 14:9). Thus the gospel is God's power "to salvation" (Rom. 1:16), Christ is an expiation "to show God's righteousness" (Rom. 3:25), Paul's mission aims at the obedience of faith (Rom. 1:5), eternal life (1 Tim. 1:16), and edification (Eph. 4:12), and God's praise and glory (Eph. 1:6; Rom. 15:7) are the goals of God's saving action. The use may also be consecutive, as in 1 Cor. 11:17; Rev. 13:3; 2 Cor. 7:9-10; Rom. 10:10; 13:4, where the result, not the purpose, is indicated; cf. Col. 1:11, where endurance and patience are the result of strengthening. Yet the line is a fine one and sometimes precise differentiation is impossible; cf. Rom. 14:1; 1 Cor. 12:13 ("one body" is either the purpose or the result); Rom. 13:4 (wrath is either purpose or result). "To faith" in Rom. 1:17 seems to be final, but "to glory" in 2 Cor. 3:18 is consecutive; neither follows OT analogies such as Jer. 3:9; Ps. 84:7.

b. With nominal accusative or accusative and infinitive eis is mainly final though sometimes consecutive. Rom. 12:3; Mt. 20:19, etc. are final, as are Rom. 1:11; Heb. 2:17; Jms. 1:18, but Heb. 11:3 is consecutive (cf. Rom. 6:12; 2 Th. 2:10), and both uses may be found in Rom. 4:11-12 (consecutive), 16 (final), and 18 (consecutive). As regards guilt, the theological question arises whether it is an immanent result or a divine purpose. "To make them believe" in 2 Th. 2:11 might be consecutive but is probably final in view of the final clause that follows, but Rom. 1:20 cannot be final, since the point is to show the ground of the complaint, and we should thus render: "So that they are without excuse."

E. The eis of Personal Relationship.

1. eis denotes relationship as such in a neutral sense, "with reference to," "relative to" (cf. 1 Cor. 4:6; Eph. 5:32). This is probably the meaning in Lk. 12:21 (rich in relation to God) and Rom. 5:18 (with effect upon all).

2. eis may denote hostile relationship, either a. enmity against God, the Son of Man, the Spirit, or God's messengers in the form of sin (cf. Lk. 15:18; Rom. 8:7,; 1 Cor. 8:12; Mk. 3:29 [blasphemy]), or b. enmity against others as persecution (Jn. 15:21) or wrongdoing (Mt. 18:15; 1 Cor. 8:12). The NT does not use eis for God's reaction to sin or sinners; God is not our enemy.

3. eis denotes a friendly relationship a. between believers (Rom. 12:10; 16:6; 1 Cor. 16:3), b. between God and us (Rom. 5:8) or God and believers (2 Cor. 1:11; 1 Pet. 1:10), and c. between us and God: we were created for God (1 Cor. 8:6), and we are to repent toward God (Acts 20:21) and to believe in (eis) God or Christ, into whom, or whose name, we are baptized. (It should be noted that believing in Christ is rare in the Synoptic Gospels, Acts, and Paul, but common in John's Gospel, where it is found over 30 times between 2:11 and 17:20.).

F. Individual Points and Questions of Hebraisms.

1. eis may occur where one would expect en, e.g., when being in a place results from movement to it, e.g., Mt. 2:23; Mk. 1:39; Mk. 1:9 (dipping into the Jordan is suggested here); 2 Cor. 1:21. This interchangeability of eis and en is not a Hebraism but is Homeric. Most of the instances are in Luke and Acts (Acts 7:12 etc.).

2. eis can denote the predicate with verbs of becoming (Mt. 21:42), being (Mk. 10:8), holding (Mt. 21:46), etc., or the result with verbs like gather (Jn. 11:52), perfect (Jn. 17:23), reckon (Rom. 4:3). This again is not just a Hebraism.

3. eis can replace the genitive or dative (1 Pet. 1:11; 1:4; Eph. 3:16); this is common usage in the Koine and modern Greek. [A. OEPKE, II, 420-34]

heís [one, single]

1. The Understanding of Uniqueness in the NT. Only rarely is heís used as a digit in the NT. It usually means "single," "once-for-all," "unique," "unanimous," "one of many," or "only one." Theologically the most important feature is that God is one (as in Dt. 6:4). There is none beside him (Mk. 12:29). The origin and goal of the world are one in him. History and salvation history are a unity in the one Christ. This rules out dualism. We can serve only one Lord (Mt. 6:24). There is an inviolable union with him (1 Cor. 6:17)—the basis of the union of marriage (Eph. 5:31). Hence everything depends on one thing (Mk. 10:21). Keeping the law stands or falls with one commandment (Jms. 2:10). We must be strong for one hour. Disaster strikes in one hour. The NT shows a very strong sense of the significance of the particular. Yet this does not mean individualism. God works through the unity of family or people. God's action sets us in a threefold relation to himself, others, and the world. We are bound to the many. We are saved for their sake (Gal. 1:15ff.). We have to sacrifice what is most individual. Our heart's desire comes to expression in intercession (Rom. 9:3). Conversely, the destiny of others hinges on individuals (Rom. 11:1). NT thinking is organic. The alternative of contingent facts or rational truths is thus irrelevant. All things are determined by the heritage of the past and the dawning of the future, as well as by the decisive character of the present (Gal. 6:7ff.). Past ages, figures, and events decide what is to come. This thought is worked out in two great complexes, that of Adam and the common destiny of the race, and that of Christ and the unity of the church.

2. Adam and the Common Destiny of the Race.

a. Genesis portrays the unity of the race and its destiny in Adam and the fall. Judaism develops this thought, whether in the sense of original sin or of individual sins that start with Adam.

b. In the NT the growth, spread, and history of the race are traced from a single point (Acts 17:26). Adam's history is that of the origin of sin and its consequences (Rom. 5:12). The fall is historically once-for-all, i.e., it takes place once, but does so as the first in a series. It thus becomes the principle of sin that engulfs all members of the race.

c. Knowing the seriousness of this once-for-allness, we appreciate the inescapability of our situation. Death reigns (Rom. 5:14, 17). Our present disposition impels us to sin willingly and thus delivers us up to death. Adam's fall creates a historical fact which implies both external compulsion and inner corruption of the will, so that we all go the way of Adam (Rom. 3:10ff.). Being one with Adam, we are one in responsibility for sin, suffering, and death.

3. Christ and the Unity of the Church.

a. Adam points beyond himself to the second man, Christ (Rom. 5:14; 1 Cor. 15:47). As in Adam all die, in Christ all shall be made alive (1 Cor. 15:21-22). In this antitype of Adam, the race is given a new beginning and principle (Rom. 5:18). He is the head of the new race. Christ is man and more than man; he transcends every analogy. He continues the human line, breaks it, and begins a new line. He is more than those who precede and also than those who follow. Even as the positive counterpart of Adam, he is unique in relation to Adam; he is the divine Son (Mk. 12:6; Heb. 1:1ff.) who endows us, too, with sonship. This uniqueness is established by his special historical position, not by speculation. His work is the center of history. He ends all previous history and gives history a new beginning (Heb. 10:11ff.). He is the one for all (Jn. 11:50; 1 Cor. 15:3). The fact of Jesus is not just one event, nor does it merely illustrate an eternal law; it is all-decisive as the meeting point of all historical lines.

b. The destiny of the new humanity is fixed in Christ as that of the old humanity was fixed in Adam. "In Christ" denotes the unity of God's people (Gal. 3:28; Rom. 12:5). He is the head to which the church as his body is subject (Col. 2:10). Its growth is all from him (Col. 2:19). Its common existence, centered in the Spirit, is from him (1 Cor. 12:1ff.). It has a common destiny under his law; each must intercede for others and suffer and rejoice with them (1 Cor. 12:26; Gal. 6:2). Christ has brought the race together again in himself (Eph. 2:14-15). The church's own unity is thus of paramount importance (Eph. 4:4ff.). A new grouping comes, with those who believe in Christ on the one side, those who do not on the other. Christ himself is in unity with the Father and brings his own into the same fellowship (Jn. 17:23). He is the starting point and center of the new humanity as the Mediator through the historical event of his death and resurrection. The new situation created by this event is now a positive reality in the church—but in the church only as it takes this reality seriously in faith, thought, and action (cf. Eph. 4:3; Phil. 1:27; Rom. 12:6; Acts 4:32).

c. The unity of the church is not that of uniformity; it is organic. Differences exist between the members, i.e., between rich and poor, or men and women. These are not removed but they are transcended. Other differences emerge, e.g., between the strong and the weak. The Spirit also manifests himself in a rich plurality of charisms (1 Cor. 12:11ff.). Paul does not try to establish a Christian cosmopolitanism but is a Jew to Jews even while he resists the Judaizing of Gentiles. He sets himself in the world of his hearers to show how the cross is both offense and fulfilment for the world: the scandal that is the power of God and the foolishness that is the wisdom of God. In this regard Paul follows the divine model, for God brings Jews and Gentiles by different paths to the one salvation. Pentecost expresses this as by one Spirit the apostles preach one message in different tongues. With one saving event as its center, there is one church that is neither national nor universal, but the church of the nations. [E. STAUFFER, II, 434-42]

→ hápax, prṓtos, mónos, theós

eisakoúō → akoúō; eisdéchomai → déchomai; eisérchomai → érchomai; eiskaléomai → kaléō; eísodos → hodós; eisphérō → phérō; hekatón tesserákonta téssares → dṓdeka; ekbállō → bállō; ekdéchomai → déchomai; ekdēméō → dḗmos

ekdikéō [to avenge], ékdikos [avenger], ekdíkēsis [vengeance]

ekdikéō. By assimilation to ekdikázō, this acquires the sense "to avenge," "to punish." We find it in the LXX for a. (passive) "to be punished," b. "to avenge" with accusative of cause, c. "to avenge" with accusative of person (or dative), d. "to punish" with accusative of person (or dative), e. "to punish" with ex, epí, or more rarely en or pará of person, and f. "to avenge" with genitive of person or cause. In the OT the usage develops under the influence of the strong sense of the sanctity of blood, whereas a more legal concept affects the usage of the papyri, thus yielding the senses "to decide a case," "to contest a case," "to bring to judgment," and "to help to justice."

1. In the NT we find sense b. in 2 Cor. 10:6 and e. in Rev. 6:10; 19:2. The apostles are ready to punish disobedience; God avenges the blood of martyrs.

2. In Rom. 12:19 the sense is c.: Do not avenge yourselves.

3. Lk. 18:3 carries a reference to legal justice. It is thus closest to the forensic use, while Revelation is closest to the OT.

ékdikos. ékdikos means a. "contrary to the law," b. "avenger." It occurs only in sense b. in the NT. God is the avenger in 1 Th. 4:6, and the authorities are the executors of God's judgment in Rom. 13:4.

ekdíkēsis. ekdíkēsis means a. "revenge," "punishment," "retribution." b. The person on whom revenge is taken is in the genitive, and so c. is the person or cause on behalf of whom it is taken.

1. In the NT ekdíkesis can mean (a.) "revenge," "threat," "punishment," e.g., judicial punishment in 2 Cor. 7:11, divine retribution in Rom. 12:19; Heb. 10:30.

2. Magistrates are sent to punish wrongdoers in 1 Pet. 2:14 (b.).

3. In Lk. 18:7-8 God will vindicate his elect by speedy retribution, but in Acts 7:24 the sense is more that of avenging.

4. In 2 Th. 1:8 God will execute vengeance, with the dative of the person on whom it is inflicted. [G. SCHRENK, II, 442-46]

ekdýō → dýō; ekzētéō → zētéō; ekkathaírō → kathaírō

ekkentéō [to put out, pierce]

"To put out" (the eyes), "to pierce" with a lance or sword, "to kill."

1. In the NT Jn. 19:37 is based on the obscure Hebrew of Zech. 12:10, which is interpreted as a prophecy or prefiguration of the completed reality of the death of Christ with the thrust of the spear into his side.

2. Rev. 1:7 relates the same OT verse to the expected return of Christ. Those who crucified him, both Jews and Gentiles, will see him when he comes and will be stricken by tardy remorse and fear of judgment. Closely related to Rev. 1:7 is Mt. 24:30. The pierced Lord is the one who comes with the sign of the Son of Man. At the parousia the cross that the world set up in secret will threaten the world openly as the victorious sign of the Lord who comes back to the world with power and great glory. [H. SCHLIER, II, 446-47]

ekklēsía → kaléō; ekkóptō → kóptō; eklégō, eklogḗ, eklektós → légō; eklýō → lýō; eknḗphō → nḗphō; hekoúsios → hekṓn; ekpeirázō → peirasmós; ekpíptō → píptō; ekplēróō, ekplḗrōsis → plēróō; ekpnéō → pneúma

ekptýō [to spit out]

ekptýō ("to spit out") is a vulgar Koine word used in Gal. 4:14, probably in the literal sense rather than the figurative sense "to despise," "reject." The Galatians did not see in Paul a person demon-possessed because of his sickness, and so they did not spit at him in the ancient gesture of self-defense against demons or misfortune. There are many examples of spitting both in incantations and for the healing of sickness, and spittle came into use in Christian baptism in connection with exorcism. The Galatians, however, received Paul as an angel of God. [H. SCHLIER, II, 448-49]

ékstasis [ecstasy, distraction], exístēmi [to be astounded] ékstasis. a. Literally "change of place," then figuratively b. "renunciation of goods," c. "degeneration," "confusion of spirit," "alienation" (often as "convulsive excitement"), and d. "ecstasy." In the OT we find sense c., especially as "illusion" or "terror"; the word is also used for the deep sleep that God sent on Adam in Gen. 2:12 and on Abraham in Gen. 15:12. The NT has c. (“astonishment,” “terror”) in Lk. 5:26; Mk. 16:8; Acts 3:10, and d. in Acts 10:10; 11:5 (Peter) and 22:17 (Paul).

A. Ecstasy outside the NT.

1. Foundations and Methodical Production of Ecstasy. Exceptional states of soul, whether due to supernatural power or neurotic disturbance, are widespread in antiquity. In detail experiences vary, and there is a fluid line between ecstasy and illusion and ecstasy and possession. In the narrower sense ecstasy denotes beneficial infilling by a substance or person, either by entry or by breathing. Early attempts are made to induce it by narcotics, music, dancing, rhythmic cries, and self-mutilation. In mysticism the goal is an absorption associated with visions and auditions.

2. Ecstasy in the Greek and Hellenistic World. Ecstatic phenomena are found early in the Greek world, as is shown by the Dionysus cult and the related but contrasting cult of Apollo. Dionysus is a union of both the hidden god and the manifested god who shares with his worshippers in a combination of creative desire and destructive frenzy. Wine and dancing and Bacchic cries express this, but also become a means to induce it. The dancing women show vividly how the world is bewitched for ecstatics. Since ecstasy brings vision, a prophetic element is involved which is most clearly reflected in the Delphic cult. A more masculine version may be seen in the Roman Bacchanalian rite in which men engage in prophecy accompanied by wild convulsions. Similar ecstasies occur in the Attis and Isis cults. We also find individual ecstatics both male and female (Bacchants and Sibyls). Ecstasy soon secures a firm place in philosophy. Thus Plato borrows from mystical ecstasy in his description of poetic inspiration. God is in man, or man in God, and there is a separation of body and soul; the soul, like the body, may be a hindrance to ecstasy, but may also be its organ. In Mithraism various ideas are present, e.g., rapture and vision in the body when it is divested of the weight of earth; God’s power as our true being or as inbreathed spirit. Philo seems to be the first to use ecstasy in a technical sense. He views rational and mystical-ecstatic knowledge as complementary, but stresses the latter, which carries with it the dawning of divine light. The ecstatic theology of revelation reaches a climax in Neo-Platonism, for which the ecstatic is an organ of deity.

3. The Significance of Ecstasy for OT Religion. Analogous phenomena may be found in the OT sphere, but with important differences. The unusual aspect forms the starting point (cf. Num. 24:15ff.; Ezek. 3:25-26). The root nb’ means “to speak with frenzy” and prophets are often called mad (2 Kgs. 9:11; Jer. 29:26). At first we find men of God with supernatural powers, seers with supernatural knowledge who can pass on their gifts, and true ecstatics like Deborah (Judg. 4:4) who give oracles for everyday occasions (1 Sam. 9:6ff.) or on political issues (2 Sam. 24:11). In so doing these declare the will of God and enforce his ethical demands. They include both great figures like Samuel and Nathan and many lesser figures (1 Sam. 2:27). Ecstatic groups also develop and wander about to the sound of music, intimating the future and catching up others in their enthusiasm (1 Sam. 10:5ff.). We cannot dismiss these groups as a Canaanite intrusion, for the cultic dance leaves room for them, and they represent the ethical majesty of God (1 Kgs. 18; 21:17ff.), have a strong sense of God’s historical direction of his people, show some feeling for eschatology, and claim to work by God’s Spirit rather than his direct presence. If classical prophecy holds aloof from the institutionalized nəḇî’îm, there are points of connection. Amos is not one of them (7:14), but sees that they are from God (2:11). Other prophets accept the term nāḇî’ (Is. 8:3) and find a place for ecstatic experiences (cf. Is. 6). Yet the role of ecstasy is reduced, and no effort is made to induce it. Visions may be deceptive; what counts is the moral will of God, and the word is the indispensable means to proclaim this. In such later prophets as Ezekiel, Zechariah, and Daniel visions may seem to resume their importance, but they do so only as literary devices.

4. Ecstasy in Judaism. Apocalyptic contains many visions but in fact testifies to the decline of ecstatic experience, for here again the visions are artificial products. Judaism endorses inspiration, but places it in the past and the messianic future. Yet ecstatic experiences still occur. Philo claims to be an ecstatic, and many rabbis refer to visions, auditions, fiery phenomena, and visits to paradise. It should be noted, however, that the visits to paradise are not necessarily ecstatic, that the fiery phenomena are usually symbolical, and that the Bath Kol involves a rational element.

B. Ecstasy in the NT.

1. In both appearance and preaching the Baptist probably has conscious links with the nǝḇî ʾîm, but he shows no traces of ecstaticism, and while he prays and fasts, does not try to induce it. John is a typical prophet of the word, full of ethical seriousness and eschatological passion, but sober and restrained.

2. Some have tried to portray Jesus as an ecstatic, but while he is unusual, has a developed prayer life, works miracles, and has what might loosely be called ecstatic experiences at his baptism and transfiguration, he is not deranged or possessed (cf. Mk. 3:21-22), avoids sensationalism, puts himself alongside the needy and sinful (cf. Mk. 9:14ff.), and displays a blend of uniqueness and simplicity whose essence lies in his relation to God, his calling, and its fulfilment.

3. Ecstatic features emerge in the primitive church, but the resurrection appearances are not ecstatic experiences, history and eschatology are still dominant at Pentecost, and if the church's prayer life borders on the ecstatic (Acts 4:24ff.) and an ecstatic element gives it direction and strength in its emergencies (Acts 7:55; 10:10ff.; 11:5ff., etc.), it opposes an ecstaticism that is devoid of moral discipline, integrity, and love (Acts 8:9ff.; 1 Cor. 12-14). Paul has ecstatic experiences (1 Cor. 14:18; 2 Cor. 5:13; 12:1ff.) but attaches no great importance to them (2 Cor. 12:1), sees in them an occasion for modesty, orients his higher knowledge to salvation history (1 Cor. 2:10ff.), and shows by his achievements that he is no psychopath. Similarly the divine of Revelation undergoes ecstatic experiences but is a genuine prophet inasmuch as he uses his visions to stir and strengthen the community at a time of serious threat.

C. The Ecstatic Element in the Early Church. The term does not occur in the apostolic fathers or apologists but we see from the Didache and the Martyrdom of Polycarp that visions do occur. Celsus satirizes Christian ecstatics (Origen Against Celsus 7.9), but his account may be due to misconception or generalization from isolated cases. In the main the church, while not totally excluding the ecstatic element, resists unhealthy features and prefers an orderly ministry.

exístēmi (existánō).

1. Transitive "to remove from its place," figuratively "to alter," "to shake," "to set in terror"; in the NT "to confuse" in Lk. 24:22, "to bewitch" in Acts 8:9.

2. Intransitive "to remove oneself," figuratively "to lose one's wits," "go out of one's mind," "be terrified out of one's wits." The verb occurs in the LXX for many Hebrew words to denote the human reaction to God's self-revelation (cf. Ex. 18:9; 19:8; Hab. 3:2). Philo has the term for self-alienation in divinely caused rapture (On Drunkenness 146). In the NT we find the meaning "to be beside oneself" in Mk. 3:21 and 2 Cor. 5:13, where the reference is probably to a supposedly eccentric apostolic claim rather than to ecstatic experiences. Astonishment is the point in Lk. 2:47; Mt. 12:23; Lk. 8:56; Acts 2:7; 8:13; 9:21; 10:45; 12:16, i.e., at the child Jesus, at the miracles of Jesus, or at the phenomena displayed in the primitive church. [A. OEPKE, II, 449-60]

ekteínō [to stretch out], ektenḗs (ektenésteron) [resolute], ekténeia [endurance], hyperekteínō [to overextend]

ekteínō. In the NT (except in Acts 27:30), the term is always used for stretching out the hand. 1. "Stretching out" is the basic sense, e.g., stretching out in sleep, or stretching a part of the body, or deploying an army, or of words for speech. The use in Acts 27:30 is a technical one; the sailors were trying to flee under cover of "paying out" anchors from the bow. 2. Stretching out the hands is a common expression in the LXX for many Hebrew equivalents. The subject may be God, the messenger of God, or an individual, and the phrase stresses a graphic point in the account. This is perhaps why Lk. 22:53 has the expression for laying hands on Jesus, unless there is simply a reference here to the stretching out of the hand to seize (cf. Mt. 26:51). Mt. 12:49 (cf. Mk. 3:34) describes a gesture that give added point to the saying of Jesus. The graphic significance is also plain in Mt. 14:28ff., where the hand of Jesus reaches out and catches Peter. In Mt. 12:9ff. the point of the command of Jesus is that movement is miraculously restored to the withered hand; by the will and word of Jesus the same movement that serves as a gesture, or is made in grasping, demonstrates his healing power. In Mt. 8:3 it is Jesus himself who stretches out his hand to the leper, thereby manifesting both his will to heal and his power to do so. The action is not necessary to effect the cure, as we see from Lk. 17:14. Thus in Acts 4:29 a particular action of God is not in view but a declaration of his will in active self-demonstration. In contrast the use in Acts 26:1 is technical; Paul introduces his speech with the regular gesture of the orator. In Jn. 21:18, however, we do not have a similar technical use; the variants show that play is made on the stretching out of the hands in crucifixion, the point being that Peter will make a final submission of his own will. In the apostolic fathers the verb occurs for the most part in OT quotations.

ektenḗs, ektenésteron. This term means “tense,” “resolute,” “eager.” It occurs in the NT only in Acts 12:5; 1 Pet. 1:22; 4:8; Lk. 22:44 (ektenésteron). The point in 1 Pet. 4:8 is that love should not fail in view of the approaching end. This demands purity of will, so that this earnest love must be from the heart (1:22). Since the term expresses resolute concentration, it is very apt to describe prayer, and is used in this context for the fervent prayer made for Peter in Acts 12:5. The comparative in Lk. 22:44 refers only to the intensity of the prayer of Jesus. Since the problem for him is not death itself, but death as a vicarious death for sin, we do not have here any direct model for us in the hour of death. In the apostolic fathers ektenḗs comes to refer more to a Christian attitude than to Christian action (cf. 1 C1em. 62.2), as does prayer itself (59.2), so that later hē ektenḗs very naturally becomes a liturgical term.

ekténeia. This word, meaning “endurance,” occurs in the NT only in Acts 26:7. The twelve tribes hope to attain the promise by persistent service; in contrast, Paul points to the event of the divine self-revelation (26:13ff.).

hyperekteínō. Not found prior to 2 Cor. 10:14, Paul uses it here in the negative sense “to overextend”; he does not boast of more than he has actually done. [E. FUCHS, II, 460-65]

éktrōma [untimely birth]

éktrōma is not a common word; it means “untimely birth,” “miscarriage,” “abortion.” It occurs three times in the LXX (Num. 12:12; Job 3:16; Eccl. 6:3). In the NT the only instance is in 1 Cor. 15:8. As the last to see the risen Lord, Paul calls himself an éktrōma. He can hardly be referring to tardy birth and probably has in mind his abnormality. He had not been a disciple, was torn out of his former course of life, saw the Lord after the forty days, and was not fit in himself for his new life and calling. Possibly the term is one that his adversaries use to describe his lack of apostolic qualifications and Paul adopts it in relation to his pre-Christian past, but this hardly seems to fit in with the context, in which the stress falls on the abnormal nature of Christ’s appearance to him. Ignatius applies the term to himself in Romams 9.2, and Eusebius in Ecclesiastical History 5.1.45 uses it for Christians who do not confess their faith in time of persecution. [J. SCHNEIDER, II, 465-67]

ekchéō [to pour out], ekchýn(n)ō [to pour out]

Both ekchéō and ekchýn(n)ō mean “to pour out,” a. of fluids (also cultically), with blood “to kill,” also “to lavish”; b. of gifts “to lavish.”

1. In the NT "to shed blood" is used for the violent slaying of OT or NT martyrs (cf. Mt. 23:35; Rom. 3:15; Acts 22:20; Rev. 16:6). It is also used for the death of Jesus (Mk. 14:24; Mt. 26:28). In the saying about the cup this violent death takes place to save us and to inaugurate the new divine order (cf. Ex. 24:8, though there is no detailed correspondence). Jesus voluntarily accepts this violent death in an act of supreme self-sacrifice.

2. Lavishing divine gifts or powers in fulfilment of Joel 3:1-2 is the point in Acts 2:16ff. As in the OT the outpouring of the Spirit means both ecstatic inspiration and inner renewal (cf. Ezek. 39:29), so the same word occurs both for the giving of tongues (Acts 10:45) and the granting of the Spirit in baptism (Tit. 3:5). In Rom. 5:5-6 the overflowing love of God shown in Christ's death brings us constant assurance by the Holy Spirit. [J. BEHM, II, 467-69]

ekpsýchō* → *psychḗ

hekṓn [willingly] (ákōn) [unwillingly], hekoúsios [voluntary]

hekṓn (ákōn). a. "Willingly," "intentionally"; b. "voluntarily," "not under compulsion." In philosophy Aristotle thinks the rational will can propose only what is good, but wrongdoing may be intentional or unintentional (due to circumstances). For Stoicism free obedience to the deity is the essence of morality and involves freedom from fate by acceptance of one's divinely imposed lot. In the NT the meaning in 1 Cor. 9:16-17 is "willingly" as opposed to anánkē in v. 16 and ákōn in v. 17. The point in Rom. 8:20 is that, whereas we sin by our own resolve, creation is subjected to futility through no will of its own.

hekoúsios. This word, too, means "willing," "intentional," "noncompulsory," but usually refers to the thing, not the person, e.g., cultic acts in the LXX. It denotes intentional transgressions in Heb. 10:26, i.e., by those who know saving truth, and "noncompulsory" consent in Phlm. 4: Paul wants willing compliance. [F. HAUCK, II, 469-70]

élaion [olive oil]

1. The production of olive oil is part of a country's merchandise or economy (cf. Rev. 6:6; Lk. 16:6). Oil is an essential of life, used also for food, and as a trading commodity it can be a symbol of wealth (cf. Dt. 32:13). Rev. 6:6 can hardly be an allusion to Domitian's edict in A.D. 92 but is probably the prediction of a partial economic crisis (cf. Dt. 28:38ff.). Intimations of God's judgment are seen in high prices, but as yet there is no total destruction of vital resources.

2. Oil is used for lamps (Mt. 25:3).

3. Oil is also used in various kinds of anointing. In Lk. 7:46 anointing with myrrh is distinguished from anointing with olive oil to point the contrast between the Pharisee who neglects the customary honors to a guest and the sinful woman who performs a menial office in generous response to the Messiah. In Heb. 1:9, the passage Ps. 45:7, which some rabbis take messianically, is referred to the Son. The original speaks of the anointing of the king for marriage. Hebrews says that the Son, having loved righteousness, is exalted to Godhead and becomes the Christ, but there is perhaps a hint of the marriage of the Messiah and the community. The phrase "oil of gladness" (cf. Is. 61:3 LXX) indicates that anointing also expresses festive joy.

4. A final use of oil is for healing, as in Mk. 6:13; Jms. 5:14; Lk. 10:34, and the discussions in Pliny, Galen, etc. [H. SCHLIER, II, 470-73]

→ aleíphō, chríō

elénchō [to bring to light], élenxis [rebuke], élenchos [conviction], elegmós [rebuke] elénchō.

1. The use outside the NT is complex. In Homer elénchō means "to scorn," "to bring into contempt." Later senses are a. "to shame," b. "to blame," c. "to expose," "resist," d. "to interpret," "expound," and e. "to investigate." LXX meanings are "to rebuke," "to punish," "to condemn or convict," "to examine," and for the root ykḥ it denotes God's disciplining by teaching, admonition, testing, and correction.

2. In the NT the use is restricted. With the accusative of person it means "to show people their sins and summon them to repentance," either privately (Mt. 18:15) or congregationally (1 Tim. 5:20). The Holy Spirit does this (Jn. 16:8), as also Christ does both now (Rev. 3:19) and at the parousia (Jude 15). No one can do it to Jesus himself (Jn. 8:46). Sinners experience this exposure when faced by the prophetic call (Lk. 3:19), divine instruction (Heb. 12:5), or the law (Jms. 2:9). perí is used to denote the fault (Lk. 3:19), with hóti for elaboration (Jn. 16:9ff.). Correction as well as exposure or conviction is implied; the corresponding action is élenxis (2 Pet. 2:16) or elegmós (2 Tim. 3:16).

3. The battle against sin signified by elénchō is based on the OT and Judaism. Lev. 19:17 demands correction. Rebuke is an integral part of love for the rabbis. Prov. 3:12; Job 5:17, etc. depict God as One who educates by correction (cf. Heb. 12:5). The Jewish view of the last judgment includes the exposure of wickedness, as in Jude 15. The group plays an important role in Greek philosophy. In Plato and Aristotle the reference is to the controverting of propositions or to negative conclusions, but Epictetus is closer to the NT with his ethical use in connection with the philosophical cure of souls.

elénchos, élenxis, elegmós. elénchos means a. "proof," "convincing," "refutation," and b. "investigation," "account." elegmós in 2 Tim. 3:16 and élenxis in 2 Pet. 2:16 mean the rebuking of the sinner. In Heb. 11:1, however, the sense of elénchos is "persuasion," but not in a subjective sense. Normal usage suggests that "things not seen" is an objective, not a subjective genitive. An elénchos is present as the basis of resting on what is hoped for. Faith does not do the convincing, but God, for the whole point in Hebrews is that faith stands on the revelation, word, and promise of God. Faith is the divinely given conviction of things unseen and is thus the assurance of what is hoped for. [F. BÜSCHEL, II, 473-76]

éleos [mercy], eleéō [to show mercy], eleḗmōn [merciful], eleēmosýnē [sympathy], anéleos [unmerciful], aneleḗmōn [unmerciful]

éleos, eleéo.

A. The Greek Usage. In Greek éleos is a páthos, the emotion roused by undeserved affliction in others and containing an element of fear as well as mercy. It is wholly fitting in the noble and plays a part in the administering of justice. For the Stoics, however, it is a sickness and unworthy of the sage, not because the Stoics are cruel, but because they do not think moral relations should be governed by a páthos.

B. The OT and Jewish Usage.

1. In the LXX éleos is mostly used for ḥeseḏ (more rarely raḥ□mîm). This denotes an attitude arising out of mutual relationship, e.g., between relatives, hosts and guests, masters and servants, those in covenant relation. It is an act rather than a disposition, with trust as the basis and loyalty as the appropriate attitude. An element of obligation is thus intrinsic, e.g., between ruler and subject. On the part of a superior, ḥeseḏ also includes grace. This is particularly so on God's part. God has freely bound himself to his people, and the righteous may thus depend on his ḥeseḏ as they themselves show mercy. God's ḥeseḏ is his faithful and merciful love which is promised and may thus be expected even if it cannot be claimed. Yet because we are unfaithful, this love takes the form of pardoning grace from which definitive salvation will ultimately come, so that ḥeseḏ becomes an eschatological term. An act or expression of love is usually at issue rather than the emotion even in the case of raḥ□mîm, which originally has a physical reference and denotes loving concern.

2. In later Judaism ḥeseḏ is used for acts of love, but it refers especially to the divine mercy, often with a stress on faithfulness, but also with a reference to mercy in distinction from wrath. God's éleos is upon Israel or those who love and fear him. It is his gracious action which is revealed, expected, and hoped and prayed for. The age of salvation is the age of éleos. Philo emphasizes that the law demands éleos, and he regards éleos as the third of God's mighty works. Being merciful, God is the Savior. For Philo, however, mercy is more an emotion than an act, and it has no eschatological significance.

C. éleos/ eleéō in the NT.

1. The NT often uses éleos /eleéō for the attitude that God requires of us. In Mt. 9:13; 23:23 it denotes the kindness owed in mutual relationships. The LXX phrase "showing mercy" occurs in Lk. 10:37 for the actions of the Samaritan. In Mt. 18:33 the demand for mercy is based on the divine mercy which precedes ours (cf. Jms. 2:13). The new feature here as compared with Judaism is that God's mercy is known in and through Christ. In Jms. 3:17 and Rom. 12:8 éleos embraces lovingkindness in general, though pity is included. Concern for eternal as well as temporal welfare may be meant (cf. Jude 22).

2. God's éleos in the NT is often his gracious faithfulness (cf. Lk. 1:58; Eph. 2:4; 1 Pet. 1:3; Rom. 11:30ff.). Paul significantly relates God's éleos to his salvation; it is God's saving eschatological act in Christ (cf. Tit. 3:5). The opposite in Rom. 9:22-23 is God's wrath. Eschatological awareness may also be seen in Rom. 9:15ff.; 15:8-9; 1 Pet. 2:10; believing Gentiles are now caught up by the divine mercy. The need of mercy in the judgment comes to expression in 2 Tim. 1:18; Jude 21, and cf. Mt. 5:7. In salutations éleos may carry only an indirect reference to Christ, as in Gal. 6:16. Mercy may be individual as well as general, as we see from the cry for mercy in Mk. 10:47-78 or the mercy shown to Paul according to 1 Cor. 7:25; cf. Mk. 5:19; Phil. 2:27; 2 Tim. 1:16. In such cases there may not always be a specific reference to God's saving act in Christ.

eleḗmōn. This is an old Greek word for "merciful," "sympathetic"; it is fairly common in the LXX and later Judaism, mostly for God. The NT does not use it for God but has it for Christ in Heb. 2:17, and Jesus praises the eleḗmones in Mt. 5:7 (cf. Did. 3.8; Pol. 6.1; 2 Clem. 4.3).

eleēmosýnē. This word for "sympathy" is late in Greek. The LXX speaks of the eleēmosýnē by which God judges and which he shows to the righteous, innocent, and oppressed (cf. Dt. 6:25; Pss. 24:4; 103:6). A divine act and not merely an emotion is presupposed. The equivalent in Judaism takes on the sense of benevolent activity and can thus be used more narrowly for almsgiving. This is the meaning of eleēmosýnē in the NT (cf. Mt. 6:2ff.; Lk. 11:41; Acts 3:2ff.). Doing works of benevolence and giving alms are common expressions (cf. Mt. 6:1-2; Acts 9:36; Lk. 11:41; 12:33). With fasting and praying, giving alms is a special practice of piety for both Jews (Mt. 6:1ff.) and Christians (Did. 15.4). It is lauded in Acts 9:36 (cf. 10:2), but Jesus warns against its misuse in the service of personal vanity (Mt. 6:2-3) and Did. 1:6 warns against imprudent almsgiving (cf. Sir. 12:1).

anéleos. "Unmerciful." Not attested for certain outside the NT, this term occurs in Jms. 2:13: There will be no mercy in judgment for those who show no mercy.

aneleḗmōn. This is the more common word for "unmerciful." It occurs in the LXX but in the NT it is found only in the list of vices in Rom. 1:31. [R. BULTMANN, II, 477-87]

eleútheros [free], eleutheróō [to set free], eleuthería [freedom], apeleútheros [freedman]

A. The Political Concept of Freedom in the Greek World. By definition, freedom means self-disposing in independence of others.

1. This sense is partly fashioned by the contrast to slavery. Slaves belong to others, not themselves. Slavery is accepted as an institution; hence freedom arises both theoretically and practically only for those who are politically free. It is the freedom of the politeía as an association of the free.

2. Freedom, for Plato and Aristotle, is essential to a state. The best constitution guarantees the greatest freedom (Thucydides). This freedom is freedom within the law, which establishes and secures it. As an embodiment of the claim of the politeía, law protects freedom against the caprice of the tyrant or the mass. But freedom means alternation of government as free people both rule and are subjects. Democracy achieves this best by allowing the same rights to all citizens (cf. Plato, Aristotle, Herodotus). It implies equality of voice, honor, dignity, and power. It comes vividly to expression in freedom of speech. As Demosthenes says, there is no greater misfortune for free citizens than to lose this. Yet the concept of freedom in Attic democracy contains the seeds of its own decay, for by promoting individual development it undermines the law on which it rests. Freedom becomes the freedom to do as one likes. The law of the self replaces the law of the politeía. Plato perceives this clearly (Laws 3.701b/c). It leads to the rise of demagogues and opens the door to tyranny.

3. Freedom also has to be secured against external foes. It means independence and hence the defense of the politeía against "barbarians." eleuthería can thus be a general expression for the autonomy of the state. At a later stage it becomes a slogan for the common "freedom" of the states which the individual states all claim to champion even in their inner struggles. In this regard it is hardly distinguishable from autonomía.

B. The Philosophical Concept of Freedom in Hellenism (Stoicism).

1. In Hellenism, and especially Stoicism, the extolling of freedom increases. The true Cynic prefers freedom to all else. He persistently criticizes tyrants and bewails their fear and misery, which make them slaves too. He also attacks their courtier-parasites.

2. Freedom, however, is now much more than political freedom. It is that of the individual under the law of nature. This is regarded as a reversion to the original meaning. The formal sense is the same, but freedom now takes the form of independent self-determination. To find freedom we must explore our nature. We cannot control body, family, property, etc., but we do control the soul. External things seek to impose a false reality on us. Hence we have to withdraw from them in a restriction of desires and an abandonment to pressures. This might seem to bring bondage but in fact results in liberation. For true liberation of this kind, there has to be liberation from the passions that represent the world in us. In particular, we must be rid of the dominant fear of death. We find freedom as we neutralize passions and surrender to the ineluctable power of circumstances. That this freedom can seldom be fully attained is recognized. Its fruit is assurance of soul. Those who seek flight in inwardness enjoy the freedom of impassibility and in so doing fulfil what they are as parts of God, or children of God, or God himself.

C. The Concept of Freedom in the NT.

1. The NT sees that the retreat into inwardness does not in fact bring freedom. Existence is inwardly defective, so that to take oneself in hand is simply to grasp a defective existence. Faced with a lost existence, we can come to ourselves only by subjecting our own will to the will of another. We achieve self-control by letting ourselves be controlled. Concretely, eleuthería in the NT is freedom from sin (Rom. 6:18ff.), the law (Rom. 7:3-4; Gal. 2:4), and death (Rom. 6:21-22; 8:21). It is freedom from an existence that in sin leads through the law to death. Existing in sin, we are its slaves (Rom. 6:20). The result is anarchy (Rom. 6:19). This means surrender to the craving of the sárx that is triggered by the law (Rom. 6:12). The law is intended for good, expressing God's claim, but in our sinful existence it brings sin to light by mediating sinful affections. It is an occasion for the self-seeking love of life that misuses the claim of God. By it there arises not merely the anarchic impulse of Rom. 6:17ff. but also the nomistic impulse of Galatians. Freedom, then, means freedom from the law as well as from sin, i.e., from the need to seek justification by the law. Freedom here is freedom from attempted autonomy, not by breaking the law, but by fulfilling our own interpretation of it in following our own needs, and doing our own will, by what seems to be an honest effort to do God's will. Freedom from the law means freedom from moralism, from self-lordship before God in the guise of serious and obedient responsibility. It thus has the further implication of being freedom from the self-deception in which we see ourselves as God and are thus blind to our true reality (cf. Jn. 8:32; Rom. 2:18ff.). Finally, the freedom that the NT proclaims in Christ is freedom from the death which is the end of human self-seeking in sin. In sin we surrender to an existence that refers to itself and not to God and that is thus severed from life. Sin carries death within it. Death is its power. Living by death (Rom. 6:23), it promotes its life by death (1 Cor. 15:56). Nature, which is subordinate to our historical existence, manifests the reality of separation from God in the process of corruption. In the human sphere, however, the movement of separated existence is to eternal corruption. In life itself we bring about death. Our works have death as their end (Rom. 6:21). We bring it on ourselves and others. As regards this existence that is given up to death, freedom means freedom from self and therefore from the law which delivers up fallen existence even in and of itself to ruin, i.e., the law of sin and death (Rom. 8:2).

2. How is this freedom achieved? The primary answer is: "By the act of Christ." Christ has made us free (Gal. 5:1). The reference here is to the event of the life that he offered up vicariously in obedience to God's will (cf. Gal. 3:13; 4:4). Our freedom is not an existential return to the soul. The Son makes us free (Jn. 8:36). The secondary answer is: "By the gospel call." We are called to freedom (Gal. 5:13). This is a call to the act of Christ which is the basis of a new life in freedom. The life-giving Spirit of Jesus is present in the call (Rom. 8:2), advancing the claim of God's act in Christ, and making possible a true fulfilment of what the law demands as the will of God (Rom. 8:3ff.). The love of God enacted in Christ's vicarious death and resurrection summons us to recognize it for what it is, so that as we open our lives to the Spirit, by the Spirit and the life and power of Christ there arises in us an unselfish and self-forgetting existence. In the Spirit of Christ's freedom, we find our own freedom. This takes places in the gospel call which already goes out to Israel as promise, and which creates the true and free Israel (Gal. 4:21ff.). The gospel call goes forth in Christ's own word (Jn. 8:31). By the Spirit of truth, it makes the truth known (Jn. 16:13). It does so through ministers who serve the ministry of the Spirit and the Lord in a freedom in which our existence is fashioned into ever increasing glory (2 Cor. 3:17-18). In time, the call is received in baptism. The freed are the baptized (Rom. 6:17). Liberation from sin is by obedience to the baptismal teaching (Rom. 6:17-18). The Spirit of the love of Christ comes with the gospel message, grants liberation from sin, and claims us for the new and free obedience.

3. How do we bring this freedom to expression? The answer is: in love, i.e., not in isolation but in a life with others. We find freedom in service, in yielding our lives to the divinely demanded righteousness of love of God and neighbor (Rom. 6:18ff.). Freedom comes to expression in righteous acts of many different kinds (Gal. 5:22). Being free, we accept civil obedience (Mt. 17:24ff.; 1 Pet. 2:13ff.). We renounce rights for the sake of others (1 Cor. 9:19). We may forgo valid personal claims (1 Cor. 9:1). We do not make of our freedom a basis of superiority (as the strong were doing in Corinth) but in genuine freedom consider the consciences of others (cf. 1 Cor. 8:1ff.). We crucify ensnaring passions and demands (Gal. 5:24). We do not make human status an overriding concern (1 Cor. 7:20ff.), for slaves and free have the same standing with the Lord in whom they are both bound and free, and striving after freedom raises the danger that entanglement with claims will make impossible the unselfish readiness for others for which Christ's sacrifice has freed us. Yet this surrender of desires is not restrictive or self-assertive. Since the gospel assures us that we need not try to attain life by the law, we can fulfil the law freely in works that are not our own but the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:23). Christ has met the claims of the law for us, and therefore, as the law of Christ (Gal. 6:2), it is for us the perfect law of liberty (Jms. 1:25)—a law which now works in the sphere of freedom and constantly mediates freedom. Freedom from sin and the law culminates in freedom from death. Works done in freedom aim at eternal life (Rom. 6:22). They produce the eternity disclosed in the event of Christ's love. Being freed from self-seeking, they make possible for both the self and others the life that is assured by God. They bring in God's future and make it available to others. Our present existence is still subject to death, for in itself it is still fallen. But it knows freedom from death in Christ's resurrection. By word and sacrament this freedom has taken place for it as the basis of life in self-forgetful dying. The disclosed freedom from death is its future enacted in Christ. It will be known here and now only as a sign in the works of freedom that manifest it. Thus those who have the Spirit working freedom in them long and sigh for the release from carnal existence and the manifestation of the children of God which mean that creation itself is set free from bondage and obtains the glorious liberty of God's children. [H. SCHLIER, II, 487-502]

éleusis → érchomai

hélkō [to draw, compel]

The basic meaning is "to draw," "tug," or, in the case of persons, "compel." It may be used for "to draw" to a place by magic, for demons being "drawn" to animal life, or for the inner influencing of the will (Plato). The Semitic world has the concept of an irresistible drawing to God (cf. 1 Sam. 10:5; 19:19ff.; Jer. 29:26; Hos. 9:7). In the OT hélkein denotes a powerful impulse, as in Cant. 1:4, which is obscure but expresses the force of love. This is the point in the two important passages in Jn. 6:44; 12:32. There is no thought here of force or magic. The term figuratively expresses the supernatural power of the love of God or Christ which goes out to all (12:32) but without which no one can come (6:44). The apparent contradiction shows that both the election and the universality of grace must be taken seriously; the compulsion is not automatic. [A. OEPKE,II, 503-04]

Héllēn [Greek, Hellene], Hellás [Greece], Hellēnikós [Greek], Hellēnís [Greek (woman)], Hellēnistḗs [Greeks, Hellenists], Hellēnistí [in the Greek]

A. Héllēnes in the Greek World.

1. From about 700 B.C. this term comes to be used for the Greek tribes, cities, and states. It develops in opposition to bárbaroi. Greek language, race, and culture are virtually absolutized, but on the basis of paideía, not a cult. Hence the term can sometimes be restricted to Greeks who share in Greek culture, and at other times be extended to barbarians who embrace Greek language and culture.

2. The process of Hellenizing was accelerated by the incorporation of Macedonia and the conquests of Alexander. Greek culture spread to Asia and Egypt, especially in the cities. In Egypt the term tended to be used only for the ruling caste, but in Asia, with more new cities, native non-Hellenes accepted Greek culture more widely, and even greater integration came with intermarriage. A movement to the west came also by way of Sicily and southern Italy and thence to Rome. Rome continued the process of Hellenization when it took over the Greek kingdoms, although it also brought about its downfall by opening the door to a revival of Near Eastern cultures.

3. The Jews were caught up in the process of Hellenization pushed by the Seleucid rulers. Many worshipped and read the law in Greek. A reaction came in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes but this did not wholly banish Greek culture. The last of the Hasmoneans and Herod and his sons posed as Hellenistic rulers and the incorporation of Judea into the Roman empire strengthened the Hellenizing process. Greek became a second commercial language and Jews met Hellenes in Jerusalem, in the half-Hellenized cities of Galilee, and on the main highways. Jews of the dispersion were affected even more. A rich Hellenistic literature developed to serve those who could speak only Greek and to spread Judaism among the Gentiles. Yet Judaism maintained itself, so that the term Hellene, in a perversion of its original use, came to denote the pagan. Jews rejected the cultus of the Hellenes while accepting their culture. Later a reaction developed even against Greek culture on the ground of its inseparability from idolatry.

B. Héllēnes among the Jews. The LXX sometimes uses the word, along with Hellás etc. Hellene is the normal sense. But for the Jews the Greek sphere that it denoted was a religious matter, so that the term approximates to Gentile. Thus when the high priest Jason was called Hellenic, it was because he was adopting Greek and abandoning Jewish customs. Hellenism as a specific complex of language, culture, and religion was the most dangerous form of paganism. Distinction was made, of course, between Hellenes and other Gentiles, as by Josephus in Against Apion 1.14 (also Philo), so that there is so simple equation of the groups.

C. Héllēnes in the NT. Hellás occurs for Greece in Acts 20:2, Héllēn is found in John, Acts, 1 Corinthians, Romans, Galatians, and Colossians, the feminine Hellēnís in Mk. 7:26 and Acts 17:12, Hellēnikós in Rev. 9:11 and Lk. 23:38 (some texts), Hellēnistí in Jn. 19:20 and Acts 21:37, and Hellēnistḗs in Acts 6:1; 9:29.

1. Only Luke and Paul really include Héllēnes in their narrative or theology. Hellēnís in Mk. 7:26 is ambiguous; it might simply mean Gentile or it could be a cultural term. The Synoptists never emphasize that Hellenes as such came to Jesus. The only parallel is in Jn. 12:20ff., but here the reference is to Greeks who had attached themselves to the synagogue (v. 20). In Jn. 7:35 “among the Greeks” seems to be meant geographically; the suggestion is that Jesus intends to go into the Greek world to teach the Greeks. In fact he does not teach Hellenes, nor does he command his disciples to do so.

2. The mission to Hellenes comes in Acts, where Hellenes denotes a. Greeks and Hellenized residents of Syria and Asia Minor, and b. inhabitants of Hellas and Macedonia. The first evangelism in this sphere is done in Antioch (Acts 11:20), then by Paul and Barnabas in Iconium and Thessalonica (14:1; 17:4), then by Paul in Corinth (18:4) and Ephesus (19:10). The Hellenes in these cities are the non-Jewish inhabitants, especially those who attend the synagogues. Churches of Jews and Hellenes thus arise and Paul picks up some baptized but not circumcised assistants. Whether Luke equates Hellenes and Gentiles may be debated. Acts 14:1-2 might seem to support this, but 17:4 etc. suggest that the Hellenes are mostly “God-fearers” already, so that the distinction is mainly a cultural one.

3. Acts also uses Hellēnistaí in 6:1 and 9:29. This is a new term of disputed meaning. In Acts 6:1 it probably denotes Jewish Christians of Greek language (and perhaps culture); Paul himself would be one of these. (In 9:29 it obviously denotes non-Christian Jews of the dispersion; cf. Acts 6:9.) Another view is that the Hellenists of 6:1 are believing Greeks. Arguments for this view are that “Hebrews” denotes race, not language, that Acts does not call such Greek-speaking Jews as Aquila or Apollos Hellenists, and that the names of the Seven favor Greek descent. On the other hand, the story of Cornelius makes little sense (10-11) if there were Greek Christians already in the church.

4. Paul refers to Hellenes in 1 Corinthians, Galatians, Romans, and Colossians, and always in connection with Jews, but also with barbarians. Hellenes are one part of the race to which the gospel is taken. His formulas thus have a national sense. As a Jew Paul is conscious of Jewish precedence. But the gospel is for all, and especially for the peoples that are unified by Greek language and culture. The characteristic of the Hellenes is wisdom, but this is an obstacle because their human wisdom is totally different from the divine wisdom of the gospel (1 Cor. 1:18ff.). If they know God from creation, they have fallen into idolatry and wickedness. They are thus under judgment and are included in the message of salvation (Rom. 1:16). They are not without a moral sense (Rom. 2:12ff.), so that Christians must take their moral judgment into account (1 Cor. 10:32), but they also come under threat for their wrongdoing (Rom. 2:7ff.). Any distinction between Jew and Hellene is resolved in the gospel as God lavishes his grace on all who believe. The crucified Christ is God's power and wisdom to both Jews and Hellenes if they are called (1 Cor. 1:24). Jews and Hellenes are thus fused into a new unity, the community (1 Cor. 12:13). They are equal as members of Christ's body and bearers of his Spirit. In Christ there is no more Jew or Hellene (Gal. 3:27-28). The Hellene is incorporated into the seed of Abraham (Gal. 3:29). In the new man there can be neither Hellene nor Jew (Col. 3:9ff.). Paul, as the apostle to the Hellenes, develops the implications of the gospel for them, for it is he who has the task of bringing the message to them, who by his preaching brings innumerable Hellenes to Christ, and who resists the imposition of the yoke of the law upon them because he perceives that what counts for believers is not that they are Jews or Hellenes, but that they belong to one and the same body in Christ. For Paul the Hellenes are, of course, Gentiles. He does not equate the two terms, as the distinction between Hellenes and barbarians in Col. 3:11 shows, and as is also plain when wisdom is called their characteristic in 1 Cor. 1:22. Yet there is a close connection between Hellenes and Gentiles. The Gentiles, as the mass of peoples that are drawn into salvation history, include the Hellenes (cf. the parallelism of Hellenes, uncircumcision, and Gentiles in Rom. 1:16ff., or the tendency to use the terms interchangeably in 1 Cor. 1:22-23 and Rom. 9-11). If Hellenes are still a distinct group, they are among the Gentiles and represent them, although Gentiles is still a more general and common term. When Christianity is firmly established on Greek soil (and national distinctions are thus abolished), Hellene and Gentile become full equivalents. [H. WINDISCH, II, 504-16] [3]

ellogéō [to charge to an account]

The term ellogéō has a commercial sense in Phlm. 18: Paul will meet any loss suffered through Onesimus. Its use is figurative in the only other NT instance in Rom. 5:13. The argument here is that all are sinners prior to the giving of the law, and death reigns as a destiny posited in Adam, but until God's will is declared in the law sin is not transgression of the law and hence it is not counted or charged in the same way as it is after Moses. [H. Preisker, II, 516-17]

elpís [hope], elpízō [to hope], apelpízō [to despair], proelpízō [to be the first to hope] elpís, elpízō.

A. The Greek Concept of Hope.

1. Plato says that human existence is determined not merely by acceptance of the present and recollection of the past, but also by expectation of the future, either good or bad. Hopes are subjective projections of the future. Good elpídes are hope in our sense, though later elpís is often used for this. Hope for the Greeks is a comfort in distress, but it is also deceptive and uncertain except in the case of the wise who base it on scientific investigation.

[3] Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (192). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

2. For Plato, what is at work in hope is the impulse toward the beautiful and the good. Hopes extend beyond the present life, so that one need not fear death. The mysteries play on hope with their promise of a life of bliss after death, and hope may be grouped with faith, truth, and eros as one of the elements in an authentic life.

3. Earthly hopes are also important. Zeus gives hope, and Augustus is lauded for fulfilling old hopes and kindling new ones. Stoicism, however, has no interest in hope. Thus Epictetus uses the group only in the sense of expectation, and hope is shunned as no more than subjective projection of the future.

B. The OT View of Hope.

1. Normally the LXX uses elpízein and elpís for bāṭaḥ, but also for such terms as yāḥal, qāwâ, and tiqwâ (for full details see TDNT, II, 521-22).

2. In this usage there is no neutral expectation. Hope is expectation of good. It is linked with trust and yearning, and differentiated from fear. So long as there is life there is hope (Eccl. 9:4). It is not a dream that offers comfort but may also be illusory. The life of the righteous is grounded in a hope that implies a future because its point of reference is God. To hope is to trust. It is demanded even in good times. It is not our own projection but confidence in what God will do. God is our hope (Jer. 17:7). It has nothing to do with the calculation that may give a false sense of security. We are not to trust in riches (Job 31:24) or righteousness (Ezek. 33:13) or religious inheritance (Jer. 7:4). God can scatter all our planning (Ps. 94:11; Is. 19:3). Politicians who build on calculable forces will be confounded (Is. 31:1). Hope looks to him whom none can control. It is thus freed from anxiety (Is. 7:4) but must be accompanied by fear of God (Is. 32:11). Hence it must be a quiet waiting on God (Is. 30:15); the fault of Job is that he will not wait (Job 6:11). If God helps in present distress, he will finally put an end to all distress (Is. 25:9 etc.). Hope, then, grasps the provisional nature of every earthly present and is increasingly hope in the eschatological future. [R. Bultmann, II, 517-23]

C. Hope in Rabbinic Judaism.

1. Linguistically elpís finds little equivalent in the rabbinic world but materially the concept is a common one, especially in the form of messianic hope. The form of this expectation explains the linguistic phenomenon.

2. Messianic Expectation. a. Positively this is expectation of the fulfilment of Jewish hopes and negatively it is expectation of judgment on the wicked. The promises belong to the people as a whole; individuals share in them only as members of the people. The basis is that the future belongs to God, but for participation in the promises there must be observance of the law as well as trust in God. The law reveals God's will, but as a way of life, not a theoretical system. This will does not change with the future aeon. The difference is that the Messiah, who keeps and teaches the law, will extend it to the Gentiles. But the messianic age will come only when Israel itself keeps the law. b. The future then, while resting in God's hands, depends on his people's relationship to him. The messianic fulfilment may be hastened or delayed by human action, and an element of uncertainty thus attaches to it, or at least to the time of its coming. Only a strict devotion to keeping the law can dispel this uncertainty, as one may see from the example of Aqiba. c. The resultant attitude, however, differs from what is really meant by hope, for a calculated attempt is made here to guarantee the expectation; the divine sovereignty, which is the basis of true hope, is to that extent abrogated. d. The emphasis on personal achievement which the demand for legal observance entails also brings with it uncertainty as to personal salvation.

3. The Problem of Assurance of Salvation. a. Individual expectation accompanies the people's expectation, but since this expectation includes the separation of the righteous and the wicked, doubt remains as to whether one will qualify for eternal felicity, as the pessimism of some rabbis in face of judgment bears witness. Moses accuses those who do not keep the law (Jn. 5:44). b. Attempts are made to overcome the lack of assurance by pointing to prayer, or noting the manner of death, or developing a theology of suffering whereby the suffering of the righteous pays in this life for the guilt that would otherwise have to be paid for after death. These measures fail to produce true hope, however, for they focus on the self instead of referring to the divine grace and gift which alone can give a true and certain hope. [K. H. Rengstorf, II, 523-29]

D. The Hope of Hellenistic Judaism.

1. Hope is part of life and is cut off only by death. We hope for healing when sick, or for reunion when separated. The hope of the wicked is vain. So is the hope fixed in military might. The righteous hope in God, and fearing him need fear nothing else. What is hoped for is his protection, or some special blessing, or help even in death. Eschatologically the restoration of Israel is the theme of hope. See especially Sirach, Wisdom, and 1, 2, and 4 Maccabees for these aspects of hope.

2. Greek psychology influences Philo. Hope for him is neutral expectation, though usually of the good. It is the counterpart of recollection. It offers comfort in distress, but as our own projection of the future. Yet for Philo hope reaches beyond human projection to the perfection of true humanity. In this regard it must be directed to God and his forgiveness and salvation, thus taking on an aspect of trust.

E. The Early Christian Concept of Hope.

1. The NT concept of hope is essentially governed by the OT. Only when the sphere is secular does the group denote (good) expectation; cf. "counting upon" in Lk. 6:34; 1 Cor. 9:10, etc., or with more of an accent on "hoping" Lk. 23:8; 24:21; Acts 24:26; Rom. 15:24; 1 Cor. 16:7. The OT element of trust is strong when the relation is to persons, as in 2 Cor. 1:3; 5:11; 13:6. Trust in persons is the point in 1 Cor. 13:7, though it rests on trust in God (v. 13).

2. When fixed on God, hope embraces expectation, trust, and patient waiting. It is linked to faith, as in Heb. 11:1, which stresses the certainty of what is divinely given. Rom. 8:24-25 makes not only the formal point that we do not hope for what is visibly present but also the material one that what is visibly present offers no basis for hope since it belongs to the sphere of the sárx. Hence we have to wait patiently, in hope believing against hope, i.e., unable to count on controllable factors and hence thrown back on God (Rom. 4:18). Patient endurance is the main point in Rom. 5:4; 1 Th. 1:3; Heb. 6:11, but sure confidence is meant in 1 Cor. 15:19; 2 Cor. 1:10; Phil. 1:20; Heb. 3:6; 1 Pet. 1:21. The main difference from the OT is that the act of salvation has now been accomplished in Christ, so that hope itself is an eschatological blessing, and there is every reason for confidence such as Paul has in the Corinthians (2 Cor. 1: 12ff.). Hope rests on faith in the act of salvation (Rom. 8:24-25) and is sustained by the Spirit (vv. 26-27). It is an integral part of the Christian life (Rom. 15:13; 12:12). As such it goes closely with faith and love (1 Th. 1:3; 1 Cor. 13:13). It endures even when we attain to sight, for its focus is not on what is to be given but on the God who gives it and will maintain it when it is given. Endurance may be stressed in this life (Rom. 5:2, 4-5), but our waiting is confident, for we are saved by hope (Rom. 8:24).

3. elpís occurs only rarely in John (cf. Jn. 5:45; 1 Jn. 3:3), but is embraced here by pístis, or by endurance in Revelation. The element of waiting for the eschatological future is prominent in Col. 1:5; 1 Tim. 4:10; Acts 23:6 (the resurrection), but hope is itself an eschatological blessing in Mt. 12:21; 1 Pet. 1:3, and cf. Christ as our hope in Col. 1:27 and hope as a gift in 2 Th. 2:16. No pictures of the future are given (except in Revelation), so that trust in God's act is always a constitutive element in the Christian's hopeful expectation.

apelpízō. This later word means "not to believe or hope," e.g., that an illness will be cured. In the LXX it can mean "to give up hope." In the NT it occurs in some versions of Eph. 4:19 in depiction of the heathen. There is a singular use in Lk. 6:35, where it means "without expecting to receive again, or to receive any return." The normal meaning would be "without despairing," i.e., "hoping for a heavenly return," but this does not fit the context.

proelpízō. This word means "to hope before or first." In Eph. 1:12 the sense depends on the reference of the "we." If the "we" are Jewish Christians, the point is that they hoped before the Gentiles, or prior to Christ's coming. If the "we" are all Christians, the before refers to the present in relation to the consummation. [R. Bultmann, II, 529-35]

embateúō [to enter into]

a. "To enter," "go into," usually military occupation in the LXX, entering on an inheritance in the papyri, also used of gods coming to a holy place or a demon indwelling a person. b. The word is used for initiation in the mysteries. c. "To approach with a view to examining," i.e., "to inquire into" is also a possible meaning, as in 2 Macc. 2:30; Philo On Noah's Life as a Planter 80.

The only NT instance is in Col. 2:18. Exegetes favor sense b. or sense c. Against b. it should be noted that the inscriptions never use embateúein alone (as here) and it always takes place in a sanctuary (unlike here). The sense, then, seems to be c. What the false teachers try to achieve by ecstasy and asceticism is opposed to adherence to the exclusiveness of Christ (2:19). All wisdom is present in Christ, so that there is no need to enter by painful investigation into what is seen in ecstatic visions, as the false teachers require. [H. Preisker, II, 535-36]

emménō → ménō; emphanízō → phaínō

emphysáō [to breathe on]

In the LXX this denotes the blowing of God's breath into or upon humans (Gen. 2:7), or creation (Ps. 104:29-30), or dead bones (Ezek. 37:5, 14). In the NT it occurs only in Jn. 20:22 for Jesus' breathing on the disciples to impart to them the Spirit who is released by Christ's work and by whom they will continue what he has begun in exercise of his binding and loosing authority. The giving of the keys, the missionary command, and the outpouring of the Spirit are combined here in a single act of creation that denotes the beginning of a new reality of life. [E. Stauffer, II, 536-37]

émphytos → phýō

en [in, on, with, etc.]

A. en with the Impersonal Dative.

1. This use is theologically significant when supraterrestrial localities are denoted, especially "the heavens"; cf. "my or our Father" in heaven in Mt. 10:32-33 etc.; "master" in Eph. 6:9; Col. 4:1; joy, peace, reward, treasure, commonwealth in Lk. 15:7; 19:38; Mt. 5:12; 6:20; Phil. 3:20. In such expressions heaven is God's dwelling. If the visible heaven is referred to in Mk. 13:25 and Acts 2:19, the ideas are close to those in Revelation (cf. 12:1; 4:2; 19:14).

2. Another sense of en in this usage is "with," e.g., "with a rod" in 1 Cor. 4:21, "with his kingdom" in Mt. 16:28, "with his blood" in 1 Jn. 5:6.

3. The sense may also be "in virtue of," e.g., "much speaking" in Mt. 6:7, "this retort" in Acts 7:29, boasting "of" in Gal. 6:13-14, "because" in Heb. 2:18, "therefore" in Heb. 6:17.

4. Another meaning is "by," e.g., "by the hand" in Acts 7:35; Gal. 3:19, and especially "by Christ's blood," as in Rom. 5:9; Heb. 9:22; Rev. 1:5. Senses 2-4 are unusual in Greek and betray Semitic influence.

B. en with the Personal Dative. This is a more difficult use. The spatial sense is basic, but other senses, e.g., the instrumental, exert an influence.

1. With Persons in General. a. With a name in quotations, en denotes the author (Mk. 1:2) or a character (Rom. 11:2). b. With the plural or collective singular it means "among," as in Rom. 1:12; Gal. 1:16. c. It also denotes the close connection of a possession, attribute, or event with a person (Mk. 9:50; Rom. 9:17). With knowledge it may denote the one who makes known (1 Cor. 4:6) or the one who knows (Rom. 1:19; Gal. 1:16). d. It may express the location within us of psychological processes or qualities (cf. Mt. 3:9; Mk. 2:8; Lk. 12:17; Jn. 6:61; Acts 10:17; Rom. 8:23; in the heart, Mk. 2:6; or in the conscience, 2 Cor. 5:11); especially in the religious or ethical sphere, e.g., fellowship with God in Jn. 2:25, sin in Rom. 7:8 etc., Satan's work in Eph. 2:2, pagan blindness in 2 Cor. 4:4, observance of the law in Rom. 8:4, the effects of preaching in 1 Cor. 1:6, God's work in Phil. 1:6, also anointing, life, joy, faith, witness, etc., or, in relation to Satan, no truth (Jn. 8:44), and, in relation to God or Christ, life (Jn. 5:26), the treasures of wisdom (Col. 2:3), the fullness of deity (1:19). Cf. the phrase "hidden in God" in Eph. 3:9; Col. 3:3. e. The spatial use sometimes passes over into an instrumental (Gen. 9:6; Rom. 9:7; Heb. 11:18; Mk. 3:22; Acts 17:31; cf. 1 Cor. 7:14, and perhaps Acts 17:18), for which parallels suggest a partially local and partially instrumental sense.

2. en with pneúma. a. The concept of the Spirit in us is local (cf. Num. 27:18; Jn. 14:17; 1 Cor. 3:16). b. The converse, that we are in the Spirit (Mt. 22:43; Rom. 8:9; Rev. 21:10; 1 Cor. 12:3; Eph. 6:18), is based on the spatial sense but approximates to the idea of a state (cf. Lk. 4:14; Acts 22:17). In the contrast with "in the flesh" in Rom. 8:8-9 the Spirit is the active principle of the ethical life. The ramifications are important for the preaching of the gospel (1 Th. 1:5) and prayer (Eph. 6:18). The demand of Jn. 4:23-24 stresses the relation between God's personal being and the worship we are to render him. Something of an instrumental use may be seen in Rom. 14:17; 1 Cor. 6:11; 12:9.

3. en Christṓ Iēsoú, en kyríō, and Related Formulas. These formulas are largely peculiar to Paul. a. In general they denote membership in Christ and his church (Phil. 1:13; 2 Cor. 12:2; 1 Th. 4:16; Rom. 8:1; 16:11). b. They may characterize the Christian state or activity (2 Cor. 2:12; Rom. 9:1; 2 Th. 3:4; 1 Cor. 15:31, etc.). c. They may also denote value judgments circumscribing the sphere of reference (Rom. 16:10, 13; 1 Cor. 3:1. 4:10, 17; Col. 1:28). d. They may denote the objective basis of fellowship with God, e.g., with grace in 2 Tim. 2:1, eternal life in Rom. 6:23, love of God in Rom. 8:39, will of God in 1 Th. 5:18, calling in Phil. 3:14, promise in Eph. 3:6, etc. e. They may denote the gathering of many into one, as in Rom. 12:5; Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:21-22; Col. 1:16-17 (creation); Eph. 1:10 (the cosmos). This rich usage is not just a Hebraism, nor does it rest on a mystically local conception, but it is based on the view of Christ as a cosmically and eschatologically universal personage. Like Adam, Christ initiates a whole race, an order of life instead of death. This differs from the common idea of the primal man by (a) its distinguishing of the first man from the last, and (b) its belief that the author of the second creation is historically present and has thus inaugurated the new creation. We move into a different sphere in baptism, so that the formulas contain a local as well as an instrumental nuance, but with the strong sense of a state.

4. Christ in Believers. This less common phrase is also essentially Pauline. Christ, the inaugurator of the new aeon, lives in his people (Rom. 8:10; Gal. 2:20; Col. 1:27). He must be formed in them (Gal. 4:19). This involves suffering (2 Cor. 1:5; 4:10; Col. 1:24). But even if concealed, Christ's life is in our mortal bodies and may be known by faith (Gal. 2:20; 2 Cor. 4:18; 13:5).

5. The en of fellowship in John. In John and 1 John we have the en of religious fellowship, often with eínai (Jn. 10:38; 1 Jn. 2:5b, etc.) or ménein (Jn. 6:56; 1 Jn. 2:6, etc.). Reciprocity is frequently stressed (Jn. 6:56; 1 Jn. 3:24, etc.). The Father is brought into the relationship, either with Jesus (Jn. 10:38) or with us (1 Jn. 4:12-13). We thus have a triangle (Jn. 14:20; 17:21; 1 Jn. 2:24). The formulas are neither ecstatic nor eschatological but mystical in a very broad sense with a strong personal and ethical reference (1 Jn. 1:3); cf. constructions with agápē and lógos (Jn. 15:10; 1 Jn. 2:14). There is no hint of the sacred marriage, nor are there any Hellenistic or Gnostic parallels. [A. Oepke, II, 537-43]

endēméō → dḗmos; endoxázomai, éndoxos → dóxa; endynamóō → dýnamis; endýō → dýō; enérgeia, energéō, enérgēma, energḗs → érgon; eneulogéō → eulogéō; enthyméomai, enthýmēsis → thymós

enístēmi [to be present]

As used in the NT this means a. "to enter" in a temporal sense, hence "to be present," and b. "to intervene." We have sense a. in 2 Th. 2:2; Rom. 8:38; 1 Cor. 3:22; Gal. 1:4; Heb. 9:9. The sense "to threaten," "impend" is improbable in 1 Cor. 7:26, since it is not attested elsewhere. The sufferings of the new aeon have already come (cf. Rom. 8:22). Sense b. is possible in 2 Tim. 3:1 (will "break upon" us), but a. fits well enough (will "come"). [A. Oepke, II, 543-44]

enkainízō → kainós; enkakéō → kakós; enkrínō → krínō; enóptēs → horáō; énnoia → noús; énnomos → nómos; énochos → échō

entéllomai [to command, commission], entolḗ [commandment, commission]

entéllomai. “To command,” “commission,” mostly with a ruler as subject, though sometimes the deity, or a teacher. The LXX uses it often, with the king as subject, or Moses, but especially God. In the NT we find 1. the general sense “to commission” (Mt. 17:9; Mk. 11:6); 2. the reference to God’s commanding, mostly in LXX quotations (Mt. 4:6; Lk. 4:10; Mt. 15:4; Acts 13:47); 3. the entéllesthai of Moses (Mt. 19:7; Jn. 8:5); and 4. Jesus‘ commanding of his disciples in his teaching (Mt. 28:20—where the commands are related to his own ruling presence), his orders immediately prior to the ascension (Acts 1:2), and his specific commanding of love (Jn. 15:14, 17).

entolḗ.

A. entolḗ outside the NT.

1. entolḗ in the General Usage of the Greek and Hellenistic World. The meaning is “command,” “commission,” a. as the command of a king or official, b. as the instruction of a teacher, c. as a commission, and d. as authorization.

2. The Specifically Religious Reference to the entolaí of the Law in the LXX and Hellenistic Judaism. The term acquires a solemn religious sense in the LXX (Hebrew mostly miṣwâ, sometimes piqqûḏîm) when used for specific requirements of the law. Josephus and Philo, however, rarely use it in this sense, preferring nómos or nómoi.

3. The Stoic Truncation of the entolḗ Concept in Philo. Philo avoids the term because he finds it too official and historical. He is less concerned with the content of the law than with its ethical substance and its agreement with natural or cosmic law. Like the Stoics, he links entolḗ with a lower form of morality. The voluntary act is higher than the commanded act. Commands are given only to the earthly Adam. The true sage knows and practices virtue without them. Commands may be tolerated only for the immature and uneducated.

B. The Synoptic Witness Endorses the Elementary entolḗ and Emphasizes Its Central Unity. In the Synoptics the debate with Pharisaism affects the usage. The synagogue enumerates 613 commands and thus has to try to find some basic principles (cf. Mt. 19:18; Mk. 12:28). Yet no command may be neglected (cf. Lk. 15:29), and entolḗ may refer not only to the Ten Commandments but to other provisions of the law (cf. Mk. 10:5; Jn. 8:5). Jesus unconditionally accepts the Ten Commandments (Mk. 10:17ff.). We do justice to the entolḗ only as we follow these, amplifying them with the positive command of love (Lev. 19:18) as expressed in giving to the poor. In Mt. 5:19, again, Jesus endorses the smallest commandments, probably the Ten Commandments as those that occupy least space on the scroll. The two tables are an elementary basis of life in the kingdom. Transcending them is the issue in true righteousness (Mt. 5:21ff.). “Least in the kingdom” is a rabbinic turn of phrase that does not suggest rank but stresses how seriously one’s destiny depends on decision relating to the commands. The attack on human commandments is not an attack on tradition as such but on casuistic interpretations which overturn the elementary requirement. By concentrating on the main thrust, Jesus gives added force to the divine entolḗ. He does this especially when he finds the essence of the commandments in love of God and love of neighbor (Mt. 22:36ff.; Lk. 10:26ff.). This accords with what is actually written in the law itself, so that the scribe and Jesus may give the same answer. The first great command is linked with the Shema, while the second is a common rabbinic compendium. Hence Jesus is not engaging in a creative act; he is simply offering a unitary and central conception taken from the law itself. Yet the combination is distinctive, for it shows that service of God cannot be isolated nor love of neighbor depreciated. The two belong together.

C. The Evaluation of entolḗ in Terms of the History of Revelation in Paul and Hebrews.

1. Paul interprets the entolḗ in Rom. 7. While the story of the fall is in the background, he equates it with nómos, relates it to the tenth commandment, raises the question of the relation of law and sin, and bases his exposition historically on Rom. 5. The law, which is linked with Moses, gives the knowledge of sin. By transgressing it, we share in Adam's sin. What is depicted more generally in ch. 5 is applied individually (though not autobiographically) in ch. 7. Sin grasps the opportunity provided by the entolḗ and by deception leads us eschatologically to death. The entolḗ makes possible the full development of sin and its consequences, but it is itself good as the righteous requirement of God. God uses it to bring sin out of its obscurity and in this way to open the door to justification. For Paul, then, entolḗ is the law in its character as divine command, but in itself it cannot bring salvation either by way of its fulfilment or by its preparatory unmasking of sin. From another angle Christ is our peace since he has broken down the barrier of the law of entolaí, i.e., the specific ordinances of the law (Eph. 2:14-15).

2. If entolḗ cannot save, there is a sense in which Christians must still keep the entolaí (1 Cor. 7:19). The content of this observance is the fulfilment, in the Spirit and on the basis of faith, of the law of love (Gal. 5:6). Paul thus agrees with the Synoptic Jesus and John in summing up all the requirements of the second table in the law of love (Rom. 13:9). This means that the individual commandments are still relevant; the fifth commandment may be cited in Eph. 6:2, and it has special significance due to the annexed promise. In Pauline writings entolḗ always denotes an OT commandment except in 1 Tim. 6:14 and one reading of 1 Cor. 14:37 ("a command of the Lord").

3. In Hebrews the reference of entolḗ is always to the law, e.g., the priestly law in 7:5, the institution of the covenant in 9:19; entolḗ denotes the specific requirement and is always accompanied by nómos as the sum of the whole. The revelation in Christ has shown the old entolḗ to be external and transitory. Since it cannot lead to fulfilment, its validity has been annulled (7:18).

D. The Christian Message as entolḗ in the Conflict against Gnosticism and Libertinism (the Johannine Writings and 2 Peter). In John (apart from Jn. 11:57) entolḗ has these senses.

1. In Jn. 10:18 the Father's entolḗ to the Son is that he should give his life and take it again, while in 12:49 the Father's entolḗ underlies the word of the Son as the word of life which the Son mediates by voluntarily accepting the task that the Father commits to him and thus enjoying his loving authorization.

2. Jesus gives his disciples the new entolḗ of love. This has a christological basis (Jn. 13:34; 15:12). If entolḗ still entails an imperative, rootage in the love of Christ and decision for him rule out both moralism and mysticism.

3. Keeping Christ's entolaí is a mark of love for Christ (Jn. 14:15, 21). If we love him, we both "have" and "keep" them. In view of the basis, the plural entolaí is not legalistic. The many commands are summed up in the one command of love, which comes to expression in the multiple spheres of the obedient life. In the light of Jn. 15:10 "task" or "commission" might also be embraced by entolḗ, but tereín tás entolás means "keeping the commandments," not "fulfilling a commission." Comparison of the disciples' keeping of the commandments with the Son's doing of the Father's work shows that a personal relationship is involved, especially in view of the common abiding in love.

4. In the Johannine Epistles the following features are to be noted. a. The entolaí are always related to the one entolḗ of love. b. The sharper conflict with Gnosticism leads to a heavier stress on keeping God's commandments (1 Jn. 2:3; 3:22; 5:3; 2 Jn. 4). True understanding of love for God must be opposed to mystical union, and love of God must be strictly related to love of the brethren. c. The description of the entolḗ as both old and new is directed against the Gnostic love of novelty. d. Also aimed at Gnosticism is the relating of faith and the entolḗ (1 Jn. 3:23) and the insistence that the commandments are not grievous (5:3). The law does not pose a problem, as in Paul, for the entolḗ is bound up with faith and the battle is against antinomian Gnosticism. There is no true gnosis without entolḗ (1 Jn. 2:3-4), but there are no entolaí without the entolḗ linked to Jesus, and as in the Gospel, though less explicitly, keeping the commandments is keeping the word. Revelation, too, links God's commands to Jesus and witness to him (cf. 12:17; 14:12). 2 Peter is directed against libertinism and understandably calls Christian teaching entolḗ in 2:21 and 3:2. The entolḗ of 1 Tim. 6:14, however, is the charge that is committed to Timothy. In the apostolic fathers entolḗ takes on a more legal sense. Subjection to God's commandments is the content of the Christian life (Barn. 4.11). Christ fulfilled these commandments (Barn. 6.1). He is the legislator of a new law (Ignatius Ephesians 9.2; Polycarp 2.2; 2 Clem. 17.1; Justin Dialogue with Trypho 12:2-3). [G. Schrenk, II, 544-56]

énteuxis → tynchánō; entolḗ → entéllomai; entynchánō → tynchánō

Enṓch [Enoch]

A. Enoch in Judaism. The name comprises a whole group of differing ideas. The title "Book of Enoch" refers to this material. The brief note in Gen. 5:21ff. provides the occasion for its development. Enoch's position as the seventh and his walk with God give him a special importance that leads to his linking with secret knowledge and the primal man, while his 365 years suggest a relation to astronomy. The resultant traditions are deposited in the noncanonical writings; cf. Sir. 44:14ff.; Jub. 4:17ff., etc., where he is the recipient of divine secrets, an ecstatic, a divinely appointed witness, and a heavenly high priest of outstanding righteousness; Ethiopian Enoch, which stresses his knowledge by visions of angelology, astronomy, and eschatology.

B. Enoch Traditions in Early Christianity. Not surprisingly, the NT refers to the Enoch literature but has no Enoch tradition of its own. Lk. 3:37 is based on Gen. 5:21ff. Heb. 11:5 repeats ideas found in Ethiopian Enoch and Jubilees. Jude 14 quotes literally from Eth. En. 7:9. There are probably other allusions to Ethiopian Enoch in Jude 4ff. Revelation also makes use of ideas that occur in Ethiopian Enoch, and there may be indirect allusions in Paul. Jn. 3:13 seems to be opposing the traditions relating to the ascension of Enoch which would make him the exalted Son of Man. 2 Peter seems not to use the materials accepted in Jude, but in early Christian writings we still find Enoch ideas, e.g., in 1 Clem. 9:2-3; Asc. Is. 9:6ff.; Justin Apology 2.5; Barn. 16:5. [H. Odeberg, II, 556-60]

→ huiós toú anthrṓpou

exangéllō → angelía; exagorázō → agorázō; exaitéō → aitéō; exakolouthéō → akolouthéō; exanástasis, exanístēmi → anístēmi; exapatáō → apatáō; exapostéllō → apostéllō; exartizō → ártios; exegeírō → egeírō; exérchomai → érchomai

éxestin [it is proper, possible], exousía [right, power], exousiázō [to have the right or power], katexousiázō [to exercise authority]

éxestin. "It is free," denoting a. an action that is possible because there is occasion for it or no obstacle to it, b. an action that is not prevented by a higher norm or court, and c. an action to which there is no psychological or ethical block. In the NT the term mostly refers to God's law or will with its specific demands, especially the OT law. The NT itself does not ask what is permitted in this sense but what is pleasing to God (Eph. 5:10).

exousía.

A. Ordinary Greek Usage.

1. This word denotes first the "ability" to perform an action.

2. It then means the "right," "authority," "permission" conferred by a higher court: a. the possibility granted by government; b. the right in various social relationships, e.g., that of parents, masters, or owners.

3. Since the authority under 2. is illusory without real power, the term approximates at times to dýnamis, but with the distinction that dýnamis denotes external power but exousía has a more inward reference.

4. The term may then denote self-asserted freedom or caprice in antithesis to law (with hýbris as a parallel). Yet legal order is usually the context.

5. Derived meanings are "authoritative position," "officebearers" (plural), "laudatory address," "crowd," and "pomp."

B. The Jewish and NT Usage.

1. Jewish usage is parallel to the Greek; the senses are “permission,” “authority,” or “right.” Philo has the term for the absolute power of the king or people, or that of God as seen in his creative activity and his judgments.

2. The LXX uses the term for right, authority, etc. in the legal sense and also as it is given by God, e.g., in the law. In Daniel and Maccabees it may be the power of the king or of God. By using exousía for God’s power the LXX introduces a term that excellently expresses the concept of God’s unrestricted sovereignty, of the God whose very word is power (cf. Dan. 4:14).

3. Formally, NT usage is closest to that of the LXX. exousía is God’s power, the power given to Jesus, or the power given by Jesus to his disciples. It is also the power of government (cf. Lk. 19:17; Acts 9:14: the Sanhedrin; Lk. 20:20: Pilate), the power of self-determination (Acts 5:4), the power of kings (Rev. 17:12), and “the powers that be” (plural) (Lk. 12:11; Rom. 13:1). It may also denote a sphere of dominion, e.g., the state (Lk. 23:7), the domain of spirits (Eph. 2:2), or the spiritual powers (1 Cor. 15:24; Eph. 1:21; Col. 1:16; 1 Pet. 3:22).

4. The rabbinic parallel rəšûṯ contributes to the range of meaning that exousía displays in the NT, since it embraces such meanings as power of disposal, possession, commission, right, freedom, and government (singular), as well as the monarchical power of God.

5. As regards construction, the classical use is with the genitive; in the NT we also find the prepositions en, perí, epí, and katá (for details see TDNT, II, 566).

C. The NT Concept of exousía. The NT concept rests on three foundations. First, the power indicated is the power to decide. Second, this decision takes place in ordered relationships, all of which reflect God’s lordship. Third, as a divinely given authority to act, exousía implies freedom for the community.

1. Primarily exousía denotes the absolute possibility of action that is proper to God alone as the source of all power and legality (cf. Lk. 12:5; Acts 1:7; Jude 25; Rom. 9:21).

2. God’s exousía may be seen in the sphere of nature (Rev. 14:18). Natural forces derive their power from God (Rev. 6:8; 9:3, 10, 19; 16:9; 18:1).

3. God’s will also encompasses Satan’s sphere of dominion (Acts 26:18; Col. 1:13). The final mystery of evil is not its power but the fact that this hostile power may still be encompassed by God’s overruling (Lk. 4:6; Rev. 13:5, 7; Lk. 22:53).

4. In relation to Christ’s person and work exousía denotes the divinely given right and power to act along with the related freedom (Mt. 28:18; Rev. 12:10). This is a cosmic power but with a special human reference (Jn. 17:2; Mt. 11:27; Jn. 1:12; 5:27: at the judgment). The historical Jesus claims exousía within the limits of his commission, e.g., to forgive sins (Mk. 2:10), to expel demons (Mk. 3:15), and to teach (Mt. 7:29; Mk. 11:28; Mt. 9:8; Lk. 4:36). This power is inseparable from the imminence of the kingdom; with the presence of him who exercises it, the kingdom itself draws near.

5. As regards the church, this derives its authority (or enablement) from Christ. Believers receive their right as such from him (Jn. 1:12; Rev. 22:14). The Lord gives the apostles their authority (2 Cor. 10:8); hence they must use it responsibly (cf. Mk. 13:34; 1 Cor. 9:4ff.). But exousía also means freedom for the community (1 Cor. 6:12; 8:9; 10:23). exousía was perhaps a slogan at Corinth, possibly on the basis of Paul’s own teaching about freedom from the law (cf. Rom. 14:14). Some Christians found it hard to apply this in spheres where they might be implicated in paganism, whereas others were perhaps led into startling demonstrations of it (1 Cor. 5:1ff.[?]). Paul radically upholds exousía, but relates it to the two principles of what is fitting and what is edifying. exousía, then, is not intrinsic autonomy, as, e.g., in Epictetus, but freedom in God’s kingdom by faith, so that regard must be had for the perils that lurk in freedom and for the needs of neighbors. In Christian Gnosticism we find hints of a development of freedom along the lines of the extremists at Corinth, while in apocryphal Acts exousía is not God’s gift to be used in service but a magically wrested power deployed for one’s own ends.

6. A special NT use, usually with archaí etc., is for supernatural powers. We do not find this in Hellenism or Gnosticism, but cf. Asc. Is. 1:4; 2:2, etc. and Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, as well as Christian Gnostics and the apocryphal Acts. The concept developed on Jewish soil. exousíai are cosmic powers, distinct from daímones but not clearly different from archaí. Paul combines the Jewish idea of the forces that rule nature with the Hellenistic notion of the nexus of destiny embracing the whole cosmos. There are thus various powers that govern human life and stand between God and us. They share the carnal nature of creation but also the fact that it is created in and for Christ (Col. 1:15-16). There is thus tension but no dualism, and the powers can never separate us from Christ.

7. The meaning of 1 Cor. 11:10 is much contested. In context the verse is part of the discussion of veiling (cf. the plḗn of v. 11). The verb opheílei implies obligation rather than compulsion and thus suggests a moral duty. It seems, then, that the veil is a sign of subordination and the angels are guardian angels or watchers over the natural order. exousía is thus used materially for the veil in a bold image suggesting male dominion. Alternatively it might be due to a confusion or intentional equation of the Aramaic stems for “to conceal” on the one hand and “to rule” on the other.

exousiázō. “To have and exercise exousía ” as a. possibility, b. right, or c. power. In 1 Cor. 7:4 Paul is saying, not that each partner has a right to the body of the other, but that each forgoes power over his or her own body (c.). The exhortation, then, is to mutual service in marital questions too. Lk. 22:25 carries an allusion to Ecclesiastes (c.). In 1 Cor. 6:12 the point of the passive is that Paul will not let anything win power over him.

katexousiázō. This uncommon word occurs in the NT only in Mk. 10:42 and parallels in the sense of the exercise of political power but with an implication of compulsion or oppression. [W. Foerster, II, 560-75]

exēgéomai → hēgéomai; exiśtēmi, existánō → ékstasis; exomologéō → homologéō; exorkízō, exorkistḗs → horkízō; exousía, exousiázō → éxestin

éxō [outside]

hoi éxō, “those outside,” figuratively “aliens”; hoi éxōthen, “the banished”; hoi ektós, “the laity” (as distinct from scribes); cf. rabbinic phrases for “heretics,” “unrecognized books.” hoi éxō in Mk. 4:11 means “those who are not disciples” and in 1 Cor. 5:12-13; 1 Th. 4:12; Col. 4:5 “non-Christians”; cf. hoi éxōthen in 1 Tim. 3:7. hoi éxō ánthrōpos in 2 Cor. 4:16 refers to our external or corruptible nature. [J. Behm, II, 575-76]

epangéllō [to promise], epangelía [promise], epángelma [promise] proepangéllomai [to promise beforehand] epangéllō, epangelía.

A. epangéllō, epangelía with the Greeks. a. The first sense is “to indicate,” “declare,” “declaration,” “report.” b. When the state declares something, it becomes an “order.” c. In law we find the senses “accusation” and “delivery of a judgment.” d. We then find the senses “to declare an achievement,” “to show one’s mastery,” “to profess a subject.” e. Another sense is “to offer,” “to promise,” “to vow.” As regards promises, tension between word and deed is felt, so that promises are often seen as worthless. f. A special type of promise is the “promise of money,” and in this sense the idea of a “subscription” or “donation” arises (state liturgies, gifts to rulers at their accession, priests promising gifts in support of their candidature). g. In the Hellenistic period we also find a sacral use for the “proclamation” of a festival. Among all the instances, only one example has been found for the promise of a deity.

B. epangelía and epangéllesthai in the Jewish World.

1. There is no prior history in the OT, for the MT and LXX use different words for God’s pledges or promises. Paul, however, links epangelía and euangélion and views OT history from the standpoint of epangéllesthai. We thus think of Heb. dbr and LXX laleín or eipeín (cf. Gen. 18:19) in terms of “promise.” The NT usage follows that of Hellenism; we find sense d. in 1 Tim. 4:8 etc. and sense e. in Mk. 14:11 etc.

2. Judaism develops the idea of the promise of God; cf. God's promise to answer prayer, the interrelating of law and promise, the emphasis on the reliability of the divine promises in the rabbis, and the eschatological promises of apocalyptic and rabbinic literature.

C. epangéllō in the NT.

1. God is he who promises in Heb. 10:23; 11:11; the reference is to eschatological hope in 10:23 and to the promise of Isaac in 11:11 (cf. 12:26; 6:13).

2. The crown of life is promised in Jms. 1:12 (cf. 2:5). Life (eternal) is also the subject of promise in 1 Jn. 2:25 and Tit. 1:2.

3. Acts 7:5 refers to the promise of the land to Abraham.

4. Paul links the promise to Abraham with the promise of life in Rom. 4 and Gal. 3. The promise of life from death has been fulfilled in Christ for believers (4:15, 17, 21, 24-25). In Gal. 3:18-19 Christ is the promised seed and what is promised is the inheritance, i.e., citizenship in the Jerusalem that is above (4:26, 28).

D. epangelía in the NT.

1. In Luke. Except in Acts 23:21, the reference is always to God's promise. epangelía (often without theoú) denotes both the promise and its fulfilment. Abraham is its recipient in Acts 7:17. It is messianic (Acts 26:6-7) and Christ has fulfilled it (13:23, 32-33). The Messiah bears and distributes the Spirit, who is also promised in the OT (2:16ff.), as Jesus has shown the disciples (1:4). Christians live in the age of fulfilment when sins are forgiven and the Spirit is poured out (2:38-39).

2. In Paul. a. Law and Promise. Paul examines the relation between law and promise. He is sure that God can do what he promises (Rom. 4:21) even to the point of raising the dead or creating out of nothing (4:17). But if the promises are to be fulfilled, they must be detached from what we do and related to the gracious will and act of God (4:16). To tie promise to law is to invalidate it by reason of our nonobservance and the resultant judgment (4:13). Promise is no longer promise if it is dependent on law (Gal. 3:18). Covenant promise precedes law. Law cannot give life (3:21) but serves only to lead sinners from works to faith (3:22). Nevertheless, the indicative of the promises carries with it an imperative, as in 2 Cor. 7:1; Rom. 6; Phil. 2:12. The promises are not determined by the believer's conduct; they determine it.

b. The Recipients. Abraham and his descendants are the recipients (Rom. 4:13). The Jews receive the promises of messianic salvation first (9:4); the Gentiles are strangers to them (Eph. 2:12). Jesus is a Jew (Rom. 15:8). From the Jews, however, the promises extend by way of Jesus to the nations, for all who believe like Abraham are his children (Rom. 4:16) in the one seed which is Christ (Gal. 3:16ff.; cf. Eph. 3:6). Those who put on Christ, or are in him, or belong to him, are Abraham's offspring and heirs according to the promise (Gal. 3:27ff.).

c. The Content of the Promise. The content is messianic salvation as inheritance, life, Spirit, righteousness, and sonship (Rom. 4:13ff.; Gal. 3:14ff.; Rom. 9:8; Eph. 1:13). All the promises are fulfilled in Christ as the Yes of God (2 Cor. 1:20) who took the curse of the law (Gal. 3:14) and gave the Spirit as a pledge, deposit, or seal (Eph. 1:13-14).

3. In Hebrews. The author of Hebrews has different concerns. As he sees it, promises are given to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Sarah, the patriarchs, the prophets, and the people (6:12-13; 11:9, 11, 33; 4:1ff.). The individual promises, e.g., the land and a posterity (4:1; 6:14), are fulfilled for them, but not the promise in the absolute. All God's promises converge on the messianic salvation which the patriarchs see and greet from afar as strangers and exiles (11:13). The new covenant set up by Christ rests on better promises (8:6). The promises cited are those of Jer. 31; they are now brought to fulfilment (9:15) by Christ's death. The final consummation is still ahead (10:36) but we live already in the éschaton (1:2), and we need to persevere in the tension between the already and the not yet lest we finally lose the promise through unbelief (4:1ff.). On God's part, his will to bring the promises to consummation is unalterable; he has pledged fulfilment with an oath, and this should strengthen us in faith (6:12ff.).

4. In 2 Peter. Delay in the parousia has produced scoffers who ask where the promise of Christ's coming is (3:4). The answer is that God's apparent slowness is forbearance (3:9); the prophetic word is sure (1:19ff.).

epángelma. This is not so common as epangelía but has much the same range of meaning, e.g., "declaration," "order," "profession," "promise," and in Philo "task." In the NT it occurs only twice in 2 Peter with the same meaning as epangelía. In 3:13 we wait for the new heaven and earth according to God's promise. In 1:4 God's promises are called very great and precious, for by them we escape present corruption and become partakers of the divine nature (cf. 1:11).

proepangéllomai. This rare word means a. "to announce beforehand," b. "to exert oneself beforehand" (about an office), and c. "to promise beforehand." We find sense a. in 2 Cor. 9:5 (the gift they have announced in advance) and sense c. in Rom. 1:2 (the gospel promised beforehand in prophetic scripture). [J. Schniewind and G. Friedrich, II, 576-86]

epagōnízomai → agṓn

épainos [praise, approval]

Praise and approval were much sought after in antiquity, though the Stoic tried to achieve freedom from human judgment. In the OT, épainos is the recognition that the community gives the righteous, but especially God's approval. In Philo it is the approval of Moses or God, but sometimes public applause in the Greek sense. épainos may also be used in the LXX for the community's attitude of praise and worship toward God. God's throne is surrounded by dóxa and épainos (1 Chr. 16:27).

1. The NT use resembles that of the LXX. Only God's approval counts, not public acclaim (Rom. 2:29; 1 Cor. 4:5). The idea is that of vindication rather than reward. épainos is God's saving sentence at the manifestation of Christ (1 Pet. 1:7).

2. Christians should not be concerned, then, about human recognition. Apart from God's recognition, they are to seek recognition only from those whom God has commissioned, i.e., a. the community (2 Cor. 8:18), and b. the government (Rom. 13:3-4; 1 Pet. 2:14). The only instance of classical usage is in Phil. 4:8.

3. épainos may also, as in the LXX, denote praise of God (Eph. 1:3ff.; Phil. 1:11). Having experienced salvation, the community can already offer dóxa and épainos even before the time of consummation. [H. Preisker, II, 586-88]

epaírō → aírō; epaischýnomai → aischýnō; epakolouthéō → akolouthéō; epakoúō → akoúō; epanapaúō → anapaúō; epanórthōsis → orthós; epáratos → ará; ependýō → dýo; epérchomai → érchomai; eperōtáō, eperṓtēma → erōtáō; epibállō → bállō; epígeios → gḗ; epíginṓskō, epígnōsis → ginṓskō

epieíkeia [gentleness], epieikḗs [gentle]

epieikḗs means "what is right or fitting," "what is serviceable," then "equable," "moderate," "reasonable," "gentle." In the LXX the group is used for God's "kindness" as supreme ruler (1 Sam. 12:22; Dan. 3:42), as well as that of earthly rulers or the righteous, e.g., Elisha (2 Kgs. 6:3). Josephus has epieikḗs for kings and prophets, as does Philo. epieíkeia denotes legal "clemency" or "leniency" in Plato and Plutarch, and cf. the papyri.

In 2 Cor. 10:1 Paul proposes the "meekness" of Christ as a model. As king, Christ has the gentleness that only one with full power may display (Phil. 2:5ff.). epieíkeia is thus a complement of heavenly majesty. The weak want to assert their dignity; Christ, having divine authority, shows saving clemency. The community shares his glory and should thus display the same epieíkeia. This comes out clearly in Phil. 4:5. Since the Lord is at hand, and the dóxa of the community will soon be manifest, it may show forbearance to all. Faith in its heavenly fullness of power finds expression in saving gentleness as the earthly outworking of an eschatological possession (cf. Phil. 2:15-16). As Felix ought to show a clemency befitting his high office (Acts 24:4), Christians should be epieikeís in virtue of their divinely given calling. In Jms. 3:17 wisdom is gentle because the attributes of rule are appropriate to it. In 1 Tim. 3:3 the bishop, acting with eschatological assurance as a representative of the community, must also be epieikḗs in virtue of its eschatological endowment. On the other hand, the term has a more general reference in 1 Pet. 2:18 (where it refers to non-Christian as well as Christian masters) and Tit. 3:2 (where it comes in a conventional list of virtues). [H. Preisker, II, 588-90]

epizētéō → zētéō; epithyméō, epithymētḗs, epithymía → thymós; epikaléō → kaléō; epikatáratos → ará; epilambánomai → lambánō; epilýō, epílysis → lýo; epimartyréō → martyréō; epiorkéō, epíorkos → horkízō

epioúsios [for the present]

In the NT this occurs in Mt. 6:11 and Lk. 11:3. The only instance outside the NT is an incomplete one on a papyrus. The meaning is hard to fix.

1. The Linguistic Derivation. One possible derivation is from epiénai, which would give such senses as "regular," "daily," "appropriate." Another is from hē epióusa (hēméra), which yields "for the next day," or "for the day already dawning." Derivations from epí and eínai are possible according to the Koine but cause confusion of sense. The suggestion that epí tḗn ousían forms the basis, so that the meaning is "for vital sustenance," is not linguistically feasible. epí tḗn oúson (hēméran), "for the present day," makes good sense, but hē oúsa has never been found without hēméra. The idea that epioúsios is formed in contrast to perioúsios and means "not exceeding our need" has little probability.

2. The Meaning of epioúsios. a. From the above survey it may be seen that a derivation from epiénai (and especially hē epioúsa) is perhaps the freest from objections. On this view the meaning is "for the morrow." But this raises material questions, e.g., whether Jesus would teach us to be concerned about the next day, whether the mention of two times in a brief request is to be expected, whether the whole point of asking bread from God is not that he will supply needs as they arise (cf. Ex. 16). In other words, the rendering "for tomorrow" does not yield the attitude that Jesus is teaching.

b. Other possibilities are to take "for the morrow" in either an eschatological or a spiritual sense, but this presents us with a very unusual figure of speech that is out of keeping with the simple diction of the prayer.

c. The idea that epioúsios means "sufficient" has little to commend it.

d. The truth may well be that epioúsios denotes a measure rather than time. This is possible in two ways. The first is that the prayer is for an amount that is enough for the dawning day. But this forces us to take the Lord's Prayer as a morning prayer and also makes the term tautologous in view of the preceding "this day."

e. epioúsios may thus denote the amount in the sense of "sufficient" (cf. Ex. 16; Prov. 30:8). On this view, the unusual Greek word might be due to the difficulty in finding a real equivalent for the Hebrew and Aramaic concept (cf. again Prov. 30:8). Thus, while we cannot say precisely what the derivation and meaning are, the sense conveyed is fairly certainly that we are to pray each day for the bread that we need. [W. Foerster, II, 590-99]

episképtomai [to look at, visit], episkopéō [to look at, oversee], episkopḗ [visitation, office of bishop], epíkopos [overseer, bishop], allotriepískopos [busybody]

A. episképtomai, episkopéō outside the NT.

1. In secular Greek episképtomai has the following senses: a. "to look upon," "consider," "have regard to" (something or someone), with such references as inspecting, supervising, having a care to, looking down on, or watching over (the gods); b. "to reflect on," "examine," "investigate" (something), e.g., a document, or virtue; c. "to visit," e.g., the sick (friends or the doctor).

2. The LXX adds some new meanings and intensifies the religious reference. Thus we find a. "to visit," b. "look on," c. "investigate," but also d. "care for" (Jer. 23:2), e. "find out" (Num. 14:34), f. "muster" (Ex. 30:12), and g. "miss" or, passive, "be missed, absent" (1 Sam. 20:6). The term has a religious content only when God is subject, e.g., when he watches over the land (Dt. 11:12) or visits his people in judgment or mercy (Zech. 10:3). Visitation in judgment produces sense h. "to punish" (Ex. 32:34; Job 35:15), and visitation in mercy sense i. “to accept” (Gen. 21:1). A final sense j. is “to appoint,” “instal,” as in Num. 4:27; Neh. 7:1. Appointment by God in Num. 27:16 is important, since it perhaps influenced the selection of the term epískopos for early Christian officebearers. Philo and Josephus use the term in its secular senses but not with any religious significance, and the rabbis, while commending visitation of the sick, add little to the concept of divine visitation.

B. episképtomai, episkopéō in the NT.

1. Jesus takes up the concern for visiting the sick in Mt. 25:35ff., applies it to people of all nations, and deepens the command a. by asking for an attitude rather than individual acts and b. by relating it to himself and therefore to God. Jms. 1:27 expresses the same concern.

2. Even when the meaning is “to seek out,” as in Acts 7:23, the idea of concern is present. Thus Paul in Acts 15:36 proposes a visit to the churches so as to see how they are doing. episkopéō has this sense in Heb. 12:14-15. “Seeing to it” that no one fails to obtain God’s grace expresses a sense of responsibility for the eternal welfare of all members of the church, and it is a matter not merely for the leaders but for the congregation as a whole. The introduction of episkopoúntes into some readings of 1 Pet. 5:2 is to the same effect. Presbyters, in tending the flock, watch over it and show a concern for it (on the model of Christ himself as shepherd and epískopos in 1 Pet. 2:25).

3. The word can also mean “to look out” someone with a view to appointment (cf. Num. 27:16; Neh. 7:1), as in Acts 6:3, where for the first time the church makes the selection, though considering only those who are “full of the Spirit and of wisdom.”

4. The idea of God’s visitation, especially in grace, comes into the NT from the LXX. Thus we have a christological exposition of Ps. 8:4 LXX in Heb. 2:6. Again, in Lk. 7:16 God shows himself to be the Lord in his gracious intervention in earthly affairs. Dependence on the OT may also be seen in Lk. 1:68, 78, except that now visitation is plainly a messianic concept and is related directly to Christ’s coming. The visitation of grace now extends from Israel to the Gentiles according to James in Acts 15:14, where the whole content of the term in salvation history supports the rendering “visit (in mercy).”

episkopḗ.

1. This first came into common use in the LXX. In the only instance in secular Greek it means a. “visit.” In the LXX, however, it means b. “look,” “glance,” c. “care,” “protection,” d. “inquiry,” and e. “muster.” f. There is no equivalent for the verb “to miss,” passive “to be missing.” g. The true theological sense is when the term is used for “visitation.” More weakly it denotes judicial punishment in Lev. 19:20, but mostly it is used for divine visitation in judgment, as in Num. 16:29; Dt. 28:25. Disobedient nations will be visited by God (Jer. 6:15). Their idols will be broken on the day of visitation (Is. 10:3). Thunder and earthquake will accompany the final visitation (Is. 29:6). h. But the divine visitation may also be in mercy and grace, as in Gen. 50:24-25; Is. 23:16. i. The meaning “office” also occurs in a transition from more general “oversight” to official responsibility (Num. 4:16; Ps. 109:8, where the Hebrew may mean “goods,” but the LXX, followed by Acts 1:20, has episkopḗ in the sense of “office”).

2.a. The NT adopts the eschatological concepts of the hour and day of visitation. Jesus relates the hour of gracious visitation to his own coming to Jerusalem in Lk. 19:44; because the people fails to recognize it, this becomes a visitation of judgment. 1 Pet. 2:12 speaks of the day of visitation when the Gentiles will be brought to glorify God by seeing the good deeds of Christians. The idea here may be that the good conduct of Christians makes this a visitation of grace, or that the Gentiles will be forced to see God’s glory manifested therein on the day of judgment when everything is brought to light. Some versions add episkopḗ to 1 Pet. 5:6; a visitation of grace changes our time of humiliation into one of exaltation.

b. The NT also has episkopḗ for “office”: the apostolic office in Acts 1:16ff. and the episcopal office in 1 Tim. 3:1. One should not deduce from this twofold use an equation of the apostle and bishop, for the term occurs in Acts 1:20 because a fulfilment of Scripture is perceived in the replacement of Judas, while in 1 Tim. 3:1 it is probably derived from epískopos.

epískopos.

A. epískopos in Nonbiblical Greek. The term means “overseer,” “watcher,” and thus comes to be used a. for “protector,” “patron,” and b. for various offices involving oversight, but not of a religious nature. The only religious use is for the gods.

1. The Gods as epískopoi. Greek gods are personified forces. They are thus related to the creatures nearest to them, which are under their protection, e.g., springs, groves, cities, peoples, and individuals. Deities watch over these and rule over them, giving sanctity to human life in society. They are thus called epískopoi. They watch over treaties, care for cities, and protect markets. They take note of offenses and punish them, e.g., offenses against parents or violations of graves. Pallas Athene watches over Athens and Artemis over pregnant women. Zeus and the gods watch over all good and evil deeds even down to the most secret details. Specific spheres come under different gods; e.g., Zeus and Pallas Athene rule over cities.

2. Men as Overseers, Watchers, Scouts. With the same basic sense, the term can be applied to various human activities, e.g., watching over corpses, overseeing a ship or a business or the market or construction, looking after young married couples, ruling a house. Other meanings along these lines are “protector” and “spy” or “scout.”

3. The Cynic as episkopṓn and epískopos. These two terms find a special use in Cynic philosophy. Epictetus, for example, views himself, not as a theoretical thinker, but as a divine messenger acting as God’s katáskopos to investigate what is good and to test people to see how far they conform to it. episkopeín is sometimes used for this testing, but only once, and later, do we find epískopos instead of katáskopos for the office.

4. epískopos as a Designation of Office. a. Athens uses epískopoi for state officials, e.g., supervisors sent by Athens to other cities of the Attic League. b. We also read of similar officials in other states, whether as secret police or as officials with judicial functions, and in one case as the officer over the mint. c. More commonly epískopoi are local officials or the officers of societies, but the exact responsibilities are not clear and even when there is a religious connection, e.g., the epískopoi of a society for a sanctuary at Rhodes, they have no cultic responsibilities but see to such secular tasks as looking after the funds. The Roman pontiff is epískopos only insofar as he has the duty of overseeing the Vestal Virgins. d. An interesting use occurs in Syria in relation to the erection of a public building in which it is clear that those who have the episkopḗ are supervisors of the work in the interests of the builders and perhaps with control of the funds. We find similar instances connected with the building of an aqueduct and a temple.

B. epískopos in Judaism.

l. God as epískopos. The LXX calls God epískopos in Job 20:29 with a clear reference to his judicial function. Philo has the same thought that nothing, good or bad, can be hidden from God. In particular, God sees into the human heart (cf. Wis. 1:6; Acts 1:24: kardiognṓstēs).

2. Men as epískopoi. There is no clearly defined office of epískopos in the LXX but the term is used for “overseer” in various senses, e.g., officers in Judg. 9:28; Is. 60:17, supervisors of funds in 2 Chr. 34:12, 17, overseers of the priests and Levites in Neh. 11:9, the temple in 2 Kgs. 11:18, and temple functions etc. in Num. 4:16. Philo has the term for “one who knows souls,” and Josephus for a “guardian” of morality.

C. epískopos in the NT.

1. Of the five NT instances, one relates to Christ. In 1 Pet. 2:25 Christ is called the shepherd and epískopos of our souls. Supplementing shepherd, the term suggests the pastoral work of watching over or guarding, but it might also imply that he has the fullest knowledge. In any case, combined with shepherd the word has the implication of his total self-offering in caring for the souls of his people (cf. episkopéō in Heb. 12:15).

2. Elsewhere men are called epískopoi, and this raises two questions. a. Who are these people called epískopoi? The word is not used for itinerant charismatics but only for leaders of settled congregations. For such leaders we quickly find the words presbýteroi or epískopoi and diákonoi. As may be seen from Acts 20:28 (Paul's speech to the Ephesian elders) there is at first no distinction between presbýteroi and epískopoi. All the presbýteroi here are epískopoi, their task is that of shepherding (cf. 1 Pet. 2:25; 5:2ff.), there are several epískopoi in one church, their calling is from the Holy Spirit (though this does not rule out election or appointment, Acts 6:3ff.; 14:23), and their function is that of the watchful direction of believers on the basis of Christ's work. b. When does the free activity of overseeing become a designation of office? There is from the outset an impulse in this direction, for while Paul describes a function in Acts 20:28 he is also addressing a specific group. The addition in Phil. 1:1 ("with the bishops") also shows that an office and not just an activity is in view even if it does not tell us what this specific office is except in general terms of function. In 1 Tim. 3:1 episkopḗ is a definite office that may be sought and for which there are qualifications (though no duties are listed). Since there is here no further reference to the Holy Spirit, everyday needs influence this development, but the qualifications are very soberly stated, embracing moral reliability, a monogamous marriage, disciplined family life, teaching ability, maturity, and blamelessness according to the standards of the non-Christian world. In the parallel passage in Tit. 1:5ff. the qualifications for elders are similar, and the sudden use of epískopos in v. 7 shows that the same function is in view, namely, that of guiding and representing the congregation, teaching, and conducting worship when no itinerant minister is present. The use of the singular in 1 Tim. 3:2 and Tit. 1:7 does not mean that there is only one bishop in each church; it is simply a reference to the bishop as a type. The point of the office is service rather than power; the bishop, too, receives admonition and must be sober and disciplined in outlook. His authority is from the Holy Spirit. The singling out of some elders in 1 Tim. 5:17 because of their good rule, especially in teaching and preaching, may hint at early distinctions that would eventually lead to a primacy of bishops. It is hardly likely that the angels of the churches in Rev. 1:20 etc. are bishops.

D. The Origin and Original Form of the Episcopate. We must begin with the distinction between the origin of the episcopal office and that of the designation epískopos. None of those called epískopoi in the ancient world can have served as a model for the Christian epískopos. A formal parallel to the bishop and deacon may perhaps be found in the archisynágōgos and hypērétēs in the synagogue, especially as the former conducts divine service, supervises external order, and is accompanied by elders, but there seems to be no deeper similarity, e.g., in relation to the task of guiding and caring for the congregation as a fellowship of faith and love. The structure of the Damascus community has also been suggested as a model with its leaders of camps who in addition to external duties have responsibility for admissions and expulsions as well as teaching, preaching, and discipline, and whose title might be rendered epískopos in Greek. Yet it is unlikely that this small community offered any direct example for the Christian church, and in addition these leaders are too monarchical for the older Christian episcopate and there is also no mention of deacons. The truth is that we need not seek models, since the Christian church was a new and distinctive thing whose mission required new offices and which had by nature the impulse to create such offices. Jesus had appointed the Twelve and given to them and others an apostolic ministry supplemented by the missionary endeavors of teachers and prophets. Where churches were founded, people with a special charisma (1 Cor. 12:28) had to be put in charge and take responsibility for the common life in such matters as pastoral direction, worship, and preaching (cf. Acts 14:23; 1 Th. 5:12; Rom. 12:8; Gal. 6:6ff.). There thus come into being the epískopoi and diákonoi of Phil. 1:1, and these remain when the need for itinerants diminishes in a given locality. The title epískopoi derives from the function. As presbýteroi comes from the Jewish world, the Greek scene offers in epískopos a familiar but not precisely defined word which can be given a specific Christian application. Like diákonos, it is a modest term, but it has a rich content due to its use for divine being and activity, and the description of Jesus himself as epískopos adds to its theological significance. Later, a human claim comes to be associated with the term as 1 Clement opens the door to the idea of apostolic succession with its hierarchical chain: God, Christ, the apostles, bishops (42-44). Did. 15.1 probably gives a better factual depiction of the situation when it shows how itinerants give way to local bishops and deacons. During the second century, however, the single bishop, distinguished from the presbyters, gradually achieves precedence (cf. Ignatius of Antioch). While providing stronger leadership, this system tends to produce authoritarian bishops in direct antithesis to the recommendations to elders in 1 Pet. 5:2-3.

allotri (o)epískopos. This word occurs only in 1 Pet. 4:15. It is formed after the manner of words like allotriógnōmos, "a meddler in alien matters." Since it is not found outside the NT, we must deduce its meaning from the context. The context, however, allows of various possibilities: a. "one who has his eye on the possessions of others"; b. "an unfaithful guardian of goods committed to him"; c. "one who meddles in things that do not concern him," and d. "a calumniator or informer." [H. W. Beyer, II, 599-622]

episkēnóō → skḗnos; episkiázō → skiá

epistátēs [master]

epistátēs occurs in the NT only in the vocative, is peculiar to Luke, and except in Lk. 17:13 is used only by the disciples. Luke chooses it as one of his equivalents for "rabbi" (cf. Mk. 4:38 and par.; 9:5 and par.; 9:38 and par.). Secular Greek has a rich and varied usage; the term can denote a herdsman, a driver of an elephant, a taskmaster, an overseer of public works, the leader of an athletic society or temple, a magistrate or governor of a city, and even a protective deity. The extent of its vocative use is uncertain. [A. Oepke, II, 622-23]

epistréphō, epistrophḗ → stréphō; episynagōgḗ → synagōgḗ; epitagḗ → tássō; epiteléō → teléō

epitimáō [to rebuke], epitimía [censure]

epitimáō corresponds to the twofold sense of timáō, "to award honor or blame," and comes into use for "to blame," "to reprove." In the LXX it is applied especially to God's rebuke (cf. Job 26:11; 2 Sam. 22:16; Pss. 106:9; 119:21). In a limited way it is also used for human rebuke (Gen. 37:10; Ruth 2:16), but human reproof is often held to be presumptuous, and only judicial, pastoral, or fraternal rebuke is commended. The NT follows the LXX 1. in treating human rebuke with great reserve. Thus the disciples are overhasty with their rebuke in Mk. 10:13, the crowd in Mk. 10:48, and Peter in Mt. 16:22 (Jesus here responds with his own legitimate rebuke). The only acceptable rebuke is that of humility. Thus one of the crucified thieves rebukes the other in Lk. 23:41, and one believer may rebuke another if it is done in a spirit of forgiveness (Lk. 17:3). Rebuke is especially a responsibility of pastoral oversight in 2 Tim. 4:2. The NT also follows the LXX 2. in regarding rebuke as essentially a prerogative of divine lordship. Only God may rightly rebuke the devil (Jude 9). Jesus plainly has the right of rebuke (Mk. 8:33; Lk. 9:55; 19:39-40). In Mk. 8:30 epitimán is used to show how strict is his charge to the disciples not to disclose his messiahship at this point. The same term is one of lordship when he commands the demons to keep silence in Mk. 3:12. He displays a similar power when he rebukes and expels the unclean spirit in Mk. 9:25, when he rebukes the fever of Simon's mother-in-law in Lk. 4:39, and when he rebukes even the elemental forces of nature in Mk. 4:39. His unconditional divine power and prerogative are clearly and forcefully revealed in his epitimán.

epitimía occurs in the NT only in 2 Cor. 2:6 as a technical term in congregational discipline for the church's "punishment" or "censure." [E. Stauffer, II, 623-27]

epiphaínō, epipháneia, epiphanḗs → phṓs; epiphaúskō → phṓs; epoikodoméō → oikodoméō; epouránios → ouranós heptá [seven], heptákis [seven times], heptakischílioi [seven thousand], hébdomos [week], hebdomḗkonta [seventy], hebdomēkontákis [seventy times]

A. The Background in Religious History.

1. The prominence of the number seven in many cultures is probably due to the observation of the four seven-day phases of the moon rather than to the recognized existence of seven planets, for the number is important even before interest in the seven planets begins, and the moon plays a role in the measuring of time in the Babylonian creation epic.

2. As regards the cosmic significance of seven, the Babylonians make an equation with “fullness” which is also found among the Hebrews. This equation links up with the seven-day period; the seventh day completes the period and thus achieves a divinely ordained totality. The number then comes into cultic use in cleansings, prayers, and the ceremonial of sacrifice. In the OT the seventh day is a holy day, the seventh year is a holy year etc., and there is in the Hebrew year a hebdomadal cycle of feasts.

3. Philo develops a numbers mysticism by which seven determines the rhythms of human life; this goes in seven-year cycles. Like the later rabbis, he believes that a seven-month child may live but not an eight-month child. His interest in this point, however, is not speculative; he simply states it as a fact within his discussion of the number seven.

B. The NT Usage.

1. OT influence may be seen in Rom. 11:4, where Paul quotes 1 Kgs. 19:18 in support of the fact that God has preserved a remnant, i.e., Christian Israel. Perhaps, like 1 Kgs. 19:18, he connects the number 7,000 with the totality of true Israel. Except for Heb. 11:30 this is the only instance of the number in the NT; possibly the NT avoids it in opposition to contemporary speculation. In the references to the seven days of the siege of Jericho in Heb. 11:30 and the seven races in Acts 13:19 the interest is purely factual.

2. “Seven days” is the term for a week in Acts 20:6; 21:4, 27; 28:14, and the “seventh day” is mentioned in Heb. 4:4 (the sabbath).

3. “Seven” is a round number in the feeding of the four thousand (Mt. 15:22ff.; Mk. 8:1ff.). The context offers us no reason to seek a hidden significance.

4. Older ideas of the significance of the number may occur at times. a. When the Sadducees refer to the seven brothers who all marry the same wife, they possibly have in view an infinite series. b. When seven spirits return to the backslider in Mt. 12:45, or seven spirits are driven out of Mary Magdalene in Lk. 8:2, the point is that we have here the worst possible state of corruption. c. In the saying about sinning and forgiving seven times (Mt. 18:21-22; Lk. 17:4), Jesus‘ point is that there is to be no limit to forgiveness no matter whether readiness for it corresponds to or transcends the measure of guilt. Already in Babylon the number seven is linked with sin and the readiness to forgive, as in penitential psalms which speak of sinning seventy times seven or of asking seven times for pardon. In the OT the blood is sprinkled seven times on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:11ff., 15ff.). The point in all such references is the fullness either of sin or of its expiation (cf. the LXX of 2 Sam. 12:6). With the seventy times seven of Mt. 18:22 we may compare Gen. 4:24; whether or not the proper rendering is 490 or 77 makes no difference, since the unlimited nature of forgiveness is obviously the issue. d. A sevenfold principle governs the genealogies of Jesus in Mt. 1:1ff. and Lk. 3:23ff. Here Jesus is shown to be the Messiah by his place in David’s lineage as the last in the ninth (Luke) or eleventh (Matthew) group of seven.

5. Seven is a very important number in Revelation. There are seven churches and angels (1:4ff.), seven candlesticks (1:13ff.), seven stars (1:16ff.), seven spirits (1:4; 4:5), seven seals (5:1ff.), seven horns and eyes (the Lamb, 5:6), seven trumpets in the hands of seven angels (8:2ff.), seven thunders (10:3-4), seven heads with crowns (the drákōn, 12:3), and seven plagues (15:1ff.). We cannot make seven a formal principle of Revelation, but it pervades the book as the number of fullness, whether this be the perfection of the divine work or the full development and deployment of the forces hostile to God. The individual references are influenced by the various motifs that are suggested by the apocalyptic tradition and the historical situation; cf. the mythical heads of the beast and their relation to the seven hills of Rome (17:9). The seven kings are probably seven emperors. The seven churches comprise the church in Asia Minor, and the cities named are also centers of the imperial cult. The seven stars perhaps carry on illusion to the role of the seven planets in mithraism or to the images of the emperors on coins; in context, they imply the unconditional lordship of Christ. The seven thunders are probably based on the seven references to God’s voice in the thunder in Ps. 29. The seven candlesticks suggest the seven-branched candelabra, the seven seals the seals attached to a Roman will, the seven horns the common symbol of power, and the seven eyes the Lord's eyes in Zech. 4:10. Seven is also a formal number in Revelation to the extent that it expresses the divine fullness and totality. Hence, even though it is not here a specific apocalyptic form, it serves as a suitable principle of arrangement.

6. Seven men are chosen in Acts 6:2ff. because there were usually seven leaders in a Jewish community. The number shows that the seven are not viewed as mere assistants of the twelve.

7. According to Lk. 10:1ff. Jesus sent out seventy on a mission as well as the twelve. The number suggests the universality of the mission. It is perhaps modeled on the seventy of Num. 11:16, though cf. the seventy-one members of the Sanhedrin, the seventy elders appointed by Josephus in Galilee, the seventy elders of Jerusalem, and also the seventy nations of Gen. 10. The point seems to be that the mission of the seventy denotes the wider claim of Jesus which, unlike the law according to Jewish tradition, will now be embraced by the Gentiles (cf. Mt. 21:43). [K. H. Rengstorf, II, 627-35]

érgon [work], ergázomai [to work], ergátēs [workman], ergasía [business], energḗs [active], enérgeia [activity], energéō [to act], enérgēma [action], euergesía [good deed], euergetéō [to do good], euergétēs. [benefactor] érgon, ergázomai.

A. General Usage.

1. The Greek Usage. These words, common from Homer, denote action or active zeal. They occur in relation to all kinds of work, working with various materials, building, and technical and cultural activity. They also denote work as a social or ethical task. Hesiod describes work as a divine plan for human life, and Cynic philosophy regards work in the service of humanity as an ideal. Plato relates work to civilization, not nature. For Aristotle a creature is good when it fulfils its érgon, so that he extends the concept to all of nature. The passive is common for the work done, i.e., the result of work, or even its reward as wages or profit. In a weak sense the term can also denote a "matter" or "thing."

2. The Linguistic Use of the Bible. In the LXX the term is used for many Hebrew words, so that we have to derive the specific sense from the originals and the context. This is especially important in the ethical and religious sphere, where the reference might be, e.g., to conduct (Job 34:21; Prov. 16:5; Sir. 10:6, etc.). (See TDNT, II, 636-37 for details.)

B. The Divine Work and Action.

1. The Divine Work of Creation. The verb ergázesthai is infrequent in the LXX with God as subject (cf. Ps. 44:1; Job 33:29). But in Gen. 2:2-3 érgon is used for the creative work from which God rests. Elsewhere nature and people are called God's works. While all creation is obviously made by God, the reference is usually to some group of works. Thus natural phenomena, the earth and its creatures, and the human race that is made in God's image all bear witness, as God's work, to his providence and gracious rule (cf. Pss. 8:3; 19:1). God has pity on his works (Pss. 90:16 LXX; 138:8). In particular, God has given humans a special position over the work of his hands (Ps. 8:6). Israel commits herself to God because she is the work of his hands, probably in the sense of his historical rather than creative work (Is. 64:8; cf. 60:21); and as such she also sees the work of his hands (Is. 29:23 LXX). Prov. 20:15 (12) stresses the wonderful nature of God's work. Sir. 43:32 and 16:21 LXX show the relation between God's work in creation and his work in revelation and judgment. In Job 37:15 the LXX imports the thought of creation in the form of a confession. In general, the LXX thinks more of God's works than his work and directs attention a little more than the MT to his work in creation as distinct from his work in history.

2. God's Activity in the World.

a. God's work does not cease with creation, although Judaism has to wrestle with the problem of his sabbath rest. One solution is to see that he now works on both the ungodly and the righteous. The general assumption is that he is active by nature (cf. Jn. 5:17). The distinctiveness of the Bible is to show God at work in the specificity of history, i.e., with a people, with individuals, and in particular events (Ex. 34:10; Josh. 24:31; Judg. 2:7, 10). The acts may sometimes be miracles, as at the Red Sea (Pss. 66; 77:11ff.), where the forces of evil are defeated. Even here, however, the stress is on the saving action that establishes Israel as a people, as later generations may see.

b. Less visible is God's present action in judgment and mercy as the prophets perceive it. Present events are also God's acts (Is. 5:12; 22:11; 28:21). Although these mean judgment for the recalcitrant, God's proper work is salvation. Acts 13:41 makes this point on the basis of Hab. 1:5, except that now God's work is the church's mission rather than an ordinary historical event. Yet Rev. 15:3 shows that the NT, too, finds God's work in all events and not just in the upbuilding of the community. Thus even personal events like Hosea's marriage can be significant in God's dealings with his people and the world. Paul sees this in relation to his own life in Col. 1:24 and 2 Cor. 12:7ff. He also integrates historical data into his eschatological understanding in 2 Th. 2:6-7. No prophets grasp this more clearly than Isaiah and Jeremiah; cf. the proclamation of Cyrus as God's anointed in Is. 45:1 and God's claim to all history as the work of his hands in 45:11 (also 41:4). God's saving work for Israel affects the nations in a missionary sense according to Is. 64:4 LXX. In the Psalms the power of God is manifested in his historical work, as shown by the fact that it brings judgment to the wicked and mercy to the righteous (Pss. 28:5; 46:8-9; 64:9, etc.). This thought often comes to expression in expectant prayers for vindication (Pss. 43:1; 86:7-8, etc.).

c. The NT brings the individual acts of God under the comprehensive rubric of the divine work of salvation. The Baptist in Mt. 11:2 finds it hard to correlate the specific works of Jesus and his total mission. In John, however, the works bear witness to Jesus and the salvation that he brings (cf. Jn. 5:20, 36; 7:3, 21; 10:25; 14:10ff.; 15:24). They do so, not just as mighty or glorious works, but as good works that display God's working both as his work in Jesus and as the work he has entrusted to him. The unity of God's saving work is always in the background (cf. 9:3; 17:4). Participation in this work is through faith (6:29). Paul manifests a similar understanding. God's work is the upbuilding of the community (Rom. 14:20; cf. 1 Cor. 3:9). God does this by the Spirit through the apostolic mission (1 Cor. 9:1). Like creation, the church is a work of the Word and Spirit. Paul's helpers have a part in this work of God (1 Cor. 16:10; Phil. 2:30). Everything done in faith is both the Lord's work and work for the Lord (1 Cor. 15:58; cf. Eph. 4:12). It is all God's working (Phil. 1:6), and this fruitful work alone gives meaning to the Christian life (Phil. 1:22).

C. Human Labor.

1. Human Labor as a Curse. Linked with the fall, human labor is seen as a curse because it is necessary (cf. Gen. 3:17). Hellenistic Judaism stresses this negative side of work in contrast to the work of the eschatological age which will be done without toil. It finds it hard to speak about érgon without disparagement (cf. Sir. 30:33; Prov. 31:15 LXX).

2. Human Labor as Sin and Vanity. In Hellenistic Judaism the curse of Gen. 3:17 also has the implication that everything called érgon in human life is sin when measured by the final criterion. Thus érga as human works (along with the verb) are often linked with wickedness etc. (cf. in the NT Mt. 7:23; Lk. 13:27). The translations of Job 11:4 and 21:16 show this, as do Job 22:3; 33:9. Throughout the OT and on into the NT "works of men's hands" is a stock term for idols (Dt. 4:28; 2 Kgs. 19:18; Is. 2:8; Jer. 1:16; Rev. 9:20). This negative assessment of human work takes on a radically theological character in the NT, where we find such expressions as works of darkness (Rom. 13:12), the flesh (Gal. 5:19), the devil (Jn. 8:41), and ungodliness (Jude 15), as well as evil, lawless, and dead works (1 Jn. 3:8; 2 Pet. 2:8; Heb. 6:1). The context may also give a negative connotation, as in Mt. 23:3; Lk. 11:48; Jn. 8:41; Tit. 1:16.

3. The Righteousness of Works in Later Judaism. Paul's doctrine of the unrighteousness of all human works does not rest merely on the Hellenistic disparagement of work, for it applies even to works that Jewish piety views favorably, e.g., cultic works, or works in fulfilment of the law which form the basis of moral achievement and which may be performed even without the written law, such as the works of Abraham (Jn. 8:39), or works of the law that is written on the heart either in the future age (Jer. 31:33) or in the case of the Gentiles (Rom. 2:15). A decision has to be made between the works of God and the works of self-will; the former are good and the latter bad. A division arises, then, between the righteous who keep the law and sinners who fail to do so. In some texts we even find the idea of works of love that are meritorious because they exceed what the law requires. Yet the hope of God’s mercy for the wicked, sometimes through the intercession of the righteous, is not excluded.

4. The Righteousness of Works and the Thought of Reward. That God recompenses us according to our works is a basic concept of Scripture. The stress, however, lies on God’s justice rather than our reward. The idea that works make no difference is intolerable (Eccl. 8:14-15) because it seems to throw doubt on the divine justice. Later, however, the thought of a reward for righteousness becomes more prominent. As Aqiba says, the preponderance of good or wicked works will decide our destiny: reward or punishment. Good works will be our advocates.

5. Human Work as a Divinely Given Task. The concept of reward and punishment presupposes that God commissions us to do érga. This is the point in Gen. 2:15 (cf. Is. 28:23ff.). God lies behind all the work of civilization, and if Gen. 1 and 2 hardly provide a basis for joy in work or for work as part of the divine revelation, they certainly offer a basis for the belief that work is by divine commission. In part this leads on to the moral concept of redemption by works, of which the planting in paradise is the presupposition, and in part to the work ethic of the rabbis whereby one’s earthly avocation is under God’s blessing as well as good works, and manual labor is highly regarded. Christianity takes up the same theme with the exhortation to work in 1 Th. 4:11; 2 Th. 3:10ff.; Eph. 4:28, and with Paul’s own example of self-support. Here all work serves the community either directly or indirectly and is finally God’s work in us. For the NT work is the fruit of faith. Faith works by love (Gal. 5:6). There is a work of faith and labor of love (1 Th. 1:3). God fulfils the work of faith by his power (2 Th. 1:11). Works are thus the basis of judgment (Rom. 2:6). True works are done in God (Jn. 3:21), so that, although we are responsible for them, they carry no merit but are the response to the message of repentance. Only with the apostolic fathers do we begin to find some ambivalence in this regard, i.e., a new nomistic trend.

6. Word and Act, Faith and Works. Everywhere in the Greek world we find a certain tension of word and act (épos or lógos and érgon). Philosophy assumes their logical and ethical harmony. The Bible, too, demands that they be in correspondence, as they are with God (Joel 2:11 LXX; Ps. 33:4). The NT agrees (cf. Lk. 23:51; 1 Jn. 3:18). Yet the rabbis are conscious of a discrepancy between preaching and practice (cf. Mt. 23:3). This is perceived also in Jms. 1:25 and 2:17. True faith and works go together. Yet as faith without works is dead, so works that do not proceed from faith are dead (Heb. 6:1); they do not lead to life. As Paul teaches, works of the law must not be an occasion for arrogant seeking of self-righteousness. We must begin with faith, and then the God who works all in all (1 Cor. 12:6) will work by the Spirit in believers. As purely human work, therefore, érgon acquires a negative sense. The works of fallen humanity are evil. Yet salvation restores the situation by producing in us the good works that are the érga toú theoú (not nomoú) of the new covenant, i.e., the work of faith that is active by love (Jn. 6:29). Of ourselves, we cannot really see the divine work of salvation, e.g., in the miracles or the resurrection. We view it only in terms of earthly goals (Jn. 6:26) or even as the work of demons (Mk. 3:22). Only by faith do we pierce the ambivalence of God’s saving érgon, and then we find that everything that promotes life, while it may be abused, is really God’s good work (cf. the law in Rom. 7:12-13), serving the faith in Christ that leads to the good works that are done in and by us also.

energéō, enérgeia, enérgēma, energḗs. enérg(e)ia in the sense of “activity” or “energy” occurs at an early date. enérgēma means “act” or “action,” and energḗs “active.” The verb energéō means “to act,” “to be at work.” The group is used in Hellenism for the work of cosmic or physical forces, but mostly in the OT and NT for the work of divine or demonic powers. Only in Phil. 2:13 do we find energeín for human activity. Evil powers are the subject in Eph. 2:2; 2 Th. 2:7, 9. Yet God is finally behind even this activity (2 Th. 2:11). God, by the Spirit, is more directly the subject in the discussion of gifts (1 Cor. 12:6, 10-11). God also works through Peter and Paul (Gal. 2:8); his mighty working gives force to their ministry (Gal. 3:5). The door for work in 1 Cor. 16:9 also has to do with the apostolic mission, as does the active word of God in Heb. 4:12. Phlm. 6 uses the same adjective as Heb. 4:12 for the faith that promotes knowledge. Always, of course, it is God who is ultimately at work (Phil. 2:13; Eph. 1:11). The power of his working is resurrection power (Eph. 1:19-20; Col. 2:12). The middle energeísthai, which occurs only in Paul and Jms. 5:16, has such varied subjects as the word in 1 Th. 2:13, comfort in 2 Cor. 1:6, faith in Gal. 5:6, divine power in Eph. 3:20, and prayer in Jms. 5:16. enérgeia is related to Christ in Eph. 4:16; it is he who gives the power of growth to members of his body. Hostile forces are the subject of energeísthai in Rom. 7:5 (passions), 2 Cor. 4:12 (death), and 2 Th. 2:7 (the mystery of lawlessness).

euergetéō, euergétēs, euergesía. This group denotes favors, benefits, benefactors, etc., whether human or divine. The OT speaks of God's beneficence, but the Greek renderings tend to avoid the group. We find it four times in the NT. In Acts 4:9 the healing of the cripple is a divine benefit mediated through the apostles. In Acts 10:38 the Savior's work is described similarly. In 1 Tim. 6:2 the relation between believing slaves and their masters is viewed in terms of benefit. In Lk. 22:25, however, Christians are to reject the title euergétēs, for God alone is the true benefactor from whom all blessings come, and God's saving work does not really come under the rubric of euergesía, which suggests the meeting of human desires, but under that of saving power (Rom. 1:16). [G. Bertram, II, 635-55]

ereunáō [to search], exereunáō [to inquire carefully]

The general sense is "to search after": a. "to sniff out" (animals), b. "to search," e.g., a house or a crime, c. "to investigate," either legally or more generally, and d. "to test, examine." Plato and Philo use the term for academic, scientific, and philosophical inquiry; Philo also has it for the rabbinic study of Scripture. In the LXX we find senses b.-d., as well as "to discover," "invent."

1. In John the study of Scripture is the point in 5:39 (with a view to finding God's revelation) and 7:52 (rabbinic study, also relating to the Messiah).

2. The sense "to look into" occurs in 1 Pet. 1:11; the prophets searched for the time or person indicated by their predictions of messianic suffering and glory.

3. The "searching" of the Spirit enables believers to see something of God's purpose and work in 1 Cor. 2:10. Christ himself searches the hearts and minds of his people according to Rev. 2:23, while in Rom. 8:27 God searches the hearts of those who pray, but through the Spirit graciously accepts their prayers. [G. Delling, II, 655-57]

érēmos [abandoned], erēmía [waste], erémóō [to lay waste], erḗmōsis [desolating] érēmos, erēmía, erēmóō. The reference of the group is to "abandonment," and it thus denotes a desolate or thinly populated area, and then a "waste" in the stricter sense.

1. A first use in the NT is for a "lonely place" (cf. Lk. 8:29; 2 Cor. 11:26).

2. Jesus seeks an "uninhabited place" when he wants to be quiet with God or his disciples (Mt. 14:13; Mk. 1:45; 6:31ff., etc.). What he primarily seeks is stillness for prayer (Mk. 1:35). This is the point of the forty days (Mk. 1:12-13). The forty days need not be related to the forty years in the desert (Dt. 8:2), since this was more a period of disobedience than testing. There are parallels in the fasts of Moses (Ex. 34:28) and Elijah (1 Kgs. 19:5, 8), though the details differ, and Elijah in particular is seeking refuge.

3. The desert wandering of Israel is stressed in the NT as an instructive time of disobedience (Heb. 3:8-9; Acts 7:41ff.), yet also of God's gracious working (Acts 7:36; Jn. 3:14; 6:31, 49) and speaking (Acts 7:38). Judaism gives this period a special emphasis, leading to the belief that the last age will begin in the desert (cf. Acts 21:38; also Mt. 24:26; Rev. 12:6, 14).

4. The Baptist begins his work in the desert, so that he is seen to be "the voice crying in the wilderness" of Is. 40:3 (Mt. 3:3; Mk. 1:3; Lk. 3:4; Jn. 1:23).

5. A city or country may be devastated by enemy action (Mt. 12:25) or divine wrath (Mt. 23:38; Rev. 17:16; cf. Is. 6:11; Lam. 5:18, etc.). Yet there is also promise for waste places, according to the OT (Is. 32:15-16; 35:1ff.; 41:18-19, etc.).

erḗmōsis. This occurs in Mt. 24:15; Mk. 13:14; Lk. 21:20 (cf. Dan. 9:27 etc.) in the phrase "desolating sacrilege." The point is that the sacrilege causes worshippers to shun the sanctuary and thus deprives it of any useful purpose. [G. Kittel, II, 657-60]

eritheía [self-seeking]

1. From eritheúō, "to work as a day-laborer"; this has to do with the work or disposition of the day-laborer.

2. It then comes to denote the attitude of self-seekers, harlots, etc., who demean themselves for gain. Aristocratic contempt for daily wage earners seems to have brought about the devaluation of meaning.

3. The result is that later translators and expositors of the NT often fail to understand the term.

4. As a complex term in everyday usage, it can be given different senses according to context. "Contentious" is perhaps too specialized in Rom. 2:8, where it refers to the "despicable nature" of those who do not obey the truth but seek immediate gain. This also fits the context in 2 Cor. 12:20; Gal. 5:20; Phil. 1:17; 2:3. The idea is "base self-seeking," the "baseness" that cannot shift its gaze to higher things.

[F. Büschel, II, 660-61]

hermēneúō [to interpret], hermēneía [interpretation], hermēneutḗs [interpreter], diermēneúō [to interpret], diermēneía [interpretation], diermēneutḗs [interpreter]

A. Linguistic Data. The basic sense is a. "to interpret," "expound," "explain" (e.g., Scripture), b. "to indicate," "express" (e.g., thoughts), then c. "to translate." diermēneúō occurs in senses a. and c.

B. Material Data.

1. In the OT the view may be found that ordinary people cannot understand visions, so that Yahweh must provide the interpretation (Gen. 40:8; Dan. 2:27-28).

2. The Greeks regard interpretation as a creative gift along with perception and reason. Poets and seers utter things that come from the gods and need expositors who can pass on the hermēneía of what they say.

3. Philo applies this concept to the prophets as interpreters of God, e.g., Moses. Those who expound dreams (e.g., Joseph) have the same office. Sometimes the inspired mediator of God's truth needs an interpreter, as in the case of Moses and Aaron. The name of God serves as God's hermēneús, and speech (not very reliably) plays the same role for the human noús.

4. The hermēneía of tongues which is a charisma in 1 Cor. 12:10 is more likely interpretation than translation, and the diermēmeutḗs of 1 Cor. 14:28 is probably an interpreter of ecstatic speech in the interests of edification. Concern for hermēneía is a concern for the true and disciplined operation of the Word and Spirit through the charism of tongues.

5. Lk. 24:27 presents Jesus on the road to Emmaus as an expositor of the OT prophecies of his passion and exaltation. The messianic understanding of the OT which is established here, and which early Christianity develops, rests on an exposition of Scripture which is new in content, if not method, as NT revelation gives a christological meaning to OT sayings. [J. Behm, II, 661-66]

érchomai [to come, go], éleusis [coming], apérchomai [to go away], diérchomai [to pass through], eisérchomai [to come, go], exérchomai [to go out], epérchomai [to come to], parérchomai [to pass by], pareisérchomai [to come in], periérchomai [to wander about], prosérchomai [to come to], synérchomai [to go with, come together]

érchomai.

A. The General Use of érchomai.

1. The classical meaning is "to come" or "to go," with nuances supplied by prepositions or context, and with such varied references as to natural events, states of mind, letters, transfers of property, or making agreements.

2. The cultic use, e.g., in prayer for the coming of deity, is significant.

3. In the LXX the term is used for 35 Hebrew words, mostly in a spatial sense, but sometimes cultic, e.g., for coming to God’s house, or the coming of prayer to God, or prayer for the coming of God’s mercy, or the coming of God, his word, angels, the Messiah, the ages, the day of salvation, the Spirit, or the coming of the nations to God’s inheritance. In the Psalms, Job, etc. both good and bad things come, especially bad.

4. The basic NT sense is “to come” or “to go,” often with a reference to people coming on the scene or to decisive events or natural phenomena, and sometimes in the sense of hostile approach (Lk. 14:31). Interesting phrases with eis are “to come into disrepute” (Acts 19:27), “to come to oneself” (Lk. 15:17), and “to move on to a new subject” (2 Cor. 12:1); cf. also “to grow worse” in Mk. 5:26 (eis tó cheíron eltheín).

B. The Special Use of érchomai in the NT.

1. The Synoptists.

a. The Coming of Jesus. With reference to the coming of Jesus as the Messiah, the group takes us to the heart of the divine epiphany. The ḗlthon sayings of Jesus in the first person derive from his messianic consciousness and state his messianic task. He has come to proclaim the kingdom (Mk. 1:38), to call sinners to repentance (Mk. 2:17), to set up a new order of life (Mt. 5:17), to kindle a fire (Lk. 12:49), and to enforce division (Mt. 10:34ff.). Son of Man sayings are of the same order. The Son of Man has come to seek and save (Lk. 19:10), to give his life as a ransom (Mk. 10:45), but to do so eating and drinking (Mt. 11:18-19). The demons describe his coming similarly in Mk. 1:24; Lk. 4:34 when they see that it involves their own destruction.

b. Coming to Jesus. Often in Matthew and Luke great crowds come to Jesus, but true coming involves a cultic action (e.g., proskyneín), as we see from certain individuals (Mt. 8:2; 9:18; Mk. 5:33; cf. Mt. 2:2), and a willing commitment by embracing and doing Jesus’ words and by denying the self (Lk. 6:47; 9:23; 14:27). The parables of the supper and the marriage feast depict coming (or not coming) as the response to divine invitation. In the parable of the prodigal coming is also coming home to God out of lostness and alienation (Lk. 15:20, 30).

c. The Coming of God’s Kingdom. We are to pray for the coming of the kingdom (Mt. 6:10). Praise is offered for its coming on the entry into Jerusalem (Mk. 11:10). The kingdom comes in power (Mk. 9:1). The future kingdom is identical with the coming aeon which means eternal life (Mk. 10:30; Lk. 18:30). The future kingdom will come with the parousia; Jesus comes in and with his kingdom (Mt. 16:28; Lk. 23:42).

d. The Coming of the Messiah. Judaism often refers to the Messiah as the coming one who inaugurates the age of salvation and whose coming will be preceded by the return of Elijah (cf. Mt. 11:14; 17:10; 27:49). The Baptist asks whether Jesus is this coming one (Mt. 11:3). The crowd hails Jesus as “he that comes in the name of the Lord” (Mt. 21:9). But there is still to be a coming in glory (Mt. 16:27). No time is set for this, but it will be sudden (Mk. 13:36). False prophets claiming to be the Messiah will come first (Mt. 24:5).

e. God’s Coming in Judgment. The parables of the wicked husbandmen (Mt. 21:40), the fig-tree (Lk. 13:6-7), and the talents (Mt. 25:19) refer to a coming in judgment.

f. The Coming of Days of Decision. Many sayings refer to coming days when something significant will happen (cf. Lk. 17:22; 21:6; 23:29). Significant, too, is Simeon’s coming into the temple in Lk. 2:27 and the coming of the hour of the passion in Mk. 14:41.

2. The Johannine Writings.

a. The Coming of Jesus. érchesthai has an even stronger theological content here, along with a wider figurative use. In the first person, the “coming” sayings of Jesus, both positive and negative, have a polemical edge. Jesus has not come of his own accord (Jn. 7:28). His claim rests on his divine sending (8:42). He comes in the Father’s name (5:43) to bring light (10:10) and to save the world (12:47). Though he has not come to judge (12:47), his coming means judgment (9:39), since with the coming of light those who love darkness reject it (3:19). He has come to bear witness to the truth (18:37) and will be heard by those who are of the truth. His messianic claim is directed against those who think they know his origin (7:27) and those who think the Messiah must still come (cf. 4:25). It is supported by the Baptist, who has come to bear witness (1:7) and who recognizes Jesus as the coming one (1:15) whose way he prepares (1:31) with a baptism that has eschatological significance as his manifestation. Others who come before Christ are thieves and robbers (10:8).

b. Coming to Jesus. Here again we find a general coming (3:26; 6:5; 10:41). Jesus invites people to come (7:37). Those who respond come in a special sense (6:35) by becoming disciples (cf. 1:47). Disciples can also issue the invitation (1:46). Jesus will not reject those who come (6:37) but give them life (6:35). Yet only those whom the Father draws (6:65) and who are taught by him (6:45) can come. Coming means believing in Jesus as the coming one (11:27), and believing means deliverance from judgment (5:24) and new birth by the Spirit (3:8). The opposite is a refusal to come to Jesus (5:40) or to come to the light (3:20).

c. The Coming of the Risen Lord. érchomai is an important word in the resurrection appearances in John. It occurs in the coming to the disciples in 20:19, in the coming to Thomas and the others in 20:26, and in the coming by the lake in 21:13.

d. The Coming Again of Christ. Jesus bears witness to this in 14:3, and there is also reference to it in 21:22-23. Between the comings, however, the Paraclete comes, or Christ himself comes by the Paraclete in a pneumatic rather than a personal coming (Jn. 15:26; 14:28). The Paraclete enables people to come to Jesus even though they cannot come where he now is (7:34; 8:21-22; 13:33).

e. The Coming of the Hour. The formula “the hour is coming” is important in John. The hour (hṓra) is the future age of salvation, yet this has already dawned (cf. 4:21, 23, “and now is”). The same applies to the hour of resurrection in 5:25. Especially significant is the hour of the passion, which is God’s hour (not yet come in 7:30; 8:20; come in 12:23; 13:1; 17:1). The hour is also coming for the disciples, i.e., the time of persecution which begins with Jesus’ own hour (cf. 16:2, 4).

f. The Epistles. 1 John speaks of the coming of Christ in the flesh (1 Jn. 4:2) and by water and blood (5:6). Antichrist comes with the last hour (2:18).

g. Revelation. The eternal God is he who was and is and is to come (1:4, 8; 4:8). Christ will come quickly (2:5); the church lives for his coming (22:17) and makes it an object of expectant prayer (22:20). Christ will come as a thief (16:15) with the clouds (1:7). The coming will bring judgment (6:17 etc.), but after messianic tribulation (3:10) it will also bring rejoicing (19:7).

3. Paul. References to Christ’s first coming occur only in Eph. 2:17 and 1 Tim. 1:15, but there are many references to the coming again, which is imminent (1 Cor. 4:5; 16:22), is proclaimed at the Supper (1 Cor. 11:26), will be like that of the thief (1 Th. 5:2), will be in glory (2 Th. 1:10), and will bring perfection (1 Cor. 13:10) but also judgment (Col. 3:6), being preceded by apostasy (2 Th. 2:3). Paul also uses “coming” for significant events, such as the coming of the commandment in Rom. 7:9, and of faith in Gal. 3:23. As an apostle he himself comes with the blessings of the gospel (Rom. 15:29); he comes not with lofty words (1 Cor. 2:1), but to preach the gospel (2 Cor. 2:12). He wants to come with meekness (1 Cor. 4:21), not with sorrow or to punish (cf. 2 Cor. 2:1, 3), and he is ready to suffer humiliation at his coming though he hopes to find repentance (2 Cor. 12:20-21).

4. The Other NT Writings. Here the eschatological use predominates: the coming again of Christ in Acts 1:11, the coming of judgment day in Acts 2:20, the coming of the age of salvation in Heb. 8:8, the coming of scoffers in 2 Pet. 3:3. The coming of the Spirit in Acts 19:6 shows that the age of salvation has already dawned (cf. Acts 2:17-18).

éleusis. This word, meaning “coming,” is rare outside the Bible. It occurs in the NT only in Acts 7:52 for the coming of the Righteous One proclaimed by the prophets, probably with a reference to the coming again in judgment.

apérchomai. opísō apérchesthai is common in the Synoptists for discipleship. Mk. 9:43 expresses the seriousness of decision; if anything hinders, we go (apeltheín) to hell. apeltheín is also the opposite in Jude 7 (indulging in unnatural lust). It is used for the end of the first and fallen creation in Rev. 21:4.

diérchomai. In Rom. 5:12 this word denotes the extension of death to everybody, while in Heb. 4:14 it signifies Christ's passing as High Priest through the heavens to the heavenly sanctuary.

eisérchomai. "To go," "to come," with such varied references as to the entry of a chorus, the movement of money, going to court, entry on an office, the onset of hunger. It occurs cultically for invocation of deities. In the LXX it can have a sexual as well as a local reference, but is commonly sacral: a. God or his glory or Spirit comes to us; b. worshippers go into the temple, purity being demanded; c. believers bring their prayers to God; d. Israel enters the promised land.

1. In the NT we often find such phrases as going into the temple (Acts 3:8), God's house (Mt. 12:4), or the synagogue (Mk. 1:21), or entering Jerusalem (Mk. 11:11), and the angel coming to Mary (Lk. 1:28).

2. The most significant theological use is with eis. The Synoptists speak about entering the kingdom, for which the following requirements are found: becoming as little children (Mk. 10:15), keeping the commandments (Mt. 19:17), doing God's will (Mt. 7:21), a new beginning (Mt. 5:20), a clean break (Mt. 18:8-9), vigilance (Mt. 25:10), and fidelity (Mt. 25:21ff.). Jesus and the disciples summon people into the kingdom; they are to enter by the strait gate (Mt. 7:13), but may be hindered by wealth (Mk. 10:23) or by the self-righteous (Lk. 11:52). John adds the need for regeneration by water and the Spirit (3:5) and stresses that access is only through Christ (10:2, 9). Tribulation precedes entry (Acts 14:22).

3. In general religious use we find Jesus coming to sinners and the risen Christ to the disciples (Lk. 19:7; 24:29). The ascension is an entry into glory (Lk. 24:26). But Satan enters into Judas (Lk. 22:3), and Jesus commands the spirit not to enter the boy again (Mk. 9:25). The disciples must pray not to enter into temptation (Mk. 14:38) and enter their rooms to pray (Mt. 6:6). Paul has the word for unbelievers coming into Christian gatherings in 1 Cor. 14:23-24, for the coming of sin in Rom. 5:12, and for the coming of the fullness of the Gentiles in Rom. 11:25. Hebrews uses the word for the entry of the high priest into the holy of holies (9:25), the entry of the heavenly High Priest into the heavenly sanctuary (6:19 etc.), the coming of Christ into the world for sin (10:5), and the entry of believers into eternal rest (3:11, 18; 4:1ff.). Revelation says that only those who are written in the book of life can enter the holy city (21:27), and Christ says that he will come in when people open the door for him (3:20). Some readings of 2 Jn. 7 refer to deceivers going into the world, while Jms. 5:4 says that the cries of the economically oppressed go up to God.

exérchomai. "To go out," e.g., sickness, time, also "to issue," "to come up," "to leave," even "to stand out." The LXX uses the word for the issue of the earth, body, or lips, for what proceeds from God, but also for our fleeting breath, and cultically for the divine epiphany and coming to prayer.

In the NT the word denotes resurrection (Jn. 11:34, 41). It also occurs for going forth to do things (Mk. 6:12), for what comes forth from a person, e.g., the decree of Lk. 2:1, rumors (Mt. 9:26), utterances (Jms. 3:10), evil thoughts (Mt. 15:19), but also God's word (1 Cor. 14:36) and news of faith (1 Th. 1:8). Other uses are for descent (Heb. 7:5), leaving a fellowship (1 Jn. 2:19), going out on missionary work (3 Jn. 7), and the going forth of angels (Rev. 14:15ff.) or Satan (20:8). Demons go out when expelled (Mk. 1:26). Peter asks Jesus to leave him (Lk. 5:8). Jesus has come out to preach (Mk. 1:38), and power goes out of him when he heals (Mk. 5:30). Jesus has come forth from God (Jn. 8:42; cf. 16:30), and he is the door through which the disciples go in and out to pasture (10:9). Judas goes out in Jn. 13:30-31. Jesus goes out of Jerusalem to be crucified in 19:17, and disciples are to go out with him in Heb. 13:13. Abraham goes out in an act of faith (Heb. 11:8), but believers are not to leave the world (1 Cor. 5:10). Angels will come forth to divide the good from the bad according to Mt. 13:49.

epérchomai a. "To come to," "draw near," used of people, events, time, etc. b. "To come with hostile intent," "to attack," "to accuse." c. In the papyri we also find "to enter illegally," d. "to be due," e. "to contest the validity," and f. "to make claims," "oppress with demands." The LXX uses the word with reference to things, events, conditions, etc. that bring evils, or, less frequently, blessings.

Except in Eph. 1:7 and Jms. 5:1 the word occurs in the NT only in Luke and Acts. Figuratively it means coming on someone, e.g., the stronger on the weaker in Lk. 11:22. The Holy Spirit as the power of God comes on Mary in Lk. 1:35 and on the disciples in Acts 1:8. Disasters will come at the end, according to Lk. 21:26, 35 (cf. Jms. 5:1). But in Eph. 2:7 the ineffable generosity of divine grace will be shown to coming ages.

parérchomai. a. "To go by," "to pass" (time), "to come to an end." b. "To outstrip," "surpass." c. "To pass over," "disregard," "miss," "transgress." d. "To come to, arrive at," "come forward," "attain to," "enter into" (an inheritance). The LXX has the term for human mortality, for breaking or deviating from the commandments, and for theophanies.

When Lk. 18:37 says that Jesus "passes by," this might be just a topographical note, but it carries a hint of epiphany. In Lk. 15:29 Jesus condemns the complacency that thinks it has left no commandment "unfulfilled," and in 11:42 the practice that,"overlooks" the essentials. In 1 Pet. 4:3 the pre-Christian life is "past," in Jms. 1:10 all earthly things are "fleeting," and in Mt. 5:18 etc. heaven and earth will "pass away," but not the word of Jesus (Mt. 24:35). In Mk. 13:30 this generation will not "pass away" until the events depicted take place. For Paul in 2 Cor. 5:17 the old has "passed away" and the new has come.

pareisérchomai. This is a significant word in Rom. 5:20, where the law has "come in" as it were parenthetically (to increase sin), and in Gal. 2:4, where false brethren (the Judaizers) have slipped into the churches to spy out and reverse their freedom.

periérchomai. This word is used in 1 Tim. 5:13 for the gadding about of younger widows and in Heb. 11:37 for the wanderings of persecuted heroes of faith.

prosérchomai. "To come to or go to," "approach (also hostilely)," "apply oneself," used for such things as income, going in to a woman, going to work or market, taking up a matter or cause, appearing before a judge or tribunal, also cultically coming before a deity. The LXX uses it sexually and militarily and also for appearing in court (Dt. 25:1) and being occupied with a matter; we also find the cultic sense of coming before God (Jer. 7:16), and cf. the warning not to draw near to sin (Sir. 21:2).

In the NT the word is most common in Matthew and denotes the coming to Jesus of angels (4:11), the tempter (4:3), and various human groups: a. the disciples (5:1), the women (28:9), and Peter (18:21), b. the crowds seeking help (15:30), the sick (8:2; 9:28, etc.), and their relatives (8:5); c. people with special requests (19:16; 20:20; 26:7), d. opponents, the scribes etc. (8:19; 15:1; 16:1), Judas (26:49), those who arrest Jesus (26:50), the false witnesses (26:60), the soldiers (Lk. 23:36). A few times Jesus himself comes to people, e.g., to heal in Mk. 1:31, to raise the dead man in Lk. 7:14, to expel demons in Lk. 9:42, and to give the great commission in Mt. 28:18. In Acts the term denotes important events (8:29; 10:28; also in Paul's life, 9:1; 18:2; 24:23). In Hebrews and 1 Peter the sense is cultic. Christians have drawn near to God through Christ (Heb. 7:25) and by faith (11:6). They have come to Mt. Zion (12:18), and should draw near to the throne of grace (4:16) or to Christ (10:22) as worshippers under the law draw near to sacrifice (10:1). The decision of faith is a coming to the Lord in 1 Pet. 2:3-4.

synérchomai. In Acts 15:38 this word means "to journey with someone" on missionary work. In 1 Cor. 11:17 it denotes the coming together of the congregation, which here is not for the better. The sense is the same in 1 Cor. 14:23, 26, where Paul is giving direction for the proper use of spiritual gifts in the church. [J. Schneider, II, 666-84] erōtáō [to ask, request], eperōtáō [to ask, question], eperṓtēma [request, question]

erōtáō.

1. The first sense is "to ask," "seek information." The rich young ruler is asking Jesus about the good (Mt. 19:17), Jesus asks his disciples about the loaves available (Mk. 8:5), or about people's views of him (Mt. 16:13), and he asks his opponents about John's baptism (Mt. 21:24). The disciples ask the meaning of the parables (Mk. 4:10) and also ask when God's kingdom will be set up (Acts 1:6). Most of the instances are in John. The disciples will no longer need to ask when they have the perfect knowledge of fellowship with Christ (16:23). Gaining an insight into his vicarious ministry, they no longer need to question him (16:30). Yet it is by asking that fuller fellowship is achieved (16:5). Outside the Parting Discourses the word is used in John only for the questions of opponents (except in 9:2, where the disciples ask whose sin was responsible for the man being born blind).

2. "To request," "demand." Apart from Acts 1:6, this is the chief meaning outside the Gospels. It can denote the disciples' request to Jesus (Mt. 15:23), that of the Jews to Pilate (Jn. 19:31), and the invitation to a meal (Lk. 14:18-19). John has it for requests to God, but only by Jesus except in 1 Jn. 5:16. The LXX uses erōtáō, "to ask," and aitéō, "to pray," for the same Hebrew word (šā'al), but secular Greek offers a cultic use, so that the use for "to pray" need not be a Semitism.

eperōtáō. "To ask," "to question," "to inquire"-a favorite word in Mark. It may suggest an urgent asking (Jn. 18:7). It is used for judicial examination (Mk. 14:60-61), investigation (Mk. 15:44), asking for a decision as in probing questions (Mk. 10:2; 12:18), and perhaps disputing rather than merely asking questions (Lk. 2:46; cf. v. 47). In Mt. 16:1 the sense is "request" or "demand." In 1 Cor. 14:35 wives are to ask their husbands at home, but in Rom. 10:20 God has shown himself to those who did not ask for him.

eperṓtēma. This word means "question." The only NT instance is in 1 Pet. 3:21, which perhaps rests on the use in the LXX for an oracular question addressed to God, so that we are to translate "request." Baptism does not confer physical cleansing but saves as a request for forgiveness; the author perhaps avoids the idea of spiritual cleansing so as to stay clear of magical conceptions. [H. Greeven, II, 685-89]

→ aitéō, déomai, eúchomai

esthíō [to eat, drink]

A. esthíō outside the NT.

1. "To eat and drink," a stock term that occurs in connection with the sick needing to eat, the righteous not being concerned about eating, giving the hungry to eat, etc.; it is sometimes a mark of pleasure-seeking, but also suggests table fellowship (cf. the rabbis).

2. The OT and Judaism have cultic rules about eating, e.g., washing before eating, not eating idol-meats, ascetic abstinence from eating and drinking.

3. Eating and drinking are linked to the vision of God (cf. Ex. 24:11, which the rabbis spiritualize). In the mysteries there is eating and drinking of the divine essence.

4. Judaism has hopes for eating and drinking with God in the eschatological banquet (cf. rabbinic and apocalyptic writings and Lk. 14:15).

5. Figuratively the word means a. "to enjoy" (Job. 21:25; Prov. 9:5). For spiritual eating cf. Philo Allegorical Interpretation of Laws 1.97. b. The Hebrew term (usually katesthíein in the LXX) can denote consuming by the sword (2 Sam. 2:26), fire (Num. 16:35), heat (Gen. 31:40), hunger and sickness (Ex. 7:15), and divine wrath (Am. 5:6). c. In warnings or laments we also find "to destroy" (Ps. 14:4; Prov. 30:14).

B. esthíō in the NT.

1. Eating is necessary for life (Mt. 6:25). Having something to eat is a pressing concern (Mt. 6:26ff.). Jesus and the disciples hardly have time to eat (Mk. 3:20). Eating and drinking is a formal expression for meeting basic needs (Mt. 6:31). After raising from the dead, it is a sign of life (Mk. 5:43; Lk. 24:41ff.). As workers are worthy of their hire (Mt. 10:10; cf. 2 Th. 3:12; 1 Cor. 9:7), missionaries should be supported (Mt. 10:8ff.). Those who will not work should not eat (2 Th. 3:10). But the hungry must be given to eat (Mt. 25:34ff.). As servants first give their masters something to eat, so the disciples are to render unselfish service (Lk. 17:7ff.). Eating is a sign of festive joy (Lk. 15:23) but also of fatal materialism (Lk. 12:19). Jesus, in eating and drinking, seems to be too worldly for a true man of God (Mt. 11:19). Eating with people is a mark of close fellowship (Mk. 14:18). Refusal of synesthíein expresses repudiation of fellowship (1 Cor. 5:11).

2. Apart from the references to eating manna in Jn. 6:31 etc., ritual matters are mostly at issue in the religious use. Paul refers to priests partaking of the offerings in 1 Cor. 9:13. Jesus quotes David’s eating of the showbread in Mk. 2:26 to support the eating of ears of grain on the sabbath. He also defends eating without ritual washing (Mk. 7:1ff.) and risks defiling table fellowship (Mk. 2:16). Yet an ascetic abstinence from eating and drinking may be practiced on occasion (cf. Mt. 11:18;, Acts 9:9; 23:12). Eating idol-meats raises a problem. The strong are free to do this, for fellowship with God does not depend on eating and drinking (1 Cor. 8:1, 7ff.). Yet it is better to renounce this freedom than sin by wounding the weak (vv. 11ff.; cf. 10:23ff.). A similar question is that of abstinence from certain foods (Rom. 14:2ff.). Paul favors the strong on this issue too, for both eating and not eating are good in God’s sight, but again loving responsibility for others demands restraint: It is wrong to make others fall by what we eat (v. 20). A ritual question is involved here (v. 14) as well as the more general practice of abstinence and vegetarianism.

3. The church comes together to eat (1 Cor. 11:33). In rectifying abuses at Corinth, Paul stresses the cultic character of the Lord’s Supper. Eating bread and drinking wine are part of a sacred action that demands restraint and that is incompatible with profane and selfish eating (vv. 22ff.). The OT manna is a model (1 Cor. 10:3). Using the same example, Jesus offers himself as the true bread from heaven; by eating this bread we may live forever (Jn. 6:50-51).

4. Eating and drinking with the heavenly King corresponds to the messianic banquet referred to in Lk. 14:15. Jesus will eat the fulfilled Passover in God’s kingdom (Lk. 22:16), and he assures the disciples that they will eat and drink at his table (22:30). Eating of the tree of life means sharing in the life of the age of salvation (Rev. 2:7). In contrast, the birds will eat the flesh of the defeated hosts of antichrist (Rev. 19:17-18).

5. The divine of Revelation eats the rolls of a book (10:9; cf. Ezek. 2:8; Jer. 15:16) in token of inward filling with his prophetic message.

6. We find figurative use a. (“to enjoy”) when Jesus refers to his spiritual food in Jn. 4:32, and b. (“to consume”) in Heb. 10:27 and Jms. 5:3.

→ trṓgō [J. Behm, II, 689-95]

ésoptron [mirror], katoptrízomai [to see something in a mirror]

ésoptron. In the figure of speech in Jms. 1:23, the obvious point is that those who are hearers and not doers are like people getting only a fleeting reflection of themselves in a mirror.

katoptrízomai. This means a. “to show in a mirror,” “to reflect” (passive “be reflected”), b. middle “to see oneself in a mirror,” and c. “to see something in a mirror.” The only NT instance is in 2 Cor. 3:18, where we have sense c.: “We see the Lord’s glory as in a mirror.” The idea here is that of a mirror that makes the invisible visible and in so doing changes us into the likeness of what we see. This is all the work of the Spirit (cf. 1 Cor. 13:12). There are no examples to support the rendering “reflect” that some exegetes have favored. [G. Kittel, II, 696-97]

éschatos [last]

1. The general use is for what is last materially (Mt. 5:26), spatially (Acts 1:8), or temporally (Mt. 12:45). Theologically significant is the last resurrection appearance to Paul. This closes the series, and the association with “least” gives Paul his character as “one untimely born” (1 Cor. 15:8-9).

2. The eschatological use derives from what is last in time (cf. the influence of the prophetic “day of Yahweh”). The end begins with Jesus’ coming (Heb. 1:2). That the present is the last time is shown by the outpouring of the Spirit (Acts 2:17) and by the coming of scoffers, antichrist, etc. (2 Tim. 3:1; Jms. 5:3; 2 Pet. 3:3; Jude 18; 1 Jn. 2:18). Yet the last day is also awaited; cf. the last plagues of Rev. 15:1, the last enemy of 1 Cor. 15:26, the last trumpet of 1 Cor. 15:52, and the last hour or time of resurrection, judgment, and salvation in Jn. 6:39-40; 1 Pet. 1:5. Christ is the last Adam (1 Cor. 15:45ff.); he is also the first and the last (Rev. 1:17).

3. A figurative sense is "last in rank" (opposite of first) (cf. 1 Cor. 4:9; Mk. 9:35; 10:31). The last place is the place of least honor (Lk. 14:9-10), but disciples are willingly to take this place in unselfish service to others. [G. Kittel, II, 697-98]

ésō [in, inside]

1. hoi ésō in 1 Cor. 15:12 are those who are in the community in distinction from pagans.

2. ho ésō ánthrōpos, parallel to egō and noús, is used in Rom. 7:22 for our spiritual side which gives us self-awareness and enables us to make moral judgments. By reason of it we are open to the claim of revelation but contradict it in our conduct. In 2 Cor. 4:16, however, the phrase denotes our determination by God as those who are new creatures (5:17) and who experience daily renewal through the Spirit (5:5); the opposite is the "outer man," our being in its creaturely mortality. In Eph. 3:16 the reference is again to believers as the object of God's working or the place where God's Spirit meets and shapes them. Like the parallel phrase in 1 Pet. 3:4 it carries a hint of God's hidden operation. The term is materially parallel to "heart" in the OT, and we may thus compare the sayings of Jesus in Mk. 7:21 and Lk. 11:39. [J. Behm, II, 698-99]

hetaíros [friend]

This term is used for a. "companion," b. "fellow-soldier," c. "member of the same party," d. "religious society," e. "pupil," f. "friend," and g. "colleague." It is not common in the LXX but is used in later Judaism for a qualified but not yet ordained member of the scribal body, and more widely for one who seeks to live strictly by the law, especially its ritual requirements.

1. The only NT use is in Matthew, where the owner of the vineyard (20:3) and the king (22:12) employ it when addressing the grumblers and the man without a wedding garment, and Jesus has it in greeting Judas (26:50). The meaning is "friend" but in each case with the implication of a distinct relationship in which there is generosity on the one part and abuse of it on the other.

2. The absence of the word elsewhere in the NT shows that it is not thought to be appropriate to Christians, for in relation to Christ doúlos is the proper term for believers, and in relation to one another adelphoí. The use of adelphoí shows that God has invaded the sphere of human egoism and that Christians have a new relationship with one another in virtue of their common relatedness to the one Lord. [K. H. Rengstorf, II, 699-701]

heteróglōssos → glṓssa; heterodidaskaléō → didáskō; heterozygéō → zygós

héteros [other, another]

In the NT héteros is used in much the same way as állos, but does not occur in several books (e.g., Mark, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1 and 2 Peter, Revelation). It denotes the new member in a series that either continues (Lk. 14:18ff.) or concludes it (Acts 15:35). It may denote others either of the same kind (Acts 17:34; Lk. 4:34) or of another kind (Lk. 23:32). It may compare or contrast two groups (Acts 23:6), but can also simply denote the next day (Acts 20:15). At times there may be the hint of a qualitative distinction, as in Mt. 11:3 ("Shall we look for another?"); Mk. 16:12 ("another form," i.e., that of a traveler); Lk. 9:29 (Jesus' transfigured face). The "other tongues" of Acts 2:4 may simply refer to tongues as in 10:46; 1 Cor. 12:10; 14:1ff., but in this case "other" would seem to be superfluous, and we should have to assume that, since the later tongues are unintelligible, the true miracle is that the people are granted a gift of understanding, which, in spite of Acts 2:6, 11, is not very convincing. Thus the alternative view that they spoke in foreign languages seems alone to do full justice to the phrase, especially in the light of v. 11 (though cf. the contemptuous reference in v. 13). In Acts 17:7 the point of the charge against Paul is that he is proclaiming a rival to the emperor. In Rom. 7:23 the other law which differs from the holy law of God, and the law of reason that assents to it, is the law of sin that dwells in our members and enslaves us. 1 Cor. 15:40 refers to the different glory of celestial and terrestrial bodies. Eph. 3:5 contrasts the present age of salvation with all preceding generations. Phil. 3:15 may refer either to failure to attain to the preceding insights or to more general divergence from Paul. In Heb. 7:11ff. Jesus is the other priest who, as is shown in detail, both fulfils and transcends Melchizedek. What has come in Jesus is different in the sense that it excludes any other way of salvation (1 Cor. 8:4; Acts 4:12), so that decision is demanded. "another gospel" (Gal. 1:6) is not really another, let alone a better; it is no gospel at all (cf. 2 Cor. 11:4). ho héteros can also be used for the neighbor, a Thou as distinct from the I (cf. Rom. 2:1). The law of Christ is to seek the other's good (1 Cor. 10:24). Self-giving to others fulfils the law (Rom. 13:8). The other here is not a collective concept but denotes the person who in a specific situation crosses my path and whose edification is my concern (1 Cor. 14:17). [H. W. Beyer, II, 702-04] hétoimos [ready], hetoimázō [to make ready], hetoimasía [readiness], proetoimázō [to prepare beforehand]

The meaning of the group is (active) "making ready" and (passive) "readiness."

1. In relation to God the words denote his living and active work of creation and preservation a. in nature and history, relative to heaven and earth (Prov. 3:19), natural processes (Job 38:25), individuals (Ps. 119:73), their needs (Ps. 65:9), their destiny (Gen. 24:14), God's throne (Ps. 103:19), the people of Israel (2 Sam. 7:24) in the desert (Ps. 78:19-20), the conquest (Ex. 23:20), and the history of the monarchy (1 Sam. 13:13; 2 Sam. 5:12), but also in judgment (Zeph. 1:7). b. The group refers to God's work, too, in salvation history. God prepares good things for those who love him (1 Cor. 2:9). This salvation is the heart of the kerygma. It is present in Christ (Lk. 2:30-31). In him the feast is prepared (Mt. 22:4, 8). But it is also future. We are to enter into a prepared kingdom (Mt. 25:34). Jesus is preparing a place for us (Jn. 14:2). His death and resurrection prepare salvation (cf. 1 Pet. 1:5). God is also preparing us for salvation (Rom. 9:23). He has prepared the good works in which we are to walk (Eph. 2:10). Yet God prepares destruction too (Mt. 25:41). The angels are held ready for the decisive time (Rev. 9:15). The group expresses the ineluctable certainty of perdition no less than salvation.

2. In relation to us, corresponding to God's preparation, the terms denote both preparing and preparedness. The Baptist prepares the way of the Lord (Mt. 3:3). Individuals must prepare for fellowship with God (Ps. 108:1). Amos summons the people to prepare to meet their God (4:12). Israel, like Moses, must be ready to receive God's revelation (Ex. 19:11ff.). In the NT readiness is demanded as readiness for good works (Tit. 3:1), readiness for witness (1 Pet. 3:15; Eph. 6:15), and readiness for the Lord's return (Mt. 24:44). Readiness gives the Christian life a distinctive dynamic character as expectation of the goal of salvation and openness to the possibilities of action determined by this goal. [W. Grundmann, II, 704-06]

Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (229). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

euangelízomai [to proclaim good news], euangélion [good news, gospel], proeuangelízomai [to proclaim beforehand], euangelistḗs [evangelist] euangelízomai.

A. bśr in the OT. This word means "to proclaim good news" (1 Kgs. 1:42). In view of 1 Kgs. 1:42 the basic sense might seem to be simply "to deliver a message," but the stem itself contains the element of joy, so that announcing a victory is a common use and the messenger views himself as the bearer of good tidings (2 Sam. 4:10). Transition to a religious use may be seen in 1 Sam. 31:9 where the proclamation of victory in the land of the Philistines has a cultic character. Parallels are Ps. 68:11, where the women proclaim victory in a song that God himself has given, and Ps. 40:9, where deliverance is declared in the congregation. The term is especially significant in Is. 40ff., where the messenger comes to Zion to proclaim the worldwide victory of God which initiates the age of salvation (52:7). This declaration is not just human word and breath, for God himself speaks through it, bringing to pass what is said by his own creative word. Ps. 96:2ff. is to the same effect. The great eschatological hour has come, and the message of God's acts of power goes out to the nations. Indeed the Gentiles themselves will proclaim it (Is. 60:6). The messenger takes on cultic significance with this effective proclamation of God's royal dominion, and the prophet shares this significance as one who is anointed to bring good tidings to the afflicted (Is. 61:1). All these themes—eschatological expectation, the embracing of the Gentiles, and the links with salvation, righteousness, and peace (Pss. 95:1; 40:9; Is. 52:7)—point forward to the NT.

---

OT Old Testament

B. euangelízomai with the Greeks. This verb, usually in the middle, with dative or accusative of person, a perí to introduce the message, and sometimes a preposition denoting the recipient, is used for bringing news, especially of a victory or some other joyous event, in person or by letter. Often, especially in war, the news may be false. Words like salvation may be combined with it, but also, in secular Greek, the idea of fate or luck. The messenger may come with an oracle, and this yields the thought of "promise" or even "threat." We also find the term used for announcing in the royal palace the arrival of the divine man Apollonius. The ideas of victory and liberation provide links with the NT, but the NT knows nothing of luck, and Jesus, unlike the divine man, is himself the content of the message. Furthermore, in both the OT and NT the term has an actuality of pronouncement that is not found in the secular sense of revealed promise.

C. The Septuagint, Philo, and Josephus.

1. The LXX uses the group for bśr (though it has paidárion for the messenger with bad news in 1 Sam. 4:17). It prefers euangelizómenos to eúangelos for the messenger in a more literal rendering of the Hebrew. On the other hand, it weakens the Hebrew in Is. 40:9, Ps. 68:11, and Is. 52:6-7 by generalizing the concept, minimizing the efficacy of the divine word, and losing the idea of the dawn of divine rule. It links euangelízesthai more frequently to salvation (cf. Is. 60:6) and also links it with dóxa (Ex. 15:11), aretḗ (Is. 42:12), and aínesis (Ps. 106:47).

2. Philo is close to the Greek world of thought. He has the verb for announcing good news, sometimes poetically as when an almond tree announces a good crop. In an allegory on Ex. 14:30 the sense is "to promise." We also find in him the terminology of the emperor cult.

3. Josephus uses the word, like Philo, for announcing good news, and also in the sense "to promise," as in Antiquities 5.24, 277. In neither writer is there any sense of salvation history or eschatology; individual experiences replace the great history of God, and there is thus no place for the bearer of good tidings in the sense of Is. 40ff.

NT New Testament

LXX Septuagint

cf. confer, compare

D. Palestinian Judaism. bšr here normally means "to proclaim good news," but sometimes bad news too. With a future reference we also find the sense "to promise." Yet the idea of the messenger of Is. 40ff., with whom the messianic age dawns, may also be found even if the tradition regarding this messenger is not uniform (he may be anonymous, or Elijah, or the Messiah, or there may be many messengers). Expectation of the great age of God's saving rule is alive, and if the message is for Israel first it is also for the Gentiles, and for the dead as well as the living, since the God of Israel is also Lord of the whole world.

E. euangelízomai in the NT. This verb (along with euangélion) is common in Luke and Acts and fairly common in Paul, but it does not occur in the Johannine writings (perhaps because the primary concept in John is that of fulfilment). We also do not find the verb in Mark, James, 2 Peter, or Jude, and it occurs only once in Matthew, twice in Hebrews, and three times in 1 Peter (euangelízein twice in Revelation).

1. Jesus. Jesus brings the good news of the expected last time (Mt. 11:5). The message carries with it the fulfilment. The works of Jesus are signs of the messianic age. At Nazareth Jesus applies Is. 61:1 to himself (Lk. 4:18). With him the good news of God's kingdom is preached (Lk. 16:16). Lk. 8:1 sums up the entire ministry of Jesus when it calls him a herald and messenger of the kingdom. His whole life proclaims the gospel. His birth is good news (Lk. 2:10). His coming, work, and death are the great proclamation of peace (Eph. 2:14ff.). He preaches the good news even to the dead (cf. 1 Pet. 3:19 and 4:6).

2. John the Baptist. Lk. 3:18 says of John that he preached good news to the people. As Elijah, he proclaims God's imminent kingdom (Lk. 1:17; Mt. 11:14; 17:12). Though belonging to the old age, he is more than a prophet. Hence an angel brings the good news of his birth (Lk. 1:19), he prepares the way of God, and as the precursor of the Messiah he is an evangelist whose story is the beginning of the gospel (Mk. 1:1).

3. The Host of Witnesses. Rom. 10:15 refers Is. 52:7, not to the Messiah, but to the messengers of the gospel, even though both the MT and LXX are in the singular. The reason for this is that Jesus had sent out the twelve to preach the gospel (Lk. 9:1ff.) and then given the task of evangelizing (telling the good news about himself) to the church (cf. Acts 5:42; Philip in 8:12, 35, 40). The message goes to both Jews and Gentiles (Acts 11:20). Paul is especially called to be the evangelist to the Gentiles (Gal. 1:16; Rom. 15:20; 1 Cor. 15:1; 2 Cor. 10:16; Acts 14:10; 17:18). This is his grace (Eph. 3:8). His whole ministry is euangelízesthai (1 Cor. 1:17). The same message goes out to both Christians and pagans (Rom. 1:15; Acts 14:15), for God himself speaks through it to all people. The content is Jesus himself (Gal. 1:16), his passion and resurrection (1 Pet. 1:11ff.; Acts 17:18), the kingdom (Acts 8:12), the OT in its witness to Christ (Acts 8:35), the word (Acts 15:35), and the faith (Gal. 1:23). Parallel terms are preaching, teaching, and witnessing. euangelízesthai is not just speaking but proclaiming with power to the accompaniment of signs. It thus brings healing (Mt. 4:23), joy (Acts 8:8), salvation (1 Cor. 15:1-2), and regeneration (1 Pet. 1:23ff.) as God's own word in the power of his Spirit (1 Pet. 1:12). Being proclamation of the good news of God, it carries with it both the offer and the power of salvation. Two special uses may be noted: In 1 Th. 3:6 the faith and love of the Thessalonians are the theme of the good news brought by Timothy, and in Heb. 4:2, 6 OT proclamation is included with its element of promise.

4. God. Twice God is the subject of evangelizing. In Acts 10:36 he causes peace to be proclaimed through Christ; the story of Jesus is God's good news of peace and joy. In Rev. 10:7 God has announced the good news of his coming rule to his servants the OT and NT prophets.

MT Masoretic Text

5. Angels. Gabriel gives the good news of the Baptist's birth in Lk. 1:19, and the angel announces the Savior's birth in Lk. 2:10. In both cases the message is evangel because the time of salvation has come and great joy may thus be proclaimed.

euangélion.

A. euangélion outside the NT.

1. bəśōrâ in the OT. The noun, much less common than the verb, occurs only six times in the OT and means 1. "good news" (2 Sam. 18:20, 25, 27; 2 Kgs. 7:9) and 2. "reward for good news" (2 Sam. 4:10; 18:22). The spoken word is equated with its content; bad news brings sorrow and good news joy. The bearer of bad news is thus guilty and may be punished for it (2 Sam. 1:15-16), while the bearer of good news is rewarded. The use in the OT is purely secular.

2. euangélion among the Greeks.

a. This word is an adjective as well as a noun and means "what is proper to an euángelos," i.e., either good news, or the reward for it. The term becomes a technical one for "news of victory." A whole ritual surrounds the coming of the messenger who bears this news, e.g., decking his spear with laurels and crowning his head. Sacrifices are also offered when the news comes, the temples are garlanded, an agṓn is held, and the offerings are crowned. Good fortune is contained in the words; hence the reward for the messenger. The first messenger receives a higher reward, a dilatory messenger may be punished. Yet, since lying reports circulate, rewards are given only after verification. An euangélion can also be an oracular saying. Thanksgivings are offered for such an euangélion, though when the Ephesians do not believe an oracle of Apollonius he orders them to postpone the sacrifice until what he has said comes to pass.

b. euangélion is particularly important in the emperor cult. The emperor is a divine ruler who controls nature, dispenses healing, serves as a protective god, and brings good fortune, his birth being accompanied by cosmic signs. Imperial messages, then, are joyous ones, since what he says is a divine act implying good and salvation. The first euangélion is news of his birth, then his coming of age, then his accession. Offerings and yearly festivals celebrate the new and more hopeful era that dawns with him. His accession to the throne is a gospel for his subjects. This imperial euangélion, like that of the NT, has a Near Eastern source, but to the many imperial messages the NT opposes the one gospel, and to the many accessions the one proclamation of God's kingdom. Again, the NT may use familiar language, but it associates it with the scandal of the cross (1 Cor. 1:17), penitence, and judgment, so that it must have seemed ironical to some (Acts 17:32). Caesar and Christ confront one another. They have much in common, for both claim to be gospel, but they belong to different worlds.

3. The Septuagint and Josephus.

a. The LXX does not have euangélion in the singular. In the plural the word occurs only in 2 Sam. 4:10 as "reward for good news"; hē euangélia is used in 2 Sam. 18:22 etc. This term is rare, and a distinction between it and euangélion is not found elsewhere. The NT use of euangélion clearly does not derive from the LXX, since the NT never has either the plural or the sense of reward.

---

i.e. id est, that is

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

b. Philo does not use the noun, but Josephus has hē euangélia, tó euangélion, and tá euangélia for "glad tidings," especially in connection with the emperor cult.

4. Rabbinic Judaism. This does not help much regarding the noun. The rabbis use the Hebrew term for good news (or sometimes sad news), and it may have a religious sense, but they do not employ it for eschatological good news. The reason seems to be that while they expect the eschatological act, and the messenger who announces it, the message as such is not a new one and hence is not so important. The stress on the act is significant, however, since it influences the NT understanding of euangélion as denoting action as well as content, which would be most unusual in Greek. The fact that euangélion seems to be a loanword to describe the NT gospel, and open as such to malicious punning, does not prove the contrary, for Palestinian Judaism was largely bilingual.

B. euangélion in the NT. Mark has the noun eight times, Matthew four, and Luke (preferring the verb) none at all. There are two instances in Acts, sixty in Pauline works, and one each in 1 Peter and Revelation.

1. The Synoptists. Except in the title (1:1) and the general summary in 1:14, Mark has euangélion only in sayings of Jesus. Doubts have been expressed as to the actual use of the word by Jesus himself except perhaps in Mk. 14:9. The real question, however, is whether it is true to the matter itself. The proclamation of Jesus is undoubtedly good news, and he himself is its proclaimer, so that we have an obvious transition from the verb to the noun. Furthermore, with his messianic consciousness, Jesus realizes that he is not just bringing a new teaching but bringing himself as the content of his message, so that for the disciples euangélion implies disclosure of the messianic secret. Thus, while the verb might be the better term for Jesus himself, the noun is apt for the direct continuation of his proclamation by the community. The question whether the word is original in Jesus' own teaching is consequently of secondary importance, as is also the question whether "gospel of the kingdom" or "gospel of Jesus" is more authentic, or whether the genitive in 1:1 is objective or subjective. Jesus both proclaims the gospel and is and actualizes it. Its content is the fulfilment of the time and the nearness of the kingdom. Being contrary to appearances, it demands repentance and faith. During his lifetime Jesus restricts it to Israel, but all nations are to come in with the messianic age (Mt. 8:11), so that when Jesus is exalted as Lord in the resurrection, proclamation extends to the Gentiles as itself an eschatological event (Mk. 13:10).

2. Paul.

a. Most of the NT references to euangélion are in Paul. His use of tó euangélion shows that the concept is now a fixed one both for himself and his readers. As one may see from 2 Cor. 8:18; Phil. 4:3, 15, it refers to the act of proclamation, but 1 Cor. 9:14 shows that it may also refer to the content. This twofold sense is especially plain in Rom. 1:1: "set apart for the gospel of God," for while Paul is set apart to preach the gospel, the clause that follows (vv. 2-3) describes its content.

b. Verbs of speaking and hearing indicate that a specific message is to be declared (cf. 1 Cor. 15:1; 9:14; Gal. 2:2; 1 Th. 2:2; 2 Tim. 1:11; Col. 1:5, 23; Gal. 1:12). Two passages summarize the content (Rom. 1:1ff. and 1 Cor. 15:1ff.), and cf. Rom. 2:16; 16:25; 2 Tim. 3:8. From Rom. 1:1ff. we learn that the preexistent Son has become man, is as such the expected Davidic Messiah, and has been exalted as kýrios with his resurrection. The resurrection presupposes the death and passion. As the message of Jesus, the gospel brings peace (Eph. 6:15), but judgment is also part of its content (Rom. 2:16). The gospel also brings strength (Rom. 16:25) as the revelation of God's saving counsel concurrent with the preaching of

---

vv. verses

Jesus. No break with the OT is implied, for the gospel is the fulfilment of promise (Rom. 1:1ff.) both in its preaching and message. Bearing witness to Christ, the OT belongs to the gospel and serves to make it known to the nations (Rom. 16:26). The new thing is what the message effects. If the content is to be summed up in a single word, that word is Christ (cf. Rom. 15:19; 1 Cor. 9:12; 2 Cor. 2:12; Gal. 1:7; Phil. 1:27, etc.; also 2 Th. 1:8 and Rom. 1:9). Whether the genitive is objective or subjective in the phrase "gospel of Christ" is of little moment, since Christ is both author and content as the Exalted and Incarnate Lord in one.

c. The gospel records a historical event, but this event transcends ordinary history. Similarly, it consists of narratives and teachings, but it also relates to human reality and shows itself to be living power. The "for our sins" of 1 Cor. 15:3 makes it a message of judgment and joy. The "resurrection from the dead" of Rom. 1:4 shows it to be the initiation of the general resurrection. If the gospel is witness to salvation history, it is itself salvation history, for it comes into human lives, refashions them, and constitutes the communities. It cannot be grasped in the ordinary way (2 Cor. 4:3); divine revelation takes place in it. Through the gospel God calls us to salvation through the preacher (2 Th. 2:14), summons us to decision, and claims our obedience (Rom. 10:16; 2 Cor. 9:13). We shall be judged by our attitude to it (2 Th. 1:8). The gospel is no empty word; it effects what it says, since God is its author (Rom. 1:1 etc.). It is everywhere at work (Col. 1:5), and brings the Gentiles into the promise (Eph. 3:6). There must be no hindrance to either its proclamation or its operation (cf. 1 Cor. 9:12). It is fulfilled when it takes effect (Rom. 15: 18ff.). It brings salvation (Eph. 1:13; Rom. 1:16). It reveals God's justifying righteousness, combining judgment and grace (Rom. 1:16-17). Faith arises through it and is directed to it (Phil. 1:27). It gives new life (1 Cor. 4:15); the life achieved through Christ's death and resurrection comes to actuality through it (cf. 2 Tim. 1:10). It mediates the presence of something future (Col. 1:5) and is thus an eschatological event, fulfilling hope (cf. Col. 1:23). Effecting what it proclaims, it can be a term for salvation itself (1 Th. 2:8). Fellowship in it is not just cooperation in evangelism but fellowship in the salvation it brings. The divine glory of Christ shines in it (2 Cor. 4:4). Christ is himself present in it (cf. 1 Th. 2:12; Col. 1:10; Phil. 1:27). Paul is in prison both for Christ and the gospel (Phlm. 9, 13). Message and content are one (2 Cor. 10:14). It forces service upon us (Col. 1:23) as its fellows (1 Cor. 9:23). It is a cultic foundation where Paul offers priestly service in Rom. 15:16, but as distinct from election it is an order of salvation in Rom. 11:28 and a declared mystery in Eph. 6:19.

d. Paul can speak of "our" (2 Cor. 4:3) or "my" gospel (Rom. 2:16). He can also refer to the gospel which "he" preached (1 Cor. 15:1; Gal. 1:11; cf. 2:2). He does not mean that he has a special gospel. He shares with others only the one gospel of Christ (Gal. 1:6). It is his because he is entrusted with its proclamation (1 Th. 2:4; 1 Tim. 1:11). He is its herald, apostle, and teacher (2 Tim. 1:10). He is called to preach it (Rom. 1:1) to the Gentiles (Gal. 1:16). He serves Christ as an evangelist (Rom. 1:9). He is a partner of the gospel (1 Cor. 9:23), and as such a priest (Rom. 15:16) and servant (Eph. 3:7). Suffering with him is suffering with the gospel (2 Tim. 1:8). But if he is in bonds, the gospel is not (2 Tim. 2:8ff.). His imprisonment is for its defense and confirmation (Phil. 1:7). What happens to him promotes it. Those who serve him, serve it (Phil. 2:22). He is Timothy's father through the gospel (1 Cor. 4:15).

e. The gospel teaches the right use of the law, revealing God's glory (1 Tim. 1:11). Law and gospel are not in direct antithesis. The Judaizers see their teaching as gospel too. For them, however, the gospel becomes proclamation of law. What Paul opposes to law is promise, not gospel. Promise predates law, and even in the OT is the true ground of acceptance. It comes to fulfilment in Christ and discloses the real purpose of law. Paul's gospel is the same as that of the others (Gal. 1:11; 1 Cor. 15:1ff.). The risen Lord is its author (Lk. 24:19ff.). But as the apostle to the Gentiles Paul is the one who faces the question of law and gospel. Jewish Christians keep the law while being free regarding it. Paul himself will do this (1 Cor. 9:20). But salvation is in Christ alone for both the circumcised and uncircumcised (cf. Gal. 2). Christ allows us to be neither legalists nor libertines. The gospel demands obedience. It is a criterion of conduct (Phil. 1:27). We are obedient to it when active in the ministry of love (2 Cor. 9:13ff.).

3. Revelation. In Rev. 14:6-7 an angel proclaims the gospel, the gospel is everlasting, and there is no article. Since the content seems to be judgment, it is thought by some that this is not the gospel of Christ. An angel proclaims it, however, because the time is short. This preaching is a sign of the end. The real content is not judgment but fear of the Lord (Mk. 1:14-15) and worship of the Creator (Acts 14:15).

C. Transition of the Term euangélion to Designation of a Book. In the NT euangélion is oral preaching. The apostles' writings are not euangélion; they declare it (cf. 1 Cor. 15:1). Soon, however, the works that contain the words and deeds of Jesus are themselves called gospel. Missionaries thus acquire both a verbal and a written mission. The gospel is both preached and read. Ignatius still uses "gospel" in the dynamic sense of Christ as the center and goal of salvation history. In the Didache it comprises the whole tradition. Irenaeus can speak of the Prophets and Gospels, i.e., the OT and the NT. But he also refers to the four Gospels, which all, of course, proclaim the same gospel. "Gospel" is used by Eusebius for the whole collection as well as each individual book, and Clement of Alexandria says "in the gospels" when he quotes a saying that is in fact found only in one Gospel.

euangelistḗs. Except in church writings, this is a rare word. It occurs three times in the NT: for Philip in Acts 4:11, Timothy in 2 Tim. 4:5, and evangelists as a group in Eph. 4:11. The evangelist does not proclaim oracles, as among the Greeks, but the good news (Rom. 10:15). The term denotes a function which apostles also exercised, though not all evangelists would be apostles, and the function is a lower one than that of the apostles in all three references. Congregational as well as missionary proclamation is denoted (cf. 2 Tim. 4:5). In the early church evangelists continue the apostles' work. The word also comes to be used for the author of a Gospel.

proeuangelízomai. Not found in classical Greek, this word is used in Gal. 3:8 to show that the promise given to Abraham is an advance preaching of the gospel. The proeuangélion becomes euangélion when the promise is fulfilled in Christ (3:16) and justification by faith is secured for the Gentiles [G. FRIEDRICH, II, 707-37]

euarestéō, euárestos → aréskō

eudokéō [to be well-pleased], eudokía [good will, good pleasure] eudokéō.

A. eudokéō outside the NT. Developed from eú dokeí tiní ti, this popular Hellenistic word occurs in papyri and inscriptions as well as the LXX in various constructions.

a. Its usual sense is "to take pleasure or delight in," e.g., God in his people, or in the righteous, or in an offering, but also humans in the sanctuary, or the sabbath, or the truth. b. A further sense is "to decide for," "to select," "to prefer," and even "to adopt." c. From this evolves the sense "to want," "to will," "to be willing or ready." d. A more social meaning is "to agree," "consent," "acquiesce," "concede," "comply." e. Outside the Bible we often find "to be satisfied," "happy."

B. eudokéō in the NT.

1. With the dative of person we find the term in the declarations at the baptism and transfiguration of Jesus (Mt. 3:17; 17:5), where it indicates that the Son is the recipient of God's elective good pleasure (cf. Mt. 12:18; 2 Pet. 1:17). Of the various words for election, this one brings out most strongly the emotional side, i.e., God's love for the one whom he chooses. In view of the total presentation in Matthew and Luke, the aorist does not support an adoptionist understanding of the baptismal statement. In 1 Cor. 10:5 the negative ("God was not pleased") implies rejection (cf. Heb. 10:38 for a similar use).

2. eudokeín ti with object occurs only in the LXX quotation in Heb. 10:6, 8 with reference to God's taking no pleasure in offerings. The object with dative or en and dative appears twice in Paul: in 2 Th. 2:12 with reference to those who take pleasure in wickedness, and in 2 Cor. 12:10 with reference to Paul's acceptance of weaknesses, insults, etc. for Christ's sake.

3. With infinitive or accusative and infinitive, the word carries a clear hint of choice or resolve, i.e., what is preferred in 2 Cor. 5:8; decision in 1 Th. 3:1 and Rom. 15:26-27; readiness in 1 Th. 2:8; God's free and gracious counsel in Lk. 12:32. The divine decision in Gal. 1:15-16 confers independence on Paul, while God's resolve in 1 Cor. 1:21 stands in antithesis to the wisdom of the world. In Col. 1:19, where one should take God as the subject, God resolved that his whole fullness should dwell in Christ and that all things should be reconciled through him. The divine resolve accompanies the revelation in Gal. 1:15 and the preaching in 1 Cor. 1:21, but it has a plain supratemporal reference in Lk. 12:32 and Col. 1:19.

eudokía. This is not a classical word; it occurs for the first time in the Greek Bible.

A. rāṣôn in the OT.

1. This word, used some 56 times in the OT, mostly denotes God's good pleasure: a. in sacrifices (Lev. 19:5 etc.), b. more generally as God's "favor" (Ps. 5:12 etc.), e.g., God's blessings (Dt. 32:33), and c. as the divine "will" (Ps. 40:8).

2. Less commonly the term expresses a human disposition, either a. bad, "caprice," "arrogance," or "partiality" (cf. Gen. 49:6; Dan. 8:4) or b. good, royal "favor" (Prov. 14:35) or mutual "delight" (Prov. 14:9), and cf. c. the setting of the will of the righteous on God (Ps. 145:19; 2 Chr. 15:15).

B. rāṣôn and eudokía in Jesus Sirach. The term reaches its full development in Sirach in 23 instances, some for rāṣôn and some with no Hebrew equivalent. 1. When rāṣôn is not rendered eudokía, it means a. God's "favor," b. God's "will," and c. human "caprice." 2. When eudokía is used for rāṣôn or without equivalent, the main sense is a. "God's good pleasure," but we also find b. "God's resolve," c. human "desire" or "will," and d. "satisfaction."

C. eudokía in the Septuagint and Hexapla. There is little that is new here. eudokía occurs only eight times in the LXX in the senses of divine "favor" and "good pleasure." One version has Eudokia for the name Tirzah in Cant. 6:3, i.e., Satisfaction. The other translations use the word more often but add nothing to its development.

D. Rabbinic Examples of eudokía. The rabbis use rāṣôn for God's favor and will, and also speak of favor before God. There are also expressions denoting human good pleasure in the sense of doing things willingly and not by constraint.

E. eudokía in the NT.

1. eudokía in Paul. In the NT there are only two references to human will. In Rom. 10:1 the will of the heart becomes petition to God. In Phil. 1:15 the idea is that of good will, directed toward Paul but by implication toward his mission as well. The other references in Paul are all to God's good pleasure or counsel. It is just possible that good human resolve is at issue in 2 Th. 1:11, but this is unlikely. In Eph. 1:5, 9, 11, where thélēma, próthesis, and boulḗ accompany eudokía, the term brings out the element of free good pleasure in the divine counsel.

2. eudokía in the Synoptists.

a. The prayer of Jesus in Mt. 11:26; Lk. 10:21 describes it as God's decree that the knowledge of the Son is hidden from the wise and revealed to babes.

b. In the Christmas saying in Lk. 2:14 we have two versions: "to men of good will" and "good will to men," but the former is better attested, and the latter may have arisen through a failure to understand the Hebrew form of the original. The meaning of the declaration is that God is glorified in heaven with the sending of Christ and the implication for earth is peace (i.e., salvation) for the people of good pleasure now that the turning point of the ages has come. These people of good pleasure are not, of course, those who have the good will to open themselves to God's grace or who do acts that will arouse a response of divine favor. eudokía can indeed have the meaning,"consent," and the idea of divine favor in human offerings may be found in the OT, but the dominant use of eudokía shows plainly that the people of good pleasure are the recipients of God's grace by his free and unfathomably sovereign choice or counsel. Who are these people? We must obviously include Israel in view of 2:10, but 2:14 itself suggests a broader eschatological reference to all the elect who are redeemed in virtue of God's saving act in Christ. The word eudokía plays an important role in Gnosticism as a name for the Savior. It is common, too, in the fathers, usually with a reference to God, the Logos, or the Spirit, and with explanations that reflect Greek uncertainty as to its precise connotation. [G. SCHRENK, II, 738-51]

euergesía, euergetéō, euergétēs* → érgon; eúkairos → *kairós

eulabḗs [devout], eulabeísthai [to be afraid, reverence], eulábeia [fear, reverence]

A. The Non-Christian Usage. a. This group denotes an attitude of "caution" or "circumspection," e.g., regard for the kairós, vigilance, provision, concern, then conscientiousness, in religion scrupulosity or awe, more generally fear or anxiety. b. In the LXX the verb means "to be on guard," but mostly "to fear," especially fear of God. c. In Josephus and Philo the group is used for "nervousness," "caution," "fear," "prudence," "religious awe."

B. NT Usage. The group is rare in the NT. It characterizes Simeon in Lk. 2:25, the Jews of Acts 2:5, those who bury Stephen in Acts 8:2, and Ananias in Acts 22:12, always in the sense of "devout" or "pious." In Heb. 12:28 eulábeia probably means "anxiety" (cf. Phil. 2:12). In Heb. 5:7 it may mean "fear of God," in which case apó means "by reason of." Another possibility is that the reference is to liberation from "anxiety," but this hardly does justice to the sonship of v. 8. The group is perhaps used mostly for devout Jews because of the element of nervous caution, which is most appropriate where regard must be had for the law. Later it achieves a new prominence for religiosity in the Eastern Church and monasticism. [R. BULTMANN, II, 751-54] eulogéō [to speak well of, bless], eulogētós [blessed], eulogía [blessing], eneulogéō [to bless] eulogéō, eulogía.

A. eulogéō and eulogía in Greek Literature. The literal sense is "speaking well." This yields the meaning "to extol." We also find a use for "advocacy" in the papyri. The term may be used for the praise of humans by the gods, but more often for praise of the gods. The idea of blessing is extremely rare.

---

v. verse

B. Blessing in the OT. Blessing is a most important concept in the OT and Judaism. Like cursing, it involves a transfer by acts and words. The Hebrew group brk, translated by eulogéō etc. in the LXX, denotes blessing, being blessed, and the individual blessings.

1. A father has a power to bless which he may transmit to his heirs (cf. Gen. 27:1ff.; 48:15; 49:25-26).

2. This blessing takes the form of prayer to God (Gen. 49:25). Since God is personal, the blessing is not magical, but relates to his free and gracious giving. Creation depends on divine blessing (Gen. 1:22). Man and woman are blessed from the outset (Gen. 1:28). God sustains his work by sending showers of blessing (Ezek. 34:26). He blesses the sabbath (Gen. 2:3) as well as crops and cattle (Dt. 28:1 ff.). Specific blessings are related to salvation history (cf. Gen. 17:7-8; 26:3). The history of the chosen people stands under blessing or cursing (Dt. 11:26ff.; 30:1 ff.). Blessing becomes cursing if the commandments are not kept. The righteous who trust in God and do his will find blessing, but sinners cursing (Jer. 17:5, 7; Ps. 24:4-5).

3. The reminder of God's blessings takes cultic forms (cf. the blessings given by Melchizedek in Gen. 14:19, by Moses in Dt. 33:1ff., by Joshua in Josh. 14:13, by Eli in 1 Sam. 2:20, by David in 2 Sam. 6:18, and by Solomon in 1 Kgs. 8:14). It gradually becomes the priest's prerogative to bless (cf. Lev. 9:22-23; Num. 6:22ff.; Dt. 10:8). The prayer of Ps. 3:8 echoes constantly in the temple liturgy.

4. An important use of the group is also for the blessing of God by believers in the sense of giving him praise and glory.

5. The Hebrew verb can be used for blessing in the general sense of greeting.

6. The term may also be used euphemistically where cursing is intended (cf. Job 1:11; 2:5, 9; 1:21).

7. The use of the eulogeín group for the brk group does not change the sense by ruling out magical ideas, for the OT itself removes blessing from the sphere of primitive mana, and the Greek terms simply set the seal on this development.

C. Blessing in Judaism at the Time of Jesus.

1. Philo uses eulogéō frequently either with the thought of reward or in connection with the contemplative life. Noting the presence of lógos in the word, he gives the praise of God a rational basis; it is most fitting that we should magnify God, unuttered thoughts rather than words being the true norm.

2. The rabbis work out specific rules for blessing. a. The Aaronic blessing has a firm place in the cultus. b. Only a priest may pronounce it in the synagogue. c. All forms of prayer that begin with praise of God are blessings. d. Ascriptions of praise etc. are common in other contexts (cf. the blessing of the law, temple, etc. on the Day of Atonement). Blessings must also precede all meals in recognition that all things come from God (Ps. 24:1). A concluding thanksgiving makes an eulogía of the whole meal. e. Table blessings play an important part in the Passover, e.g., the blessing of the bread, and the cup of blessing after the eating of the lamb.

D. eulogéō and eulogía in the NT.

1. The use of the group in the NT is heavily influenced by the OT. Thus Heb. 7:1 uses the story of the blessing of Abraham by Melchizedek to show the superiority of Christ's high priesthood, while Heb. 11:20-21 and 12:17 reflect the OT concept of parental blessing.

2. The NT also recognizes the duty of blessing God (cf. Lk. 1:64; 2:28).

3. Blessing within salvation history may be seen in the case of Mary (Lk. 1:28, 42) but especially the Messiah himself (cf. the greeting of Mk. 11:9-10; Jn. 12:13).

4. The Messiah adopts the religious practices of his day, so that we find him blessing the bread in Mk. 6:41; 8:7, though with an upward rather than the prescribed downward look, and with something distinctive that made him recognizable in Lk. 24:30. At the last supper Jesus blesses the bread and hands around the cup of blessing (Mk. 14:22; cf. "the cup of blessing which we bless" in 1 Cor. 10:16).

5. Jesus also blesses people, e.g., the children in Mk. 10:16, and the disciples in Lk. 24:50ff. He brings a fullness of blessing (Rom. 15:29). This is a spiritual blessing (Eph. 1:3) which fulfils what was promised to Abraham (Gal. 3:8-9) and means eternal joy for the blessed of the Father (Mt. 25:34).

6. Those who are thus blessed are no longer to repay evil with evil but to bless even those who curse them (Lk. 6:28; cf. Rom. 12:14).

7. Springing out of unconditional love, eulogía can be used by Paul for the gifts that he seeks as a collection for Jerusalem (2 Cor. 9:5-6).

8. In 1 Cor. 14:16 eulogeín denotes ecstatic praise. As distinct from the curse anáthema Iēsoús, confession of Jesus as Lord is true eulogía (1 Cor. 12:3).

9. The citation in Rom. 16:18 for the flattering words of seducers reflects Greek usage, but perhaps with a Palestinian suggestion of false promises.

10. Revelation shows that the eternal world of the last time includes the magnifying of him that sits on the throne and the Lamb (5:12-13; 7:12).

eulogētós.

1. In the OT believers may be the blessed of God (Gen. 12:2; Dt. 28:6), but more commonly God is the blessed one (Gen. 14:20, where Abram is also blessed by God, v. 19).

2. In Jewish writings outside the OT, liturgical formulas call God blessed.

3. Only God is the blessed one in the NT in such doxological formulas as occur in Lk. 1:68; Rom. 1:25; 2 Cor. 1:3; 11:31; Eph. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:3. Christ is the Son of the Blessed in Mk. 14:61; this may echo Jewish concern to paraphrase God's name.

eneulogéō. This compound form occurs in Gen. 12:3; 18:18 to stress the fact that the blessing embraces all races and peoples. In the NT we find it in the quotation in Gal. 3:8 and the rather free rendering in Acts 3:25. [H. W. BEYER, II, 754-65]

eunoéō, eúnoia → noús

eunoúchos [eunuch], eunouchízō [to make a eunuch]

1. Outside the NT eunoúchos is used not only for men but also for castrated animals and for fruits or plants with no seed or kernel.

2. Castration is alien to the Greeks but is found in the Near East. Eunuchs here are overseers of women and confidants of rulers, often in places of power. Eunuch priests play a role in many cults; perhaps the idea is that of assimilation and dedication to the deity.

3. The OT forbids the castration of men or animals as contrary to the Creator's will (cf. Dt. 17:16ff.; 23:2ff.). The desire for a healthy cultic order may play some part in the prohibition. Yet the prophets insist that God's boundless love covers eunuchs too (Is. 56:3ff.). The OT term sārîs denotes a military or political official as well as a eunuch (cf. 2 Kgs. 25:19). The LXX rendering eunoúchos may imply emasculation but does not have to do so. By the time of Jesus Hellenistic influences strengthen a more lenient attitude toward eunuchs in some circles, e.g., in Herod's court, where Josephus tells us the three chamberlains were eunuchs.

4. Rabbinic Judaism, however, insists on the duty of marrying and having children. In view of this Jeremias believes that Paul must have been a widower (though cf. 1 Cor. 7:7).

5. Jesus transcends the rabbinic view by differentiating three groups of eunuchs (Mt. 19:12): those who are so from birth, those who are castrated, and those who emasculate themselves for the kingdom's sake. In the latter case the sense is obviously figurative; the reference is to those who renounce sex in order to focus on the higher goal of the kingdom, as Jesus himself does. The gospel affirms the natural order but may require its denial for the sake of the new and higher order.

6. In Acts 8:27ff. Is. 56:3-4 comes to fulfilment as the eunuch of Queen Candace comes to faith and is baptized.

7. The early church mostly takes Mt. 19:12 figuratively (though cf. the young Origen) and excludes from the ministry any who are castrated except through no fault of their own (cf. canons 21ff. of the Apostolic Constitutions). [J. SCHNEIDER, II, 765-68]

euprósdektos* → déchomai; eueprosōpéō → *prósōpon

heurískō [to find]

This word means “to find”: a. “to find after search,” b. “to find accidentally” (passive “to be struck by”), c. “to fetch or get” (of goods), d. “to procure,” e. (figuratively) “to gain perception or insight, to discover,” and f. “to show or prove oneself,” “to be found as.” All these nuances but c. occur in the NT, sometimes with reference to ordinary facts, but mostly with reference to things relating to God’s work and kingdom, e.g., surprising events (Mt. 1:18; Lk. 9:36; Acts 5:10), or miracles (Mt. 17:27; Mk. 7:30; Jn. 21:6), or supernatural gifts (Mt. 7:7-8), or the gift of God’s kingdom (Mt. 13:44), or encounter with Jesus (Mk. 1:37), or experience of God (Lk. 4:17; Rom. 10:20), or gifts of salvation such as pasture in Jn. 10:9, grace in Acts 7:46, mercy in Rom. 4:1, and redemption in Heb. 9:12, or God’s call and salvation (Mt. 18:13; 24:46; Lk. 15:5-6), but also with a suggestion of responsibility (Lk. 13:6-7; 17:18) and of the seriousness of divine judgment (Mt. 24:46; 2 Pet. 3:14; Rev. 12:8; 16:20; 18:14; 20:15). [H. PREISKER, II, 769-70]

eusébeia, eusebéō, eusebḗs* → *sébomai

eúsēmos [clear, distinct]

A compound of sḗma, eúsēmos means a. “favorable” (giving good signs) and b. “evident” (giving clear signs). It occurs in the NT only in 1 Cor. 14:8-9, where Paul demands clarity of proclamation in view of the serious import of the message in questions of eternal destiny. [W. GRUNDMANN, II, 770]

eúsplanchnos* → *splanchnízomai

euschḗmōn [presentable, prominent]

1. “Honest,” “orderly,” “becoming.” Paul uses the term in this sense when exhorting to Christian conduct that the non-Christian world will also find blameless. Thus in 1 Th. 4:12 his point is that outsiders can make judgments on this basis and should be given no occasion for offense. In Rom. 13:13 the underlying idea (in context) of “suitable attire” merges into that of “becoming conduct.” The external aspect of Christian life is at issue, and therefore, from the Greek standpoint, the aesthetic element may sometimes be what counts, as in 1 Cor. 12:23-24.

2. “Noble,” “honorable,” “excellent,” “prominent.” Joseph of Arimathea is a “respected” man in Mk. 15:43 (rich in Mt. 27:57, good and righteous in Lk. 23:5). The women who are incited against Paul in Acts 13:50 are “prominent,” as are those in Acts 17:12. They belong to a higher social stratum. [H. GREEVEN, II, 770-72]

euphraínō [to be cheerful, glad], euphrosýnē [joy, gladness]

1. euphraínō means “to cheer,” “to gladden,” and (middle or passive) “to be glad,” “to rejoice.” euphrosýnē means “joy” with an emphasis on the mood. The objects of joy may be physical happenings, festivals, or intellectual and spiritual things (as in Plato and the Stoics).

2. Alternation in translation shows that in the LXX the group has no specific sense as distinct from other terms for joy. It may denote cultic joy, joy at God’s help, or eschatological joy in the last time as a time of celebration.

3. Judaism follows the same usage, and since obedience to the law has a cultic character even the fear of the Lord can be described as euphrosýnē. Philo distinguishes between true and false festive joy. True joy characterizes the sphere of God and comes from God as the supreme divine blessing.

4. The terms play no great role in the NT. Theologically they are overshadowed by chará. euphraínesthai is used for secular joy. This may be simply worldly merriness (Lk. 12:19; 16:19) or even wicked jubilation (Rev. 11:10), but it may also be social jollity (Lk. 15:29) or the joy of the father at the return of his lost son (Lk. 15:23-24). The term may thus denote a gladness that pagans experience as recipients of God’s natural bounties (Acts 14:17). The joy of fellowship comes to expression in 2 Cor. 2:2 (the good side of the joy of Israel when sacrificing to the golden calf in Acts 7:41). Rev. 12:12 and 18:20 echo the OT demand for joy at God’s eschatological judgments. But the nations may rejoice already at the message of God’s saving act in Christ (Rom. 15:10). The Christian community brings fruitfulness to Jerusalem and is thus an occasion of rejoicing in fulfilment of Is. 54:1 (Gal. 4:27). The resurrection of Christ is also an occasion for the joy foreseen in Ps. 16 (Acts 2:25-26). In the early Christian writings we find cultic joy in Barn. 15.9, joy at the preaching of the word in Did. 12.9, and eschatological joy in Justin Dialogue 80.1 etc. (quoting the OT). [R. BULTMANN, II, 772-75]

eucharistéō, eucharistía, eucháristos → cháris

eúchomai [to wish, pray], euchḗ [prayer, vow], proseúchomai [to pray], proseuchḗ [prayer, place of prayer] eúchomai, euchḗ.

A. The Usage of eúchomai, euchḗ. In nonbiblical Greek these are the most comprehensive terms for invocation of the deity. The sense “to vow” is present as well as “to ask, pray.” The LXX has the word, but here, and even more so in the NT, proseúchomai becomes the main term.

1. “To pray, ask, beseech,” “prayer, petitionary prayer, invocation.” Both noun and verb occur in this sense in Jms. 5:15-16, thus ruling out any magical operation and perhaps implying prayer for forgiveness as well as healing. In 2 Cor. 13:7, 9 Paul uses the term when praying God that the Corinthians may not do wrong and may show improvement. His courteous wish of Acts 26:29 also becomes a prayer when he adds the words “to God”: only God can bring about the conversion of Agrippa and his hearers.

2. “To vow, dedicate,” “vow.” Only the noun occurs in this sense in the NT. We find it in Acts 18:18 and 21:23. The shaving of the head indicates that this is a Nazirite vow (cf. Num. 6:7, 9, 19).

3. The cultic connection weakens with time and eúchomai can thus take on the more general sense of “to wish” or “to ask.” The salutation in 3 Jn. 2 reflects this. So does Paul’s statement in Rom. 9:3, where he could wish (not pray) that he himself might be cut off from Christ for his fellow Israelites. In Acts 27:29 again the ship’s company wish rather than pray that day may come.

B. Prayer in the Greek World.

1. Greek prayer accords with Greek religion, which nonanimistically finds in the gods restricted forces of destiny, so that incantations are secondary in prayer, and sacrifice and prayer have a place in every sphere of life.

a. The Homeric prayers, though often stylistic devices, express this clearly. Homer's heroes are conscious of their dependence on the gods, ascribe to them human impulses and emotions, and come to them in need, e.g., before battle. The favors sought show that humans have some control of life, and even in areas where the gods rule they may be swayed by prayers and offerings that impose an obligation on them, or by promises of future offerings if the prayers are answered. Cultic and moral demands are made, however, in the approach to the gods, though the approach itself is one of intimacy rather than fear.

b. In tragedy we find a greater concern for moral and spiritual blessings, e.g., honesty and piety. Prayer for revenge becomes prayer for just retribution. The stress on moral as well as cultic requirements is stronger.

c. Lyric poetry and philosophy combine eudaemonistic and more purely ethical concerns, e.g., wealth but also protection against pride. Philosophy tries to reduce the eudaemonistic element but in so doing robs prayer of its vitality. Yet Plato reaches a new moral depth, and we begin to find prayer for the remission of moral guilt. In later philosophy prayer becomes more general petition for the good, sometimes as intercession for others. But a note of skepticism arises. A failure of Zeus to answer displays his impotence.

2. Hellenism combines Greek features with Near Eastern influences. The literature again reflects popular thinking and practice.

a. In the Stoic-Cynic diatribe we see that practical monotheism has replaced the earlier polytheism. If prayer is offered to many gods, these represent the one God. Since this God is impersonal, there is no real petition. The requests simply reflect the ideal that is to be sought, and since one can attain this oneself, there is no final need to pray. Prayer for health is repudiated; the gods do not give this, and therefore we should not pray for it. The Zeus of Cleanthes is little more than fate, and the apátheia of the wise makes it impossible for them to invoke the deity. Later we find some return to concrete petition in Marcus Aurelius, but in general he, too, extols prayer for inner development as alone appropriate for the true sage.

b. The mysteries rest on a basis of individual religious life, and in their prayers initiates experience with awe the nearness of the deity to whom they belong by their dedication, who controls their destiny, and from whom they expect salvation. Yet prayer is only penultimate; the vision of God is ultimate. Hence prayer is primarily adoration, then thanksgiving. Prayers for mundane things are rare, there is little concern about guilt, the great aim is to seek escape from natural frailty in ecstasy, and intercession for others focuses on their ignorance (cf. in contrast 2 Cor. 12:1ff.).

c. In Philo and the Wisdom of Solomon the Jewish elements predominate. For Philo only those who pray truly live. The high priest's task is to intercede for the people, humanity, and all creation. The people's strength lies in the presence of the God who answers prayer. Prayer must be with purity and penitence. The prayer for mercy is always heard. But in general God grants only what is good for us. Prayer should be more for moral than material blessings. In Wisdom, prayer gives the soul true freedom, all may pray without fear of rejection, and we have all received so many gifts that thanksgiving is always in order.

d. Inscriptions add little to our knowledge of Greek prayer. We find public petitions for prosperity, thanksgivings for healings, and formulas that seek to use divine power for the purposes of exorcism, medicine, and eroticism.   [H. GREEVEN, II, 775-84]

C. Prayer in the OT.

1. OT Usage. For "to pray" the OT uses the not very common word 'tr, and sometimes pll, but several other words belong to the sphere of prayer.

a. Proper Verbs. For 'tr an original sense "to sacrifice" has been proposed, but in the OT it always means "to pray (to God)" or "to ask (God)." pll also denotes either "to pray" or "to ask for."

b. Other Words. The idea of prayer may also be suggested by terms denoting "to wish," "to present oneself," "to induce God's favor," by various words for speaking or crying, and also by words for sighing, groaning, roaring, and weeping.

c. Prayers of praise and thanksgiving are very common and therefore terms for "to extol," "to magnify," and "to confess" belong to the area of prayer. So, too, do verbs denoting "to murmur," "to meditate," "to reflect," and the group signifying "to exult," "to rejoice," "to make merry."

d. Words for music and singing must also be mentioned, e.g., singing, leading, playing instruments, and making music.

e. hstḥwh, the term for respectful greeting, describes the disposition as well as the attitude of prayer. Even when not followed by prayer, it often denotes the worship of God (Lev. 26:1; 2 Kgs. 5:18, etc.). Prayers of different kinds follow in Gen. 24:26; Ex. 34:8; 1 Sam. 1:28, etc. For its use at great festivals, cf. 1 Chr. 29:20; 2 Chr. 7:3; Neh. 8:6, etc. Kneeling is mentioned as a similar gesture (1 Kgs. 8:54), and we also find standing in prayer (1 Sam. 1:26; Jer. 18:20). The hands may be stretched out to God (Is. 1:15; Jer. 4:31) or lifted up (Ps. 28:2). (For a detailed survey of the Hebrew terms, cf. TDNT, II, 785-90).

2. The Main Features of OT Prayer

a. Prayer and Faith in Yahweh. The OT demands the exclusive worship of Yahweh; hence all prayer is directed to the one God, the covenant God of Israel. Israel is conscious of the might, wisdom, goodness, and faithfulness of this God, but also of his holiness and righteousness. Individuals with their faith share in the faith of the people and therefore in God's relationship with the people. This governs their prayer life, gives it the necessary confidence, and embeds it in the people's history as the history of the ongoing action toward them of their gracious, faithful, and merciful God from whom they may expect future salvation. Faith in this God, however, is faith in the God who is also the world's Creator and Sustainer and disposes of all things in heaven and earth. Yet faith in God does not give overconfidence in prayer. Petitions are supported by confession, appeals to the past, and remembrance of God's mercy. God cannot be taken for granted. He is a living person in his love and wrath. Seeing and hearing all things, he is always the sovereign Lord. Answers, then, depend on his personal counsel and decision.

b. The Content of Prayer. What do Israelites pray for? Since all good things come from the Creator God of Israel, one may ask him and thank him for all things. Bodily affairs play a big role in OT prayers, e.g., in the Psalms. Body and soul being so closely related, bodily goods merge into spiritual. Prayers for the overthrow of enemies are common, whether the enemies are personal or national. These prayers are the outbursts of an oppressed or exiled people (cf. Ps. 137 or Ps. 149), and they express, not just a human desire for revenge, but a concern for divine justice, i.e., the triumph of the good represented by Israel, and the defeat of wickedness represented by her foes. Alongside these requests, we find, of course, passionate cries for such spiritual blessings as forgiveness and the bliss of fellowship with God.

c. Prayer and the Cultus. Prayers are closely related to sanctuaries, sacrifices, feasts, and solemn days (cf. Gen. 12:8; 1 Sam. 1; Dan. 12:11; Is. 56:7). The temple forms a special focus; hands are stretched out to it or to the holy city (Ps. 5:7; Dan. 6:11). Yet prayer is tied neither to the sanctuary nor to the land. It may be offered in foreign countries (Gen. 21:32; 1 Kgs. 17:20) and in one's own home (Gen. 25:21). Daniel prays three times a day (6:11; cf. Ps. 55:17), and we find morning and evening prayers in Pss. 4 and 5. While prayer may accompany sacrifice, it can be rated above it (Pss. 50:23; 69:30-31; 40:6ff.), and songs may be described as spiritual sacrifices (Ps. 107:22). Yet there is no absolute antithesis. Abraham sets up altars when he calls on God (Gen. 12:8 etc.), forms of prayer are given for the offering of firstfruits (Dt. 26: 13ff.), the Psalms often refer to sacrifices in connection with prayers (Ps. 22:25-26), and we find prayers along with sacrifices in Neh. 12 etc. Fasting may also accompany prayer (Jer. 14:12; Neh. 1:4; Ezr. 8:23). Vows of praise as well as sacrifice are made, and Hannah makes a vow of dedication (1 Sam. 1:11).

d. Prayer and Magic. In a few passages words or acts might suggest magical concepts, e.g., Moses stretching out his rod in Ex. 17:9, or Joshua addressing the sun and moon in Josh. 10:12-13, or Elijah stretching himself on the child in 1 Kgs. 17:21, but in all cases prayer to God divests the words or acts of any magical character. Faith in Yahweh crowds out magic, replacing it by true prayer (cf. 1 Kgs. 18:41 ff. and Jms. 5:18).

3. Review of Prayer in the OT.

a. Prayer in the History Books. Specific references to prayer are comparatively few, but it is often implied (Gen. 30:6, 17, 27), and we have some beautiful examples (Gen. 24; 32:10ff.). Moses is depicted as a great intercessor (Ex. 32:11ff. etc.). The short prayers of Samson are forceful and fervent (Judg. 15:18), and Hannah's prayer is a fine instance of quiet outpouring even if couched in more general terms. The David stories contain a magnificent prayer by David in 2 Sam. 7:18ff., and music and song accompany the bringing up of the ark in 2 Sam. 6. From Solomon we have the royal prayer at Gibeon (1 Kgs. 3:6ff.) and the great prayer of dedication (8:23ff.). In the Elijah stories the powerful prayer of 1 Kgs. 18:36-37 stands in contrast to the empty crying of the priests of Baal. In 1 and 2 Chronicles we have many instances of both liturgical prayer (e.g., 1 Chr. 16) and individual prayer (cf. the prayers of Asa and Manasseh). Nehemiah is also a man of prayer (1:4 etc.), and Ezra makes a great impression with his prayer of penitence concerning mixed marriages (Ezr. 9:6ff. and 10:1ff.).

b. The Wisdom Literature. All three friends tell Job to pray (5:8 etc.), and Job himself is faithful, if sometimes critical, in prayer (12:4 etc.; 9:16 etc.; 42:2ff.). Proverbs commends the prayer of confession in 28:13, assures the righteous of God's answer in 15:29, and puts prayer above the sacrifice of the wicked in 15:8. Eccl. 5:2 warns against wordiness in prayer.

c. Prayer in the Prophets. We find here less material than might be expected. The prayers of sinners weary God (Is. 1:15; cf. Am. 5:23-24). He will not hear them (Mic. 3:4). Amos himself prays for the forgiveness of the people and is heard (Am. 7:1ff.), and Hosea issues a call for penitent prayer (14:2ff.). Jeremiah, too, prays for the people (10:23ff.) but is forbidden by God to do so (7:16). He also prays for God's righteous judgments (17:12ff.). True seeking of God, he claims, will lead to finding (29:13-14; cf. Is. 55:6; 58:9; 65:24). Joel calls for a day of penitential prayer (1:14ff.; 2:17), while Jonah offers a prayer of thanksgiving for his deliverance (2:3ff.), summons Nineveh to prayer (3:8), and utters a discouraged prayer for death (4:2-3).

d. The Psalter. This is the great treasury of OT prayer, combining beauty of expression with wealth of content. The prayers are more commonly those of individuals than of the community, but they stand against a cultic background and their highly developed personal piety is embedded in the collective awareness of belonging to God's people. Few of the psalms offer clear evidence of their original cultic use, but all of them show that even when piety is no longer closely tied to cultic observance, it still has its source in public worship. Dominant themes are complaint and grief and the earnest seeking of help from God, but hope and assurance arise out of complaint, and the note of praise and thanksgiving is almost always sounded. The forms and imagery, of course, are in many cases stylized, as may be seen from comparison with Babylonian and Egyptian psalms, but these prayers have a supreme religious force that can derive only from the psalmists' God and that makes the Psalter a universal Christian possession which new converts easily appropriate and from which they learn not only to pray but also to set themselves in the saving history which through the Psalms reaches out into all the world. [J. HERRMANN, II, 785-800]

D. Prayer in the Synagogue. Destroying the temple, the Babylonians helped to force prayer into the center of Jewish piety. Only regular prayer could replace regular worship. This might make prayer superficial, but formulas etc. are regarded less highly by the Jews than other peoples, and a vigorous life pulses through all the forms. Praying two or three times a day is attested (cf. Acts 3:1). Rehearsal of the Shema is a prayer as well as a confession. The chief prayer, which develops early, consists of eighteen benedictions, beginning with three thanksgivings, moving on to petitions for knowledge, penitence, restoration, etc., and closing with a thanksgiving for God's loving rule and prayers for peace. The we-form gives evidence of a continuing sense of community. Prayers are to be offered two or three times a day, and shorter times develop (and may also be earlier). Prayers at table also pre-date the Christian era, but we cannot be too sure about the dating of other fixed forms. There is plenty of scope, of course, for independent prayer, though it is debated whether individual petitions should be put in the eighteen benedictions. Casuistry develops at times regarding individual points, but the prayers of Jesus stand firmly in the context of Judaism, and if he censures the prayer of the time it is only when he finds impure motives (Mt. 6:5), or sees prayer to be a pious mask (Mk. 12:40), or detects in it an impenitent heart (Lk. 18:10ff.). Hardly a clause in the Lord’s Prayer either does not or could not stand in Jewish prayers, and the effective prayer life of Jesus, as the first disciples record it, clearly has its human roots in the rich prayer life of his people.

E. Prayer in the NT.

1. Review, Presuppositions, and Content. In prayer believers draw on the powers of the new aeon as Jesus did in the garden and on the cross. That Jesus was a man of prayer may be seen from his withdrawals for prayer, his blessings at meals, and his prayers at exorcisms and healings. He finds assurance in prayer, prays for his disciples, and gains help in prayer during the passion. In John his prayer at the raising of Lazarus (11:41-42) convinces those around him of his divine mission. His praying is so much an attitude that individual acts are secondary. In view of his unique relation to the Father, his prayers are not put on the same level as those of the disciples. Distinctive of Christian prayer is the certainty of being heard in virtue of God’s love, so that all things may be brought to him (Mk. 11:24). Indeed, the answers exceed the asking (cf. 2 Cor. 12:7ff.). Confidence in prayer lies behind the addressing of God as Father (and even Abba). Prayer for the kingdom is fundamental, but future salvation is so close to present life that one may at the same time pray for daily bread, remission of sins, and deliverance from temptation. Constant prayer is needed because the filial relation to God needs constant renewal. Jesus in giving the Lord’s Prayer does not mean to restrict freedom and yet the text has a certain normativeness, since Jesus is not hostile to formal prayer and the disciples require and request guidance in prayer (Lk. 11:1ff.). In prayer Christians are to avoid selfishness (Jms. 4:2ff.), to remember that this aeon is coming to an end (1 Pet. 4:7), and to honor each other (1 Pet. 3:7). External things can have a place in prayer (Mk. 13:18; Rom. 1:10). Intercession is important, e.g., for the sick and imprisoned (Jms. 5:14ff.; Acts 12:5). Prayer is to be offered for the brethren and even for enemies (cf. Jesus on the cross). Thanksgiving is also an integral part of prayer (cf. the graces at meals, the greetings in epistles, and Paul’s cry in Rom. 7:25). The Spirit is at work in prayer, attesting to us that we are God’s children, and interceding for us in our frailty (Rom. 8:15, 26). Prayer may be offered kneeling (Acts 21:5) or standing (Mk. 11:25). Common as well as private prayer is in order (1 Cor. 14:13ff.; Mt. 18:19 with its special promise for the two or three). Prayer may be offered to Jesus as well as the Father in view of his identification as ký́rios, whether in invocation of Jesus when praying to the Father or in direct prayer to Jesus. Except in Rev. 5:8, 14, however, proseúchesthai and proskyneín are not used with reference to such prayer.

2. The Words Used. aitéō (“to want something”) is not used for Jesus’ own prayers but occurs when Jesus summons his disciples to pray. erōtáō is used in John with an emphasis on intimate fellowship with God; only in 1 Jn. 5:16 does it refer to believers, prayers. parakaléō also posits closeness to the one addressed, e.g., in Mk. 5:10; 2 Cor. 12:8; Mt. 26:53. As in Jewish usage, eulogéō occurs in grace at meals. eucharistéō is the term for thanksgiving. krázein in Rom. 8:15 expresses fervency in prayer. epikaléomai, often used with ónoma, stresses the element of confession (invoking the name) (Acts 9:14; 22:16). But since prayer commonly means petition, the words used most frequently are déomai and déēsis. The former, which may also have a secular sense, almost always denotes petition (Acts 10:2 is the exception); déēsis is more general (cf. Lk. 5:33; Phil. 4:6). A more exclusively religious word group now demands separate treatment.

proseúchomai, proseuchḗ. The construction may be with accusative of object, with hína, or with hypér and perí. The genitive with proseuchḗ usually refers to the one praying, but in Lk. 6:12 to the one addressed. James uses the strong proseuchḗ pros eúchesthai in 5:17.

1. "To pray," "to pray to," "to ask," "prayer," "petitionary prayer." While deísthai almost always denotes asking, proseúchesthai contains no narrower definition of content and refers to calling on God. The nouns are harder to distinguish. Both may denote prayer as a habit or a single act (Lk. 22:45; Phil. 1:4; cf. the plural in Rom. 1:10; Lk. 5:33). The difference seems to be in content; déēsis is more specific (cf. Lk. 1:13 and Acts 10:31). Yet this should not be pressed in view of the deḗseis and proseuchás of 1 Tim. 2:1.

2. proseuchḗ can also denote a "place of prayer," as in Acts 16:13ff., which probably refers to a synagogue (synagogues were often built near water). This use is rare in secular Greek but has been found on an inscription. It occurs in Philo but not in the canonical books of the LXX. [H. GREEVEN, II, 800-808]

→ aitéō, déomai, epikaléō, erōtáō, eulogéō, eucharistéō, proskynéō

euōdía [fragrance]

In secular Greek euōdia has the literal sense of "sweet smell," "scent," e.g., of plants, fruits, wine, ointment, atmosphere, incense, breath. The LXX uses it for the sweet savor of the burnt offering. Philo compares the good influence of the wise to the invisible outflowing of a sweet scent.

1. In the NT Eph. 5:2 and Phil. 4:18 employ the figure of the sweet savor of sacrifice—Christ's offering in the former, the gift of the congregation in the latter—- which also contains the thought of acceptability to God.

2. The meaning is not so clear in 2 Cor. 2:14-15. The idea of the sweet savor of a triumphal procession makes the expression purely metaphorical and does not explain the thought of the scent being to salvation or perdition. Nor can we simply see here the thought that Paul himself is a living sacrifice to God in view of the reference to the fragrance of knowledge. Judaism uses the image of "savor" for the power of the preached word, and since the euōdía is that of Christ, and "to God" rules out the view that euōdía might be a term for God's manifestation, the best explanation is that the aroma is a palpable mark of God's invasion of the world, in grace and judgment, through the sacrificial self-offering of Christ as this is proclaimed by the apostles. [A. STUMPFF, II, 808-10]

ephápax → hápax

echthrós [hostile], échthra [hostility]

While mísos denotes the disposition of hostility and pólemos war, echthrós means "hostility" itself. Hebrew usage is similar.

echthrós.

A. echthrós outside the NT. In classical Greek we find a varied use for personal or impersonal enmity, first only in the passive, then the active. The main LXX use is for Heb. ’ôyēḇ, which itself is almost always rendered echthrós. Yet while the Hebrew denotes both personal and national enemies, echthrós has a more personal reference a. to enemies in war or daily life, b. to enemy nations, the opponents of Israel or its king, c. to the enemies of the righteous, and d. to God’s enemies. Basic to the usage is that Gentiles do not alternate between hostility and friendship but are in constant opposition to both Israel and God (Ex. 23:22), so that defeat of Israel dishonors God (Josh. 7:8), and David’s adultery causes the Lord’s enemies to blaspheme (2 Sam. 12:14). The opposition becomes more purely religious in Is. 1:24 when foes within Israel are at issue. Liberation from enemies is Israel’s hope (Is. 62:8), but ongoing hostility between the righteous and the wicked is a common theme (Ps. 6:10 etc.). For the rabbis opponents include idolaters, apostate proselytes, renegades, and wicked Israelites. Unjustifiable hatred is forbidden but there is a legitimate hatred of foes in the OT sense as those who disrupt the covenant relationship. Josephus speaks of hatred of God in more general Greek terms, while the pseudepigrapha often call the devil echthrós and the rabbis construe the enemy of Prov. 25:21-22 as the evil impulse.

B. echthrós in the NT. The term is used in the NT for personal enemies (Gal. 4:16), but as in the OT and LXX, it is used for the foes of Israel (Lk. 1:71), of Jerusalem (Lk. 19:43), of the NT witnesses (Rev. 11:5), and of believers within their own families (Mt. 10:36). echthrós refers, too, to hostility to God and Christ (Lk. 19:27; Phil. 3:18; Acts 13:10, and cf. the quoting of Ps. 110:1 in Mk. 12:36; Acts 2:34-35; 1 Cor. 15:25; Heb. 1:13; Paul in 1 Cor. 15:25 refers to all the forces that are hostile to God, including death). The reference of Mt. 5:43-44 is to love for the enemies of God and his people (in contradistinction to the older hatred), and the same view may be reflected in 2 Th. 3:15. By nature we are all God’s enemies (Rom. 5:10; 11:28; Col. 1:21; Jms. 4:4). The point is that we hate God (active), although in Rom. 11:28 Jews are both hated (passive) because of the gospel and loved on account of the fathers. The echthrós is the devil in the parable of Mt. 13:24ff. and Lk. 10:19; the devil is the absolute enemy both of us and of God and his kingdom.

échthra. “Hatred,” “hostility” is a disposition, objective opposition, and actual conflict. In the LXX canon the word mostly denotes individual hostility, in the apocrypha national enmity. In the NT hatred is one of the works of the flesh in Gal. 5:20 (cf. Herod and Pilate in Lk. 23:12). Christ, however, has broken down the wall of human hostility (Eph. 2:14). The carnal mind means enmity against God (Rom. 8:7; cf. Jms. 4:4). [W. FOERSTER, II, 811-14]

→ miséō

échidna [viper]

An échidna is a “poisonous serpent” (adder or viper). The only NT instances are in Acts 28:3 and Mt. 3:7; 12:34; 23:33. Paul shakes off the viper unharmed in Acts 28:3. Poison is essential to the comparisons in Matthew, and since the viper is by nature destructive it has to be asked who gave warning of coming wrath, or how good can be spoken, or hell escaped. We should not press the idea of the serpent in paradise or the cunning, self-concealment, or deceptive smoothness of the snake, though there may be some suggestion of its repulsiveness. [W. FOERSTER, II, 815-16]

Heb. Hebrew

échō [to have, hold], antéchomai [to hold fast], apéchō [to keep away], enéchō [to hold fast], énochos [held fast], katéchō [to hold fast], metéchō [to share], metochḗ [sharing], métochos [sharing in], nounechṓs [wisely], symmétochos [sharing with] échō (nounechṓs).

A. échein in Secular Usage. This term means "to have" in various senses, "to have in, on, around, over, or with," "to own," "to enjoy," "to possess." In Greek philosophy it is used with abstract terms, e.g., with qualities or with fellowship, which may be with gods or demons as well as other people (for Christians with Christ or God).

B. échein in the LXX. Hebrew has no single term for "to have," so that échein is comparatively rare in the LXX (some 500 times), mostly with no originals. The use of échein covers all the meanings in classical and Hellenistic Greek, including the having of power, spirit, hope, etc., as well as virtues and fellowship with others or with God. When there is no object, the meaning is "to have property."

C. échein in the NT.

1. The word is common in the NT but its distribution is uneven. It does not occur in Lk. 1-2 or the Sermon on the Mount, is used with above-average frequency in Mark, is less common in the epistles, and is most common in 1 John and Revelation. Almost every meaning found elsewhere is found in the NT.

2. Spiritual Possession. In the Greek world having noús or lógos ("thought or understanding") differentiates humans from animals, which also have psychḗ ("life"). Later we are said to have a part in noús or lógos as a world spirit is thought to pervade the cosmos. In other circles we share in the world spirit (lógos) and have an individual spirit (noús). Another view is that participation means mystical possession. Rev. 8:9 attributes having psychḗ to sea creatures, and Rev. 13:18 uses the noun échein for having understanding (cf. 17:9; Mk. 12:34). In general, then, the NT views the human creature as a trichotomy, but while all have noús, only believers have pneúma. Yet pneúma échein is rare; the point is that we share in the one divine Spirit (cf. métochos in Hebrews). The échein pneúma Christoú of Rom. 8:9 has a strong ethical note, while in 8:11 the Spirit is a pledge of final redemption (cf. 8:23; 2 Cor. 1:23). Ethical and eschatological concerns are also present in 1 Cor. 6:19 and 2 Cor. 4:13. The point of the slightly ironical 1 Cor. 7:40 is that having the Spirit means knowing God's will. If Paul cannot quote Christ himself here, his view carries weight because he is a bearer of the Spirit. In Jude 19 pneúma échein echoes the Gnostic distinction between psychics and pneumatics, possibly turning the Gnostics' own slogan against them. One might have expected pneúma rather than noús in 1 Cor. 2:16 (the "mind" of Christ). Where lógon échein occurs in the NT, the basic sense of lógos is word rather than reason. In Acts 19:38 the thought is that of alleging something, in Col. 2:23 standing at the call of something, and in 2 Pet. 1:19 holding fast the prophetic word. In Jn. 5:38 having God's word means believing and receiving him who is the Logos, the personal revelation of God.

3. Demonic Possession. Greek religion and thought also postulate a demon active within humans. If this daemon is good, we possess it; if bad, it possesses us. Magical papyri suggest means to secure good daemons, ultimately by having their names. In the NT Christ has the seven spirits of God (Rev. 3:1, in the sense of having authority over them; they are "sent out" in 5:6). Mostly, however, having demons means demon possession, i.e., not having authority over them, but bearing them in oneself. Sometimes these are spirits of sickness, e.g., in Mk. 3:22; 5:15; Lk. 4:33; 13:11; Acts 8:7. Jesus is accused of having Beelzebul (the chief demon) in Mk. 3:22. 1 Cor. 2:12 speaks of not receiving the spirit of the world but God's Spirit. daimónion échein in Jn. 7:20; 8:48-49 has the weaker sense "to be out of one's mind."

4. To Have God. This phrase is rare in the NT but is distinctively Christian. The Greek world speaks of fellowship with God as a having, and also says that we are God's possession. Classical texts also contain such phrases as "to have the deity gracious" (cf. the Jewish "to have God as a covenant partner"). The OT refers to Israel as God's possession (Jer. 10:16) and to God as the portion of the Levites (Dt. 10:9). The Psalms are full of similar phrases for the righteous. Jewish writings in Greek develop this into "to have God" (cf. Esth. 4:17). In the NT the Jews say that they have only one Father (God) (Jn. 8:41), though the stress here is on Father. The point in Rom. 1:28 is that the wicked see no value in really knowing God (having him in their knowledge). Col. 4:1 speaks of having a master in heaven, but acknowledgment is again the issue. Only in 1 Jn. 2:23 and 2 Jn. 9 does échein express a distinct relation to God. This relation depends on having Christ (1 Jn. 5:12) and includes reaching God in prayer, enjoying the blessings of forgiveness and grace, and sharing eternal fellowship with him. It comes through having Christ as advocate (1 Jn. 2:1) and high priest (Heb. 4:14-15). The phrase "having God or Christ" is a common one in the apostolic fathers (1 Clem. 46.6; 2 Clem. 16. 1; Ignatius Magnesians 12. 1), and Ignatius speaks of attaining to God by martyrdom. In Clement of Alexandria and Origen the phrase takes on a mystical sense, and it later becomes integral to Christian mysticism.

5. Having Hope. The eschatological orientation of NT Christianity comes out in the phrase "to have hope." Pagans are without hope, but Christians have a solid hope that is grounded in Christ's work and gives a good conscience, boldness, and comfort (cf. Acts 24:15; 1 Th. 4:13; Heb. 10:2; Acts 24:16; Eph. 3:12; Heb. 6:18), for through Christ's advocacy they have redemption and access to God (Col. 1:14; Eph. 2:18). Present possession is a foretaste of eternal salvation (Rom. 8:23; Eph. 1:13). It takes the form of having a reward (Mt. 5:46; Heb. 10:35) or heavenly treasure (Mt. 19:21) or inheritance (Eph. 5:5). All this is summed up in having eternal life (Mt. 19:16; Jn. 3:15; 5:24; 6:40; 10:10; 1 Jn. 3:15; Rom. 6:22). This is the overcoming of death by resurrection (only God has immortality, 1 Tim. 6:16), but it has already dawned (Jn. 5:24; 6:53) as we receive it through the eternal Son (Jn. 5:26; cf. 1 Tim. 4:8). The new dwelling is already prepared (2 Cor. 5:1), so that we may have absolute certainty of hope backed by the Spirit as guarantee (v. 5).

6. Johannine Having. In John we have eternal life even here and now. This concept expresses the richness of the Christian life as not just life in hope but as present possession. It is having God's love (Jn. 5:42), peace (16:33), grace (17:13), light (8:12), life (3:15 etc.), indeed, God himself and fellowship with him (1 Jn. 2:23). We have all these in Christ or as we have Christ (Jn. 5:38).

7. Christianity as Having. In the NT as a whole Christianity is a religion of having and not just seeking. The Jews have the law (Jn. 19:7), knowledge of the truth (Rom. 2:20), and zeal for God (Rom. 10:2), but Christians have Christ, the Spirit, the gifts of righteousness, redemption, peace, and the fellowship with God that means true knowledge. Materially poor, they are thus immeasurably rich (Acts 3:6; 2 Cor. 6:10; Jms. 2:5; 1 Tim. 6:17) in a transvaluation of all values. Yet Christian having is not a merit but a gift that is constantly sought from God and renewed by him. The idea of merit (having something to show) occurs in Rev. 2:6, 25; 3:11, but the thought is different in the proverb in Mt. 13:12 etc., where those who have heard will be granted fuller understanding so long as they also give out what they get (cf. Mk. 4:21ff. and the parable of the talents, Mt. 25:29).

antéchō (-omai). In the active this means "to hold against" and in the middle "to do this in one's own interest," then "to cleave to," "to concern oneself with," "to hold fast." The NT uses only the middle but the concern is for the interests of others (1 Th. 5:14; cf. servant and master in Mt. 6:24). In Tit. 1:9, with a material object, it means "to hold fast."

apéchō. In classical Greek this means a. "to hold off," b. "to have received (what is owed)," and c. "to be distant" (middle "to keep away"). The LXX has b. twice and c. frequently. The NT has b. five times and c. six (also the middle six times). "To receive back" in Phlm. 15 is a special use of b. (cf. Phil. 4:18). The idea of full receiving is important in Mt. 6:2, 5, 16; Lk. 6:24: the disciples await full possession. There are no parallels for the use in Mk. 14:41 (usually rendered with the Vulgate: "It is enough"—but what is enough?). Perhaps the meaning is: "It is out of place."

enéchō, énochos. The classical meaning of enéchō is "to hold fast to something," and of énochos "held fast," "liable," "subject to" (with dative of a law, offense, or penalty), middle "to strive after," "be entangled," LXX "to pursue." In the NT we find "to press" in Lk. 11:53, and "to entangle oneself," "subject oneself" in Gal. 5:1. énochos means "subject" in Heb. 2:15, "guilty" in Mk. 3:29, with genitive of the law or principle in 1 Cor. 11:27; Jms. 2:10 and the penalty in Mt. 26:66, and dative of the local court in Mt. 5:21-22, the progression being from a local court to the supreme court and then to hell (v. 22).

katéchō. This more emphatic form means 1. "to hold fast or back," 2. "to occupy spatially," 3. "to occupy legally," "to possess." A nautical sense is "to steer toward" or "land at." Religiously the term denotes inspiration or rapture with a stress on human passivity. But the group can also be used for imprisonment in service of the deity. The main sense in the LXX is 1. It may be used for states that possess us, and once for spirit possession. Sense 1. also predominates in the NT: a. for one person holding another (Lk. 4:42; Phlm. 13); b. for holding fast values, instruction, or attitudes (Lk. 8:15; 1 Cor. 11:2; 15:2; 1 Th. 5:21; Heb. 3:6, 14): Christians already have spiritual blessings but have to hold them fast to the end; c. for holding illegally (Rom. 1:18; 7:6); d. for restraining (2 Th. 2:6-7, where the restraining force, though first neuter and then masculine, is the same but cannot be identified for certain). Sense 2. occurs only in Lk. 14:9 (occupying the lowest place). Sense 3. may be found in 1 Cor. 7:30 (free for God as though there were no goods), 2 Cor. 6:10 (in poverty possessing all things), and Jn. 5:4 (passive, possessed by illness).

metéchō, metochḗ, métochos, symmétochos. The point of this group is sharing or participation. In Greek thought, it is used for sharing in the "idea," the universal spirit, the higher world, or the deity (as seen in spiritual life, inspiration, and fellowship with God, sometimes extended to the whole cosmos, sometimes after death). The group is rare in the LXX. métochos here often means "companion"; in Prov. 29:10 it means "participant in (guilty of)" the blood of another. Sharing is still the dominant sense in the NT: sharing the fruits in 1 Cor. 9:10, the bread in 10:17, the table in 10:21, our flesh in Heb. 2:14, a right in 1 Cor. 9:12. The NT never speaks of sharing God or Christ, but hints at participation in Christ in Jn. 13:8 ("you have no part in me," ouk écheis méros met' emoú), where one must accept service from Christ to have fellowship with him. In Jn. 14:30 en emoí ouk échei oudén might mean that the ruler of this world has no part in Christ, but the more likely sense is that he has no power over him. metochḗ in 2 Cor. 6:14 means fellowship rather than participation; partnership brings out the idea. métochos in Lk. 5:7 has the LXX sense of colleague. Elsewhere only Hebrews uses it. 1:9 quotes Ps. 45:6-7, where the reference is to Christ's fellows. Christians are his fellows (métochoi) in 3:14 as they share his heavenly call (3:1) and partake of his Spirit (6:4), whereby partnership in the world to come (which belongs strictly to the angels, 1:9), is brought into this period between the aeons. [H. HANSE, II, 816-32]

→ anéchō, anektós, anochḗ, schḗma, héxis

ζ z

záō [to live], zōḗ [life], (bióō [to live], bíos [life]), anazáō [to come to life again], zṓon [living creature], zōogonéō [to give life], zōopoiéō [to make alive]

záō, zōḗ (bióō, bíos).

A. zōḗ in Greek Usage.

1. Classical Usage.

a. zōḗ (zḗn) denotes the physical vitality of organic beings. Life is not a thing but the vitality that characterizes all living things. The whole cosmos can be called a zṓon. Life involves self-movement with its source in the psychḗ, though only sṓmata are living and zōḗ is thus a natural phenomenon like its antithesis, death. The gods have immortal zōḗ. Where the cosmos and deity are equated, the vitality of the whole takes shape in specific organic phenomena. For Aristotle the deity stands outside the cosmos as noús, but even so its enérgeia is still zōḗ.

b. If the zōḗ of deity is related to the noús, this means that zōḗ transcends as well as includes natural vitality. The supreme human possibility is also noús, and this can be achieved only in distinction from the body, though not apart from it. Thus true human zōḗ is not the zōḗ in virtue of which one becomes a zṓon by the unity of body and soul. Psychḗ is the principle of vitality in matter but it is also the principle of selfhood in humans as opposed to matter. Similarly zōḗ is life as a natural phenomenon but also the specifically human life whose possibilities are not fulfilled in organic nature and which has a meaning beyond perpetuation of the species. Human life has its own destiny, knows happiness or unhappiness, is aware of its own possibilities, and is thus faced with the question of what is appropriate to it.

c. In humans zōḗ is thus accompanied by bíos, i.e., manner of life or character (closely related to ḗthos). Relative to animals, bíos denotes species, but relative to humans it denotes individual forms of the species. It can thus be used for the writing of a life (biography) and also denotes life's duration or the means of supporting it. bíos is lived in the pólis and in this respect stands under law (nómos). While bíos is individual, it is not strictly unique; the various bíoi may be classified as types, so that a leading question is that of the normal bíos. Both as bíos and as natural vitality, zōḗ belongs to this world; it is not eschatological except as intermittent achievement of the blessed life of godhead.

2. Hellenistic Usage.

a. Stoicism. For Stoicism zōḗ is the physical life of organic creatures. The whole cosmos is an organism; in humans the general vital force takes individual form. Yet the fulfilment of human life depends on intelligent resolve. The ánthrōpos, being more than zṓon, is asked whether his life is true life or not. Those who do not achieve true humanity are "dead." Natural life has value for us only as the presupposition for the attainment of virtue. The life of rational zṓa may be called bíos, and the question of true bíos is thus a live one, but the pólis is now less important and the bíos of the sage is the norm.

b. Neo-Platonism. With Near Eastern dualism, the anthropological dualism of Plato has an impact here. zōḗ belongs to cosmic psychḗ, yet the human psychḗ has come from above, is a stranger in the body, seeks its true home, and survives death. Thus, while zōḗ derives from noús as psychḗ does, it is a lower rung on the ladder of totality. True life has to be attained by turning from the body in the contemplation in which we are zōḗ and do not just have it. This true zōḗ belongs to the other world. It is not achieved in historical life, yet it is an actual determination to the degree that life is a constant striving for the good.

c. Gnosticism. In Gnosticism zōḗ without attributes characterizes the divine life. The connection with natural life is severed. Life is not the vitality of cosmic being but a basic force of unending duration. It flows down from the divine world and is present in us by means of pneúma, the divine breath. Behind this concept stands the primitive idea of life as a divine fluid that flows into earthly beings from the godhead. In Gnosticism, however, this otherworldly power cannot be received in the earthly world. God is life, living denotes relationship to God, and the divine power of life flows into believers. With light, life belonged to primal humanity, but after the fall into matter it is hampered by the body; only as revelation brings liberation from the body can there be a return to light and life. Life as divine vitality comes as a new birth when there is union with God. It can be experienced in ecstatic vision and in this sense is a physical state, but it is still awaited as the blissful vision of God. If it has to have the character of individuality, liberation from the mortal body severs it from the possibilities of historical human life. As my zōḗ, it can be regarded only as a psychological state, and negatively it can be achieved only by negation. The Odes of Solomon, relating light and life to revelation in the word, sound a more positive note whereby life comes to concrete fulfilment as knowledge of God, joy, and love. [R. BULTMANN, II, 832-43]

B. Life and Death in the OT. In the OT the ideas of life and death stand in the context of Near Eastern ideas but are given a distinctive shape by Israel's faith in God.

1. Life in the OT. The term ḥayyîm covers only physical, organic life, yet it contains a value judgment. Life is good-the supreme good (Job 2:4; Prov. 3:16)-as the presupposition of all else (cf. Eccl. 9:4). Long life is a special grace (cf. Gen. 25:8 etc.), a reward for keeping the commandments (Dt. 5:16 etc.). Life itself comes from God, who breathes the breath of life into our nostrils (Gen. 2:7). The center of life is in the blood (Gen. 9:4). Life, however, has been disrupted. On the one hand it has been shortened (Gen. 6:3), on the other made bitter, by reason of human sin. The tree of life signifies a destiny of eternal life that was forfeited with the fall and expulsion from the garden. More important than the origin of life is the actual relation of life to God, who is Lord of both life and death, who controls the book of life (Ex. 32:32), and who, having given the covenant, determines the preservation or loss of life by the response to his word. Life is not secured by magical rites but by a decision for obedience (Dt. 30:15ff.; 32:47). It does not depend on bread alone but on God's word (Dt. 8:3). Ezekiel develops this theme most sharply with his call for repentance and the associated promise of life. Life is thus understood solely in terms of grace. It is the very basis of salvation and may be had only by faith, by cleaving to the saving God (Hab. 2:4). While it is the enjoyment of blessings on the one side, it is fellowship with God on the other, but either way it is understood as God's gift. The Wisdom books make it their chief aim to offer life, or to lead to life, by a right decision concerning the true order of life. The only difference is that wisdom now replaces God or the word as the source or giver of life. If the view that the word or wisdom confers life in a physical and not just a spiritual sense involves some contradiction with the harsh realities of experience, the OT is aware of this, but can provide a solution only as death is not seen as the irrevocable end of life.

2. Death in the OT. The termination of life by death in old age is accepted as regrettable but natural. The state expected after death is cheerless. Individuality is lost and no reunion is expected. Sacral quality is denied to graves, and corpses are unclean (Dt. 21:23). The dead are excluded from the praise of God (Ps. 115:16-17). Severance from the God of life is the true sting of death (Is. 38:18). If life comes by relation to God, death is lack of any such relation. The perpetuation of the nation, even by restoration (Ezek. 37), is guaranteed by the covenant, but the spell of death rests on individual life.

3. The OT Conquest of Death. Although God is always seen to rule over higher spheres to which he may snatch up the righteous (Gen. 5:21ff.; 2 Kgs. 2:9-10), it is out of stress, and faith in the divine righteousness, that fulfilment of the covenant promise comes to be expected after death (Pss. 16:9-10; 49:16; 73:23ff.; Job 19:25). The concept of grace underlies the assurance stated here. The same concept lies behind Is. 26:19 and Dan. 12:2, though here the righteousness of God means retribution for the wicked as well as ongoing fellowship with God for believers. [G. VON RAD, II, 843-49]

4. The Concept of Life in the OT. If Heb. ḥayyîm corresponds more to bíos (as duration) than to zōḗ, the word nep̱eš, denoting the potency on which life rests, stands closer to zōḗ. The essence of ḥayyîm may be seen in the expressions of life whose subject is nep̱eš, e.g., hunger and thirst, wishes and desires. Yet nep̱eš is not also the subject of the intellectual life, for the concept of life is linked with that of flesh, all living creatures come under the rubric of nep̱eš, and soul and flesh can be used as parallels or combined. While nep̱eš is in us, or in the blood, it cannot be investigated, for it is subject only to God's control (Gen. 6:3, 17 etc.). We have life only as a loan. God is the Lord of life (Ps. 104:29-30). He is its Giver, killing and making alive (Ps. 36:9; Dt. 32:39). He alone has life in himself. We who are mortal can only sustain it by food and toil. For us life is temporal and implies movement, possibility, orientation, and desire. Striving and hope characterize it, as well as hunger and thirst. Mere existence is not life. Sickness is as bad as death (Job 27:15), and healing is life. True life is long and happy. Life is the supreme good; the worst suffering is "unto death" (Jon. 4:9). Death ends life; it cannot fulfil it. Life means self-knowledge; hence the link with light (cf. Eccl. 11:8). Life is individual; death equalizes (Job 3:19). This individuality is present with life itself; it does not not have to be attained by the way one lives, nor does it survive death. Death is a rest (Job 3:17-18), and one may die content when full of days. This present life is true life if long and happy, and by obedience to the law or wisdom one may fashion a long and happy life, thus choosing life and not death. [R. BULTMANN, II, 849-51]

C. zōḗ and bíos in the LXX. Almost always the LXX uses zḗn and zōḗ for the Hebrew terms. bíos does not occur at all in the law and the prophets, and is used in Job, Prov. 3:2, 16, Wisdom, and 2 and 3 Maccabees only for length of life. It acquires an ethical sense only in 4 Maccabees. zōḗ occurs some 278 times, 191 in the canon, 10 times with no original, and 19 times in a free rendering. It first means length of life or vitality as distinct from sickness and death. God is the lord of life and history who smites and heals. Later the life that is a divine gift is eternal life (cf. 4 Macc. 18:18). On earlier burial inscriptions the references are to earthly life, but sometimes OT texts are adduced to support belief in the afterlife (cf. 1 Sam. 25:29; Gen. 3:22ff.; Job 19:25 for LXX suggestions along these lines. also Is. 26:19; Lev. 18:5; Ps. 119; Ps 49.7) (For a full survey cf TDNT, II 851-54.) [G. BERTRAM, II, 851-54]

D. The Concept of Life in Judaism.

1. Palestinian Judaism.

a. Life and Death. Palestinian Judaism maintains the OT concept of life. Humans, as the primary subjects, are living. Life is an extension of natural existence. It depends on nourishment, but God is Lord of life and death, gives life, has put in us the spirit of life, and is invoked as the Father of life. Life is a blessing; it is health and salvation. Long life rewards obedience, but death is better than a miserable life. Since death ends all things, one should use life wisely. God's commands are the commands of life, his words the words of life, the law the tree of life, and we must choose between the ways of life and death. Death is the common lot and does not tarry. All of us fear it, but it brings rest and may at times be desired. Yet it is also a penalty for sin, having come into the world through the first sin and being brought by the devil.

b. Life after Death. Death contradicts individual life. Hence the conviction grows that true life must be eternal as God creates it anew in resurrection. Beliefs vary as to whether the wicked are also raised, what forms the new life will take, and how it fits in with the awaited age of salvation. The Pharisees defend the resurrection academically, while apocalyptic takes it for granted. Eschatological life is not life in a wholly new sense. Freedom from suffering is in keeping with the OT view of true life. The only truly new features are liberation from sin and from present conditions. If there is no dualism, we find a tendency to stress the otherworldly aspects.

2. Hellenistic Judaism.

a. Linguistically zḗn is used for natural life-"to be alive," etc. zōḗ and bíos are sometimes but not always distinguished. One may both bíon zḗn and zōḗn bioún, and both bíos and zōḗ may denote sustenance.

b. The understanding of life is Jewish with Hellenistic modifications. God, the living God and Lord of life and death, gives life. The soul as the bearer of life is immortal. Both zōḗ and bíos denote the leading of life (a Hellenistic modification). True life must accord with a transcendent norm. Death is rest, but in martyrdom it may be a deliberate act and therefore good or glorious. It may even be a liberation of the soul (cf. Josephus The Jewish War 344ff.).

c. Expectation of life after death is widespread, but while the idea of heavenly being is similar to that of Palestinian Judaism, belief in immortality of the soul partly replaces the concept of resurrection, and judgment comes immediately at death.

d. Philo uses zōḗ philosophically for the vital force that is active in the psychḗ. This is common to all zṓa, but humans also have the rational force of inbreathed pneúma. True life is life in knowledge and virtue. Life in the body is bad and a hindrance to the soul, so that true life is apart from the body and will culminate in life after death or ecstatic vision.

E. The Concept of Life in the NT.

1. Natural Life. In the NT zōḗ and zḗn refer first to natural life as distinct from natural death. This life is corruptible and limited but involves movement and ability. To live sometimes means to be healthy (Mk. 5:23; cf. Rom. 7:8). Figuratively things that are efficacious may be called living, e.g., words (Acts 7:38), hope (1 Pet. 1:3), and sacrifice (Rom. 12:1). Power is of the essence of life. Life is a supreme good (Mk. 8:36-37). Jesus puts forth his power to save or restore it (Mk. 5:23; Mt. 9:18). Sinners lose it (Acts 22:22). It is sustained but not assured by food, resting also on the pneúma as the power of the God who has life intrinsically (Jn. 5:26), who lives eternally (Rev. 4:9-10; cf. 1 Tim. 6:16), who is Lord of life and death, who judges the living and the dead (1 Pet. 4:5), and who makes alive through his life-giving Spirit (1 Cor. 15:45). Life is thus dependent on God. It is fulfilled, however, in the manner of leading it, and may thus be qualified adverbially (cf. Lk. 15:13; Gal. 2:14; Tit. 2:12, etc.). bíos can be used for zōḗ in this sense (1 Tim. 2:2), but zōḗ does not first take on meaningful content in bíos (as in Greek thought), for it is responsible before God. Believers do not live for self but for God or the Lord (Rom. 14:7-8). Living for self is living for sin and death (Rom. 6:2). Life stands always under the question of its origin and goal.

2. True Life according to the General NT View. Death is not just a natural phenomenon. It is not self-evident but a punishment for sin. True life, the life of God, is indestructible. Thus the life that is subject to death is only provisional (1 Cor. 15:19). It is life in the flesh (Gal. 2:20). Those who are bound to it are "dead" (Mt. 8:22-23; Eph. 5:14; Rev. 3:1). The true life is future (1 Tim. 4:8). This is zōḗ in the absolute (Mk. 9:43), or zḗn (Rom. 1:17). Being indestructible, it is eternal (Mk. 10:17; Rom. 2:7; Gal. 6:8, etc.), and is linked with salvation. It is inherited, received, or entered (Mk. 10:17; 10:30; 9:43-44). If we may be worthy of it (Mt. 7:13-14), we have no control over it; as natural life is given by creation, true life is given by resurrection. There is no immortality of the soul. God sovereignly ordains to eternal life (Acts 13:48, and cf. the book or books of life in Rev. 13:8; 17:8).

3. The Grounding of Life in Jesus Christ. The new feature in the NT is that the future act of awakening is grounded in the enacted resurrection of Christ. The heart of the Christian gospel is the Easter message that he who was dead now lives (Lk. 24:9; Rom. 6:10; 14:9; 2 Cor. 13:4). This life of his is eternal (Rev. 1:18), and death is thus robbed of its power. Faith in a future zōḗ no longer rests merely on a general concept of God. The concept of God is radicalized, the result of sin is shown to be deeper, and the claim of humanity is more sharply negated. God's gift of new and true life is by a free and gracious act of salvation (Rom. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:7) without which we would be lost. Hope rests on faith in this act (Rom. 1:17). To believe in Jesus is to have life (Jn. 3:15-16). Jesus has brought life and immortality to light (2 Tim. 1:10). He is the author of life (Acts 3:15). We are saved by his life (Rom. 5:10). He is our life, a life hidden with him in God (Col. 3:3-4). In him is life (Rom. 8:2). He is the resurrection and the life (Jn. 11:25), the way, the truth, and the life (Jn. 14:6), the true and eternal life (1 Jn. 5:20).

4. Life Future and present. If future zōḗ is established by Christ's work, this work has already taken place and the resurrection of the dead is simply the consummation of the replacing of the old aeon by the new. Thus zōḗ is not just hoped for; we have it already. It is still future in the teaching of Jesus and throughout the NT. Yet the present is seen in the light of it, and since it is grounded in a completed act, our hope is sure and living (1 Pet. 1:3). In Rev. 2:7, 10 the present is sustained by this certain hope. In Col. 3:3-4 zōḗ is already present but hidden as yet in God. In 2 Tim. 1:1 it is given in Christ. In 1 Tim. 6:12 we are to lay hold of it; it is manifested in the gospel (2 Tim. 1:10). Earthly conditions no longer apply to it (Mk. 12:25). It is a life of joy and glory (Mt. 25:21; 2 Tim. 2:10), free from suffering and decay (Rev. 21:4). Yet it is not wholly different from life as it now is.

5. Paul's View of Life as Present.

a. Paul uses present terms to describe life. The old aeon has given way to the new. Christ is the second Adam, the author of a new humanity, its firstfruits or firstborn (1 Cor. 15:20; Rom. 8:29). If there is a future fulfilment (1 Cor. 15:20ff.), there is also present renewal (Rom. 5: 12ff.). The pneúma is a pledge of the future (Rom. 8:11). Yet the pneúma also means a new manner of life as Christ is present and active in believers, so that their zōḗ is a historical reality here and now. The life-giving pneúma differs from the living psychḗ (1 Cor. 15:45) and is already present, so that if we hope for zōḗ (Rom. 5:1ff.), we also have it, like dóxa (Rom. 8:30; 2 Cor. 3:6ff.).

b. zōḗ is not present in an ideal bíos (as in Stoicism), nor as a substance conferring immortality (as in Gnosticism). For Paul the pneúma is not the noús but the power of God, and the presupposition of reception of the pneúma and zōḗ is the word that proclaims a historical event and that belongs to this event. The word, as God's power to salvation (Rom. 1:16), is the word of life (Phil. 2:16; cf. Acts 5:20). Hence the gospel destroys death and manifests immortality (2 Tim. 1:10). Faith corresponds to the word; it grasps the righteousness of God and the remission of sins which are necessary for life. Thus the pneúma is not our possession but implies that we cannot live on our own. Our true life is Christ living in us (Gal. 2:20). His life is in us (2 Cor. 5:20-21). We live in him (Rom. 6:11). Christ is our life (Rom. 8:2). We have life in relation to his work for us.

c. This true life in the Spirit is at work in the concrete possibilities of life (1 Cor. 7:29ff.). It is freedom from death by identification with Christ's vicarious death. This freedom comes to expression in daily dying, for "dying, behold we live" (2 Cor. 4:8ff.). By living and dying we glorify Christ; our death is gain and our life in the flesh is fruitful labor (Phil. 1:20ff.). Since we belong to God and serve him, our living and dying are relativized, and our possibilities are only mediately such through faith. We walk in newness of life (Rom. 6:4), i.e., righteousness (6:12ff.). The first fruit of life in the pneúma is agápē (Gal. 5:22-23). The walk itself, of course, is not zōḗ, for zōḗ propagates itself by the word and is not limited in time, the télos of zōḗ being also zōḗ (Rom. 6:22). If right conduct alone makes us worthy of eternal life, this conduct springs from the life that is already given and that confers freedom from the law (2 Cor. 3:17), and from sin (Rom. 6:18). Thus zōḗ is both present life and future blessing. The implied transformation (2 Cor. 3:18; 4:16) is not by natural process but by divine action (1 Cor. 15:36ff.) linked to a dramatic cosmic event (1 Th. 4: 13ff.).

d. As future life, zōḗ defies full definition. It is both salvation (Rom. 5:10) and glory (2 Cor. 3:6ff.). Transcending earthly possibilities, it is still somatic (1 Cor. 15:35ff.). It brings with it righteousness, peace, and.joy (Rom. 14:17), face-to-face vision (1 Cor. 13:12), perfect knowledge, and being with Christ in abiding faith, hope, and love.

6. John's View of Life as Present.

a. As the eternal Son and Logos, Christ has life in himself (Jn. 1:4), for he is God's creative power. He yields up his human psychḗ to death (10:11) but his zōḗ (which is the light of men, 1:4) cannot be destroyed. As himself zōḗ, he reveals the God whose command is eternal life (12:50). Giving life to believers, he is the bread of life (6:35) and the light of life (8:12), he gives the water of life (4:10-11), his words are spirit and life (6:63) or the words of life (6:68), and he has come to give life to the world (6:33).

b. Believers in Christ already have life in faith (3:25). They have passed from death to life (5:24). With his word, the hour comes (5:25). He is the resurrection and the life, so that believers in him will live though they die (11:25). He has already given them glory (17:22). Yet this zōḗ has an eternal future (4:14; 6:27) and there is the promise of a new vision of glory (17:24). Express references to an eschatological future occur in 5:28-29 and 6:51ff.

c. By depicting life as present, John does not spiritualize it but radicalizes it. Christ's coming is the decisive event. Life comes by commitment to him. It thus stands under the command of love, for abiding in him is abiding in love (15:1ff., 9ff.). Our love is grounded in God's love (13:34; 1 Jn. 4:7ff.). Love of the brethren shows that we have passed from death to life (1 Jn. 3:14-15). Inwardly, life means an assurance or confidence that drives out fear (1 Jn. 4:18) and a joy of asking (Jn. 16:20ff.) that overcomes sorrow. These are part of the abundance (Jn. 10:10) that comes with the life that is knowledge of God in Christ.

d. If this view seems to resemble the Hellenistic concept, it does so only in a complete radicalizing and restructuring (as in the related issues of truth and knowledge). For it points away from speculation and mysticism to the historical revelation of God in Christ. The egṓ eimi sayings are significant in this regard. If the zōḗ of creation is light, it is so in actuality even though the cosmos resists it (Jn. 1:4-5). The question of zōḗ is an urgent one even in darkness, for all things owe their being to the Logos. People may wrongly think they have found life (5:39-40), but revelation leads from false life to true life. Thus common necessities and metaphors of life (water and bread) are adopted, and the fact that in themselves these do not satisfy the quest for authentic life turns them into a question that the incarnate Logos answers as the one in whom alone real life is to be found.

anazáō. This rare word, meaning “to become alive again,” “to rise again,” is used figuratively in Lk. 15:24 (the prodigal) and Rom. 7:9 (sin), and literally with reference to Christ’s resurrection in Rom. 14:9 and that of the dead in Rev. 20:5.

zṓon. This word for “living creature” (whether the animal or human) is used for animals in Gen. 1:21; Ps. 104:24; Ezek. 47:9; Heb. 13:11. Heretics are compared to irrational creatures (animals) in Jude 10; 2 Pet. 2:12. A special use is for the four heavenly creatures of Ezek. 1:5, 13ff. and Rev. 4:6ff.; 5:6ff.

zōogonéō. Attested from the time of Aristotle for “to make alive,” this word normally has reference to nature or animals, and ultimately to deity. God makes alive in 1 Sam. 2:6. Another use, with humans as subjects, is for “to leave alive” (Ex. 1:17-18; Judg. 8:19; 1 Sam. 27:9ff.). God gives life to all things in 1 Tim. 6:13, while the LXX sense “to leave or keep alive” occurs in Lk. 17:33; Acts 7:19.

zoopoiéō. This word, too, means “to make alive” (animals, plants, deity). God is the usual subject in the LXX (2 Kgs. 5:7; wisdom in Eccl. 7:12). In the NT the term acquires a distinct soteriological sense. The law cannot give life (Gal. 3:21). God gives life to the dead (Rom. 4:17). He will give life to our mortal bodies (Rom. 8:11; cf. 1 Cor. 15:22). He raises Christ (1 Pet. 3:18). This life-giving can have a present reference: God (and Christ) in Jn. 5:21; Col. 2:13; the Spirit in 1 Cor. 15:45; 2 Cor. 3:6; Jn. 6:63. [R. BULTMANN, II, 855-75]

zéō [to boil], zestós [hot], (chliarós [lukewarm], psychrós [cold])

zéō. The basic sense is “to well up,” then “to boil” (cf. the stormy sea, fermenting wine), also “to glow” (figuratively: desire). The LXX has the word for the manna going bad in Ex. 16:20, for a stormy spirit in Job 32:19, for the seething pot of judgment in Ezek. 24:5. In the NT the term finds a special use for being stirred in the Spirit (Rom. 12:11; Acts 18:25). Boiling or glowing seems to be the basis of the metaphor. In Rom. 12:11 we are to develop our energy as Christians, although we can do so only as we are impelled by God’s Spirit. In Acts 18:25 some exegetes see a reference to Apollos’ ardent spirit or fiery eloquence, but in view of the prior mention of his gift of speech (v. 24), what is in view is probably his fervor in the Holy Spirit (as in Rom. 12:11).

zestós (chliarós, psychrós). Apart from psychrós in Mt. 10:42, these three terms occur only in Rev. 3:15-16. The rare word zestós occurs for “cooked” meat, “glowing” sand, and “boiling” water. It has the sense of “hot” as distinct from “tepid” or “cold.” It is unlikely that the sense of zéō in Rom. 12:11 underlies the usage in Revelation. Perhaps the fact that the hot springs of Hierapolis are lukewarm at Laodicea suggests the metaphor, but rabbinic distinctions between the hot and tepid, or sinners, righteous, and lukewarm, are materially more relevant. The point is that the gospel calls for unconditional self-offering to the Lord who even now knocks at the door. A commitment that is rendered lukewarm by secular concerns is worse, and harder to overcome, than complete alienation. [A. OEPKE, II, 875-77]

zḗlos [zeal], zēlóō [to strive after], zēlōtḗs [zealot], parazēlóō [to provoke to jealousy]

zḗlos.

A. zḗlos in Greek Usage. The usual translation of this term is “zeal”: a. as the capacity or state of passionate commitment; b. comprehensively for the forces that motivate personality (e.g., interest, taste, imitative zeal, rivalry, fame, enthusiasm); c. in the bad sense jealousy, envy, competition, contention.

B. Zeal in the OT and Judaism.

1. zḗlos as a human emotion occurs only in the later parts of the OT; all sense of zealous striving to ennoble personality is alien to the underlying Hebrew. a. The term characterizes the living in Eccl. 9:6. It has a derogatory sense in Sir. 30:24 etc.; Prov. 27:4; perhaps Eccl. 4:4. The feeling that gives rise to national hostility is the point in Ezek. 35:11; cf. Is. 11:13. b. Marital jealousy is the reference in Prov. 6:34; Cant. 8:6. c. A special OT sense is that of zeal for God and his will (Pss. 69:9; 119:139).

2. In half of the LXX instances the term denotes the intensity of God's action, whether this means good or ill for those concerned. It is linked with anger in Dt. 29:20, with fire in Zeph. 1:18, and with compassion in Is. 63:15. God's zeal (qin'â), which is more commonly mentioned in the OT than zḗlos might suggest, relates primarily to Israel. Expressing God's holiness, his zeal turns against the apostasy of Israel (as jealousy at her adultery), but when the nations seek to disrupt his plan for Israel, his zeal is displayed either historically or eschatologically on her behalf (cf. Ezek. 16:38 on the one side; Ezek. 36:6; Is. 9:7; 26:11; Zech. 1:14; Zeph. 1:18 on the other). Its combination with "Lord of hosts" (Is. 9:7; 2 Kgs. 19:31) shows that zḗlos is closely related to the concept of Yahweh as the Lord of history.

3. Philo uses zḗlos for human striving after things along the lines of Greek ethics. The term may be predicated of God only for the sake of those of lesser intelligence.

4. The rabbis, too, find it hard to speak about God's zeal for fear of anthropomorphism. God is a jealous God, not because he envies idols as rivals, but because he cannot allow his honor to be infringed by idolatry.

C. zḗlos in the NT.

1. In the NT the word is in the singular except in Rom. 13:13 and Gal. 5:20. It occurs in the Gospels only in Jn. 2:17 (quoting Ps. 69) for the zeal of the righteous. This is also the point in Jewish zeal against Christianity in Acts 5:17 and possibly 13:45 (cf. 17:5). Zeal for God is what Paul has in mind in Rom. 10:2, though when misplaced this turns against itself (v. 3). Paul earlier shared this zeal when persecuting the church (Phil. 3:16).

2. In 2 Cor. 11:2 we find a sense similar to that of the OT (cf. 1 Cor. 10:22). As God seeks with holy zeal to keep his people from idolatry, so Paul jealously watches over the church lest it fall into error.

3. Elsewhere zḗlos has the ordinary Greek senses: a. enthusiasm for the collection in 2 Cor. 9:2 and an ardent desire to restore good relations in 2 Cor. 7:7; b. in connection with such words as quarreling, anger, etc., competitive envy or jealousy (Rom. 13:13; 1 Cor. 3:3; 2 Cor. 12:20; Gal. 5:20); c. consuming ardor (of fire) (Heb. 10:27).

In the apostolic fathers, zḗlos (envy) is an important word in 1 Clement and Cyprian, who depict the evils of envy, but Chrysostom in his homily on 2 Cor. 12:21, while condemning divisive zḗlos, finds high ethical value in imitative zḗlos.

zēlóō, zēlōtḗs.

A. The Greek Usage. In Greek zēlóō is mostly in the active and means "to admire or commend," with such nuances as "to be enthusiastic for," "to seek to imitate," "to envy" in a good sense; yet we also find the bad sense of "to envy" and an occasional use for jealousy in marriage.

B. The Usage in the OT and LXX.

1.a. The most consistent use is in Proverbs, where it means "to strive after," though commonly with a warning not to do so (3:31; 4:14, etc.; but cf. 6:6). b. Wrathful indignation is the point in 1 Macc. 2:24 (cf. Ps. 73:3, 21-22), envy in Gen. 26:14, and zeal on behalf of the people in 2 Sam. 21:2. c. The only instances of jealousy in marriage are in Num. 5:14, 30.

2.a. God is jealous in Ex. 20:5; 34:14. This jealous zeal is not a mood but belongs to God's very essence. It turns against Israel in case of disobedience (Dt. 32:19) but may also work in her favor (Ezek. 39:25). It is bound up with the manifestation of God's omnipotent reality (Ezek. 39:28). b. The righteous may be zealous on God's behalf, not in mood, but in specific action (Num. 25:11; 1 Kgs. 19:10, 14; 2 Kgs. 10:16; 1 Macc. 2:24).

C. Zealotism.

1. Zeal for God and his law and honor is in keeping with the basic orientation of Pharisaism and comes to violent expression in the movement of Zealotism. The Zealots make active zeal for God the determinative factor in their whole conduct.

2. The origins of Zealotism are obscure. It derives from Pharisaism and takes shape when Judas of Galilee joins Zadok in resistance to Roman rule. Phinehas is taken as the prototype of the Zealot. At first Pharisaism tends to side with Zealotism but diverges from it when Zealotism becomes a more revolutionary and anarchical movement.

3. The fact that the first disciples include a Zealot points to some link between Zealotism and Palestinian Christianity (though not in respect of social action). Gamaliel adopts the same principle in relation to both (Acts 5:34ff.). The distinction may be seen when Zealots plot to murder Paul in Acts 23: 12ff. Zealotism is activist, seeking to set up the rule of God by revolt, displaying a readiness to suffer to this end, and passionately trusting that God will intervene to insure success. A saying like Mk. 8:34-35 is immediately understandable in the context of Zealotism, and a question like that of Mk. 12:13ff. arises in the same context, though Zealots would reply with a definite negative. The sons of Zebedee manifest Zealot traits in Lk. 9:54 and Mk. 10:38-39 (cf. their name in Mk. 3:17). Rev. 13:4ff. also reflects a Zealot hostility to alien domination. The application to Rome of OT prophecies concerning Edom and Babylon may also indicate Zealot influence (cf. Rev. 18:2-3, 9ff.). Yet Christians could not stay in Jerusalem when Zealot rule was established, not merely because the Zealots were now becoming revolutionary fanatics, but because of basic incompatibilities, e.g., the Christian command to love one's enemies, or Christ's understanding of his crucifixion as the fulfilment of his divine mission.

D. zēlóō and zēlōtḗs in the NT.

1. A first meaning is that of zeal for God. a. The disciple Simon is called zēlōtḗs in Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13; this denotes membership in the Zealot party. b. This zeal may find expression in hostility to Christian preaching (Acts 17:5). Paul had been one of these zealous Jews (Gal. 1:14). Christian Jews may still be zealous for the law (Acts 21:20).

2. zēlóō may also denote the apostle's personal attitude to the community, as in 2 Cor. 11:2. Paul's strong concern is to woo believers to obedience to the gospel. In Gal. 4:17 Paul's opponents manifest zeal for the welfare of the Galatians, but only for a selfish purpose; in contrast, the apostolic zeal of Paul is good, for it is for a good purpose.

3. The usual Greek sense "to strive after something" may be seen in Tit. 2:14 and 1 Pet. 3:13, not along the lines of individualistic ethics, but with a view to edification (cf. striving after gifts in 1 Cor. 12:31; 14:1). In 1 Cor. 13:4 and Jms. 4:2, however, there is no thought of edification and thus the sense of envious or passionate striving is apposite. [A. STUMPFF, II, 877-88]

zēmía [loss, hurt], zēmióō [to suffer loss]

zēmía originally meant "disadvantage" and zēmióō "to disadvantage."

1.a. Disadvantage may take the form of monetary or material "loss" or "damage." b. It may also be moral or spiritual in the sense of "hurt" or "ruin," with a subjective nuance of "unpleasantness." c. Legally zēmía early takes on the sense of "penalty" and zēmióō "to punish."

2.a. Underlying 2 Cor. 7:9 is sense 1.b. Paul is responsible for the welfare of the church, and it should not suffer hurt through his fault. The same sense is probable (rather than "penalty") in 1 Cor. 3:15 in contrast to the reward of v. 14. What is at issue is "hurt'" or "loss" in a general sense, not in a financial sense or as loss of salvation (cf. the continuation). The point in Phil. 3:7-8 is not objective loss but subjective loss of value. For Paul all value now lies in Christ, and therefore things that were once highly estimated (his zeal and legal righteousness) are now regarded as worthless. The idea is not that they are harmful to his new Christian life, and there is certainly no thought of punishment.

b. In the one instance in the Synoptics (Mt. 16:26; par. Mk. 8:36; Lk. 9:25), the antithesis "gain" suggests the commercial figure of profit and loss. To gain the whole world one must lose (i.e., pay the price of) the self-a poor exchange. Gaining the world may refer to material goods (cf. Mt. 4:8-9) or just possibly to missionary success (cf. Mt. 6:2). The loss takes place here and now, but if final judgment is also implied the term carries some sense of punishment (though cf. the equivalent "to forfeit" in Lk. 9:25). [A. STUMPFF, II, 888-92] zētéō [to seek], zḗtēsis [debate], ekzētéō [to seek], epizētéō [to seek] zētéō.

1. Religiously this term denotes first the seeking of what is lost by the Son of Man with a view to saving it (Lk. 19:10; Mt. 18:12; Lk. 15:8). But it can also refer to God's requiring much from those to whom much is given (Lk. 12:48), or fruit from the tree (Lk. 13:6-7), or faithfulness from the steward (1 Cor. 4:2), or true worship from the righteous (Jn. 4:23). From this twofold use we see that the divine seeking involves at the same time a divine claiming. In John 8:50 the point seems to be that the Father looks after the glory of the Son and will judge those who refuse him recognition.

2. In many instances human seeking is the point. The basis here is the Greek use of zētéō for philosophical inquiry (cf. 1 Cor. 1:22; Acts 17:27) and the LXX use for seeking God (cf. Rom. 10:20). The seeking of God in prayer in Mt. 7:7ff. follows LXX usage. Seeking covers the broader orientation of will: the seeking of God's kingdom and righteousness (Mt. 6:32-33), the seeking of things above (Col. 3:1), the seeking of the great goal of life (Mt. 13:45), the seeking of justification (Gal. 2:17). Such seeking can be perverted into the request for a sign whereby the demand of the gospel may be evaded (Mk. 8:11-12).

zḗtēsis. On the basis of the Greek use for philosophical investigation, this word occurs in the NT for "debate" or "dispute," the accent now being on the manner of inquiry. In Jn. 3:25; Acts 15:2, 7; 1 Tim. 6:4 we seem to have an exchange of words rather than true search. General disputing is at issue in 2 Tim. 2:23, and here (as in 1 Tim. 6:4 and Tit. 3:9) the disputes are useless, foolish, harmful, and incompatible with true faith and assurance. The context in Acts 25:20 suggests a legal sense ("investigation"). There are no clear instances of the use for "clash of opinions" in the pre-Christian era, and the word does not occur in the LXX or apostolic fathers.

ekzētéō. This compound means the same as the simple form. As in the LXX, seeking God is the point in Acts 15:17; Rom. 3:11; Heb. 11:6. The element of search is stronger in 1 Pet. 1:10, but the seeking is more general in Heb. 12:17. Eschatological requiring or demanding of justice is the point in Heb. 11:50-51. The eschatological element distinguishes it here from the Hebrew usage on which it is based (e.g., 2 Sam. 4:11).

epizētéō. This word, too, means the same as zētéō. Thus the Gentiles seek material things (Mt. 6:32), while the Jews seek righteousness (Rom. 11:17), and Sergius Paulus seeks to hear God's word (Acts 13:7).

---

par. paragraph

In Hebrews the OT saints seek a heavenly country (11:14) and Christians an eternal city (13:14). “Look for” and “desire” are the meanings in Acts 12:19 and 19:39. [H. GREEVEN, II, 892-96]

zygṓs [yoke, scales], heterozygéō [to be unevenly yoked] zygṓs.

A. zygṓs. in the LXX.

1. The normal LXX use is for “scales” or “yoke.” For scales in the secular sense cf. Ezek. 5:1 (division), Is. 46:6, and Jer. 32:10 (weighing). God weighs the universe in Is. 40:12, and demands just weights in Lev. 19:35; Ezek. 45:10; Hos. 12:7; Am. 8:5; Prov. 11:1; 16:11. Scales symbolize justice when given to Dan (cf. Gen. 49:16). For a moral use cf. Sir. 21:25; 28:25 (the measuring of words).

2. A significant figurative use is found for destiny and human worth. Job’s sufferings weigh more than the sand (i.e., they cannot be measured) (6:2). We ourselves are to be weighed (Job 31:6; cf. Mic. 6:11). We count for nothing in God’s sight (Ps. 62:9,; cf. Is. 40:15). Belshazzar’s kingdom, when weighed, is found wanting. Though the LXX translates this differently, the idea of weighing in judgment occurs in many apocryphal and apocalyptic texts.

3. The image of the “yoke” is also common in the LXX. It denotes political tyranny in 2 Chr. 10:4ff. (cf. Gen. 27:40) and alien rule in Is. 19:10; 14:29; 47:6; Dan. 8:25. Deliverance is the taking away of the yoke in Is. 9:3 and its breaking by God in Lev. 26:13 (cf. the false prophecy in Jer. 28:2, 4, 11). In the moral sphere, slaves must be under the yoke (Sir. 30:35), one must avoid the yoke of the tongue (28:19), but it is good to accept the yoke of wisdom (51:26). Sinners do not want to bear God’s yoke (Jer. 2:20) but finally the nations will bear it gladly (Zeph. 3:9). The suffering of the righteous is construed as God’s yoke (cf. Mt. 11:29-30). [G. BERTRAM, II, 896-98]

B. zygós in the NT.

1. In Rev. 6:5 the third horseman (on the black horse) has “scales” in his hand. He symbolizes scarcity as a sign of impending judgment (cf. Lev. 26:26).

2. Elsewhere in the NT zygós means “yoke,” but is used only figuratively in the general sense of absolute dependence. a. In 1 Tim. 6:1 the word expresses the situation of slaves; where the masters are Christians, the legal situation is the same but the personal relation is determined by their love as brethren, which adds a new dimension to service. b. The yoke of slavery has figurative significance in Gal. 5:1: Having escaped bondage to the elemental spirits (4:8ff.), believers should not submit to the yoke of the law but enjoy the freedom of sonship that Christ has conferred. The use in Acts 15:10 is similar: Gentile Christians are not to be put under the yoke of the law. c. In Mt. 11:29-30 Jesus invites those who labor and are heavy laden to take his easy yoke upon them. The apparent paradox (how can a yoke be easy?) vanishes when one considers that this is the yoke of the Messiah who offers free access to God to all who accept his call. Parallel rabbinic sayings refer to the putting off of the yoke of government by acceptance of the yoke of the law, or of coming under the yoke of earthly rule by breaking the yoke of heaven, but with the distinction that human achievement is here presupposed (though the divine yoke is regarded as a privilege rather than a burden), and that the yoke of Christ does not stand in such absolute antithesis to that of earthly government (cf. Mt. 22:15ff.). d. The apostolic fathers adopt the metaphor of the yoke, e.g., in Did. 6.2 (more legalistically) and Barn. 2.6 (characterizing the new law of Christ as gift rather than obligation).

heterozygéō. This word derives from heterózygos, “unequally yoked” (e.g., the yoking of an ass and ox). It occurs for the first time in 2 Cor. 6:14, where Paul uses it to describe the abnormal situation that results when Christians fail to maintain their distinction from unbelievers. [K. H. RENGSTORF, II, 898-901]

zýmē [yeast, leaven], zymóō [to ferment], ázymos [unleavened]

1. The NT usage rests on the Feast of Unleavened Bread and its rules in Ex. 12:18 (cf. 13:6-7; Num. 28:16-17; Dt. 16:3-4). The origin and meaning of this feast and its precise relation to the one-day Passover are hard to determine.

2. The feast itself is mentioned in Mk. 14:1, 12 (cf. Mt. 26:17; Lk. 22:1,7) and twice in Acts (12:3; 20:6). The ázyma are the seven days following the evening of the Passover, though the Passover itself is sometimes called the first day of an eight-day feast (Mk. 14:12). It is not clear why the accounts of the last supper do not mention the eating of unleavened bread which was part of the Passover ritual (cf. Ex. 12:18). Is ártos used instead?

3. The ázyma ritual underlies 1 Cor. 5:6ff., where Paul (perhaps writing at the Passover season) gives the cultic demand a moral significance. zýmē denotes the moral impurity of the old life, ázyma liberation from this and therefore the truth and purity of the new life. The ideas of oldness and newness are introduced by the thought of conversion (cf. Rom. 7:6; Col. 3:9-10), while allegorizing suggests the idea of sin as leaven in the dough, and the whole metaphor opens up exciting vistas, e.g., the ázymoi as the new festal community, the new life as the feast, and Christ as the paschal lamb who both demands renewal and makes it possible. We have a good example of Paul's combining indicative and imperative in v. 7. Philo has several allegorical interpretations of ázyma and zýmē. Thus eating ázyma symbolizes asceticism, and tá ázyma is a symbol of humility and zýmē of pride or sinful lust. But Philo has no powerful injunction to cleanse out zýmē (which on occasion may indeed denote the lawful elevation of the soul). Plutarch, too, finds in zýmē a symbol of uncleanness and compares the process of leavening to defilement, so that Paul's metaphor would be readily understandable to Gentile Christians not so well versed in the OT.

4. In the parable of the leaven in Mt. 13:33 (Lk. 13:21), Jesus makes the more general point that a little cause can have great effects (cf. Jms. 3:3ff.). Here the kingdom itself is compared to zýmē. Though quantitatively small, it can penetrate the whole earth (cf. the salt in Mt. 5:13).

5. In contrast is the figurative warning of Mk. 8:15; Mt. 16:6; Lk. 12:1 against the zýmē of the Pharisees (and Herodians and Sadducees). The reference here is obviously to the corrupt and corrupting element in the teaching of these opponents of Jesus, though in itself zýmē is possibly neutral, the emphasis being on the qualifying genitive or genitives. There is no parallel for this kind of use in the LXX, which employs the group only in rules for the feasts and sacrifices (Ex. 12:15; 23:18; Dt. 16:3-4, etc.).

→ ártos, páscha [H. WINDISCH, II, 902-06]

zōḗ, zōogonéō, zṓon, zōopoiéō → záō[4]

η ē

hēgéomai [to lead, think], exēgéomai [to expound], proēgéomai [to outdo], diēgēsis [narrative] hēgéomai.

[4]Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (267). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

1. This word means a. “to lead,” b. “to think,” “believe,” “regard as.” In the NT it occurs in sense a. only in the present participle (see 2.), but is widespread in sense b. (though not found in the Johannine writings). “To esteem” is the point in 1 Th. 5:13 (as in Thucydides 2.89.9).

2. a. hēgoúmenoi (mostly plural) is used for community leaders in Heb. 13:7, 17, 24. These are examples of faith (v. 7) and pastors responsible to God (v. 17); they are thus to be obeyed (v. 17), and are mentioned before the saints (v. 24). Yet according to Lk. 22:26 the hēgoúmenos is to be as one who serves—a necessary check on officialdom. Judas and Silas are called “leading men” among the brethren in Acts 15:22.

b. hēgoúmenoi can also be leaders outside the community, e.g., military leaders in 1 Macc. 9:30, national leaders in Ezek. 43:7, princes in 1 Clem. 5.7, leading priests in the papyri. Quoting Mic. 5:1ff., Mt. 2:6 has the term for a national ruler, and Acts 7:10 has it for Joseph as the governor of Egypt. A common predicate of Hermes is adopted when Paul is called the hēgoúmenos toú lógou in Acts 14:12 (cf. Hermes as theós ho tṓn lógōn hēgemṓn).

exēgéomia. Of the two meanings a. “to introduce,” “adduce,” and b. “to expound,” “recount,” the NT uses only b. (Jn. 1:18; Lk. 24:35; Acts 10:8; 15:12; 21:19). The word is a technical one for the exposition of poetry, law, oracles, etc. In Jn. 1:18, where there is no object, the sense is “to reveal.”

proēgéomia. This occurs in the NT only in Rom. 12:10. Since it can hardly mean “to take the lead” or “to go first,” we do best to see it in analogy to Phil. 2:3 and render “to esteem more highly” (cf. 2 Macc. 10:12).

diḗgēsis. In Lk. 1:1, Luke refers to those who have undertaken to compile a “narrative” of the things concerning Jesus. The word is used from the time of Plato for an oral or written “record.” Attempts to give diégēis a special sense in support of the theory that random extracts form the basis of the present Gospels have met with little success. [F. BÜSCHEL, II, 907-09]

hēdonḗ [pleasure], philḗdonos [lover of pleasure]

In the NT hēdonḗ is one of the many forces of unsanctified carnality that work against God and drag us back into evil.

A. General Greek Usage. 1. Semasiological Development. a. Derived from the root hēdýs (“sweet,” “pleasant,” “delightful”), hēdonḗ first means what is pleasant to the taste, then to the senses in general, then what gives pleasure. b. The word then comes to mean the “desire for pleasure” (cf. Jms. 4:1 and perhaps Tit. 3:3). c. A final development is for that which kindles desire or pleasure (e.g., good news), or for pleasure with an enumeration of the pleasures at issue, with a tendency in the NT period to take on the sense of “sensual lust.”

NT New Testament

v. verse

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

cf. confer, compare

2. Ethical Evaluation. For the Greeks, hēdonḗ is ambivalent. It belongs to bíos and enriches it, yet it may also threaten and dissolve its true meaning. In Plato and Aristotle it may be noble pleasure in the good, true, and beautiful, and thus equivalent to chará (joy). But it may also be sensual pleasure, and hēdonokrasía is surrender to a life of dissipation. The restriction of meaning brings a decline in estimation and makes it the opposite of aretḗ.

B. hēdonḗ in Greek Philosophy.

1. In philosophical anthropology hēdonḗ (as the opposite of lýpē) is one of the emotions or a result of one of the emotions.

2. In philosophical ethics the basic question is whether it is a virtue, whether it may be the goal of life, whether it conforms to what is rational, or whether it promotes virtue. For Socrates, it is part of the felicity based on virtue so long as it remains within self-control and is in harmony with other forms of the good. For Aristotle, too, hēdonḗ is good if it springs from a virtuous life. Others, however, regard hēdonḗ either as wholly good (Aristippus and later Epicurus), or as wholly bad (Antisthenes). The Stoics, who keep it on the periphery, prefer to call the pleasure that results from virtue either chará or euphrosýnē.

3. Conformity to nature, reason, or virtue is the criterion when value is assigned to hēdonḗ. Aristotle posits harmony between true hēdonḗ and nature, reason, and virtue; yet he makes hēdonḗ subsidiary to all three. The Cyrenaics and Epicureans ascribe a higher role to hēdonḗ as the fulfilment of nature, reason, and virtue. The Stoics question whether hēdonḗ is really in accord with nature and reason. Aristotle, of course, has to distinguish between higher and lower hēdonaí, and while Epicurus states that bodily pleasure is the original seat of spiritual joy, he, too, recognizes that sensual pleasure is not at all the true goal of life. The critical attitude of the Stoics, along with increasing pessimism, helps to produce later a mostly negative evaluation.

C. hēdonḗ in Jewish Literature.

1. In the LXX, the term is rare. “Pleasant taste” is the sense in Num. 11:8; Wis. 16:20. The closest to the usual sense is Prov. 17:1. “Sexual desire” is the point in Wis. 7:2.

2. 4 Maccabees is an exception, forming a bridge to the use in Greek philosophy. hēdonḗ here may be ethically neutral pleasure, but Stoicism is evident where it is the seat of evil impulses, as in 1:25. Yet along OT lines hēdonḗ refers to both body and soul (1:28).

3. Philo is close to 4 Maccabees. For him the seat of hēdonḗ is the body. As the source of many evils, it is in antithesis to the lógos and consists primarily of sensual pleasure.

4. In the rabbis there is no exact equivalent for hēdonḗ, but teaching on the evil impulse offers interesting similarities to the extent that both cover the element of desire and the pleasures of the evil impulse are sweet.

D. The Nonbiblical Use of philḗdonos.

LXX Septuagint

OT Old Testament

1. In relation to persons this means “intent on pleasure,” with nuances similar to those of hēdonḗ. Philo, thinking theologically, contrasts philḗdonos and philótheos; Epictetus, thinking anthropologically, contrasts philḗdonos and philánthrōpos.

2. In relation to objects the meaning is “bringing pleasure.”

E. hēdonḗ in the NT. The following secular meanings may be found in the NT too: a. “pleasure” (2 Pet. 2:13); b. “desire for pleasure” (Jms. 4:1); c. “sensual pleasure” (Jms. 4:3; Lk. 8:14).

1. The Origin and Nature of hēdonḗ. hēdonḗ marks a non-Christian orientation to life. It belongs to the sphere that is ruled by ungodly forces: bíos in Lk. 8:14, this aeon in Mt. 13:22. In Jms. 4:1-2 hēdonái are in the service of sin and stand in contrast to the chará which is the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). hēdonḗ comes under the same judgment as fallen human nature. It is one of the basic NT antitheses.

2. hēdonḗ and Man’s Relationship to God.

a. hēdonḗ stands opposed to God. Those who disrupt the church in 2 Tim. 3:4 are lovers of pleasure (philḗdonoi) rather than lovers of God philótheoi). Love of the world is enmity against God, and yielding to hēdonái is disloyalty to him (Jms. 4:1ff.). It influences our relation to God’s will and word and to prayer.

b. Human hēdonḗ opposes God’s will, for we live either according to this will or our own desires (cf. 1 Pet. 4:2). Cf. the evil impulse in the rabbis.

c. It struggles, then, against God’s word (Lk. 8:14), which epithymíai are said to choke in Mk. 4:19. Cf. again the rabbinic evil impulse.

d. What is said to God (in prayer) is also adversely affected by hēdonḗ, as we read in Jms. 4:3, where we ask amiss if we make carnal hēdonaí the object of prayer. The attitude of unbridled earthly desire is contrary to the attitude of true prayer, which waits on God and seeks only what can be asked in the name of Jesus. The prayer that is based on hēdonḗ moves in a futile circle which leads only to new hēdonḗ and ends only with death (Jms. 4:1, 3).

3. hēdonaí and Man.

a. hēdonaí are the enemy of man no less than God, as we learn from the three biblical images that describe their operation: conflict, slavery, and thorns. hēdonaí bring constant conflict (Jms. 4:1ff.) instead of the peace (peace with God and peace of soul, Rom. 5:1; 15:13) that we have in Christ. This conflict is with God (Jms. 4:4), with others (v. 1), and probably with the self as well (v. 2; cf. Gal. 5:17; 1 Pet. 2:11; Rom. 7:23). Parallels for this inner conflict may be found in Thucydides, the rabbis, Philo, and Hermas among the apostolic fathers. In James, however the main stress is on the conflict with others.

b. If we will not fight hēdonaí, or are defeated by them, we become their slaves (Tit. 3:3). They are masters that rule instead of God or Christ. The same image of bondage to hēdonḗ may be found in Plato, the rabbis, and Philo, all of whom advocate resistance to desire, which may take the form of logismós in 4 Maccabees, study of the law in the rabbis, or prayer and submission to God in the NT.

c. The third image brings out the destructive nature of hēdonḗ (Lk. 8:14), for, as thorns choke the seed, so hēdonaí bring death to those who yield to them (cf. Rom. 6:23; Hermas Similitudes 8.8.5, and rabbinic teaching on death as the final end of the evil impulse).

4. The Bearers and Victims of hēdonḗ.

a. Among the three groups that fall victim to hēdonḗ in the NT, non-Christians are the most numerous (Tit. 3:3). hēdonḗ is one of many terms that the NT uses to describe the state prior to faith (cf. ágnoia, átheoi without hope, etc.). The lists of vices enumerate what is covered by the term.

b. The second group consists of double-minded Christians as these are best described in Jms. 4:1ff. Parallel to this group are the people in Lk. 8:14 who for a time are open to the work of the word but then fall away, not now because of external pressures, but because of the opposing impulses to which they submit.

c. Finally, there is the group of false teachers who are characterized more by bad living than bad doctrine (2 Tim. 3:4) and whose presence is an indication of the last time (cf. Jude 18). 2 Pet. 2:13 offers the most exact delineation of this third group. hēdonḗ here is more than pleasure in a general sense. It is voluptuousness—taking delight in revelings by day, i.e., in carousing and intemperance (cf. Phil. 3:19). This stands in the sharpest possible contrast to the joy which in the NT, too, is a supreme thing both in this life and the next, but which is promoted, not by hēdonaí, but by the fellowship with Christ in trials and afflictions (Jms. 1:2) that has perfection and eternal bliss as its end. [G. STÄHLIN, II, 909-26]

hḗkō [to come]

Formally a present, this word denotes a state and thus has the force of a perfect, although still used in the present for "to come." An aorist was constructed in the Hellenistic period (hḗxa). In the papyri we find the meanings "to come to," "to turn to," "to resolve on," and "to attain." The term is important cultically for the coming of deity, especially to cultic participants, and conversely for the coming of these participants to deity. Cultic as well as local use may be found in the LXX, e.g., coming to God in prayer or sacrifice, and God's coming (sometimes eschatological) to redeem or to judge (cf. Ezek. 7:2). In the age of salvation the Gentiles will come and see God's glory (Hag. 2:7). The last time also comes (Ezek. 7:2ff.). Heavy blows (and good things too) come on us during our lives. Josephus has the word for the coming of a point in time (Jewish War 7.323). The main use in the NT is for the final coming of God in salvation and judgment. Jesus looks forward to the future of the kingdom in which Gentiles will share (Mt. 8:11; Lk. 13:29). The end will come after the gospel is preached (Mt. 24:14). Christ will come like a thief (Rev. 3:3; cf. 2:25). 2 Pet. 3:10 refers to the terrible events that will accompany the Lord's coming, and Rev. 18:8 speaks of the plagues that come on Babylon. Days of destruction will also come on Jerusalem (Lk. 19:43). In John hḗkein, like érchesthai, is used to express epiphany. Jesus has come forth from God (8:42). In 2:4 his hour has not yet come. We know that the Son has come (1 Jn. 5:20). At the same time those whom the Father gives will come to him (Jn. 6:37). The Jews in Rome come to question Paul (Acts 28:23). The term has a cultic ring when linked with proskyneín (Rev. 3:9) [J. SCHNEIDER, II, 926-28]

Hēl (e)ías [Elijah]

A. Elijah in Later Judaism. No biblical figure influenced later Judaism more than Elijah (cf. 1 Kgs. 17-18; 2 Chr. 21:12ff.; Mal. 3:23-24; Sir. 48:1ff.; Eth. En. 89:52, etc.; 1 Macc. 2:58; Philo, Josephus, rabbinic writings, and Elijah apocalypses). The reasons for Elijah's prominence are his mysterious rapture (2 Kgs. 2:11) and the prophecy of his return (Mal. 4:5-6). His miracles provide rich material for legend, and his rapture offers assurance that he gives supernatural aid. In apocalyptic he has the role of a heavenly scribe as well as Israel's intercessor.

---

i.e. id est, that is

3. The Return of Elijah.

a. In the oldest passage (Mal. 4:5-6) Elijah will return as a messianic figure who prepares the way of the heavenly King (3:1) by purifying the priesthood (3:2ff.) and establishing peace (4:6). In Sirach he will restore the twelve tribes (48:10). For the rabbis Elijah will come from Gad as a military deliverer.

b. Later, Elijah prepares the way of the Messiah rather than God (cf. many rabbinic passages and Justin Dialogue 8.4). The Damascus Document expects the coming of a teacher of truth (the term for its own founder) who is equated by some with Elijah. It also speaks of a past and coming Messiah, and there is a possibility that the Messiah, not Elijah, is the expected teacher of truth.

c. Another common view is that Elijah is the high priest of the last time (cf. Zech. 4:1ff.). Probably underlying this idea is a combination of Mal. 3:1 and 4:5-6 with 2:4-5 (the angel of the covenant and the covenant with Levi). In the NT it may be noted that the Baptist is of priestly descent and that in Rev. 11:3ff. Elijah and Moses are two olive trees (cf. Zech. 4:3, 11ff.); the olive trees of Zechariah are usually expounded as representing the priesthood and monarchy.

4. The Task of the Returning Elijah. Elijah's coming announces the age of salvation. His task is the restoration of the people: a. inner restoration, setting up peaceful relations by preaching repentance, solving disputed issues of the law; b. outer restoration, establishing purity of blood and regathering the scattered people; c. proclamation of salvation, conflict with antichrist, and introduction of the Messiah (though the two latter functions occur only outside the older rabbinic literature).

B. Elijah in the NT.

1. The Historical Elijah in the NT. Mentioned some 29 times in the NT (behind only Moses [73 times] and David [59], Elijah receives attention a. for proclaiming the 3 ½-year drought and famine (Lk. 4:25; Jms. 5:17; Rev. 11:6; cf. 1 Kgs. 17:1), which he both starts and ends by his effective prayer as a righteous man (Jms. 5:16-17), not by some special endowment; b. because he offers a model of ministering to Gentiles (Lk. 4:25-26); c. because of the assurance he is given of the 7,000 who have not bowed the knee to Baal (Rom. 11:2ff., and cf. Lk. 22:43 for resemblances to 1 Kgs. 19:5, 7); and d. because of the divine judgment that he brings down on opponents in 2 Kgs. 1:10, 12, and that is probably in the minds of the sons of Zebedee in Lk. 9:54 when Jesus shows them that such an act is incompatible with his saving mission.

2. The Later Jewish Conception of Elijah in the NT.

a. The idea of Elijah as a helper in time of need is recognized only as a popular belief in the NT (Mk. 15:35-36; Mt. 27:47, 49). When Jesus cries "Eli, Eli," some spectators think he is appealing to Elijah for help, and when this help does not come his messianic claim is disproved. For Christians, Christ is himself the one intercessor whose help is to be sought in time of need.

b. The expectation that Elijah will return is everywhere apparent in the Gospels (Mk. 9:11 etc.). There is speculation whether the Baptist is Elijah (Jn. 1:21) or even Jesus (Mk. 6:15), especially in view of his miracles (Lk. 9:7-8). Elijah is expected as the forerunner (Mk. 9:11) with a task of restoration (Mk. 9:12) through preaching repentance (Rev. 11:3). The "must" of Mk. 9:11 shows that this expectation is thought to have a biblical basis.

3. The NT Understanding of Expectation of Elijah and Its Fulfilment in the Baptist.

a. Whether the Baptist thought of himself as Elijah is hard to say. He certainly does not view himself as Elijah's forerunner. In support of self-identification with the returning Elijah one might cite his preaching of repentance, his clothing (Mk. 1:6), and the views expressed in Lk. 1:14ff. On the other hand, the hairy mantle is a common prophetic garment (Zech. 13:4), and the views of the people and even his disciples are not necessarily his own (cf. Jn. 1:20-21). What John seeks to be is probably just the anonymous voice in the wilderness (Jn. 1:23; cf. Is. 40:3).

b. A scribal argument against the messiahship of Jesus is that Elijah has not yet returned (cf. also the disciples in Mk. 9:11). Jesus answers this by hinting in Mk. 9:13 and stating openly in Mt. 11:14 that the Baptist has fulfilled the prophecy of Malachi, though the "if you are willing to accept it" of Mt. 11:14 suggests that this is a new interpretation which is significant because Jesus places himself under Scripture, views the restoration as religious rather than political, sees the closeness of the end, and with the execution of John faces his own imminent crucifixion. In accepting the fact that John fulfils the expectation of Elijah (Mk. 1:2), the NT consciously confesses Jesus' own messiahship.

4. Elijah's Appearance on the Mount of Transfiguration. This story (Mk. 9:4-5 and par.) is interesting because older rabbinic sources do not associate Moses and Elijah in this way. Various theories have been advanced in interpretation, e.g., that the two represent law and prophecy, or the unveiling of the heavenly world, or the harbinger and forerunner, or two escorts of an oriental king, or two Iranian messengers, precursors, companions, or deities. Pre-Christian apocalyptic certainly refers to two forerunners (cf. Mk. 9:4-5), but these are usually Enoch and Elijah, not Moses and Elijah as in Mk. 9:4 and Rev. 11:3ff. At the transfiguration, Moses and Elijah are probably precursors whose appearance proclaims the inauguration of the end-time. As suffering figures, they also intimate the passion (cf. Mk. 8:31ff. and Lk. 9:31).

5. The Suffering Elijah. Only once in the NT is Elijah's coming still future, i.e., in Rev. 11:3ff., where Elijah and Moses are the two preachers of repentance who will be killed by the beast and rise again after 3 ½ days (in identification cf. the drought and the changing of water into blood in 11:6 [1 Kgs. 17:1 and Ex. 7:17]). A parallel to this may be found in the Elijah Apocalypse, which also speaks of the conflict with antichrist, the martyrdom, the shaming of the corpses, and the rising again, but with Enoch rather than Moses as the second figure. A distinction is that in Revelation the two witnesses do not return to kill antichrist. The tradition is important, however, for it shows that the idea of a suffering forerunner (Mk. 9:12-13) was not unknown in the time of Jesus; the historicity of Jesus' predictions of his own passion is thus supported. [J. JEREMIAS, II, 928-41]

hēlikía [age, stature]

1. This word first means "age," especially of maturity, collectively "contemporaries." 2. It then means "generation." 3. A final sense is "physical size," "growth," though this does not occur in the papyri, where the word often has the legal sense of "maturity." The meaning "age" is the most common one in Philo and the LXX. In the NT "stature" is the sense in Lk. 19:3. This might be the meaning in Mt. 6:27 and Lk. 12:25, but the context favors "span of life." Maturity is the point in Jn. 9:21, 23, age of virility in Heb. 11:11, and "years" rather than "stature" in Lk. 2:52. Eph. 4:13 is theologically significant when it posits maturity as the goal of the Christian life. Whether we think of age or physical growth is immaterial here. The church is to achieve its perfect form as "all" come to the stature of the fullness of Christ through the ministry (vv. 11-12). Christ's fullness is represented in the church when it achieves its divinely ordained form by upbuilding into Christ's body through the ministry of evangelism and edification. [J. SCHNEIDER, II, 941-43]

hēméra [day]

A. "Day" in the OT.

1. The ancient Hebrew day consisted of day and night beginning in the evening (Ex. 12:18). Thus light is created (as distinct from darkness) and day results from the separation of light and darkness (Gen. 1:5).

---

par. paragraph

vv. verses

God himself recognizes day and night. Time and its rhythm are God's creation, and all that takes place within the bounds of temporality is under his control (Ps. 31:15).

2. All days are God's, but the secular nature of life demands that special days (the sabbath and cultic feasts) be set apart for God. Other days apart from cultic may also be specially related to God (e.g., the day of Midian in Is. 9:3). There is expectation, too, of a special future "day of the Lord" when his might, his readiness to save, and his judicial power will be manifested. This is not necessarily a final day. Thus the overthrow of Jerusalem is a day of God which can be looked back on in Lam. 1:21. The day of the Lord is similarly a historical rather than an eschatological day in Ezek. 34:12. In Am. 5:18ff. the popular hope is obviously for a great day of salvation, and this day has eschatological features for the prophet when he refers to the cosmic changes it includes. But here again there is a mixture of the political and eschatological. The prophets, however, revise the original idea that the day of the Lord will mean judgment for the Gentiles and salvation for Israel by showing that this day will mean judgment for Israel too (cf. especially Zephaniah).

3. The day of the Lord is not the dominant feature in all prophecy. It is very subsidiary in Hosea, and even predictions of judgment or disaster do not have to refer to it (e.g., Is. 28: 14ff.). The fall of Jerusalem is a turning point, for after this judgment the day of the Lord is to be a day of deliverance (cf. the precisely dated change in Ezek. 33:21ff.). Thus the later prophets again view the day of the Lord as a day of judgment for the Gentiles but protection (Zech. 12:1ff.), purification (Mal. 3:2), cleansing (Zech. 13:1-2), endowment with the Spirit (Joel 3), and paradisal waters (Joel 4:18) for Israel. This eschatological prospect is sometimes called the end of days (Is. 2:2; Jer. 23:20, etc.). An eschatological belief is firmly embedded in the OT and in essentials it is identical to this postexilic day of the Lord.

4. The use of the term, while not restricting what takes place to a calendar day, signifies the occurrence of an event. There is a time when God hides his face or visits Jerusalem or when all know him in the new covenant. Yet the term may refer to conditions rather than a specific span of time. Jeremiah, for example, uses the phrase "that time" or "those days" but not the "day of the Lord." Ezekiel combines "time" and "day" in 7:12. Eschatologically the day of the Lord denotes the inauguration of a new era. In Daniel we find a different set of expressions (cf. 8:17; 9:26; 10:14; 11:27; 12:13). A time of affliction will here precede the end of the old aeon and the inauguration of the new. [G. von Rad, II, 943-47]

B. General Greek Usage.

1. "Day" as a. "daylight," b. "full day" (24 hours), and c. "day" of the week.

2. "Time" (not common) a. as "time of youth, age, etc.," b. as determined by events, experiences, situations, or moods.

3. Very rarely personified in religion or art (e.g., the daughter of Helios) in sense 1.a.

C. LXX Usage.

1. The word is common in the LXX in senses 1.a. (Gen. 1:5) and 1.b. (Gen. 25:24; Ex. 29:36).

2. Sense 2. is also common in the LXX. We find 2.a. first for lifetime or extended times as historical periods, then in connection with the future as the time of God's action either historically or eschatologically. 2.b. is especially common in the Psalms, e.g., the "day of trouble" in 27:5.

D. NT Usage.

1. hēméra as Day.

a. The time of "daylight"; with gínesthai of dawn (Luke and Acts) and klínein of sunset (only Lk. 9:12; 24:29); with báros for the burden of the full sun (Mt. 20:12); as distinct from night (2 Pet. 2:13); restricted in Rev. 8:12.

b. "Day" as a measure of time from sunrise to sunset or sunrise to sunrise (Lk. 9:37; Acts 21:26), with a number (Mt. 26:2), the "third day" relative to Christ's resurrection (Mk. 8:31 and par.; 9:31 and par., etc.). That Christ rose on the third day is an early part of the tradition (1 Cor. 15:3), so that the influence of mystery religions on the number is unlikely. Three might be used simply as a small number, but the “according to the scriptures” (1 Cor. 15:4) suggests that its significance derives from the fulfilment of Hos. 6:2 (which Jewish exegesis blunted by suppressing the number, changing the days to millennia, or referring the passage to the final resurrection). The difference between the tḗ . . . trítē of Matthew, Luke, and Paul and the metá treís hēméras of Mark may be explained by the difference between Greek and Jewish modes of reckoning (cf. Mt. 27:63-64). “Day” is relativized in 2 Pet. 3:8 (cf. Ps. 90:4). For “every day” see 1 Cor. 15:31, and “day by day” 2 Cor. 4:16.

c. For “day of the week” cf. Mk. 16:2, date Rev. 9:15, day of judgment 1 Cor. 4:3, day of fasting or feasting Rom. 14:5-6, day of the Lord Rev. 1:10, sabbath day Lk. 4:16, day of unleavened bread Lk. 22:7, day of preparation Lk. 23:54.

2. hēméra as Time.

a. “Lifetime” etc. (Heb. 5:7; 7:3; 12:10), “period of time” (Rev. 10:7, of future events; Acts 15:7, the early days; 2 Pet. 3:3, the last time prior to judgment; Acts 2:17, the last time as already present; 2 Tim. 3:1, the last time as the time of judgment; Lk. 17:22, the days of the Messiah; Mk. 2:20, the time after Jesus’ death). In the singular the word denotes the last age. The stress is on the divine action along the lines of apocalyptic, but still with different nuances as in the Jewish world. Thus in Lk. 17:24 the day of the Son of Man refers to his final coming in glory (cf. Jn. 8:56). In 2 Pet. 3:12 the reference is to the day of God as a day of final conflagration, while in Rev. 16:14 the great day of God is that of conflict with the kings of the earth. In Paul the “day” is the great day of judgment for the church (1 Cor. 1:8) or himself (2 Cor. 1:14) as well as non-Christians; it serves as an ethical incentive. In 2 Th. 2:2 the manifestation of Christ is the primary concern; the day of the Lord here is equivalent to the day of Christ in Philippians. In the absolute, “day” is the day of judgment in 1 Th. 5:5; 1 Cor. 3:13; Heb. 10:25 (cf. “that day” in Mt. 7:22 etc., and “great day” in Jude 6; Rev. 6:17, etc.). The day of Christ’s manifestation and the day of judgment are, of course, the same. The content may sometimes be denoted by phrases like day of judgment in Mt. 11:22, wrath in Rom. 2:5, and redemption in Eph. 4:30. The last day is also used for the day of resurrection in Jn. 6:39-40 etc. But day may simply denote a point of time, as in Col. 1:6, 9, or a period as in Jms. 5:5; 1 Pet. 2:12—these two passages are probably not eschatological.

b. With further definition we have the evil day of Eph. 6:13, the day of testing in Heb. 3:8, birthday in Mk. 6:21, and good days in 1 Pet. 3:10.

3. In Rev. 11:9, 11 days are used figuratively for years. Day is also figurative in Jn. 9:4 (2.a.) and Jn. 11:9b (1.a.). In Rom. 13:12-13 the time after Christ’s resurrection is the time of daylight when Christians, as those who share its brightness (1 Th. 5:5), must shun the works of darkness. In 2 Pet. 1:19 the word of God, like a lamp in a dark place, brings the day which scatters the powers of darkness. [G. DELLING, II, 947-53]

Ēsaú [Esau]

1. Paul uses Esau’s rejection typologically in Rom. 9:13 to show that God’s counsel does not depend on human privilege or merit. Esau is also a descendant of Abraham but is not chosen even though he is born first and has done neither good nor evil. There are no parallels for this use of the story; Jewish exegesis tends to explain Esau’s rejection by his evil works.

2. In Heb. 11:20 Isaac invokes blessings on Esau as well as Jacob. Again Jewish exegesis thinks Jacob has precedence because God foresees Esau’s wickedness.

3. In Heb. 12:16 Esau is given as an example of the immoral and irreligious person who wants, too late, to reverse his wrong decision. [H. ODEBERG, II, 953-54]

ēchéō [to sound]

a. Intransitive “to sound,” “ring,” “boom,” “peal”; b. transitive “to cause to sound”; middle “to sing.” The word finds varied use in the LXX for the sounding of a zither (Is. 16:11), the roaring of the sea (Is. 51:15), the tumult of enemies (Ps. 83:2), the howling of a dog (Ps. 59:6), the tinkling of the priestly bells (Sir. 45:9), and blowing on trumpets (Sir. 50:16). The only NT instance is in 1 Cor. 13:1: Ecstatic speech without love is like a clanging cymbal, which may attract attention and enthuse the hearers but has no moral or spiritual worth. The chalkós is usually taken to be the gong that hung in temples or on sacred trees and whose long and booming notes were struck by orgiastic cults to induce ecstasy. [J. SCHNEIDER, II, 954-55]

θ th

Thamár [Tamar], Rhacháb [Rahab], Rhoúth [Ruth], hē toú Ouríou [the wife of Uriah]

1. The inclusion of women in Jesus’ genealogy is surprising, but even more so is the substitution of these four women (Mt. 1:3, 5, 6) for the four ancestral mothers of Israel. The point is that these women have a place here, even though they are sinners and aliens, because the history of the people of the Messiah is one of grace working through the fall and making the last first (cf. 1 Cor. 1:27ff.). Rabbinic exegesis may sometimes excuse these women, but Matthew does not do this, nor is he producing them merely as types of Mary, and certainly not to justify a supposed illegitimacy of Jesus.

2. Rabbinic exegesis does in fact mitigate the sins of Tamar etc. a. In Gen. 38 the OT itself attributes the sin to Judah more than to Tamar (Gen. 38:26), though rabbinic exegesis tends (not without dissent) to excuse Judah too. b. Rahab is extolled as a proselyte and tool of the Spirit (cf. in the NT Heb. 11:31; Jms. 2:25), who is the ancestress of many priests and prophets (e.g., Jeremiah), though she is nowhere put in the Davidic line. c. That David had an alien as ancestress might be regarded as a serious blemish, but rabbinic exegesis stresses her conversion and the divine overruling; the suggestion is also made that the implied humiliation makes for a more lasting exaltation. d. Various reasons are advanced in some circles to exculpate Bathsheba and David, e.g., that Uriah might have divorced Bathsheba on going to war, or that he was in revolt against David. On the other hand, Shammai and others freely admit David’s guilt. [G. KITTEL, III, 1-3]

thámbos [astonishment], thambéō [to be astonished], ékthambos [utterly astonished], ekthambéomai [to be amazed]

1. The basic meaning of the group is “to be astonished,” then “to be affrighted.” Thus divine manifestations or miracles can cause astonishment or fear and trembling. Plutarch links thámbos and superstition; true piety flourishes only on rational soil.

2. The group is not much used in the LXX, nor does it have a fixed Hebrew original. (For the various words rendered by it see TDNT, III, 5.) In general the psychological element is dominant in instances of the group, but the element of the occasional is less prominent; something mysterious and impalpable is at work in human thámbos.

3. Astonishment is again linked with sight in the NT: Mk. 9:15; 16:5-6; Acts 3:10-11, etc. Yet the element of epiphany rather than the external form arouses astonishment or fear. With cognate expressions, the terms stress the revelatory content and christological significance of incidents (cf. Mk. 1:27). The words also serve to accredit the miracles (Lk. 4:36). But Jesus’ strict demand for discipleship also kindles astonishment and fear because of our human inability to meet it (Mk. 10:24ff.; cf. Lk. 5:9-10). The fact that the disciples are in the hands of the Lord probably causes their amazement and fear in Mk. 10:32. This pious awe is a preparatory stage of faith. In Mk. 14:33 we are perhaps to see a christological understanding of, e.g., Ps. 31:22. The incident not only sheds light on the historical character of Jesus (contrary to Docetism) but brings out the element of epiphany in Gethsemane by presenting the "fearful" Christ as the bearer of divine revelation. [G. BERTRAM, III, 4-7] thánatos [death], thnḗskō [to die], apothnḗskō [to die], synapothnḗskō [to die with someone], thanatóō [to kill], thnētós [mortal], athanasía [immortality], (athánatos [immortal]) thánatos, thnḗskō, apothnḗskō, synapothnḗskō.

A. thánatos in Greek Usage.

1. Classical Usage. Death destroys life; the shadowy existence of the dead in Hades is no true life. The most that may be expected is the survival or transmigration of the soul. All must die, so that death casts a shadow on life and its meaning. Yet death brings release from the dubious boon of life. Thus suicide may be liberation. Yet no one wants to die, and there is no knowledge of what comes after it. Heroes live on immortally in their renown, for it is good to die for the pólis. Death is seen as a natural phenomenon. The psychḗ lives on as the vital force in the cosmos, but only as the birth of one is the death of another. This does not solve the riddle or remove the terror of individual death. Plato lifts the issue to another plane by giving precedence to the question of right and wrong. The point, then, is to die a good death. Indeed, death can be the fulfilment of life by rising above the mortal body. On this basis the hope arises that the soul will live on. Aristotle follows the same reasoning, except that for him it is the noús that survives in some obscure way.

2. Hellenistic Usage.

a. Stoicism. For the Stoics, death is a natural phenomenon. It has to be accepted as such and in this way may become an ethical act. Death as well as life is a matter of individual decision, and since life is indifferent, and its goods are viewed pessimistically, responsible suicide is justifiable. Death serves a useful purpose as a test of right conduct, i.e., whether we turn from external things, accept our destiny, and are thus ready when death strikes. Death does not have the character of judgment, but those who focus on external things have no true life and may thus be described as already dead.

b. Neo-Platonism. Bodily life is here regarded as involving death for the psychḗ. The soul attains true life only by progressive release from the body. Death is good inasmuch as it completes this release, but suicide is an illegitimate way of hastening the process.

c. Gnosticism. Here again true life cannot develop in the body, but true life is now the immortality of divine life, and transition to it is made with ascetic mortification, or in the mystery religions with sacramentalized experiences of a mystical or ecstatic nature. Life is finally attained with the putting off of the soul in transmigration or the ascent to heaven.

d. Philo. Philo follows Stoicism and Neo-Platonism in describing the wicked as already dead. Physical death itself is either indifferent or good. But there is also a death that is eternal destruction.

B. The Concept of Death in the NT.

1. In the NT thánatos means "dying" (Heb. 7:23) or "being dead" (Phil. 1:20). Death is our human lot, remote only from God (1 Tim. 6:16). It is never presented in heroic terms, not even as self-sacrificial death (2 Cor. 4:12) or martyrdom (Rev. 2:10). Death is a terrible thing that makes zōḗ improper zōḗ, and the work of Christ is that of destroying death (2 Tim. 1:10). Death is the last enemy; with its overthrow salvation will be complete (1 Cor. 15:26; Rev. 20:14). It is nowhere neutralized as merely a natural process. It belongs together with sin, and stands opposed to zōḗ as the true being of God.

2. Death is the consequence and punishment of sin. Its origin is not treated speculatively, for even if Paul views it as a cosmic power, it results from a responsible act (Rom. 5: 12ff.). That Adam was created only a "living soul" might perhaps imply natural mortality, but thánatos came into the world through Adam's sin (Rom. 5:12, 17). This does not excuse us, for we are responsible for our own sin and our own death. The ineluctability of sin and death serves merely to bring out the fact that there is salvation only in Christ. The law is what effects death, for as Adam disobeyed God's command and pagans transgress his just requirement (Rom. 1:32), so in Israel the law awakens slumbering sin and enforces death as its penalty (cf. Rom. 7; 2 Cor. 3:7). Our sinful being is what Paul calls sárx. This is neither matter, nor a prison of the soul, nor a demonic power, but the lost self seen in terms of the corruptible sphere (Rom. 2:28-29). Wanting to live for ourselves, we are subject to death, and all self efforts to escape this entangle us in the same vicious circle (Rom. 7:10). The message of John is materially the same. Outside the revelation in Jesus we are all sinful and thus rightly given up to death. Sin is seeing the self in terms of the self instead of God. Thus the self sets up its own criteria (5:31ff.), imagines it is free (8:33), and has its own standards of glory (5:41ff.).

3. The NT sometimes portrays death as purely destructive and sometimes as involving future torment (cf. Mk. 9:48). Yet God or Christ judges both the living and the dead, so that physical death is followed by judgment and resurrection. No detailed teaching is given on the intermediate state, but physical death becomes definitive death (the second death, Rev. 2:11; 20:6, 14; 21:8) through judgment. Even now, however, death robs life of its true quality. It imposes fear (Heb. 2:15). It casts a shadow and darkness (Lk. 1:79). It reigns over what is carnal (Rom. 8:6). Outside Christ, we might as well eat and drink, for tomorrow we die (1 Cor. 15:32). Death brings uncertainty (Mt. 6:25ff.). Human works are dead from the outset (Heb. 9:14). As sinners, we are already dead (Mt. 8:22; cf. Rom. 7:10, 24; Jn. 5:21).

4. Christ's death and resurrection are the eschatological event by which death itself is destroyed (2 Tim. 1:10; Heb. 2:14). Christ's death is unique. It is not a death to sin; God made him sin for us (2 Cor. 5:21; Rom. 8:3; Gal. 3:13-14), and he died for us. In him God deals with us, takes death to himself, and thus makes it a creative divine act. This removes sin and death, and from it life springs, for Christ is not held by death (Acts 2:24), comes to life again (Rom. 8:34), and now has the keys of death and Hades (Rev. 1:18). Giving his life, he takes it again (Jn. 10:18). Humbling himself, he is divinely exalted (Phil. 2:6ff.). He thus overcomes death for those who make his death their own in faith. He is the firstborn from the dead (Col. 1:18; Rev. 1:5). Believers still die, except for those alive at Christ's coming (1 Th. 4: 15ff.). But they will finally overcome death at the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:26; Rev. 21:4), so that even now death has lost its sting (1 Cor. 15:55). As impending death negates life for unbelievers, awaited resurrection gives it a new character for believers. They will not die (Jn. 6:50). They have passed from death to life (5:24). This life is not their own possession (2 Tim. 2:18; cf. the probable belief of the Corinthians). But death's destruction is already present in hope on the basis of the gospel. It takes place in the obedience of faith, which is acceptance of Christ's death, i.e., dying with Christ (Rom. 6:3-4) worked out in a new way of life which we must grasp with intelligent resolve (Rom. 6:11). Thus the destruction of sin and death manifests itself in mortification and the fulfilment of God's righteous demand (Rom. 8:2ff.). Believers no longer live for self but for the Lord who died for all, so that all are dead in him (Rom. 14:7ff.;, 2 Cor. 5:14-15). In the cross the world is crucified for believers and believers for the world (Gal. 2:19-20; 6:14). Proclamation of Christ's death in the Lord's Supper demands worthy conduct (1 Cor. 11:27ff.; cf. 5:7-8). Yet this conduct does not itself overcome death. The goal is already reached with Christ's death, so that boasting is ruled out (Rom. 3:27) and we are dead to the law (7:6); its reimposition robs the death of Christ of its effect (Gal. 2:19ff.). The Christian walk is participation in this death (Phil. 3:9, 14). This participation also gives a new meaning to sufferings as a daily dying in which the message is brought to others (cf. especially Col. 1:24) or an example is given to them (1 Pet. 2:18ff.). Union with Christ in dying is a sure ground of comfort. We die in Christ (1 Th. 4:16). We are thus blessed (Rev. 14:13). We die for the Lord's name (Acts 21:13). This is to God's glory (Jn. 21:19). Death is not taken idealistically here. The new walk and understanding do not themselves defeat death. Based on the event of Christ's death and resurrection, they are part of a movement of consummation. We are dead, but our life is hidden (Col. 3:3). Our present life being provisional, we long for physical death or the parousia (2 Cor. 5:1ff.). Yet this provisional life is service of the Lord (even if to die is gain, Phil. 1:21). Both death and life are thus relativized (Rom. 8:38), but only for believers, for Christ's work has made death final for those to whom the gospel spreads death (2 Cor. 2:16) and who thus abide in death (1 Jn. 3:14).

thanatóō. This word means "to kill," "to give up to death," "to condemn to death." It has these senses in the NT: "to kill" in Mk. 13:12; 1 Pet. 3:18; "to give up to death" in Rom. 8:36; "to condemn to death" in Mk. 14:55. The use is figurative ("to mortify") in Rom. 8:13.

thnētós. This word, meaning "mortal," is used by the Greeks to characterize humans in contrast to the gods (cf. in the LXX Job 30:23; Prov. 3:13). Paul uses it as a comprehensive term for human nature in 1 Cor. 15:53-54. In 2 Cor. 5:4 he longs for the swallowing up of what is mortal by life. In particular the sárx or sṓma is mortal (2 Cor. 4:11; Rom. 6:12; 8:11). The apostolic fathers and Apologists similarly see in thnētós a typical human attribute; the latter can also apply the term to pagan deities in polemical sections (e.g., Tatian 21.2).

athanasía (athánatos) → (zōḗ, thánatos).

1. athanasía is primarily a literary term meaning "immortality." This belongs properly to the gods. Whether the soul is immortal is debated. The school of Plato adopts this view. In Hellenism the demand for it is great but belief in it meager. Pantheistic Stoicism finds impersonal immortality in the cosmos, while individual immortality is sought in the mysteries, magic, and mysticism. This immortality is more than duration; it is participation in the blissful divine nature, i.e., divinization. Anything superhuman may thus be called immortal, e.g., seers, rulers, and all things pneumatic (e.g., Christian knowledge in 1 Clem. 36.2). A supposed food of immortality or medicine of life is a common notion (cf. Sir. 6:16 and Ignatius Ephesians 20.2).

2. The OT has no equivalent for athanasía, but the LXX uses it for the future life of the righteous (Wis. 3:4; 4 Macc. 14:5). The word is common in Philo, and occurs in Josephus in references to Eleazar, Titus, the Essenes, and the Pharisees.

3. In the NT athánatos does not occur, and we find athanasía only in 1 Cor. 15:53-54 (the incorruptible mode of existence in the resurrection) and 1 Tim. 6:16 (God alone has immortality in himself). In both instances the form of expression shows the influence of Hellenistic Judaism. [R. BULTMANN, III, 7-25]

→ zōḗ

tharréō (tharséō) [to be confident, courageous]

1. In its two forms (tharséō is the older) this word has the basic sense "to dare," "to be bold," "to be of good courage," "to be cheerful or confident," and then a. "to trust in," "rely on," and b. "to be bold against someone or something," "to go out bravely to." The LXX always has the basic sense. While Plato suggests that boldness in face of death is possible only where there is awareness of the soul's immorta1ity, the LXX uses the term as a summons in time of stress or emergency, and God's readiness to help is the basis. God himself issues the summons in Hag. 2:5; Zech. 8:13; he stakes himself by way of guarantee.

2. In the NT Jesus issues the summons to be of good courage (Mt. 9:2, 22; 14:27). What he gives or is backs the summons. His own claim lies behind it; in encounter with him God's is a liberating action. The gospel thus gives joy and confidence, chasing away anxiety, bringing us into fatherly goodness. The risen

Lord issues the same summons to Paul in prison (Acts 23:11). The disciples live in a threatening world, but they may be of good courage because Christ has overcome it (Jn. 16:33). Their boldness does not rest on a dubious theory of the soul's immortality, nor on a process of initiation and deification, but on the historical event of Christ's victorious death and resurrection. History replaces myth, and fulfilment longing. Though we are now separated from Christ, we are still of good courage (2 Cor. 5:6, 8), for we have the pledge of the Spirit (v. 5) and move toward the consummation. Heb. 13:6 finds a ground for courage during persecution in the fact that the Lord is our helper. An instance of "to have confidence in" occurs in 2 Cor. 7:16, and Paul is "bold against" the Corinthians when absent according to his ironic statement in 2 Cor. 10:1. [W. GRUNDMANN, III, 25-27]

thaúma [wonder], thaumázō [to wonder], thaumásios [wonderful], thaumastós [wonderful]

A. The Use of the Word Group in Secular Greek. The group has first the sense of astonishment, whether critical or inquisitive, then admiration, with a nuance of awe or fear at what is unusual or mysterious, e.g., miracles or oracles in religion, also magical acts or media, and certain phenomena (prior to their explanation) in philosophy.

B. The Use of the Word Group in Greek Judaism.

1. The Greek OT. The group finds varied use here for many unconnected Hebrew words. It serves to denote religious experience face to face with what transcends human possibilities. a. In the negative (Prov. 6:30, no MT) it introduces something self-evident. The group also finds a use for God's nonrespecting of persons (Dt. 10:17), or having respect to someone in prayer (Gen. 19:21). In human relations, judges should not be guilty of respect of persons (cf. Is. 9:14). Partiality is also the issue in Lev. 19:15 etc., while the point in Job 22:8 is flattery. b. At times the LXX uses the group for astonishment so as to stress the effect of a fact or event on those who see it (cf. Job 11:13; 42:11). In particular, it brings out the wonderful and inexplicable ways of God in relation to problems of theodicy. Yet it may express horror at divine judgment (as in Job 17:8; cf. Lev. 26:32) as well as wonder at divine direction (Ex. 34:10; cf. Job 42:3 and especially the Psalms, e.g., 45:4). In 2 Sam. 1:26 the reference is to the wonderful love of friends, and in 2 Chr. 26:15 to the miraculous help of God. In Sir. 39:20 the idea is that nothing is impossible for God, but while the wonderful thing may be what is humanly impossible, it may also be something great or glorious (cf. Ex. 34:10; Job 5:9). The element of the dreadful in miracle comes out at times (cf. Job 41:1; Am. 3:9). Verbs of seeing may be linked with the group to bring out the idea of startled astonishment (Hab. 1:5). A negative sense may be seen in Is. 52:14, where the offense is caused by God but the verb brings out the human reaction of those who do not understand. God, who is wonderful in his works (Ps. 68:35), does wonders of salvation and judgment (Ex. 3:20 etc.), and everything connected with him—his name, house, etc.—can have the attribute of the wonderful. c. This attribute may also apply to his people, the saints, the righteous, and especially martyrs, although it is only in the Hellenistic writings that we find this usage with its dangers of exaggeration and profanation (cf. the heroine cult of Jdt. 10:19 and the martyr motifs of Maccabees). The canonical books, in contrast, forbid us to enter of ourselves into the sphere of divine wonder (Ex. 19:12; cf. the sign-seeking of the NT in Mt. 12:38ff.). The proper attitude is not to occupy oneself with things that are too marvelous (Ps. 131:1). The title thaumastós is also one that is intrinsically unbiblical. (For a detailed linguistic study, see TDNT, III, 29-36.)

2. In Philo and Josephus the secular and legendary motifs are stronger. Stress is placed on the wonderful events of OT history. For Philo, wonder at creation may lead to admiration of its Creator, though it may also remain fixed on the world. Either way, there is little true sense of awe at divine revelation. The terms are used within a rational view of things, may be applied to sages and prophets, and in general promote religion rather than magnifying God.

---

MT Masoretic Text

C. The Use of the Word Group in the NT. While the NT use agrees externally with that of the OT, the secularizing of the group in the Hellenistic period means that it cannot have the same linguistic or theological significance, that the instances are neither so numerous nor important, and that there are strong differences in the different sections of the NT.

1. a. Most of the passages occur in the Synoptists (especially Luke) in relation to the miracle stories. The purpose of the term is to describe the effect on the spectators (e.g., Mk. 5:20; Lk. 11:14). In Mt. 9:33, however, what is brought out is the significance of the event as part of NT salvation history. The same is true of Mt. 15:31. In Mt. 9:8, where ethaúmasan is a variant reading, the term serves to express joyful astonishment that Jesus not only gives himself for sin but himself personally forgives our sins. The stilling of the storm also causes astonishment (Mt. 8:27; Lk. 8:25), but Matthew finds this too weak at the walking on the water and substitutes "worship" (Mt. 14:33). The astonishment at the withering of the fig tree in Mt. 21:20 perhaps carries an element of doubt in view of the reply of Jesus in vv. 21-22. The teaching of Jesus causes astonishment as well as his deeds. In Lk. 4:22 the hearers are surprised by the charm but also by the gracious content of Jesus' sermon, though they remain critical. In the tax debate the astonishment is at the wisdom of the answer (Mt. 22:22), but surprise is the point in Lk. 11:38 (the Pharisees), Mk. 15:5 (Pilate when Jesus will not defend himself against such flimsy charges), and Mk. 15:44 (Pilate again when he hears that Jesus has died so quickly). Doubt and wonder intermingle in the thaumázein of Lk. 24:12 and 24:41 relative to the resurrection. In the infancy stories in Luke the use of thaumázein (1:21, 63; 2:18, 33) gives a sense of the divine action and revelation in the events. In Mk. 12:11 Jesus himself quotes Ps. 118:22-23 to denote the response to God's working—a response which is only preliminary to faith, since it may contain elements of surprise, doubt, or mere admiration as well as awe at the manifest operation of God.

b. Twice Jesus himself is astonished, first at the lack of belief in Nazareth (Mk. 6:6), and second at the faith of the Capernaum centurion (Mt. 8:10; Lk. 7:9).

c. Acts follows Synoptic usage, linking the group with miraculous events in 2:7; 3:12; 7:31 (the burning bush). Hab. 1:5 is quoted as a warning in 13:41 with the accent on the negative element.

3. John does not use the term for individual miracles or for the psychological response but for the impact of Jesus' works (5:20; 7:21). It indicates the disciples' misunderstanding in 4:27, 33. There is exhortation not to marvel in 3:7; 5:28 (cf. 1 Jn. 3:13); they are not to doubt or take offense.

4. In Paul thaumázein is a literary form in Gal. 1:6; 2 Cor. 11:4. In the passive in 2 Th. 1:10 the reference is to the eschatological manifestation of God's glory in which the community shares; the word is here parallel to "glorified."

5. Jude 16 follows OT usage for flattery, while 1 Pet. 2:9 has a more Hellenistic ring when it speaks of our calling into God's "marvelous" light.

6. Revelation uses the group six times. In 13:3 the earth follows the beast with wonder (probably a first step to cultic adoration in view of v. 4; cf. the imperial cult of Rome). It is because of the close relation to worship that the seer is forbidden to marvel in 17:6-7. In 15:1 a sign from heaven is called great and wonderful, and God's works are great and wonderful in 15:3. The usage here is similar to that of the Psalms.

D. The Word Group in Early Christian Usage. There is nothing distinctive here except in the dominical saying preserved in Clement of Alexandria Stromateis 2.9.45.4 (cf. 5.14.96.3), which echoes a motif in Platonic philosophy and thus suggests a mystical misunderstanding of the biblical concept. The provisional nature of wonder is lost in 1 Clem. 1.2 when the wonderful in a weaker sense is linked to Christian blessings, but theological particularity is maintained in 2 Clem. 2.6; 13.3-4. The use in early martyrology is similar to that of 4 Maccabees. [G. BERTRAM, III, 27-42]

theáomai* → *horáō

théatron [theater, spectacle], theatrízomai [to expose publicly]

The word théatron (not in the LXX) denotes a. "theater or amphitheater," b. "audience," and c. "play" or "spectacle." The Stoics use it in sense c. (also théama) to express the thought that the sage in conflict with destiny is a spectacle for gods and men. This usage is echoed in 1 Cor. 4:9 (cf. Heb. 10:33), but 1. there is also here recollection of the public sufferings of Job, 2. this théatron is a sorry one rather than a proud one, and 3. the stress is not on human autonomy but on divine operation, so that unbelievers might very well miss the point of this théatron. [G. KITTEL, III, 42-43]

theíos, theiótēs* → *theós

thélō [to wish, desire], thélēma [will], thélēsis [will] thélō. On the relation to boúlomai, see boúlomai above. In secular Greek and the LXX the word thélō has such varied meanings as "to purpose," "to be ready," "to resolve," "to desire," "to wish," "to prefer," and negatively "to refuse." It may be used for the divine will or the royal will. It is common in the OT in the negative.

A. The Common Greek Meaning of (e)thélō.

1. A first sense is "to be ready" (with a nuance "to consent") or "to like."

2. We then find "to want," sometimes in an erotic sense leading to "to come together" and even "to conceive," but also, with no erotic sense, "to like," "to take pleasure in," primarily, in the LXX, with a human subject.

3. Expressing intention, the word may then denote "to wish," "to be about to do something," "to be used to doing something," "to intend."

4. The word also expresses resolve as free or weighed decision, sometimes with the idea of choice or preference, and religiously with the nuance of resolute willingness (considered or stubborn refusal in the negative).

5. thélein may also denote the will that commands, e.g., God's rule and purpose in creation and history, or the rule, decrees, or orders of rulers, officials, and military leaders.

B. Significant Features in the NT Use of thélein from the Standpoint of Biblical Theology.

1. The thélein of God. God's thélein is characterized by definiteness, assurance, and efficacy. In Mt. 27:43 (quoting Ps. 22:8) it expresses divine desire or delight, but elsewhere it refers to God's sovereign will in creation (1 Cor. 12:18) or salvation (Jn. 3:8; 1 Tim. 2:4). In the parable in Mt. 20:14-15 God's freedom of disposal is the point. Paul shows how this works out in salvation and judgment in Rom. 9:18, 22. The saving will of God is declared to the Gentiles in Col. 1:27. In contrast stands the pseudoclaim of the devil in Lk. 4:6. God's thélein also expresses his demands upon his people, especially mercy rather than sacrifice (Mt. 9:13; Heb. 10:5, 8). It further denotes God's direction in the lives of his people; thus we are to suffer for doing right if that is God's will (1 Pet. 3:17).

2. The thélein of Jesus.

a. The disciples accept the power of Jesus' will, as in the request of Lk. 9:54, or the readiness to follow in Mk. 14:12. This will initiates the miracle of Mt. 15:32ff. It may be seen in his choice of the disciples in Mk. 3:13 and his healing work in Mk. 1:40-41; Mt. 8:2-3. It extends to raising the dead in Jn. 5:21, or (in prayer) to granting the disciples a vision of his glory in Jn. 17:23. The whole future of the disciples rests upon this omnipotent will of the Son (21:21).

b. Yet the will of Jesus in his earthly calling bears witness to his sharing our humanity. Thus his will may be thwarted in Mk. 7:24. Indeed, human rejection can frustrate his saving purpose (Mt. 23:37; Lk. 12:49). The prayer in Gethsemane implies the possibility of an independent human will that is set aside in voluntary submission to the divine will (Mk. 14:36; Mt. 26:39).

3. The thélein of Paul in His Authoritative Apostolic Dealings with the Churches. Paul is fond of thélein either when stressing points of teaching (1 Th. 4:13; 1 Cor. 10:1; 12:1; Rom. 11:25), making personal statements (Rom. 1:3), expressing intention in controversy (Gal. 3:2), or giving pastoral direction (1 Cor. 7:32).

4. Religious thélein and Its Opposite in the NT.

a. In the Synoptists thélein may express religious striving, e.g., that of Jewish piety in Mt. 19:17, or the will for discipleship in Mk. 8:34. A misguided wish is at issue in Mk. 10:35 and Gal. 4:21. On the other hand, the wish of Mt. 15:28 implies faith with its orientation to Christ's power (cf. Mk. 10:51). In Jn. 7:17 we have a readiness to do God's will which becomes effective prayer in 15:7, a will for sanctification in Heb. 13:18, and a will for true life in 1 Pet. 3:10 (cf. the determinative role of thélein in Mt. 7:12). In Rev. 22:17 the desire for the water of life may be met by coming to Christ, i.e., by faith.

b. In Paul religious thélein is linked with verbs of doing. God himself wills and does in Phil. 2:3. Giving follows a ready will in 2 Cor. 8:10-11. Desires and doing interact in Gal. 5:17. In Rom. 7, however, thélein under the law, apart from faith and the Spirit, cannot be put into action. What is willed is not done; what is not willed is done. This impotent thélein consents to the law and even delights in it (vv. 16, 22), but cannot get beyond the intention to do it. A cleavage is at issue here which is a matter, not merely of keeping specific commands, but of life and death. Yet the perversion of being in legalism also involves concrete transgression. Only the Spirit, not the law itself, can give force to the will and enable it to meet the law's just demand (8:4). In attempts at self-righteousness, the will is enslaved to sárx; in Christ it is liberated by the Spirit. Parallels to Rom. 7 may be seen in Epictetus, who argues that there is something in life that does not conform to what is desired, and that while we will to be free, we are bound by the body. But in Epictetus the first problem is mostly one of ignorance, while the body, being a secondary matter, need not be the serious obstacle that sárx is in Paul, for whom true freedom of the will comes only as the spiritual will replaces the legal will through the ministry of Christ and the Spirit. As Rom. 9:16 puts it, will and effort are to no effect without the divine will and mercy (cf. vv. 18, 22).

c. Refusal as the opposite of religious willingness may be seen in the parable of Mt. 21:30, the resistance of Jerusalem in Mt. 23:37, the blunt rejection of Lk. 19:14, the refusal to come to Jesus in Jn. 5:40, the disobedience of Acts 7:39, and the refusal to repent in Rev. 2:21. A resolute will to do evil is denoted in Jn. 8:44 and an orientation to mistaken values in Mk. 8:35.

thélēma.

A. thélēma in the Greek World, in Hellenism, and in the Synagogue.

1. A first use of thélēma is for "wish" or "purpose," then "desire" (also sexual). 2. In the LXX it occurs for the divine "will" and "pleasure," then for human "desire," the royal "will," and "self-will."

3. In the Hermetic writings there is considerable use for the will of God as good, sovereign, creative, and all-determinative.

4. In rabbinic writings the will of God, often linked with his name and rule (as in the Lord's Prayer), is that which is to be done.

B. thélēma in the NT. The plural form (common in the LXX) occurs in the NT only in LXX quotations (Acts 13:22) and for carnal desires (Eph. 2:3). God's will is a unity and is thus put in the singular (apart from the variant reading in Mk. 3:35).

1. thélēma as God's will.

a. Christ as Doer of the Divine Will.

(i) The third petition of the Lord's Prayer expresses a consent to God's will that Christ himself exemplifies in Mt. 26:42. It is because he lives by the divine will that he calls the one who does this will his brother, sister, and mother (Mk. 3:35).

(ii) John makes the same point with christological depth. Jesus does the will of the divine Sender, executing and thereby mediating it (4:34; 5:30, etc.). The essential union of Son and Father comes to ethical expression. Jesus is the eternal Son (7:28) who is one with the Father (1:18 etc.) and hears his words (5:20). He demonstrates this by his constant openness to the Father's will. His very life is to do this will (4:34). The content of this will is to lead believers in him to eternal life (6:39-40). Obedience, however, is neither a natural process nor a miracle. It entails a willing subjection of his own will which enables him to claim that his mission, word, and work are all from God (7:28 etc.). This guarantees that his judgment is just (5:30), and it insures his power in virtue of the divine hearing (9:31). Yet it also involves his self-giving (cf. 12:25) in fulfilment of his saving mission.

(iii) In Heb. 10:7, 9 the whole life of Christ, in contrast to animal sacrifices, is a self-offering to God's will whereby believers in him are sanctified.

b. The Conception of the Will of God as the Basis and Purpose of Salvation.

(i) Except in Rev. 4:11, God's will in the NT is always his will to save. In Mt. 18:14 this will is protective of little ones. It is a fatherly will in Mt. 6:10 etc. As such, it is normatively commanding (cf. 21:31).

(ii) Paul expresses the saving character of God's will by his use of katá when speaking of Christ's work (cf. Gal. 1:4). In Eph. 1:5ff. we have en Christ, katá God's will, and eis the praise of God's glory. God's will is related here to his eudokía and boulḗ, and it is a published mystḗrion in v. 9. If we expound the divine thélēma in terms of these equivalents, we see that it is the source, basis, and norm of the whole work of salvation, the resolve which demands action and which alone can provide the impulse for execution of what is planned.

c. The New Life of Believers and the Divine Will.

(i) The Basic Attitude. (a) The Jews know God's will in the sense of his requirements (Rom. 2:18), but only those who are taught by Jesus truly recognize it (Lk. 12:47-48). Thus Paul acquires a wholly new knowledge of God's will at his conversion (Acts 22:14). This will must be tested (Rom. 12:2) on the basis of nonconformity to this aeon and renewal of the mind. What is needed is a practical knowledge in wisdom and spiritual understanding (Col. 1:9). The Spirit teaches us how to conduct ourselves as God desires (cf. Eph. 5:17). (b) Prayer, too, should be according to God's will on the model of Jesus (Mk. 14:36). Such prayer may be sure of a hearing (1 Jn. 5:14).

(ii) The Doing. (a) Doing is decisive for following Jesus (Mt. 12:50). Only where there is a resolve to do can one know the didachḗ of Jesus (Jn. 7:17) and perceive its true conformity with Scripture (Jn. 5:46-47). Doing is also a condition for entering the kingdom (Mt. 7:21; cf. 1 Jn. 2:17). Reception of what is promised follows only on endurance in doing (Heb. 10:36). (b) If doing is a condition, it is also the content of the Christian life under God's own enabling (cf. Heb. 13:21; Rom. 12:2; Phil. 2:12-13). 1 Pet. 4:2 contrasts the new living by God's will with the former living by human passions. Even slaves will now render their service as a doing of God's will from the heart (Eph. 6:6). (c) Definitions. We are rarely told what God's will specifically involves, since it is supposedly no secret. Sanctification and thanksgiving are commended in 1 Th. 4:3; 5:18, and submission to rulers in 1 Pet. 2:15. In 2 Cor. 8:5 we are to give ourselves to the Lord. Glorifying God is a common denominator. (d) Detailed Directions. God's will is to be worked out in detail (cf. Col. 4:12). Thus Paul is an apostle by God's will (1 Cor. 1:1 etc.), and as such he declares God's will and is ruled by it (cf. Rom. 1:10). The community, too, sees the operation of God's will in what befalls it (cf. 1 Pet. 3:17; 4:19).

2. thélēma as Human and Demonic Will. Apart from Mt. 21:31 (in a parable), the only Synoptic instances of human will are in Luke, e.g., 22:42; 23:25. Human self-will is the point in 2 Pet. 1:21; as Scripture was not written by human impulse, so we are not to expound it arbitrarily. The will of the flesh in Jn. 1:13 is sexual desire (and the will of man here is perhaps the desire for a son and heir, while blood might just conceivably be a reference to the female contribution). The same sense occurs in 1 Cor. 7:37, which can hardly refer to a father or guardian, nor to a spiritual marriage, but seems most naturally to have in view a purpose of marriage. In Jn. 1:13 and 1 Cor. 7:37 sexual desire is meant in a purely psychological and nonderogatory sense, but this is not so in Eph. 2:13, where the passions of the flesh in pagan life embrace sexual lusts and carry a hint of enslavement to the sárx. 2 Tim. 2:26 refers to the will of Satan which opponents do as they are ensnared and captured by him.

C. thélēma in the Early Church. In the apostolic fathers thélēma is used biblically for the will of God which underlies salvation (Ignatius Smyrneans 11.1), gives direction for service (Ignatius Ephesians 20.1), and is the power that begets Christ (Ignatius Smyrneans 1.1 etc., taking Jn. 1:13 in the singular). The term is important in the Monothelite controversy, but with a non-NT stress on the thélēma as an organ of volition instead of its content.

thélēsis. This is a late Koine word related to thélēma but less common. It occurs in the LXX for the divine will or good pleasure, for human desire, for the royal will, and in a special usage for "delight" or "sweetness." The only NT instance is in Heb. 2:4: Along with the attestation of the Lord's hearers, God also gave testimony by signs etc. and gifts distributed according to his own will. [G. SCHRENK, III, 44-62]

themélios [foundation], themélion [foundation], themelióō [to lay the foundation]

1. Found from Homer, the adjectival noun ho themélios means "basic stone" or "foundation" (masculine in 1 Cor. 3:12; 2 Tim. 2:19; Heb. 11:10; Rev. 21:19, neuter in Acts 16:26). The use may be literal for the foundation of a house, tower, or city (cf. Lk. 6:48-49; Heb. 11:10; Rev. 21:14, 19), or it may be figurative for the foundation of churches (Rom. 15:20) or teachings (Heb. 6:1; cf. 1 Tim. 6:19). Christ is the foundation in Rom. 15:20; 1 Cor. 3:11, while the apostles and prophets are the foundation and Christ the cornerstone in Eph. 2:20 (cf. also 2 Tim. 2:19). Behind this use is the concept of edification. The church is a house that is built by God or Christ, or in God or Christ by its leaders and members. Christ is the foundation, but the apostles are associated with him (cf. Mt. 16:18). The house is the house of God; there are OT roots for this concept and for the related idea of the themélios (cf. Is. 28:16 and Rev. 21:14, 19).

2. The verb themelióō in Mt. 7:25; Lk. 6:48; Heb. 1:10 means "to provide with a foundation." The sense is figurative in Eph. 3:17; 1 Pet. 5:10, i.e., "to strengthen," "to confirm," but with the implicit thought that when God confirms us in faith and love he establishes his house or church on its sure foundation in Christ. [K. L. SCHMIDT, III, 63-64]

theodídaktos → theós; theómachos, theomachéō → máchomai; theópneustos → pneúma theós [God, god], theótēs [divinity], átheos [without God], theodídaktos [taught by God], theíos [divine], theiótēs [divinity] theós → (kýrios, patḗr).

A. The Greek Concept of God.

1. theós in the Usage of Secular Greek. The word theós is used in both singular and plural, definite and indefinite, often with little distinction of sense between the gods, god, the god, and the godhead. The term does not denote a specific personality but the unity of the religious world in spite of its multiplicity. The Greek concept is essentially polytheistic in the sense of belief in an ordered totality of gods. Zeus as the father of gods and men brings this to expression. Since he has the first and last word, piety often associates him quite simply with god. Out of the plurality a hierarchy develops with families of gods and a pantheon. Zeus, Apollo, etc. are called gods, but so is the cosmos, and elemental forces may also be given the name. The deepest reality is god (the Greeks would have to reverse 1 Jn. 4:16 and say that love is God). But reality is manifold; hence the plural theói. Heroes, unusual people, and outstanding rulers are also gods, so that in the emperor cult theós is a designation of office. Finally, philosophers use the word for metaphysical forces, so that often they use as equivalents the divine, the good, the existent, and destiny. We see here a spiritualizing and moralizing of mythical figures which enhances their dignity but robs them of proximity. Through every change of form, however, the inner structure of the concept remains constant.

2. The Content of the Greek Concept of God. The gods are a given factor. Though eternal, they have come into being. They have not created the world but are its form or meaning. They are thus identified with human order, e.g., in the state. Their eternity includes eternal youth. They enjoy superior power and felicity, but lack moral seriousness. They are infinite beings, but of the same kind as ourselves. Unlike impersonal fate, which even they cannot alter, they represent meaningful plan and purpose. They have human form (their majesty being that of the highest living creature), and their emotions and customs are human.

3. The Development of the Greek Concept of God.

a. Two motifs in Homer govern the development of the concept, the natural and the ethical. These motifs lead to nature mysticism on the one side and rational ethics on,the other. The philosophers subject the Homeric gods to rational criticism, replacing anthropomorphism with cosmomorphism. The presence of divinity in the world is not denied, but its unity is stressed, and the idea of the unmoved mover is introduced. The regularity of being and the principle of compensation or cosmic justice represent the ethical aspect. Thus in tragedy divine justice rules inscrutably in the dialectic of human existence. Zeus is a redeeming power as he teaches us moderation through suffering. The Greek concept thus achieves a certain objectivity, but there is no direct relationship with the deity, for state and society stand between, and we know deity only from its works in nature and history.

b. Plato carries the ethicizing and spiritualizing further by attacking false religiosity, denying divine intervention in the form of physical relationship, and completing the separation between deity and humanity by postulating only a resemblance of being and no true unity. In Plato myth serves only to elucidate philosophical themes. Final reality is impersonal, and divinity means its actualization in space and time as a moving reflection of eternity. In this regard deity plays the role of architect, not creator. In Aristotle, too, deity is the necessary condition of a world order, the cause of each thing existing as it does.

One cannot pray to this deity, nor does it will anything, and if there is love for it, this is simply the attraction which impels us to strive for a higher form of being.

c. Hellenism transforms the mythical gods into metaphysical and cosmic concepts. Thus Stoicism finds in Zeus the comprehensive law of the world which is operative in all things and to which one must adapt. An impersonal pantheistic view thus develops, stressing the providential aspect, though later Stoicism takes a more personal and ethical line with its father and provider who is the original of all virtues and who through the noús may be in us too. In contrast, the atomism of Epicurus leaves no true place for deity except at the level of our views about it or consciousness of it. Over against constant increase in the number of gods, Hellenism attempts unification by equation on the principle that only names differ and realities are the same. Non-Greek deities are fused with Greek, and syncretistic trends lead to the worship of a chief or universal god, Zeus or Jupiter, though not in any truly monotheistic sense.

d. Philo tries to mediate between the OT concept and the Greek ideas of Platonism and Stoicism. God for him is transcendent, the unique, incomprehensible, and almighty Creator who first fashions the ideas and then makes of them the visible world. Alongside God is the lógos of whom the ideas are begotten. The lógos-concept depersonalizes God, yet, while the work of the Greek deity is simply the interrelating of idea and being, for Philo the idea itself is a creation and emanation from God.

e. In Neo-Platonism the concern is with an ultimate one from which and to which all things flow. The one is the first and fatherly deity from which noús proceeds as architect and then psychḗ as the link between the worlds of ideas and experience. We thus have the one and all, but the one does not merge into the all. The one is the underlying force of all that is, and for it being and creating are all the same. The world timelessly evolves from it as its objectification, so that the deity becomes the world. On this view prayer is pointless except as self-reflection with a view to elevation to purer heights.

f. A mystical pantheism may be found in the Hermetic writings. The deity fills all things, and is bi-sexual, and self-creating, the one and all; mystics who reflect on the merging of cosmic unity into the unity of the spiritual ego are themselves theoí. It is noteworthy that in none of these developments is there a place for a personal, monotheistic view of God as the Creator with whom there may be personal relationship. The basic orientation is to eternal being and law, with the deity as the power or essence that insures permanence. [H. KLEINKNECHT, III, 65-79]

B. El and Elohim in the OT.

l. The Usage of the LXX. theós is the usual LXX equivalent for ’ēl and ’□lōhîm; other words such as kýrios and ischyrós occur at times, but infrequently (kýrios being the usual word for the divine name Yahweh). theós itself occurs only some 330 times.

2. The OT Belief in God in the Form of Faith in Yahweh. What the OT authors believe about God comes out in what they say about him and to him. Though individual experience and teaching vary, the underlying reality is the same. Simple expressions bring out its basic character, though these are complicated by the random use of such terms as El, Elohim, and Yahweh. God and Yahweh are obviously the same, but there is an initial tension between the divine person of Yahweh and the sum of cosmic forces; this is resolved only as the prophets promote confidence that Yahweh is the Creator and Ruler of the world in whom divine power is concentrated into an omnipotent will and beside whom there are no other deities. As the canon shows, the people move on only slowly to a recognition that the national God is the Lord of all things. The starting point is with faith in Yahweh as the covenant God. Moses takes this concept and gives it its uniquely impelling force by linking it with the God of the fathers (Ex. 3:15), the exclusive God (Ex. 20:5; 34:14, etc.).

3. The Tradition concerning Belief in God prior to the Rise of the Community of Yahweh. Due to the nature of the material, it is hard to say with certainty what was the precise form of the pre-Mosaic concept. The name Yahweh is brought into the material, but Ex. 6:3 displays an awareness of distinction. Nevertheless, the combination “Yahweh God” in Gen. 2:4 identifies Yahweh as the God who created all things and whom the patriarchs knew and worshipped. The fuller apposition in Ps. 50:1 has the evident nature of a confession of faith.

4. El and Elohim as Appellatives. Neither ’ēl nor ’□lōhîm has originally the same meaning as Yahweh. They both denote God generically rather than personally, are of polytheistic derivation, and need qualification to denote God individually. ’ēl as a name outside Israel is secondary and does not help us to understand biblical usage. When used alone for Yahweh (Is. 40:18 etc.), or as a parallel to Yahweh (Num. 23:8), the point is that Yahweh alone is ’ēl, though not necessarily with a polemic against other gods.

5. The Content of the OT Belief in God. The thesis that God is Israel’s God is fundamental. This God is God in the absolute (cf. 1 Kgs. 18:21), so that as the name merges into the appellatives, the words ’ēl and ’□lōhîm come to contain the vital heritage of faith. a. ’ēl, of course, is not peculiar to Israel. Ishmael has ’ēl in his name, and Balaam and Job both speak of ’ēl. Parallels may be found among many peoples. In the OT ’ēl is the simplest form for the divine as distinct from the human (Ezek. 28:2; Hos. 11:9). ’ēl is holy (Hos. 11:9), spirit (Is. 31:3), ethically superior (Num. 23:19), and thus worthy of trust. Through every nuance ’ ēl is a personal object of religious awe and knowledge even if the concept of God is introduced only by the usage and is not the original meaning. As may be seen from the expression “It is in my power” (Gen. 31:29), the root idea may be one of power, but in the ultimate religious sense of power that is superhuman. Parallel terms for God, e.g., Owner, Lord, and King, support the connection with power. b. The etymology, of course, raises several difficulties (see TDNT, III, 84-85 for details). c. Nor can the linguistic data be explained in terms of ’□lōhîm and ’□lô (a)h, even if we have a plural and related singular (which some contest). Certainly one need not suppose that these terms have a different basic sense, i.e., “he who is to be feared.” d. But if they are related and carry the sense of power, the use of the singular and plural raises a question. Since ’□lô (a)h is mainly later, and is common only in Job, its significance is fixed by the other two terms. ’□lōhîm is clearly a numerical plural only in a very few instances (cf. Ex. 15:11). Even a single pagan god can be meant by the word (e.g., 1 Kgs. 11:5). In the main, then, we have a plural of majesty. There is no sense of treating God as one among many gods. The point is that God has all that belongs to deity.

6. The Historical Continuation of the OT Belief in God. If Yahweh is called ’ēl or ’□lōhîm, this implies that he is a concrete manifestation of divine reality. The concept does not have the dynamism of the name, but forms a basis for its development as a basic religious experience. This experience differs for Israel inasmuch as Israel’s God is truly God, i.e., sovereign, creative, and self-revealing as distinct from the natural forces that pagans symbolize in images or cultic actions. Such forces are inactive; they can neither help nor impel, and are therefore vain (Is. 44:9; 1 Sam. 12:21). If they can be explained rationally as cosmic or sexual, only faith in Yahweh and obedience to his commands can break their numinous power. God made us in his own image (Gen. 1:26); we cannot make God. Hence God’s word comes as a reality that transcends and shapes human will and action. This reality may be partial or inadequate (cf. 1 Sam. 28:13). It can be properly filled out only as God himself commands and acts and guides. But one cannot count on this, for God hides himself (Is. 25:1; 45:15), and confusion is caused by experience of other cults, whose gods may be puny (Ps. 31:6; 1 Chr. 16:26), but can point to great triumphs and prodigality (Jer.

7:18; Am. 5:26; Dt. 12:2), so that the people yields allegiance (Jer. 5:7) and is conscious of their power (cf. 2 Kgs. 3:27). That there are real divine powers is admitted in Dt. 6:12. The exclusivism of Yahweh (Ex. 20:5) is finally directed, not against those who turn to other gods, but to the gods themselves. Whether in her own fellowship or in external dealings, Israel is conscious of the reality of a territorial pantheon. Only belief that God is the Mighty One (Josh. 22:22), supreme over the whole pantheon, can prevent relapse into idol worship. Yet a monarchical monotheism is seen to imply (Jer. 2:11) that for all the sincerity of paganism, the gods of pagans have no true reality; and if Israel looks to them she is guilty of infidelity and falls victim to inner discord (Jer. 2:13ff.). Later writings can thus make a clear distinction between the one God and foreign gods (cf. Dan. 11:36; Mal. 2:10-11; Ps. 82), but these distinctions rest on the recognition of God's deity in his help or faithfulness or comfort, as in the Psalms with their personal motif "my God." God is known as the living God who is active on his people's behalf (Hos. 2:1). As Is. 40-41 shows, he manifests himself as God by doing what is worthy of God in his works of creation and redemption. [G. QUELL, III, 79-89]

C. The Primitive Christian Fact of God and Its Conflict with the Concept of God in Judaism.

1. The Usage. a. In the LXX theós is the usual term for 'ĕlōhîm. ho theós is the God of Israel, while theós is mostly appellative. tó theíon does not occur. Judaism prefers not to speak of God, adopting instead such expressions as the Lord, the Almighty, the Most High. Hellenistic Judaism, adopting philosophical style, refers to the deity, providence, etc. Philo uses the adjective theíos, ho theós for the God of Israel (or ho kýrios to denote his power), theós for the lógos, and theoí at times for humans, but his favorite term is tó theíon. Josephus has ho theós and theós without distinction, but likes tó theíon and hoi ouranoí, and seldom uses kýrios. Apocryphal and pseudepigraphal works, adopting older styles, use kýrios (for Yahweh) along with many other expressions, e.g., Most High, Most Merciful, Almighty, Holy One, Creator, Unbegotten, etc. Jesus uses theós freely and more rarely has kýrios, ouranós, dýnamis (cf. Mk. 14:61-62), or sophía (Lk. 7:35). patḗr, however, is his true name for God. Elsewhere in the NT theós is the normal word. From Paul onward kýrios is more often used for Jesus, as theós is in, e.g., Jn. 1:1. theós usually has the article in the nominative, but in other cases may be with or without article with no distinction. theós may also denote pagan deities (cf. Acts 19:37; 1 Cor. 8:5) and even humans (Jn. 10:34-35 quoting Ps. 82:6). [E. STAUFFER, III, 90-92]

b. The Rabbinic Terms for God. Later rabbinic Judaism avoids the divine name and adopts formal substitutes. It distinguishes between the proper name (Yahweh), generic names ('ēl, ' əúlô (a)h, ' əúlōhîm), and descriptive names (the Most High, the King, etc.). Since the divine name must not be taken in vain, its use is restricted to the cultus, and eventually it comes to exist only as a written symbol and not a living word. The substitutes vary according to whether the usage is religious or secular, and as these take on the full concept of God, they in turn tend to become too holy for secular use and give way to others. 'əúlô (a)h and 'əúlōhîm cause no initial difficulty and become taboo only in medieval times. Terms or nouns expressing qualities and the like are freely used, and an abstract group (holiness, power, etc.) also becomes popular. (See TDNT III, pp. 92-94 for details.) [K. G. KUHN, III, 92-94]

2. The Uniqueness of God.

---

pp. pages

a. Prophetic Monotheism as the Starting Point of True Monotheism. True monotheism is not a product of polytheism but its negation. Its God is not a new idea of unity but ultimate and true reality. The one God is the decisive reality for Moses and as such claims sole validity (Ex. 20:2-3). This God is the only God of the whole world. He is revealed and worshipped, however, only in Israel. Hence his uniqueness must be asserted against both false gods and the other forces that dominate the people (Is. 26:13). The later triumph of monotheism in Islam owes much to biblical concepts. Elsewhere monotheistic formulas have little impact. Zoroaster expounds a dualistic philosophy of history with a monotheistic orientation (in view of the final triumph of light).

b. Dynamic Monotheism in Later Judaism.

(a) Judaism may sometimes use theoí for humans or for pagan gods. The OT basis for the description of humans as gods is slight, and in passages like Ps. 82:1; Ex. 21:6 the reference is to judges as God’s representatives. The rabbis resist strongly the pagan pretensions of humans to deity (cf. Dan. 11:36-37). Where the OT calls heavenly beings ’□lōhím, the LXX usually has angels or sons of God. This is part of the great polemic against the idea that the idols of paganism are gods in any true sense, as in Bel and the Dragon, Wis. 13:1ff., Josephus, and the attacks of the rabbis on star worship, animal worship, and the emperor cult. Sometimes demonic forces are seen behind idols, sometimes they are dismissed as things of nought. But there is a united front against polytheism.

(b) Judaism gives a primary place to the confession of one God, whether in faith, formulas, or practice. The formulas vary and may take confessional or polemical form. The original meaning is best preserved in the Shema (Dt. 6:4). To the uniqueness of God corresponds the uniqueness of the people, for while the one God will one day be God of the whole world, he is now the only God only for Israel, which is ready to suffer and die in confession of his uniqueness.

(c) God works, of course, through intermediaries, i.e., angels or hypostases (word, spirit, truth, etc.), but these are not independent or of the same rank. They serve God as his deputies. Their numbers increase from Daniel on. Angels subject their own wills wholly to God’s will, daily receiving and executing orders, proclaiming God’s will in the first person, but only as God’s representatives, so that they cannot accept human worship. In extreme emergencies, only God’s direct help avails.

(d) The one God is in conflict with demonic forces. Satan has rebelled against God and commands a host of demons. But Satan is God’s creature, has fallen from heaven, and, while still powerful, is held in check by God, who overrules the evil acts of demons to his own purposes of good and to their destruction. Thus a dynamic monotheism overcomes both automatic monotheism and static dualism.

(e) In this conflict, apocalyptic finds a role for the Savior King, the Messiah, the Son of Man, who, whether heavenly or earthly, is God’s representative, not himself God, but armed with a divine power to which all enemies must submit. This Savior King is God’s decisive representative, not replacing God, but effecting a universal acknowledgment of God’s glory and uniqueness.

c. theoí in the NT. Acts vividly depicts the polytheism that the apostles encountered in Ephesus (19:27), Athens (17:23), Malta (28:6), and Lystra (14:11ff.); cf. also Herod in Caesarea (Acts 12:22). The monotheistic answer is always the same (Acts 19:26; 17:23-24; 14:15; 12:23). Idols are nothing (1 Cor. 8:4), but idolatry is a sin (10:7), for it is a failure to worship the true God and involves subjection to demonic forces; the theoí polloí are not true gods but they impose terrible bondage.

d. heís theós in the Confession and Practice of Primitive Christianity. Jesus himself quotes the Shema in Mk. 12:29-30, and the scribe can only endorse this (12:32-33). Similar monotheistic formulas occur in, e.g., Rom. 3:29-30; 1 Tim. 1:17. We believe (Jms. 2:19) or know (1 Cor. 8:4) that there is only one God. As yet not all peoples perceive this; hence the NT refers to the God of the fathers, of Israel, of Abraham, etc., or to our God or my God in true OT fashion. As the church has inherited the promises, the God of Israel is now the God of the church (cf. Acts 15:14). Yet the church must not only believe that God is one; it must believe in God (Rom. 4:3) and hope in him (1 Pet. 1:21). Zeal must accompany knowledge (Rom. 3:11). Recognition of his sovereignty means that he is not to be tempted (Mt. 4:7). The first commandment takes on new seriousness in its exclusion not only of idols but of mammon, belly, cosmic forces, state authorities, or even the emperor. The confession of one God imposes the constant task of trusting and obeying this one God alone.

e. God and His Angels in the NT. Angels play no big role in the NT. They come from God (Acts 12:11) and he acts through them (Acts 7:35). They are nothing without God and everything with him. They will not accept worship (Rev. 19:10).

f. Monotheism and Christology in the NT. Christ confirms monotheism by depriving the prince of this world of his power. He himself sharpens the monotheistic confession (Mk. 10:18), is consumed by zeal for God's house (Jn. 2:17), prays constantly to God, and calls him exclusively "my Father" (Jn. 20:17). As the Son he has power to forgive sins, will sit on God's throne and judge the world, bears the name Logos, mediates creation (Jn. 1:3) and salvation (1 Cor. 10:4), and precedes angels (Heb. 1). He battles the devil (Lk. 22:28; 1 Jn. 3:8), resisting his temptations, driving out demons, binding the strong man, turning the apparent defeat of the cross into victory, and establishing the dominion of the one God (1 Cor. 15:28). God has sent, instituted, accredited, confirmed, anointed, and exalted him. God is with him, empowers him, and works with and through him, reconciling the world to himself (2 Cor. 5:19). He comes from God and returns to him. Faith in him and faith in God are the same (cf. Jn. 14:1, 9; 10:30; 17:11). The forerunner of God in Mal. 3:1 is the forerunner of Jesus in Mk. 1:2. Jesus uses the divine egṓ eimi. He is first Judge and then God in 1 Cor. 4:4-5. All things are by and to him as well as God (Rom. 11:36; 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:16). He is the First and the Last (Rev. 1:17; cf. v. 8). Yet God is his God and Head and Father (Eph. 1:17; 1 Cor. 11:3; Jn. 5:18). He, too, is "of" God (1 Cor. 3:23). His titles, with the article, express his uniqueness (the holy one, elect, anointed, son, etc.), but the genitive "of theós " shows his derivation from God. The exception is kýrios.

g. Christ as theós in Primitive Christianity. In Jn. 10:30ff. Jesus proves that the use of theoí for humans is not unbiblical, though he himself claims only to be God's Son. In Heb. 1:8-9 the designation of the OT king as theós is transferred to Jesus. In Rom. 9:4-5 Christ is called theós directly unless we have in the last clause an independent doxology. In Jn. 1:1 "the Logos was God" (and cf. some readings of 1:18). Thomas recognizes Jesus as his God in Jn. 20:28 (cf. the blind man in 9:38). Cf. also Tit. 2:13 and outside the NT Did. 10.6, Ignatius Ephesians 18.2 etc., and Pliny Letters 10.96.7. Christ as the representative of God is himself the bearer of the divine nature and office.

h. The Threefold Relation of God, Christ, and Spirit. The relation between God and Christ finds expression in formulas that state both their unity and God's primacy (1 Cor. 8:6; 1 Tim. 2:5; Mt. 23:8ff.). Triadic formulas occur which include angels (Lk. 9:26), and cf. the spirits of Rev. 1:4-5. But the usual triad is God, Christ, and the Spirit, who stands in a special relation to both God (Jn. 4:24) and Christ (Mk. 3:29-30; Lk. 1:35. Jn. 3:34; Rom. 8:27, 34; Jn. 16:14), but who also continues Christ's work (Jn. 14:26; Gal. 4:4ff.). We thus find triadic formulas embracing God, Christ, and Spirit in 1 Cor. 12:4ff.; 2 Cor. 13:13; Mt. 28:19. These formulas express the indissoluble threefold relationship but do not actually speak of triunity. The clear-cut statement of 1 Jn. 5 is brought into the text only in the sixth century.

3. The Personal Being of God.

a. The Conflict with Anthropomorphism in the Jewish World. The LXX tries to purify the concept of God by minor alterations, e.g., bringing in a divine messenger in Ex. 4:24, or putting "power" for "hand" in Josh. 4:24, or speaking of seeing God's place instead of God in Ex. 24:10, or saying that God becomes gracious for his repenting in Gen. 6:6-7. Later Hellenists go further by allegorizing the OT, finding abstract content in anthropomorphisms, and substituting philosophical concepts. Yet faith in the personal God remains. Thus Josephus uses alien terms but is still speaking of the living God of his fathers. The rabbis avoid allegorizing but explain anthropomorphisms as divine accommodation to human frailty, though they themselves in prayer call God Father, speak of his ear and hand for their needs, and think of him as weeping over Jerusalem. Stressing God's will, they do not equate him with his attributes but bring out his personal character. Thus, while both Greeks and Jews eliminate anthropomorphism, the former regard personality as itself anthropomorphic but the latter distinguish between anthropomorphism and faith in the personal God. God is not as we are, but he wills, speaks, and hears.

b. The Personal God of the NT. Anthropomorphism is a dead issue in the NT. God's personal nature is here a living reality disclosed in Christ and the Spirit (2 Cor. 4:6; Rom. 8:27; cf. the prayer "Abba" in Rom. 8:15). We respond to God's Thou to us with our Thou to God. God is the living God of will and purpose to whom we may come with prayers and cries for aid. He is known to be faithful and true (Rom. 11:29; Jn. 3:33; Tit. 1:2), gracious (Rom. 2:4), righteous (Rom. 1:18), holy, and perfect (Mt. 5:48). These are not abstract descriptions but historical attestations. They are expressed by attributive or predicative adjectives (Rom. 16:27 etc.), by a genitive of theós with noun (Rom. 3:3) or theós with genitive (Rom. 15:5 etc.), by bold equation (1 Jn. 4:8, which makes God the origin and norm of love), by predications referring to his nature (Rom. 16:26; 1 Tim. 1:11), and by equation with neutral predication (Jn. 4:24; 1 Jn. 1:5).

4. The Transcendence of God.

a. The Power of God as Ruler in Semitic Religion. (1) In the Semitic world deities are defined by their power and thus bear titles of rule. In relation to people they are masters, protectors, judges, fathers, kings. In relation to the world they are rulers who control its destiny. (2) Magical ideas, fertility cults, and astral mythologies dissolve this concept in syncretism, but in Israel the prophets deepen it. Israel's God is the absolute Creator and Ruler of all things. The LXX expresses this by stressing the term kýrios and such related words as despótēs and basileús.

b. God and the World in Later Judaism. God is above the world and uses intermediaries to execute his commands. He is immortal, but dynamically so as Ruler. He is not outside the world but above it, and hence omnipresent rather than distant. He is the all, but as its Creator and not in any pantheistic sense. We are not "in" God by natural or ecstatic union, but we come "from" him. He is "with" us in virtue of his covenant, so that in every need we may pray to him, knowing that the Ruler of all things will extend his powerful protection. Apocalyptic descries an opposition of will that distorts the form of this world but God can omnipotently bend all things to his own purpose, so that one may confidently expect his final triumph and dominion.

c. The Transcendent God of the NT. In the NT, too, God is kýrios etc. He is not outside the world but above it. Heaven and earth are together God's creation, though heaven is superior as God's throne (Mt. 5:34-35), and earthly forces oppose God's lordship in heaven (cf. Mt. 6:10). The Christ event is the decisive encounter between heaven and earth that apocalyptic awaited (Lk. 17:20, which means that the kingdom is present in Jesus). In Jesus God is with us—Immanuel (Mt. 1:23; cf. Is. 7:14). His heavenly form and nature find earthly manifestation in servanthood and crucifixion (Phil. 2:6ff.). The Word became flesh (Jn. 1:14). The encounter does not mean human enlightenment or divinization, nor a divine-human marriage, but a heightening and overcoming of the tension by Christ's death and resurrection. The tension is not that of infinite and finite or eternity and time, as in Hellenistic philosophy. God is not restricted by metaphysical relations (cf. Lk. 3:8). No natural or historical power can thwart God (Rom. 11:23-24). His word is life and death (Lk. 12:20). All life's changes and chances are from him. God is with his people as its Ruler and Protector, but with a new certainty in Christ that Paul expresses with his hypér in Rom. 8:31-32. In virtue of this "God for us" the cosmic anxiety of antiquity is resolved. Words like moíra do not occur in the NT. Along with this transcendence, there is, of course, a certain immanence as well. Believers are the house in which God dwells. God is among them (cf. 1 Cor. 14:25: en hymín). He is the Father who is in all, though this "in all" is to be understood in terms of the preceding "above and through all" (Eph. 4:6; cf. 1 Cor. 12:6; Col. 1:17). 1 Jn. 4:16 refers to a mutual abiding, though more in the sense of faithfulness than metaphysical union. This accords with the important role of prayer in the Johannine writings. Prayer has no place when immanentism dissolves the I-Thou relation. Prayer presupposes a God who is above the world and to whom we may turn with confidence in time of need. Various terms for prayer occur in the NT. It is addressed to God. Made in the name of Jesus, it has purpose as well as assurance. Its climax is petition for the definitive actualizing of God's rule whose victory the Christ event has already decided (Lk. 11:2). Even after the Christ event, this actualizing is still an object of faith, not sight. The first encounter will come to completion when all conflict is removed (Rev. 21:3-4) and God is all in all (1 Cor. 15:28).

theótēs (→ theiótēs). This word, meaning "divinity," occurs in the NT only in Col. 2:9 (cf. 1:19-20). The one God, to whom all deity belongs, has given this fullness of deity to the incarnate Christ.

átheos. There were seven basic forms of atheism in antiquity: 1. the practical atheism of the ignorant, careless, and hedonistic (cf. Is. 22:13; Rom. 1:30); 2. the secularized religion of the state-cult (Ezek. 28:2; Dan. 11:36; Rev. 13); 3. belief in fate (cf. Col. 1); 4. metaphysical reinterpretation of beliefs; 5. religious doubt (cf. Ps. 73); 6. defiance of the omnipotent God (cf. Moses in Ex. 32:32; Jeremiah; Job); 7. any denial of God or the gods (Jews and Christians are accused of atheism by polytheists, whose gods they reject, while Eph. 2:11-12 calls pagans átheoi, and cf. Mart. Pol. 9.2).

theodídaktos. Unlike theópneustos, which is used for canonical Scripture (2 Tim. 3:16), theodídaktos ("taught by God") is used in 1 Th. 4:9 for Christians as members of the new community (cf. Jer. 31:34; Is. 54:13; Jn. 6:45). [E. STAUFFER, III, 94-121]

theíos. a. Adjective of theós, this means "divine" relative to all that bears the stamp of deity, e.g., as predominant power, final reality, supreme meaning, or philosophical conception. The educated like the term and often use the impersonal theía phýsis for God. Humans may also be theíos, e.g., seers, priests, singers, saviors, and rulers. b. The noun tó theíon is a common term for "deity." The NT uses theíos only in passages under Hellenistic influence (2 Pet. 1:3-4; Acts 17:29), but with no surrender of faith in the personal God.

theíotēs. Formed from theíos, this, too, means "divinity" in the sense that something is divine, whether a god or imperial majesty. The only NT instance is in Rom. 1:20: God's deity may be perceived in creation. [H. KLEINKNECHT, III, 122-23]

theosebḗs [God-fearing], theosébeia [piety, reverence for God]

A. Usage outside the NT. 1. True piety is the point behind this compound of theós (i.e., honoring the gods), but in a critical sense it means "superstition," and more generally it simply denotes "religion." 2. The group is rare in the LXX (though eusébeia is common in 4 Maccabees), but when used (e.g., in Job 1:1; Ex. 18:21), it has the sense of true religion. The noun occurs only in Prov. 1:29. 3. theosebḗs may be found on a few inscriptions to describe the Jews as holding the true religion. The Jews themselves like the term "God-fearers" for themselves and Gentile adherents, since it implies that they are worshippers of the true God.

B. NT Usage. The NT avoids the group, using theosebḗs and theosébeia only once each. The adjective occurs in Jn. 9:31: God hears those who fear him, which is defined as doing his will (cf. Prov. 15:29; Job 27:9). The noun comes in 1 Tim. 2:10, which teaches that women professing religion (i.e., Christianity) should substantiate their confession with good deeds.

C. Early Christian Usage. The terms are still infrequent in the apostolic fathers. In Mart. Pol. 3 theosébeia is obviously Christianity (cf. 2 Clem. 20.4). The words are more common in the Apologists. In Justin Dialogue 110.2 theosébeia comes through the apostolic preaching. In Athenagoras Supplication 37.1 Christians are the true God-fearers. Diognetus charmingly describes the theosébeia of Christians. Origen Against Celsus 3.59 and 81 tries to bring out the uniqueness of the theosébeia of Jesus. In this instance, however, the use of the general term "religion" tends to surrender the point at the outset. The restricted Jewish and NT use for true worship in contrast to idolatry is thus threatened by the invasion of a more general anthropocentric use which is intrinsically alien to the biblical revelation. [G. BERTRAM, III, 123-28]

therapeúō [to heal, serve], therapeía [healing], therápōn [servant]

therapeúō.

1. This word, in secular Greek, means a. "to serve," "to be serviceable," and b. "to care for the sick," "to treat," "to cure" (also figuratively).

2. The same senses may be found in Judaism (cf. "to serve" in Esth. 1:1b and "to heal" in Sir. 18:19). Philo refers to healing of both body and soul.

3. In view of the miracles of Jesus, one might expect many parallels among the rabbis of his day, but in fact we have only isolated instances.

4.a. In the NT therapeúō never means "to serve" in a secular sense, and only once in Acts 17:25 does it denote worship. Paul's point here is that the true God has no cultic dwelling and does not need a cultic ministry, so that the therapeúein that is suitable for idols is inappropriate to him.

b. A much more common use is for "healing," not merely in the sense of medical treatment, but in the sense of the real healing that the Messiah brings. Jesus has power to heal the sick (Lk. 7:21ff.). This is no less a part of his ministry than preaching (Mk. 4:23). No sickness can resist him. He heals many (Mk. 3:10) or all (Mt. 12:15), whether they be ill, lame, blind, maimed, or deaf and dumb, and whenever the need arises even though it be on the sabbath (Mt. 12:10 etc.). Driving out demons is one form of healing. This is done by the word in what is sometimes a violent struggle (cf. Lk. 4:40-41; Mk. 3:10-11). The word also cures ailments or defects, though Jesus will often touch the sick (Mk. 1:41), take their hand (1:31), lay on hands (5:23), or perform acts like those of doctors (7:33; cf. Jms. 5:14). The sick may simply touch him or his garment (Mk. 3:10; 5:28; cf. Peter's shadow in Acts 5:15 and Paul's clothing in Acts 19:12). The healing is total as Jesus, initiating the age of salvation, takes away the sicknesses of the people (Mt. 8:17; cf. Is. 53:4). The actual processes may have parallels in Greek and Jewish records, but the important point is the demonstration that with Jesus God's kingdom has already broken into our suffering world. The real miracle, then, is not the breaking of natural law but victory in the conflict for world mastery. Following up this victory, Jesus commands his disciples to heal the sick. The command itself, received in faith, grants them the power (Mt. 10:1 etc.). The risen Lord repeats the commission, and in Jesus' name the apostles heal the sick and demon-possessed (Acts 5:16; cf. Peter in Acts 3:1ff., Philip in Acts 8:7, Paul in Acts 28:8-9). Healing may be blocked, however, by a false attitude: skepticism in Nazareth (Lk. 4:23; Mk. 6:5), and the weak faith of the disciples in the case of the epileptic boy (Mt. 17:14ff.).

c. The serious wound that is inflicted on the beast is healed according to Rev. 13:3, 12. The event to which this refers cannot be fixed with certainty.

therapeía. This word means a. "household" and b. "healing." For a. cf. Mt. 24:45 and for b. Lk. 9:11 (medical) and Rev. 22:2 (eschatological). The LXX has the term for "divine worship" (e.g., Joel 1:14), but the NT never has this sense.

therápōn. Common in the LXX, this word is used in the NT only for Moses in Heb. 3:5. The point is that Moses is a servant in contrast to Jesus the Son (cf. Gal. 4:1ff.). [H. W. BEYER, III, 128-32]

therízō [to reap, harvest], therismós [harvest]

therízō. a. Literally "to reap," b. figuratively "to reap a harvest" (cf. a moral action and its consequences either ethically or eschatologically in the LXX and Philo). The NT uses the word literally in Mt. 6:26 and figuratively in Jms. 5:4 (with an eschatological thrust). What is reaped corresponds necessarily to what is sown (Gal. 6:7ff.). This provides a motive for right conduct. The results of mission, too, are a harvest based on what is sown (Jn. 4:36ff.). But here one may have the joy of reaping what others sow. Material support is also a harvest related to the spiritual seed that is sown (1 Cor. 9:11).

therismós. The LXX uses this word for "harvest" literally in Gen. 8:22 and figuratively for world judgment (the separation of the elect people from the nations) in Joel 4:1ff. An ethical sense may be found in apocalyptic (eschatological) and Philo (psychological). The literal sense occurs in the NT in Jn. 4:35, the figurative (God's eschatological decision) in Mt. 13:30; Mk. 4:29; Rev. 14:15. The hour of this decision is imminent (Mt. 9:37-38) and the criterion is ethical (Mt. 13:41ff.). Both promise and threat are implied (Mt. 3:12; 13:30), for the decision entails separation in consequence of present action. [F. HAUCK, III, 132-33]

theōréō → horáō

thēríon [wild animal, beast]

A diminutive of thḗr, thériōn means "wild animal," sometimes including birds and insects, and later any animal. The LXX uses the term only for land animals, usually wild, and if Tit. 1:12 adds kakós, no addition is needed to convey the sense of a wild beast. The figurative sense (humans as beasts) also occurs. Wild animals are with Jesus (as well as angels) in the desert in Mk. 1:12. The sense here is literal; there is no need to think of Gen. 2 or of a mythological conflict. The thēríon of Rev. 13:2 links Revelation to Dan. 7, but one cannot simply equate the beast of Revelation and the fourth beast (Rome) of Dan. 7. Since there is antithetical parallelism between God and the dragon, Christ and the beast, and the seven spirits and the second beast (Rev. 13:11ff.), the first beast is antichrist. This wounded beast stands in contrast to the slain Lamb (5:6). The beast, which is wounded but not slain, enforces worship by violence, persecutes believers, and dishonors God by serving as the dragon's representative; the Lamb, on the other hand, gives himself up in service to a self-sacrificial death, receives honor and power, and brings glory to the Father. The second beast is the false prophet of the last time who acts like a true prophet but whose prophecy is a devilish temptation to worship the first beast (13:11ff.). Elsewhere in the imagery of Revelation demonic powers are commonly depicted as beasts: the locusts of 9:1ff., the horses of 9:16ff., and the frogs of 16:13-14. One may see here a distinction from zṓon, which includes humans. In a fallen creation the beasts seem to signify the perversion of our calling as those who are made in God's image. They can thus symbolize the demonic element that corrupts what is truly human into what is subhuman. [W. FOERSTER, III, 133-35] thēsaurós [treasure, treasure chest], thēsaurízō [to keep, lay up] thēsaurós. a. “What is deposited,” “store,” “treasure.” b. “Place of storage,” “warehouse,” “treasure chamber or chest” (e.g., temple treasury). The LXX has both a. (Josh. 6:19 etc.; also figuratively in Is. 33:6) and b. (Am. 8:5; figuratively in Jer. 51:16 etc.). In Judaism good works are a treasure laid up with God; interest may be paid now, but the capital is kept for the judgment. Eternity is also a treasure house to which the righteous go (cf. Lk. 23:46; Rev. 6:9). The NT has a. “treasure” in the literal sense in Mt. 13:44, with a figurative use in Mt. 12:35 (the heart’s treasure), Mt. 6:19ff. (heavenly in contrast to earthly treasures, but with a new urgency and no thought of merit), Col. 2:3 (the treasures of true wisdom and knowledge hidden in Christ), and 2 Cor. 4:7 (the treasure of the new life in Christ that we have as yet only in earthen vessels). The NT also has sense b. (“treasure chest”) in Mt. 2:11; 13:52. In sense a. thēsaurós is important in Gnosticism for the treasure of light and Christ as treasure and pearl. Perhaps Gnostic terminology influenced Col. 2:3, but cf. Is. 45:3.

thesaurízō. “To keep,” “hoard,” “lay up,” especially valuables. In the LXX see 2 Kgs. 20:17 and figuratively Am. 3:10. Christ forbids the heaping up of earthly goods as materialistic and egotistical (Lk. 12:21). They may be lost if not renounced, for they carry no security (Mt. 6:19ff.). Acts of love are a storing of treasure in heaven (Mt. 6:20). Paul uses the word literally for the setting aside of weekly offerings in 1 Cor. 16:2 (cf. 2 Cor. 12:14), but in Rom. 2:5 the use is figurative for the storing up of wrath by the impenitent (cf. God’s keeping of the present world for judgment in 2 Pet. 3:7). [F. HAUCK, III, 136-38]

thlíbō [to press, afflict], thlípsis [pressure, affliction]

A. thlíbō, thlípsis in Secular Greek.

1. thlíbō means literally “to press,” “squash,” “hem in,” then “to be narrow.” thlípsis means “pressure” in the physical sense, e.g., medically of the pulse.

2. thlíbō figuratively means “to afflict,” “harass” with the nuances a. “to discomfit,” b. “to oppress” or “vex.” Philosophically the group is used for life’s afflictions.

B. thlíbō, thlípsis in the LXX.

1. The theologically significant figurative use is common in the LXX for various Hebrew terms meaning a. “to distress,” b. “to treat with hostility,” c. “to afflict,” d. “to oppress,” and e. “to harass,” “be hostile to,” and even “destroy,” or, in the case of the noun, a. “trouble,” b. “distress,” c. “oppression,” “tribulation,” etc. 2. Both internal and external afflictions are in view, the former covering both distress and anxiety, the latter the afflictions of slaves or aliens, oppression by enemies, and such troubles as illness, desert wandering, and shipwreck. 3. Inner fear or anguish may be intended (cf. Gen. 42:21). 4. The terms acquire theological significance because the reference is usually to the distress of Israel (or the righteous), e.g., in Egypt (Ex. 4:31), or exile (Dt. 4:29). Often such distress is seen as a divine visitation on the people, so that we read of a present or future day of affliction (Is. 37:3; Hab. 3:16). 5. Yet the righteous also suffer various afflictions (enemies, sickness, etc.) from which God delivers them (cf. Pss. 9:9; 32:7, etc.). In later Judaism afflictions are said to bring about repentance, increase merit, or achieve expiation for the self or others.

C. thlíbō, thlípsis in the NT.

I. The Nature of Tribulation.

1. The terms are common in the NT (especially in Paul), and are mostly figurative. Both believers and apostles undergo affliction. It is factual (Acts 11:19 etc.) but also unavoidable (Jn. 16:33). Israel is a type in this regard. Paul as an apostle suffers particular affliction (cf. 1 Th. 3:3-4; Acts 20:23; 2 Cor. 1:4-5; Col. 1:24).

2. These sufferings are Christ's own sufferings, which, not yet exhausted (Col. 1:24), continue in the apostle. The apostle experiences Christ's own passion as he is given up to death for the church (2 Cor. 4:10-11). In proclaiming the word, he exemplifies it. The martyrs of Rev. 7:14 bear similar witness to Christ's own sufferings. The church's sufferings are Christ's in a representative capacity. Christ suffers in his people on the basis of his own suffering.

3. Christian suffering, then, is inseparable from the Christian life, is Christ's own suffering, and is eschatological in view of its occurrence in the aeon that Christ has ended (cf. 1 Cor. 7:26ff.; Mt. 24:4ff., 9ff., 15ff.; Rev. 1:9, where present afflictions are set in the light of the great end-time tribulation). Judaism, too, expected eschatological tribulation, but new features in the NT are (a) that this final tribulation has begun, (b) that the Messiah's own passion initiates it, and (c) that it is suffered by his scattered people.

4. There is also an affliction associated with the last judgment, when the unrighteous and those who afflict the church will come under God's wrath (Rom. 2:9; 2 Th. 1:6). The church anticipates this judgment as it is associated with Christ in his vicarious suffering of divine judgment. In this sense Christian affliction is for faith a true demonstration of God's righteous judgment (2 Th. 1:5).

II. The Experience of Tribulation.

1. Christian afflictions are of different kinds (cf. the synonyms in Rom. 2:9; 1 Th. 3:7; Jn. 16:21; Mk. 4:17). Specific references are to persecution in 1 Th. 1:6, imprisonment in Acts 20:23, derision in Heb. 10:33, poverty in 2 Cor. 5:13, and perhaps sickness in Rev. 2:22 (cf. also the lists in Rev. 8:35 and 2 Cor. 11:23ff.). We also find inner distress and sorrow (Phil. 1:17) or anxiety and fear (2 Cor. 7:5).

2. The common power of affliction is that of the death that works in it (2 Cor. 1:8-9; 4:10-11; 11:23). Christ's suffering in his members is an experience of the effects of the death that he has defeated (cf. Phil. 3:10). Affliction leaves its external mark on our present life with its contingency and corruptibility (2 Cor. 4:16). It thus brings us under the test whether we will champion the gospel at the risk of life, whether we will see life in terms of its own possibilities or of those opened up by the divine promise (cf. 2 Cor. 1:8-9). Faith accepts the divine judgment in affliction and offers life back to God. It thus leads to patient endurance (2 Th. 1:4) which in hope focuses on what is not seen, thus giving comfort (2 Cor. 1:5-6) and the assurance that coming glory far outweighs present suffering (2 Cor. 4:17-18). We have, then, a virtuous circle whereby the promise gives hope, hope accepts suffering, suffering nourishes endurance, and endurance augments hope, fulfilling thereby the joy of the Spirit's promise.

3. With this acceptance of affliction Christians edify the community. In it the word becomes a relevant promise of comfort to others (2 Cor. 1:4ff.). In his people's suffering Christ himself builds up the church, thus showing that in fact he has already broken the power of affliction. [H. SCHLIER, III, 139-48]

thnḗskō, thnētós → thánatos

thrēnéō [to mourn, lament], thrḗnos [mourning, lamentation]

From Homer on thrḗnos is a technical term for "mourning" and may even mean "lament" or "dirge." The verb, however, is not restricted to lamenting for the dead.

A. thrḗnos in Graeco-Roman Culture.

1. In Greece mourning is an essential part of burial during the display of the corpse and the actual interment. The dirge serves as homage to the departed. Women play a prominent part, but men also sing laments. Professionals are often used. Solon tried to restrict excesses connected with the related growth of a burial industry, e.g., by laying down that mourners must be relatives.

2. Near Eastern influences reduced the effectiveness of Solon's reforms. These may be seen in the use of lamentations to bewail the death of the cult-god in the mysteries.

3. The Romans follow the Greeks in the singing of dirges by close female relatives during the showing of the corpse and burial.

B. thrḗnos in Near Eastern Culture. Near Eastern customs allow a place for more violent lamentation. Here again women play a more important part than men.

1. The OT. The LXX normally uses thrḗnos for the lament rather than more spontaneous mourning. Mourning takes place in the house and then during interment. Relatives are the first to mourn, though there may be national mourning for outstanding figures (cf. Gen. 50:3, 10). Professional mourners are found, and the formal dirge replaces the original less formal lamentation (cf. Gen. 23:2). Inspired poets like David (2 Sam. 1:17ff.) and Jeremiah (Jer. 9:9) take the place of the paid threnodists of Greece. Women are again prominent (Jer. 9:10; Ezek. 32:16), especially virgins (Joel 1:8; Jer. 9:20). No cultic lamentation occurs in the OT. Instead of mourning for a dead god, the living God himself, through his prophets, calls for lamentation on account of judgment on his people or the destruction of other peoples. Thus thrḗnos becomes an important prophetic word, whether it refers to the thrḗnos of the prophet, of those affected, or of spectators (cf. Is. 14:4). The circle widens as the divine judgments become universal. thrḗnos may cover the whole land (Am. 5:16), especially the high places (Jer. 7:29 etc.). For examples of Hebrew thrḗnoi see Lamentations; 2 Sam. 1:19ff.; Am. 5:1ff.; Is. 14:4ff.

2. Judaism. In postbiblical Judaism mourning customs are fixed and codified. Lamentation takes place in the house and at the interment. Flutes are played, but their use is restricted (e.g., not in the house or procession or on certain days). Dirges are sung by women, who also clap their hands. Women relatives play little part, but the men eulogize the dead, beating their breasts and heads and stamping their feet. Paid speakers deliver orations near the grave. Burial inscriptions (epitáphioi thrḗnoi) are referred to by Josephus in Antiquities 7.42.

C. thrēnéō and thrḗnos in the NT. The noun occurs only in Mt. 2:18 (uncertain) and the verb only in Mt. 11:17 (Lk. 7:32); Lk. 23:27; Jn. 16:20. Except in John the reference is strictly to mourning but not to the formal lament.

1. The use of thrēnéō bears witness to Jewish customs at the time of Jesus (cf. weeping, beating on the breast, and the lamenting of the women on the way to Golgotha).

2. An inner continuation of OT trends may be seen in Mt. 2:17-18 (quoting Jer. 31:15). The NT fulfilment corresponds here to the OT prophecy inasmuch as God accomplishes a miraculous deliverance amid complete destruction. The thrḗnos of the mother of Israel (Rachel) is taken up by the mothers of Bethlehem, but over both rings out the voice of the éleos of God, so that with the proleptic preservation of the Savior Jesus the voice of lamentation becomes the voice of joy. The women of Israel lament similarly as Jesus marches to the cross in a burial procession (cf. the anointing). But Jesus forbids this, for he himself is on the way to life and Jerusalem to destruction, so that it is for themselves and their children that the women should mourn. We thus have here another instance of the prophetic intimation of thrḗnos. In Jn. 16:20 there is a reference, of course, to the lamenting of the disciples at the death of Jesus, but the term now has a broader reference to the lamenting of his people during the whole period of affliction prior to his parousia (cf. v. 21). At the same time, as Israel’s mourning is turned into joy by Christ’s first coming, so the mourning of the church will be turned into joy by his second coming. His people passed through the night of sorrow and death to the day of joy and life. In Mt. 11:17 (Lk. 7:32) the mourning, like the piping, is an attempt to tell God what he ought to say through his messengers. The people’s leaders, like the children, want to give orders to God (cf. Ahab in 1 Kgs. 22:8ff.). They will not accept the divine singularity of the messengers and they evade the claim of God thereby (cf. Mk. 3:22, 29-30). God’s acts are accompanied by human thrḗnos, but in the NT this centers on Jesus himself, the messenger of joy. There is thrḗnos at his birth and death, and during its time of tribulation with him his church also knows thrḗnos. Yet since he is the messenger of joy, we are not to expect thrḗnos from him personally, and the thrḗnos of the church militant will finally be the chará of the church triumphant. [G. STÄHLIN, III, 148-55]

→ klaíō, klauthmós, kóptō, kopetós, lypéō, lýpē, penthéō, pénthos

thrēskeía [religion], thrḗskos [religious], ethelothrēskeía [self-made religion]

1. This group, rare in the LXX and NT, is common in Greek.

2. The etymology is disputed; early suggestions were derivation from Thrace or thréomai ("to tremble"), while modern scholars favor a link with therap- ("to serve").

3. Distinction of meaning may also be noted. The good sense is "religious zeal" (for which Thracian women were noted), "worship of God," "religion" (cf. Josephus Antiquities 1.13.1). This seems to be meant in Acts 26:5 and Jms. 1:26-27.

4. But there is also a bad sense, i.e., "religious excess," "wrong worship"; this is the point in Col. 2:18 with its attack on the cult of angels.

5. The bad sense is not intrinsically necessary but is added by the genitive. In itself thrēskeía is a colorless word rather like cultus. It has to do mostly with the externals of worship, and makes them a matter of taste or choice. Synonyms like therapeúō, epiméleia, and hierourgía are similarly rare in the NT. This indicates that expressions denoting a religious attitude to God find little place in NT Christianity, for here one's attitude to God is the response to God's claim, and in distinction from cultus the Bible speaks of faith as the obedience of the whole person to God (cf. the phrase leitourgía tḗs písteōs in Phil. 2:17).

6. The word ethelothrēskeía in Col. 2:23 seems to have been coined by the author to denote, not an affected piety, but a piety that does not keep to its true reality,to Christ, but is self-ordered. [K. L. SCHMIDT, III, 155-59]

thriambeúō [to lead in triumph]

The basis of "triumph," thriambeúō means a. "to triumph over" and b. "to lead in triumph." In the NT it occurs in sense b. Christ's way to the cross is paradoxically God's triumph march in which he leads the powers (Col. 2:15). Christians, too, are led in triumph (2 Cor. 2:15), but for them, as Christ's servants, it means grace and ministry. [G. DELLING, III, 159-60]

thrónos [throne]

A. The Throne outside the NT.

1. On the Usage. This word, related to seat and footstool, denotes a high stool with back, arms, and footstool. It is a seat for elders, teachers, etc., and is later reserved for kings and gods. In the plural (cf. Col. 1:16) it may denote royal or divine power. The LXX, which has it for kisē', often adds genitives, e.g., throne of glory (1 Sam. 2:8), of the kingdom, i.e., royal (1 Kgs. 9:5), of wickedness (Ps. 94:20); cf. throne of glory in Mt. 19:28 and of grace in Heb. 4:16.

2. The Throne in the Greek World. The royal throne comes to Greece from the Near East. The divine throne is the prerogative of Zeus, though there is sometimes a double throne for Zeus and Hera. Thrones also occur in the cult of the dead. There is no equivalent to a real divine throne in the OT, though cf. heaven as God's throne. The ark is never spoken of as the empty throne of God.

3. The Throne in the OT. The throne is the seat of the king (Gen. 41:40), the queen mother (1 Kgs. 2:19), and the governor (Neh. 3:7). The firstborn of Pharaoh shares the throne (Ex. 11:5), and Solomon sits on David's throne (1 Kgs. 1:13). The throne is thus a symbol of rule. David's throne is to last forever (2 Sam. 7:12ff.). It is the Messiah's throne in Is. 9:6. Since David's kingship implies that of God, the throne is that of Yahweh's kingdom (1 Chr. 28:5) or of Yahweh himself (1 Chr. 29:23). References, then, to the throne of God (cf. Is. 6:5; Ezek. 1:26) or to God's throne in heaven (Is. 66:1) are meant to express the majesty of the divine Ruler. This majesty manifests itself on earth; the coming age of salvation is the Lord's throne in Jer. 3:17 (cf. the link with the name and covenant in 14:21). Majesty and presence also come together in the address in Jer. 17:12-13. The power of God's throne extends over the Gentiles (Ps. 47:8). It is eternal (Ps. 93:2; Lam. 5:19). It carries with it the administration of justice (Ps. 9:4, 7). Thrones are depicted in the judgment scene in Dan. 7:9ff. The throne of the Ancient of Days is fiery flames, and myriads of angels surround it.

4. The Throne in Hellenistic Judaism. In Wis. 18:15 the word comes down from God's throne to judge Egypt. Wisdom itself is the occupant of the throne in Wis. 9:4. The martyrs are near the throne in 4 Macc. 17:18. Josephus mentions the throne in Antiquities 3.137, but he and Philo avoid the idea of God's throne as too anthropomorphic.

5. The Throne in Palestinian Judaism. The rabbis show great interest in the throne. It is a precosmic work. The righteous dead are under it, the martyrs being closest. Of the angels, the throne angels are nearest. The thrones of Daniel are for the great men of Israel. The Son of Man sits on the throne of judgment in Eth. En. 45:3 etc.

B. The Throne in the NT. The NT refers freely but nonspeculatively to God's throne and associates the throne of Christ with it.

1. Heaven as God's Throne. On the basis of Is. 66:1ff. Jesus calls heaven the throne of God (Mt. 5:34). Swearing by it is swearing by God. Stephen quotes the same verse to show that God cannot be enclosed in a human temple (Acts 7:49).

2. The Throne of David. David's throne is the throne of the Messiah King in Lk. 1:32. Heb. 1:8 refers Ps. 45:6 to Christ as the eternal Son. The Davidic monarchy reaches its true fulfilment with the sovereign majesty of the Messiah.

3. The Throne of Glory. This phrase occurs often in Synoptic sayings with reference to the future rule of the Messiah over Israel, in which the disciples share (Mt. 19:28). This rule extends to the Gentiles (Mt. 25:31-32), though others do not now have a part. In Revelation, too, there are thrones at the beginning of the millennial rule (20:4), but at the end there is only the great white throne of world judgment and the one who sits on it (20:11).

4. The Throne of Grace. Now that Jesus, our great High Priest, is seated at God's right hand, the throne may be called the throne of grace, for God's sovereignty is manifested in mercy rather than condemnation (Heb. 4: 14ff.).

5. The Throne of God and of the Lamb. In the vision in Rev. 4 the throne, though not described, is central. Worship is addressed to him who sits on it (4:8ff.). The exalted Christ shares the throne (cf. 5:13; 6:16). It is the Lamb that feeds the host before the throne (7:15ff.). The stream of 22:1 issues from the throne of God and the Lamb. The throne of God and the Lamb is in the city (22:3). Already in 3:21 Jesus shares this throne with his Father and promises the fellowship of the throne to overcomers. The elders have their own thrones in 4:4, but these are not autonomous, for they worship him who sits on the throne. In contrast, God's own throne itself is finally the throne of the Lamb. This twofold throne represents the same eternal dominion.

6. The Throne of Satan and of the Beast. There is an ungodly counterpart to the throne of God and the Lamb. The throne of Satan in Rev. 2:13 may contain an allusion to the cult of Aesculapius at Pergamos, or more narrowly to the altar to Zeus in the fortress there. The dragon gives a throne to the beast in 13:2, and an angel pours out a vial on the throne of the beast in 16:10. This results in darkness for his kingdom; the throne and dominion are related.

7. The Throne as a Class of Angels. Col. 1:16 mentions "thrones" among the supraterrestrial powers (cf. Slav. En. 20:1). The reference seems to be to the highest class of angelic powers. [O. SCHMITZ, III, 160-67][5]

thymós [passion, wrath], epithymía [desire], epithyméō [to desire], epithymētḗs [one who desires], enthyméomai [to consider], enthýmēsis [hidden thought] thymós (→ orgḗ). thýō denotes violent movement (of air, water, the ground, or living creatures). From the sense "to boil up" comes "to smoke" and then "to sacrifice." thymós means what is moved or moves, i.e., vital force, and it may then denote such varied things as desire, impulse, spirit, anger, sensibility, disposition, and thought. In the NT thymós occurs five times in Paul, once in Hebrews, twice in Luke, and ten times in Revelation (five with toú theoú). The meaning is always "wrath," human in Paul, Hebrews, and Luke but not in Rom. 2:8, divine in Revelation except in 12:12 (the dragon's wrath). Symbols are wine and cup (from the OT), as well as vials (cf. Rev. 14:10, 19; 15:7). In Rev. 14:8; 18:3 Babylon has brought the nations into ungodliness, so that they have fallen into sin and under God's wrath (cf. Jer. 25:15ff.). thymós is the same as wrath, and the phrase the thymós of wrath (orgē) occurs in Rev. 16:19; 19:15.

epithymía, epithyméō (→ hēdonḗ).

1. This group denotes desire, especially for food or sex. This desire is morally neutral at first, but philosophy, holding aloof from the sensory world, regards it as reprehensible, and in Stoicism epithymía is one of the four chief passions. Epicurus distinguishes between natural and illicit desires, subdividing the former into the purely natural and those that are necessary to happiness.

2. The OT condemns the evil will as well as the evil act, e.g., coveting. Sexual self-discipline is demanded (cf. 2 Sam. 11:2). In Judaism fasting, regulation of meats, and strict keeping of the sabbath are important. Desire is sometimes viewed as the main sin, for epithymía conflicts with supreme devotion to God.

---

[5]Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (303). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

i.e. id est, that is

NT New Testament

OT Old Testament

cf. confer, compare

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

3. Stoicism and Judaism combine in the Hellenists. The LXX has epithymía for base desire in, e.g., Num. 11:4 (though epithymeín can denote pious striving in Is 58:2). Philo summons us to conflict with epithymía.4 Maccabees demands the rule of reason over impulse and numbers epithymía (arising out of sensuality) as one of the chief impulses alongside hēonḗ, phóbos, and lýpē.

4. Rabbinic equivalents are to much the same effect, e.g., in such phrases as "doing one's desire."

B. The Usage in the NT. The group is more common in the epistles than the Gospels. It may denote hunger (Lk. 15:16), longing (Lk. 22:15), or a desire for the divine mysteries (Mt. 13:17) or for anything good (Phil. 1:23; 1 Tim. 3:1). But it usually denotes evil desire as indicated by the object (a woman in Mt. 5:28, other things in Mk. 4:19), by the orientation (cf. Gal. 5:17), by the instrument (the heart in Rom. 1:24, the body in Rom. 6:12, the flesh in Eph. 2:3, the eyes in 1 Jn. 2:16), or by the manner (carnal in 1 Pet. 2:11, worldly in Tit. 2:12, defiling in 2 Pet. 2:10, etc.). A Jewish model for Paul's use of the term for the tenth commandment is found in Rom. 7:7. Hence one need not postulate Stoic influence except perhaps in 1 Th. 4:5. In any case, disobedience, not irrationality, is the evil in epithymía . Desire is a manifestation of sin. Under the prohibition of the law, it discloses our carnality, our apostasy from God, and our subjection to wrath (Gal. 5:16; Rom. 1:18ff.). In James it is the root of individual sins (1:14-15), while in John it arises out of the world, constitutes its nature, and perishes with it (1 Jn. 2:15ff.). NT statements about epithymía belong to the message of repentance and self-denial. epithymía is impulse, lust, or anxious self-seeking. It shows us what we really are. Even after reception of the Spirit, it remains a danger.

epithymētḗs. In the NT the only instance is in 1 Cor. 10:6 (alluding to Num. 10:34).

enthyméomai. From énthymos, which means "brave," "spirited," this word has many senses, of which only "to weigh," "consider" occurs in the NT (Mt. 1:20; 9:4).

enthýmēsis. This rare word is used in Mt. 9:4; 12:25; Heb. 4:12 for the hidden thoughts of the heart which only God can discern. énnoia is parallel in Heb. 4:12 and téchnē in Acts 17:29. What is foolish or wicked may be implied. [F. BÜSCHEL, III, 167-72]

thýra [door]

A. The Literal and Figurative Use.

1. Strictly thýra is used in the NT for "door," especially in a house, whether outer door or door into a room (cf. Mk. 1:33; 2:2; Lk. 11:7; Acts 5:19; Jn. 18:16; Mt. 6:6). It may also denote the "gate" of the temple (Acts 3:2; 21:30), and a third use is for the "entrance" to a tomb (Mt. 27:60; Mk. 15:46).

2. Figuratively, to be "at the door" is to be very near (Mk. 13:29 etc.). To "open a door" is a common metaphor for opportunity. God opens a door by granting the chance for missionary work (Col. 4:3), or the possibility of faith (Acts 14:27); believers open the door to Christ in repentance (Rev. 3:20). In contrast, to "close the door" represents the irrevocable loss of opportunity (Rev. 3:7; Mt. 25:10) and thus carries an implication of judgment. That Christ has power to open and shut (Rev. 3:7) shows that grace and judgment are both in his hand.

B. The Door Miracles of the NT.

1. Three times in Acts (5:19; 12:6ff.; 16:26-27) liberation comes through the miraculous opening of doors. The motif of the self-opening door is a common one in the OT and beyond, but there is only a restricted connection with freeing from prison. The details in Acts, the ancient parallels, and the inner similarities suggest to some scholars that Luke is stylizing the accounts, but no specific influences can be established. The lesson of the stories is that no bonds or prisons can check the course of the gospel, since God's arm is strong enough to break every lock and remove every obstacle.

---

LXX Septuagint

2. In Jn. 20:19, 26 the risen Lord twice passes through locked doors. His transfigured corporeality is no longer subject to earthly restriction.

C. The Heavenly Door. The idea of a solid firmament carries with it the thought of a door or doors into heaven. Though there are only two references in the OT (Gen. 28:17; Ps. 78:23), the notion is common in classical writings, mysticism, Gnosticism, and later Judaism. The only express reference in the NT is in Rev. 4:1, but the same figure lies behind the verses that speak about the shutting of heaven (Lk. 4:25) or its opening either (1) in God's self-revelation (Mk. 1:10; Jn. 1:51; Acts 10:11; Rev. 19:11) or (2) in disclosure to the saints of the mysteries of the coming aeon as they have access by vision (Acts 7:55ff.) or in the Spirit (Rev. 4:1ff.) to God's heavenly palace.

D. The Eschatological Use of the Image of the Door. Eschatologically the opened or closed door denotes the granting or refusing of a share in salvation. In this instance, the door is not the door of heaven. Entry into the kingdom, whether a door is mentioned (Mt. 25:10) or not, usually implies entry into the festive hall for the eschatological banquet (Mt. 7:7-8; 22:12; 25:10, 21ff.; Lk. 13:24-25; 14:23). In context, the opened door of Rev. 3:8 also signifies access to eschatological glory rather than missionary success. The image of Rev. 3:20 has an eschatological thrust as well; the returning Savior (cf. Lk. 12:37) seeks entry as a guest so as to enjoy table fellowship in the great festal meal.

E. "I Am the Door" (Jn. 10:7, 9). The context seems to force us to take this I-predication rather differently in v. 7 (the door to the sheep) and v. 9 (the door for the sheep). But this is not very likely, and we do best to interpret the ambiguous v. 7 by v. 9. The origin of the metaphor has been much debated. Some scholars see a misreading of the Aramaic "shepherd of the sheep" as "door of the sheep." Others trace the influence of pre-Christian Gnosticism. Yet OT models for the shepherd image, for going in and out, and for door-predication (especially in the messianic context of Ps. 118:19ff.) form a more obvious basis. In analogy to "I am the way" in 14:6, "I am the door" develops the thoughts in 10:1-2. The lesson of v. 9 is that Christ alone mediates membership in the messianic community and reception of its blessings of salvation and eternal life. The lesson of v. 7 is that he alone mediates the authentic pastoral office. [J. JEREMIAS, III, 173-80]

→ kleís, pýlē

thyreós → hóplon, panoplía

thýō [to sacrifice], thysía [sacrifice], thysiastḗrion [altar]

A. Linguistic Data.

1. thýō. a. The basic sense is "to sacrifice," at first only burnt offerings, then all kinds. The LXX uses it for sacrifices both to God (Gen. 31:54) and to alien gods (Ex. 34:15), the NT only for pagan sacrifices (Acts 14:13; 1 Cor. 10:20). b. In connection with burnt offerings, the word also means "to immolate," then "to slay" (cf. in the NT Lk. 15:23; Acts 10:13). It is used for killing the Passover lamb in Mk. 14:12 (cf. 1 Cor. 6:7: Christ, our paschal lamb, has been slain). c. A third sense is then simply "to murder."

2. thysía. a. The "act of sacrifice." b. "Sacrifice" (a) literally, both pagan and OT (cf. in the NT Lk. 2:24; 1 Cor. 10:18), and (b) figuratively for the death of Christ as an offering to God (Eph. 5:2), and the

v. verse

Christian life as an offering of the self (Rom. 12:1), whether in gifts (Phil. 4:18), praise (Heb. 13:15-16), or sharing and doing good (Heb. 13:16).

3. thysiastḗrion as God's Altar a. Literally for the temple altars (Lev. 4:7 and in the NT Mt. 5:23-24; Lk. 11:5-6; 1 Cor. 9:13; Heb. 7:13; Rev. 11:1), for other cultic altars (Gen. 22:9-10; Jms. 2:21), and for the heavenly altar (Rev. 6:9 etc.); b. figuratively, but with no very specific reference, Heb. 13:10.

B. The Concept of Sacrifice in the NT.

1. The OT Presuppositions. The root of the OT concept of sacrifice is to be found in the reality of the covenant order. God in his historical self-revelation wills to have personal dealings with his people through sacrifice. Whether sacrifice be a gift to God, means of atonement, or expression of fellowship, it is oriented to God's presence in grace and judgment. The prophets contest it (Am. 5:21ff.; Is. 1:10ff.) and the Psalms reject it (40:6ff.; 50:8ff.) only when human achievement replaces personal encounter. If praise, obedience, faithfulness, and love are seen to be the true sacrifices (Pss. 40:6ff.; 50:14, etc.), these do not invalidate the cultic sacrifices, which may also be sacrifices of righteousness (Ps. 51:19).

2. The NT Evidence. In the Gospels Jesus does not pronounce judgment on the cultus. He accepts the altar and sacrifices as given factors in Mt. 5:23-24; 23:18ff. The call for mercy and not sacrifice simply follows the prophetic line (Mt. 9:13; cf. Hos. 6:6). If the temple and the cultus are secondary and will come to an end (Mt. 12:6; 26:61; Jn. 2:19), it is because Jesus himself will set up a new covenant which finds no place for cultic offerings. Paul realizes that fellowship with deity is the goal of sacrificial meals (1 Cor. 9:13; 10:18ff.), but in 1 Cor. 10:11ff. he gives no hint that the eucharist, in which we have fellowship with Christ's body and blood, is for him a sacrificial meal. In keeping with his theology of history and its schema of the old order and the new, he compares Christ as the paschal lamb of the new community to the paschal lamb of Israel (1 Cor. 5:7). Christ's atoning death is the antitype of the death of the lamb. Both in its nature and its effect, this death is pleasing to God. The figure of sacrifice, so familiar to Paul, helps him to understand it as the basic event of salvation. The same figure helps him to understand the Christian life. As believers we are to offer thanksgiving, or to offer ourselves as logikḗ latreía (Rom. 12:1). All that we do in faith, e.g., in ministry (Phil. 2:17b) or giving material help (Phil. 4:18), becomes thysía and leitourgía. 1 Peter is to the same effect when it calls Christians a holy priesthood (2:5) whose gifts are spiritual sacrifices as they offer back their lives to God (cf. 1:15). Hebrews uses the cultic concepts of the OT when it calls Christ the High Priest who makes expiation by his free self-offering. For all the parallels, however, the epistle sees a qualitative distinction inasmuch as the sinless and eternal Son, by his once-for-all and personal self-giving, accomplishes the inward cleansing and eternal redemption which fulfil the original purpose of OT sacrifice, i.e., personal fellowship with God. For this reason, the unique self-sacrifice of Christ abolishes as well as transcends the OT ritual. If the author uses the ritual as a means to portray Christ's work, he also finds that in the new covenant the literal offerings of the ritual are replaced by the obedience of Christ (10:5ff.; cf. Ps. 40) and the Christian ministry of praise and mutual service (13:15-16; cf. Ps. 50). In other words, total self-giving, first that of Christ, and then, on this basis, that of his people, is the true meaning of sacrifice.

3. The Historical Background: Later Judaism and Hellenism.

a. Later Judaism is strict in observing the laws of sacrifice but voices criticism as well as commendation. Sacrifices are good because they involve obedience to God's commands. Doing good, however, is also obedience and may indeed be regarded as sacrifice (cf. also fear of God and suffering on his behalf). Thus cultic sacrifice loses its special place and the way opens for Judaism to continue unshaken without it. If the cultus is second only to the law as one of the things on which the world rests, synagogue piety (i.e., repentance, a broken spirit, study of the law, benevolence, and prayer) is also sacrifice, and even though sacrifices cease, the sacrifice of thanksgiving will not cease to all eternity.

b. Hellenism inherits from the classical world, not the old view of sacrifice nor its spiritualizing, but the philosophical criticism of it. If only the good are worthy to sacrifice, and a pious life is more pleasing than a great offering, there is no thought that right conduct bears any relation to literal sacrifice. For some, true worship takes place in the sphere of the noús. For others, mystical prayer replaces offerings. Hellenistic Judaism adopts a figurative concept, regarding moral obedience as better than cultic observance in a possible fusion of philosophical and prophetic influences. Philo allegorizes the law of sacrifice and thereby spiritualizes it on mystical lines. If a right attitude of soul is necessary, the true point is that the outward form points beyond itself.

4. The NT Concept and the Early Church. In the first post-NT writings sacrifice is a plastic image for self-giving to God. The Epistle of Barnabas finds in Christ's death the counterpart of OT sacrifices, while the Martyrdom of Polycarp regards martyrdom as a sacrifice; fasting, benevolence, and prayer are sacrifices in the Shepherd of Hermas. Justin, with his typological view of OT and NT worship, calls the sacramental elements thysíai (Dialogue 41), though for him only prayers have the character of true sacrifices (117). The praise of creation is the supreme sacrifice in Athenagoras Supplication 13. Did. 14.2 alludes to Mt. 5:23-24 and Mal. 1:11 in connection with the eucharist, but an approach to eucharistic sacrifice emerges only with Irenaeus. [J. BEHM, III, 180-90]

thṓrax → hóplon, panoplía

ι i

Iakṓb [Jacob]

1. In the NT the formula "Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob" denotes the special relation to God on which Israel prides itself. God made his covenant with these three patriarchs, and the expression symbolizes true and faithful Israel. The Pharisees apply it to themselves as those who have accepted God's will and are thus sure of the kingdom. Those who have the patriarchs as their fathers are sons of the kingdom; hence the offense of the saying in Mt. 8:11-12 that outsiders will sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom while the sons are cast out. Later Judaism finds in the formula a guarantee of God's dealings with the covenant people that is included in the patriarchs. This line of thought lies behind Mk. 12:26 and parallels: If God is still the God of the patriarchs, then they must have been raised to life again, and we shall be raised with them. In Acts 3:13, since it is the God of the patriarchs who raised up Jesus, Israel denies its own God in rejecting Jesus. The inclusion of the three names has a restrictive purpose, for only the descendants of Jacob, not all the descendants of Abraham, are the covenant people (cf. Acts 7:2ff.; Heb. 11:9).

2. Paul finds an abandonment of the restriction in the gospel, for all who believe are true children of Abraham and heirs of the promise. If Jacob represents national Israel in Rom. 11:26, he also illustrates that grace is by election and not by right of birth (Rom. 9:13).

3. The use of "house of Jacob" for Israel (Lk. 1:33; Acts 7:46) is again restrictive.

4. 1 Clem. 31.4-5 remains within this circle, seeing in Jacob the epitome of national Israel to which Jesus belongs by the flesh and as High Priest. [H. ODEBERG, III, 191-92]

Iánnēs [Jannes], Iámbrēs [Jambres]

1. These two names are corrupt even in rabbinic texts, where they figure as the chief magicians of Egypt who try to compete with Moses and Aaron (Ex. 7:11ff.). They are said to have continued their opposition at the Red Sea and in the desert, where they instigated the worship of the golden calf and later worked with Balaam.

2. In 2 Tim. 3:8 they are mentioned only in a general way as opponents of Moses who typify opponents of the gospel.

3. Traces of a work recounting their story are found in Origen and the Decretum of Gelasius. [H. ODEBERG, III, 192-93] iáomai [to heal], íasis [healing], íama [healing], iatrós [healer]

A. Sickness and Healing outside the Bible.

1. Primitive Views. In early times the only physical ailment that can be understood is a wound in battle. Sicknesses that are not understood are thus seen as attacks by alien powers which can be overcome by magic or sacrifices. But the healing properties of plants and animals are also discovered and play a role in treatment.

2. Rationalization of the Art of Healing in Ancient Medicine. The Egyptians were among the first to develop medicine, using a strange blend of research and theory (2600-1600 B.C.). They lanced sores, set bones, stitched wounds, filled teeth, and used drugs, but also found a place for magic. The Greeks put the art of healing on a more empirical basis (6th cent. B.C. on). Doctors formed a guild bound by the Hippocratic oath, and were trained in schools. Specialists in eyes, teeth, ears, and women's complaints emerged in Rome, and many physicians became wealthy.

3. Miracles of Healing, Gods of Healing, and Savior Gods in Hellenism. Religion and superstition merged with medicine. Sickness was often seen as a punishment, and we find gods of healing, especially Apollo and Aesculapius. Temple sleep supposedly had healing value in such shrines as Epidauros, which were very well appointed. Whether surgery was performed during sleep is debatable, but there was no rift between priest and doctor except in detail, e.g., on the nature and treatment of epilepsy. Miraculous healings are reported, such as the curing of the blind and lame by Vespasian and Hadrian. The gods are healers and saviors in both an inward and a cosmic sense. Thus Aesculapius is seen as the founder of medicine and Eros as the patron of gymnastics and agriculture as well as medicine. The gods mediate the healing presence of Zeus, whose goal is human happiness in a predominantly natural sense.

4. The Literal and Figurative Use of the Words. a. The literal sense is most frequent, but b. the Greeks extend the terms to other fields in the general sense "to restore," e.g., by removing intellectual defects, or avenging wrongs, or correcting evils. Along these lines Epictetus thinks of the philosophical school as iatreíon.

B. Sickness and Healing in the OT and Judaism.

1. The Religious Evaluation of Sickness. In Israel some ailments, such as mental illness, leprosy, and mortal sickness, are associated with demons, but we also find the beginnings of hygiene, and the conviction develops that God sends or withholds sickness. Thus it may be a sign of divine wrath (Is. 38), but this raises problems for the righteous (e.g., Job) when there is no obvious cause. When there is, repentance is a way to healing (2 Sam. 12:15ff.). Judaism tries to assign particular ailments to particular sins, but recognizes that sickness may also be a chastisement of love or a means of alleviating eternal pains.

2. Magic and Medicine; God the Healer (Literally). Belief in God discredits magic, but relics continue (cf. conjurations in Judaism). Egyptian and Greek influences (Gen. 50:2) produce more empirical medicine (cf. Is. 3:7; Jer. 8:22; hygienic rules in Sir. 19:2-3, etc.). Anatomy and surgery command respect. But God is the true Doctor. The priest is put in charge of health (Lev. 13:49ff.). If physicians are praised as the work of God (Sir. 38), prayer plays an important role (38:13-14); cf. the censuring of Asa for resorting to physicians rather than God (2 Chr. 16:12). Philo is no less ambivalent, recognizing good doctors but pointing to God as the true Healer. In later Judaism warnings against doctors go hand in hand with the training of many rabbis as physicians and the use of physicians in the temple. Prayer is the chief means of healing, as in many psalms with their sequence of complaint, petition, and thanksgiving (Pss. 6; 16:10; 38; 107:17ff.). If the terms may at times be figurative, the literal sense is original. The relation between prayer and miraculous healing is fluid (cf. Naaman in 2 Kgs. 5 and the raising of the dead in 2 Kgs. 4).

3. Healing in the Figurative Sense. God heals by withdrawing judgment, which may take the form of either sickness or other calamities. Thus healing has a broader sense, especially in Jeremiah (3:22 etc.). Repentance and remission of sins are prerequisites, so that healing and forgiveness go closely together. iásthai denotes God's gracious turning, with the binding up of a wound in the background. Thus restoration of fellowship is the crucial thing from which physical or mental restoration flows. The prophet is anointed by God to bind up the broken in heart (Is. 61:1) by announcing good tidings. The Servant of the Lord undergoes vicarious suffering to make expiation, so that the paradoxical conclusion is reached that "by his stripes we are healed." Philo favors the figurative use, but more for inner healing than for forgiveness, though this healing comes from God, the lógos, or the divine énnoia.

C. Sickness and Healing in the NT.

1. Sickness and the Art of Healing in the Light of the NT. At times the NT relates sickness to demons (cf. possession and Mt. 12:22ff.), but it also sees it as judgment (Rev. 6:8), although not in terms of a rigid dogma of retribution (cf. Mk. 2:5; Jn. 9:3-4; 11:4). Paul, then, can classify it with all other sufferings (Rom. 8:28) even under the burden of what was perhaps a physical ailment that God did not remove (2 Cor. 12:7ff.). Sickness in the NT is seen to contradict God's plan for creation, so that in spite of Mk. 5:26 there can be no opposing any effort to free us from it (cf. Lk. 10:34; Col. 4:14; 1 Tim. 5:23).

2. Jesus the Physician. The Use of the Terms in the Gospels. Jesus made a great impression as the Healer. All the Gospels, especially Luke, use iásthai for his work. íasis is literal in Lk. 13:32, and figurative only in quotation. Jesus calls himself "physician" more than once (cf. the parabolic saying in Mk. 2:17 and the proverbial saying in Lk. 4:23).

3. Jesus' Miracles of Healing in the Light of the History of Religion. Stories of similar healings to those of Jesus raise many questions.

a. Tradition. Many accounts of healing come from excavations at Epidauros. Some of the healings are grotesque, but others seem to be authentic. The stories of healings in Judaism contain legendary accretions, but often the essentials may well be historical. When two or more recensions are present, these confirm the tenacity of popular tradition. No original testimony exists to the miracles of Jesus, nor can one trace an unbroken tradition (in spite of Papias), so that expansion may well have taken place in some instances (cf. Mk. 5:21ff.; Lk. 7:11ff.; Jn. 11:1ff.). Yet there can hardly have been substantial change after the first century. The tradition took its basic form before the written record (cf. 1 Cor. 15:6) and authenticates itself by vividness and simplicity (as compared to apocryphal stories). The community arose under the impress of mighty acts which could hardly be replaced and which Christians themselves showed no eagerness to imagine (cf. the fact that the Baptist is credited with no miracles, and the matter-of-fact account of what happened to Paul in Acts 14:20 and what he said in Acts 20:10). Common features of miracle stories are (1) the failure of medical skill, (2) an encounter, and (3) the quickness and sureness of the miracle. Motives in telling the stories vary, e.g., to give confidence at Epidauros, to show the power of keeping the law among the rabbis, and to lead to faith in Christ in the Gospels.

b. The Nature of the Miracles. Nature miracles are recounted at Epidauros and in Judaism. A few occur in the Gospels, but healings are more common. The ailments cured include more than nervous disorders, and there are also exorcisms. The stories are told, not from the standpoint of the patients or self-seeking priests, but from that of the mercy of Jesus, so that love, not egoism, is the central force. There are no animal healings, no payments, no punishments, and no burlesque elements. Jesus will not use miracles to cause a sensation and the only demand he makes is for discipleship, so that spiritual blessing may be enjoyed as well as physical healing.

c. The Cures. The mode of healing in the Gospels is simple and involves no empirical therapy. There must have been some special reason for the use of spittle in Mk. 7:33; 8:23; Jn. 9:6. We find no healing sleep, and laying on of hands replaces cruder contacts. Some healings are at a distance. Healing is often by word, not in the sense of magic, but by Jesus' word of command in answer to appeals for help and in virtue of the power received in prayer (Mk. 9:29; cf. the rabbis). A precondition and consequence is faith. Jesus himself has faith, demands it of those whom he heals, and promises power to the disciples only as they have faith. The faith required, however, is not a belief in the credibility of the miracles but faith in Jesus himself. It involves a relationship of trust, a conviction of God's power, and the resultant commitment of obedience. This faith, which is well illustrated in Mt. 8:5ff. (the centurion), receives not merely physical healing but the full health of salvation (Mk. 5:34; Lk. 7:50).

d. Theological Appraisal: The Uniqueness of Jesus' Healings. Miracles of healing are well attested from various sources, and natural "laws" are relative, so that one cannot rationalistically rule out the healings of Jesus. The impact of the personality and special powers of Jesus must also be taken into account. Since these are put in the service of God's own work in history, we should not measure them by ordinary standards. Compared to other healings, those of Jesus are unique by reason of his own holy and merciful love, which is both supremely intensive and supremely comprehensive, and which embraces both the outer and the inner being. Jesus does not sever the connection between evil and sin, yet he does not view sickness as retribution nor believe that freedom from sickness is a primary goal. His chief concern is to free from sin, and while he may use healing as a first step in this direction, he may also give forgiveness first (Mt. 9:2) or even confer forgiveness where there is no need of healing (Lk. 7:47ff.). The healings may also sometimes serve a pastoral point, e.g., when performed in the context of a dispute (the sabbath in Mt. 12:9ff., the right to forgive in Mt. 9:1ff.). The miracles are not spectacles, but they are signs (Jn. 2:11, 23; 4:48, etc.). They are simple but powerful demonstrations that the promised age of fulfilment has come (cf. Mt. 11:5 and Is. 35:5-6). From them the Baptist should perceive that God's rule is present (Mt. 12:28). Failure to see this is guilty obtuseness (Lk. 12:54ff.). The miracles are proleptic victories—a foretaste and pledge of the final victory. Jesus invades Satan's kingdom with power (Lk. 10:18). Nothing can resist him, for even though he is put to death, the kingdom comes thereby. This messianic and eschatological context gives the healings of Jesus a uniqueness in religious history which is the uniqueness of his whole person and mission.

4. Healing in the Apostolic Age. If Jesus gives his disciples power to heal (Mk. 3:14-15), this is not an endowment for selfish use but an equipment for effective witness by act as well as word. The power may reach a limit (Mk. 9:18), is not to be used for profit (Mt. 10:8), and may be exercised even outside the apostolic circle when the name of Jesus is invoked (Mk. 9:38ff.). With their eschatological faith in Jesus, the first witnesses take up the fight against bodily suffering (Acts 3:1ff. etc.). If primitive features occur, especially on the part of the healed, the acts of power, like the healings of Jesus in missionary preaching (Acts 2:22), awaken faith (Acts 2:43 etc.) and further the progress of preaching (Rom. 15:18-19 etc.). The gift of healing is an operation in the name of the exalted Lord (Acts 3:16), or an operation of the Lord himself through the Spirit (Acts 9:34). It is a special charism, given particularly to commissioned witnesses, but confers no claim or magical exemption from serious or persistent sickness (cf. Phil. 2:26; 2 Tim. 4:20). Healing may be a gift, but it is still a theme in godly intercession (2 Cor. 12:8; Jms. 5:13ff.). The figurative use of the group occurs in the NT only in OT quotations (except in Heb. 12:13). Thus the warning of Acts 28:27 quotes Is. 6:10, and 1 Pet. 2:24 quotes Is. 53:5. In both instances the reference is to restoration through forgiveness and the resultant saving benefits. The use in Heb. 12:13 is ethical. In an exhortation to Christian conduct, this is compared to the making of straight paths so that what is lame may be healed.

D. The Gospel of the Healer and Healing in the Early Church. The missionary vigor of Christianity owes much to the power with which it brings release from bondage to demons and destiny and to the selfless love with which believers take up the cause of the sick and needy. With an emphasis on liberation from sin, the figurative use (partly under OT influence) becomes more prominent again, as when Jesus is called iatrós (cf. the similarity of sound of Jesus and iásthai) and Hellenistic motifs are transferred to him. Literal use of the group is rare. It occurs in OT quotations in 1 Clement and Barnabas, and the figurative use is especially common in Hermas (e.g., Visions 1.1.9; Mandates 4.1. 11; Similitudes 5.7.3) with a hint of infusion of grace as well as remission of sins. [A. OEPKE, III, 194-215]

→ dýnamis, therapeúō, sōtḗr, hygiḗs

idiṓtēs [layman, outsider]

A. idiṓtēs outside the NT.

1. In Greek usage we find the following senses: a. "private individual" as distinct from public person; b. "layman" as distinct from expert, and c. "outsider" as distinct from member. The term takes on its distinctive sense from the context.

2. The rabbis take over idiṓtēs as a loanword in the three senses: a. "private person" as compared to the king; b. "layman" in contrast to expert; and c. "human being" as distinct from God.

B. idiṓtēs in the NT.

1. The word has in Acts 4:13 the general sense of "uneducated" and in 2 Cor. 11:6 the similar sense of "unskilled" (in eloquence) (cf. Justin Apology 1.39.3; 60. 11).

2. In 1 Cor. 14:16 the context suggests a person who does not have the gift and hence is not edified. In 1 Cor. 14:23-24, however, the combination with ápistos shows that the reference is to a nonmember attending the church's gatherings. In both cases, then, unbelievers are in view, i.e., outsiders who have neither the gift of tongues nor faith, and whom exercise of the gift will not help. [H. SCHLIER, III, 215-17]

Iezábel [Jezebel]

Jezebel is seldom mentioned in later Judaism, and usually only in repetition of the OT stories in 1 and 2 Kings. Rev. 2:20 obviously uses the name symbolically, possibly for a movement or a pagan prophetess, but more likely for a woman leader in the Christian community, i.e., a libertinistic prophetess. [H. ODEBERG, III, 217- 18]

hierateía, hierateúō, hieráteuma → hierós

Ieremías [Jeremiah]

A. The Prophet Jeremiah in Later Judaism. Sources of the Jeremiah tradition are 2 Chr. 35:25; 36:12, 21-22; Ezr. 1:1; Dan. 9:2; Sir. 49:6-7; 2 Maccabees; also Philo and Josephus, a fragment transmitted in Eusebius Preparation for the Gospel 9.39, and various apocrypha. Most of the tradition relates to the historic personage, adding to the scanty data of Scripture legends about his birth, his hiding of the ark, and his martyrdom by stoning.

B. The Prophet Jeremiah in the NT.

1. The only express NT references are in Mt. 2:17; 6:14; 27:9, though there are probable allusions in Mt. 23:37 and Heb. 11:37. 2. A saying of Jeremiah is expressly quoted in Mt. 2:17 (Jer. 31:15). 3. Recollection of Jer. 32:9 may explain the attributing of Zech. 11:13 to Jeremiah in Mt. 27:9. 4. Mt. 16:14 says that some people saw in Jesus a reappearance of the prophet Jeremiah. This is puzzling inasmuch as there is no record of eschatological expectation relative to Jeremiah. Possibly Jeremiah occurs as a representative name (cf. Mk. 8:28; Lk. 9:19) because of the canonical position of the Book of Jeremiah at the head of the latter prophets. [J. JEREMIAS, III, 218-21]

hierós [holy], tó hierón [the temple], hierōsýnē [priesthood], hierateúō [to discharge the priestly office], hieráteuma [royal priesthood], hierateía (-ía) [priestly office], hierourgéō [to perform holy service], hieróthytos [sacrificed to deity], hieroprepḗs [holy], hierosyléō [to rob temples], hierósylos [temple robber], hiereús [priest], archierús [high priest] hierós.

A. Etymology. Various suggestions have been made but there is no certainty except that the word is pre-Greek.

B. hierós in Common Greek Usage.

1. Synonyms and Antonyms. There is no fixed distinction from such terms as theíos, hágios, hósios, etc. On the one side it denotes the power of the divine sphere, on the other the sanctity of what belongs to deity, whether by nature, primal law, or custom. It is the most common sacral and cultic term in the Greek world.

2. The Main Groups of Usage.

a. Relative to things it denotes (1) what belongs to the divine sphere (2) as this is experienced in the form of consecration, e.g., (3) countries and cities under divine protection, but (4) especially cultic things like temples, feasts, etc., yet also (5) anything dedicated religiously to deity.

b. Persons are hieroí (1) when as heroes or kings they stand under divine protection, or (2) are sacrosanct like the emperor, or (3) are initiates in the mysteries (cf. also poets, philosophers, and priests).

C. hierós in the LXX. Feeling the pagan sense of the term, the LXX prefers hágios for qdš and has hierós only rarely, e.g., the sacred trumpets in Josh. 6:8 and vessels in Dan. 1:2.

D. hierós in the Rest of Hellenistic Judaism.

1. Josephus senses the distinctiveness of hágios but still makes lavish use of hierós in the general literary sense.

2. Philo, too, has hierós frequently, e.g., for holy Scripture or a holy commandment, but with a stronger moral significance than in ordinary Greek usage.

3. In Josephus, Philo, and the Apocrypha, the word describes (1) Scripture and the law, (2) holy things pertaining to the tabernacle and temple, and (3) holy days, especially the sabbath.

4. We also find such speculative connections as to (1) nature and the cosmos (Philo), (2) the lógos and the noús (Philo), (3) the mystical in the broad sense, especially relating to numbers and allegorical meanings (Philo), and (4) persons such as priests, angels, and occasionally virtuous people (Josephus and 4 Maccabees).

E. hierós in the NT. The infrequent use in the NT shows that Christianity shares the LXX shunning of this sacral term of paganism. The one concession is the description of the OT scriptures as hierá in 2 Tim. 3:15, and cf. the use of tá hierá in 1 Cor. 9:13.

F. hierós in the Early Church. In the apostolic fathers and Apologists hierós occurs for Scripture in 1 Clement, for the right use of money in Hermas Similitudes 1.10, and once for God in 1 Clem. 33.4. Clement of Alexandria uses the term only rarely (for Moses in Stromateis 1.12.4), but Origen has it frequently, e.g., for incense, the resurrection, and especially angels, prophets, the apostles, and friends devoted to sacred study.

tó hierón.

A. tó hierón and tá hierá as General Cultic Terms. a. A first use is for "sacrifices," especially burnt offerings and sacrificial meals and customs. b. Cultic objects and actions in general may also be denoted. c. A more comprehensive use is for the cultic as such (cf. 1 Cor. 9:13: "the temple ministry").

B. The Use of tó hierón for Temple.

1. General Greek Usage. While naós is normally the inner shrine, and témenos the precincts, tó hierón may be used more comprehensively for either, or for any consecrated grove or place of sacrifice, including pagan shrines, the Jerusalem temple, and even synagogues.

2. The Jerusalem Temple in Judaism.

a. The LXX and Apocrypha. (1) While the priest is ho hiereús, the LXX avoids tó hierón for the temple, preferring oíkos or naós. (2) In the Apocrypha, however, we often find tó hierón or tó hierón toú theoú (or toú kyríou) for the temple.

b. Josephus and Philo. (1) In general Josephus offers a full account of Herod's temple (Jewish War 5.184ff.). (2) As regards usage, both Josephus and Philo use tó hierón for the tabernacle, Solomon's temple, and pagan shrines. In Josephus hierón can denote the whole court or the temple hill, while naós is used for the temple proper, as are tó hágion and tá hágia, which put a special stress on the holiness of the place (cf. Philo's allegorical use), with a distinction between tá hágia and tá hágiōn (the holy of holies).

3. The Use of tó hierón for the Temple in the NT.

a. The General Usage. While the LXX avoids hierón for the OT temple, the NT finds no reason not to use the term now that the age of the OT temple has gone. oíkos may be used, as in Mt. 12:4 (toú theoú) and Jn. 2:16 (toú patrós mou), and naós is also found in a general sense (cf. Mt. 27:5; Jn. 2:19), but tó hierón is the common term for both the precincts and the inner sanctuary.

b. tó hierón as a General Term. With a general reference tó hierón occurs in such passages as Mt. 12:6; Acts 24:6; 1 Cor. 9:13; Lk. 22:53; Mk. 13:3.

c. As the Temple Hill. tó hierón denotes the temple hill or outermost court in verses like Mt. 21:14; 21:12 and parallels (the cleansing of the temple).

d. tó pterýgion toú hieroú. The exact reference in Mt. 4:5; Lk. 4:9 is uncertain. Schlatter suggests an overhanging balcony and Dalman the southeast corner jutting out over the valley of Kidron.

e. Teaching in the hierón. when we read of Jesus or the apostles teaching in the temple (e.g., Mk. 14:49; Jn. 7:14; Acts 5:20; cf. Lk. 2:46), the site is either the house of instruction or a pillared hall in the outer court.

f. The Beautiful Gate. The site of the healing in Acts 3:2ff. is the bronze Corinthian gate at the eastern entrance to the Court of Women (Josephus Jewish War 2.411).

g. tó hierón as the Court of Women. This is where Anna prays in Lk. 2:37. Jesus watches the widow here in Mk. 12:41ff., teaches here in Jn. 8:20, and probably has here the encounter of Jn. 8:2ff. Mothers bring their purificatory offerings here (Lk. 2:24).

h. As the Inner Court. This is the reference in Lk. 18:11; Lk. 24:53; Mk. 11:11; Jn. 7:37-38; Acts 21:26.

i. As the Temple Proper. Only the priest may enter this. Curtains cover the entrances to the sanctuary and the holy of holies (cf. Mt. 27:51).

C. Impulses toward a Spiritualization of the Temple in the Greek World.

1. The Enlightenment. The Ionic enlightenment protests against the Homeric anthropomorphizing of the gods, speaks of a single God, and shows some understanding of inward prayer. Criticism of the cultus develops in Zeno. Seneca finds the cultus salutary for the people but reinterprets it for the sage.

2. The Spiritualizing of the Concept of the Temple. Seneca suggests that the world or the soul is the true temple of God. Dualistic contempt for the body does not allow the body to be called God's temple. Later the image of the temple is used for the indwelling of the spirit or of magical power.

D. The Way from OT Prophecy to Jewish Apocalyptic and Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The Temple in OT Prophecy. Prophets like Amos and Isaiah do not stand in a cultic tradition, but while they criticize cultic acts when there is injustice or lack of love (Am. 5:21ff.; Mic. 6:6ff.; Is. 1:10ff.), they are not against the cultus as such. Even if the temple cannot embrace God's majesty (Is. 66:1ff.), the nations will still come to Zion (Is. 60:1ff.). Similar themes occur in Proverbs (e.g., 15:8; 21:27) and Psalms (cf. 50:8ff.; 51:16ff.), but with no rejection of the cultus as such. The temple will be destroyed (Mic. 3:12) but it will also be rebuilt (Ezek. 40ff.; cf. Hag. 2:9 and Is. 2:1-4). The smallness of the new temple, the absence of the ark, and the desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes influence later temple apocalyptic.

2. The Temple in Apocalyptic.

a. Sayings Prior to A.D. 70. A more glorious temple is expected in the messianic period, though whether the Messiah builds it is unclear.

b. The New Temple. There is a legend that the sanctuary is buried and hidden prior to restoration. With the liberation of Israel will come a bigger Jerusalem with a new temple as the sanctuary of the nations.

c. The Heavenly Temple. References to a heavenly city and temple as the pattern of the earthly city and temple and as the abode of the blessed also occur.

d. The Catastrophe of A.D. 70. The destruction of the city and temple in A.D. 70 intensifies the above expectations. Special consolation is found in the idea of a heavenly Jerusalem (which in 4 Esdras will appear at the end).

e. The Spiritualizing and Criticism of Sacrifice. For some rabbis, acts of love and keeping the commandments are the true sacrifices, and we even find the view that there will be no sacrifices in the world to come.

3. The Temple in Josephus and Philo.

a. Josephus. Josephus values the temple and the cultus highly. God sends a portion of his Spirit into it, though without actual localization. For Josephus, however, virtue is the worthiest service of God and the cosmos is God's eternal house which survives even when the temple perishes.

b. Philo. Philo attacks a perverted religiosity which neglects inner purification. To make God a house of wood or stone is sinful; the cosmos is God's true hierón, as well as the logikḗ psychḗ, the noús, and the logismós of the wise. The lógos reigns as true priest of the soul. Yet Philo can find a place for temple worship both in allegorizing and in the sense that it offers scope for the valid impulse to bring thank offerings and to seek expiation.

E. The Attitude of Jesus and Primitive Christianity toward the Temple.

1. The Emphasis of the Witness of Jesus and the Primitive Christian Attitude in the Gospels. The sayings in the Gospels reflect the church's conflict as well as Jesus' own position, but what Jesus says undoubtedly influences the church's decisions.

a. The Twofold Attitude of Jesus. Jesus affirms temple worship as divinely appointed, and yet claims superiority over the temple. He prays in the temple and teaches in it as the public center of Judaism (cf.

Mk. 14:49; Jn. 7:14, etc.). He also heals there (Jn. 5:14; Mt. 21:14). Children's lips praise him there (Mt. 21:15).

b. The Temple as the Place of the Divine Presence. By making the temple the place of his self-manifestation, Jesus fulfils and transcends the prior divine history. The tabernacle and the temple are the house of God (Mt. 12:4) and a house of prayer (Mk. 11:17). To swear by the temple is to swear by the indwelling God (Mt. 23:21). As the place of God's presence, the temple sanctifies all that is in it (Mt. 23:16-17). The temple tax is to be paid (Mt. 17:24ff.).

c. The Cleansing of the Temple. This is a purification, not an interruption, of worship. Holiness extends to the precincts as a whole. The protest expresses the prophetic conviction that the temple is not a place of gain, that it is to be a place of prayer for all nations, and that prayer takes precedence over sacrifice. The action may also have a messianic aspect but can hardly be political.

d. The Saying concerning the Destruction and Rebuilding of the Temple. Garbled at the trial, this saying seems to have been to the effect that new worship, associated with the person of Jesus, will replace the old. Worship will be perfected in the messianic age of salvation. Jn. 2:18ff. also relates the saying to the body of Jesus (cf. Jn. 1:14b). As Mt. 12:6 puts it, a greater than the temple is here. The full import of this comes out after A.D. 70.

e. The Prophecy of Its Destruction. The Synoptic apocalypse contains a prediction of the overthrow of the temple in a judgment which is also a sign of the parousia. While the disciples admire the temple, Jesus sorrowfully foretells its devastation. The abomination of Dan. 12:11 is given a wider reference: Gentile armies in Lk. 21:20, and the antichrist in 2 Th. 2:3-4.

f. Sayings from later Strata of the Tradition. The infancy stories offer prophecies from temple devotees to whom it is important that the new revelation is given on the ancient site. Jesus as a boy shows reverence for the temple, especially as a place of teaching. In the passion story the rending of the temple curtain shows that Christ's death gives free access to God (Mk. 15:38).

*2. The Attitude of Other Nt Writings touard the Temple as tó hierón.

a. Acts. In Acts the disciples pray in the temple (2:46), and Paul has a vision there (22:17) and brings the offering of purification (21:26). Yet Stephen argues that the Most High does not dwell in houses (cf. Is. 66:1-2) and insists that the temple is only temporary.

b. Other NT References. In other NT references naós or tá hágia is used rather than tó hierón. The central point is that such terms as temple, people, and priesthood now apply to Christ's universal community. In 1 Pet. 2:4ff. the image of the temple is combined with that of Christ as the living stone. The community itself is the temple in 1 Cor. 3:9; 2 Cor. 6:16-17; Eph. 2: 19ff. In 1 Tim. 3:15, however, the oíkos theoú is God's household (cf. 1 Pet. 4:17; Heb. 3:6; 10:21).

c. The Images of Revelation. Revelation develops the new imagery. Overcomers will be pillars in God's temple. The new Jerusalem comes down as the universal city, and the temple is God's eternal presence on the throne (7:15; 11:19; 14:15; 15:5-6; 16:1, 17). In the consummation there will be no more temple (21:22).

hierōsýnē.

1. More abstract than the later hierateía, this means "priesthood," "priestly office," "priestly dignity," or (more rarely) "priestly ministry." It occurs only once in the canon (1 Chr. 29:22) for the priestly office, but is common in the Apocrypha, Josephus, and Philo for the priesthood or priestly office or dignity (and occasionally activity).

2. The only NT instances are in Heb. 7:11-12, 24. This passage contrasts the Levitical priesthood, which cannot bring perfection, with Christ's priesthood after the order of Melchizedek. In the fathers we find the term for the Levitical priesthood (1 Clem. 43.2), the pagan priesthood (Athenagoras Supplication 28.3), Christ's priesthood (Origen Commentary on John 1.28), and the Christian ministry (Chrysostom).

hierateúō.

1. This word means "to discharge the priestly office" and occurs in the Koine, the LXX, the Apocrypha, and Josephus, but not Philo.

2. In the NT we find it only in Lk. 1:8 (Zacharias). 1 Clement has it for the Levitical ministry (43.4), and Justin for that of pagan priests (Apology 1.62.2).

hieráteuma. This word seems to occur only in the LXX and dependent writings. It is coined in exposition of the revelation at Sinai (Ex. 19:6; cf. 23:22).

1. The underlying Hebrew means "kingdom of priests" and implies that all members of the people have a priestly function (cf. Num. 11:29; Is. 61:6).

2. The LXX translates very freely and brings out the priestly side more strongly.

3. 2 Macc. 2:17 alludes to Ex. 19:6 with its reference to Israel's divinely conferred dignity, which is both royal and priestly. But here and in Philo the exact meaning is uncertain, for strictly basíleion means "royal residence."

4. In 1 Pet. 2:5, 9 salvation and dignity are transferred to the community, which, based on Christ as the living stone, is built up into a spiritual temple for a consecrated priestly ministry. The community is a priesthood because it offers spiritual sacrifices. As a priestly company it is immediate to God, but there is no priestly caste, for the whole people is a priestly fellowship. It is royal inasmuch as it belongs to the King, serves him, and shares his glory in a ministry of witness (v. 9).

hierateía (-ía).

1. Deriving from hierateúō, this word may denote priestly activity, but more commonly relates to the office, or to the priesthood in general (cf. Ex. 40:15; Josh. 18:7).

2. In Lk. 1:9 it refers to the temple ministry (burning incense), but in Heb. 7:5 it denotes the priestly office received by the descendants of Levi.

hierourgéō.

1. This term means "to perform sacred or sacrificial ministry." In Josephus and Philo it always means "to offer sacrifice" and often has no object. (hierourgía means "sacrifice" and hieroúrgēma the "act of sacrifice.")

2. In Rom. 15:16 Paul calls his service of the gospel a cultic ministry. As Christ's minister he brings the Gentiles as an acceptable offering. He protects the metaphor from cultic misunderstanding by showing that the true sacrifice, sanctified by the Spirit, is the offering of life in obedience.

hieróthytos.

1. This word means "consecrated or sacrificed to deity"; the use is mainly cultic.

2. In 1 Cor. 10:28 the reference is to cultic meat that has been offered in pagan sacrifice. For Paul it is eidolóthyton (food sacrificed to idols; cf. 8:1).

hieroprepḗs.

1. The idea here is "that which corresponds to the hierón," whether as temple, temple ministry, sacred action, or deity. The term may refer to anything religious or cultic, but can also have a moral reference, and in Philo may take the more general sense of "solemn," though for him what is consonant with God is the usual sense. Other possible meanings are "worthy of respect" and "costly."

2. Tit. 2:3 exhorts the older women of the church to be hieroprepeís in conduct. With a cultic background, the point is that, since they belong to God by faith in Jesus Christ, they should live and act accordingly, i.e., with the consonant reverence.

hierosyléō.

1. The reference of this term is to the robbery of temples, which is a most serious offense in Greek and Roman eyes, on a par with treason and murder, and involving drastic penalties. In the OT Dt. 7:25-26 forbids the people to take anything from pagan shrines. Josephus reinterprets this as an expression of the tolerance of the OT law for other religions. The rabbis view temple robbery more leniently than, e.g., murder, and impose less stringent penalties. Some rabbis allow idols to be possessed if they are deconsecrated by Gentiles, and the associated gold, clothing, and vessels may be put to positive use.

2. Literally the term means "to commit temple robbery" but it may also be used less strictly, e.g., for the taking of the temple gold from the Jews.

3. In Rom. 2:22 Paul accuses the Jews of despising idols yet also robbing temples. The use of the verb in a kind of list shows that a literal sense is in view. At issue is probably not so much the actual robbing of pagan temples as making a profit out of votive offerings. The suggestion that robbing the Jerusalem temple by not paying the temple tax is all that Paul means is not very convincing in view of the antithesis: abhorring idols.

hierósylos.

1. Literally this refers to the removal of the gold vessels from the temple by Lysimachus or to the stealing of sacred books and funds from the Jews according to an edict of Augustus. The noun may also be used for sacrilege in general and for the category of punishment (hōs hierósylos) applying to similar offenses. In comedy it becomes a common term of abuse ("rascal").

2. In the Ephesian riot the town clerk defends the apostles on the ground that they are not offenders against religion; they have committed no sacrilege (Acts 19:37).

hiereús.

A. The Priest in the Greek World.

1. The Facts of Religious History.

a. hiereús occurs in Homer in much the same sense as mántis; both priest and seer have indwelling powers equipping them to mediate dealings with the gods. b. But we also find the idea that all people may pray and sacrifice. c. Shrines, however, require official priests serving the local deities. d. There is thus a priestly vocation, and if there is no definite caste, some priestly functions are hereditary.

2. Philosophical Reflections on the Priesthood in Stoicism.

a. For Zeno the priest must have correlative knowledge and piety that put him in touch with the power at work in all things. b. Only the sage is truly equipped for what the priest is and should be. c. Epictetus may thus use the figure of the priest for the philosophical ministry.

3. The Particular Form of Such Reflection in Hellenistic Judaism (Philo).

a. In Philo the priest symbolizes the lógos or reason. In the temple of the soul the true man reigns as priest (cf. the phrase ho hierés lógos). b. The priestly office is supreme for Philo. Physical freedom from blemish denotes spiritual blamelessness. The priest avoids sensual entanglements and looks exclusively to God. All righteous sages are priests. c. The Jewish people has priestly rank through the law, which is a preparatory school for priesthood, although only the sage, not the Jew, is the true priest.

B. The Priest in the History of Israel.

1. From the Early Period to Josiah's Reform. The original priestly function is to deliver oracles (Ex. 17:9; 33:7ff., etc.); cf. the derivation of khn from Arab. kahin ("seer"). The family head may offer sacrifices. Moses and Aaron are Levites, linked with a priestly clan, which has guest status in the national organism. The cultus is at first decentralized inasmuch as the Levites act as house priests alongside their functions at Shiloh (giving oracles, offering sacrifices, and ministering to the ark). A full cultus is established with the official temples under royal control, and in these sacrifice becomes more important than giving oracles or instruction in the law.

2. From Josiah to Ezra. Centralization is enforced by Josiah, and idolatry at local shrines is suppressed. This reform promotes the one priesthood of the one sanctuary, that of the Zadokites, and other Levites perform only lesser duties at the temple. In spite of prophetic criticism, which stresses the deeper requirements of God, sacrifice tends to overshadow instruction. The exilic period is one of codification; the priesthood emerges with exclusive cultic control. After the exile, Ezra reconstructs the community on this basis. The priesthood becomes a self-enclosed order, but scribes are also needed for the exposition of the law. If the priests, as organs of the temple ministry, become an influential caste, the scribes achieve increasing authority as they declare the law and direct religious instruction, even teaching the priests, who are only cultic ministers and often of poor reputation.

3. The Priests and Levites at the Time of Jesus.

a. A social gulf separates ordinary priests and higher priests. Traced back to Aaron, the priesthood is hereditary. It is divided into 24 classes or courses, each of which serves a week at a time and is itself subdivided into four to nine houses. On duty only two weeks a year and at the feasts, priests pursue secular callings.

b. The Levites, who are also hereditary, have charge of more lowly temple duties and the music, but have no access to the altar or sanctuary. J. Jeremias estimates that the priests and Levites, with their families, number about 10 percent of the people.

4. The Priest after the Destruction of the Temple. After the destruction of the temple, priests may read Scripture, impart blessings, and receive firstfruits, but the scribes become the true center of the community as the law and its study offer a replacement for the temple and its sacrifices (in spite of hope for restoration of the temple and priesthood).

C. The Use of hiereús in Jewish and Christian Writings.

1. For lack of any other word, hiereús is freely used for priest and high priest in the LXX. 2. hiereús is also used for pagan priests, but often with a qualification, e.g., tṓn eidṓlōn.3. Josephus often distinguishes ordinary priests from high priests.

D. hiereús in the NT. As distinct from the chief priests and high priest, the priests play only a minor role in the NT. Jesus, while not hostile to the priestly ministry, does not call himself or his disciples priests, and shows more of a prophetic spirit.

1. Jesus accepts the role of the priest when he tells cleansed lepers to show themselves to the priest (Mt. 8:4 etc.) and offer the prescribed gift.

2. In Mt. 12:4ff. he defends his healing on the sabbath on the twofold ground that in an emergency David breached priestly law and that the priests themselves break the sabbath. Scripture itself justifies these breaches, and there is now something present that is greater than either temple or priesthood.

3. In Lk. 1:5 a priest receives the new revelation, and in Acts 6:7 many priests become believers, but the priest and Levite show up badly in Lk. 10:31-32.

4. In Rev. 1:6; 5:10; 20:6; 22:5 (on the basis of Ex. 19:6) all Christians are priests as they are redeemed by Christ, and as such they have a share in Christ's royal dominion. The church is the new community consisting wholly of priests of God and Christ.

archiereús.

A. Linguistic Observations.

1. This word occurs only from the third century B.C. and seems to have been adopted in Judaism from 150 to 50 B.C. Derivatives such as archiéreia (high priestess) are common. 2. OT equivalents may be found in Lev. 21:10; 2 Kgs. 25:18; Lev. 4:5. 3. archiereús is rare in the LXX. It occurs only five times (e.g., Lev. 4:3); elsewhere the high priest is ho hiereús mégas or just ho hiereús. 4. archiereús, however, is more common in the Apocrypha (41 times).

B. The archiereús in the Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. In Egypt and Tyre and in Theoretical Discussion. The term occurs first in Herodotus for the chief priest in Egypt, who ranks next to the king. A chief priest is also documented for Tyre. Plato’s ideal state includes an annual high priest at the head of the priests officiating for the year.

2. Under the Seleucids and Ptolemies. Under the Seleucids the term is used for royally appointed high priests of satrapies and also for the chief priests of local shrines. The Ptolemies also appoint high priests, and high priests are among the various classes of priests in Egypt.

3. After Augustus. a. Provincial chief priests of the imperial cult are given the title. b. There is also a chief priest in Egypt to whom Greek and Egyptian cults seem to be subject. c. Provincial temples (e.g., in Pergamos, Smyrna, etc.) are under high priests. d. Hereditary priests of artistic and other societies are archiereís. e. So are many chief priests of specific gods and local shrines.

4. As pontifex maximus. The term also applies (without mégistos) to the emperor himself. Caesar bears the title, and with Augustus it becomes part of the imperial style.

C. The High Priest and Chief Priests in Judaism and the NT.

1. The History of the High Priesthood.

a. From the Exile to the Hasmoneans. After the exile, the high priest, claiming descent from Aaron by way of Zadok, stands alongside the governor. The Zadokite line is broken by Antiochus. Onias III goes to Egypt, and from 160 to 153 B.C. Jerusalem has no high priest.

b. From the Hasmoneans to the Time of Jesus and the Apostles. Jonathan, an ordinary priest, takes the high priesthood in 153 B.C. and later the Hasmoneans assume the royal title as well. Under Herod and the Romans arbitrary appointments and depositions take place, and influential families arise (e.g., that of Annas), though legalists still argue for Zadokite legitimacy. Political manipulation, simony, and the increasing power of the Pharisees weaken the role of the high priests, but they are still Israel’s supreme religious representatives.

2. The Dignity, Rights, and Tasks of the High Priest.

a. The Dignity. With the fall of the monarchy, the high priest is not only God’s plenipotentiary but also the people’s chief representative. He has an indelible character of sanctity transmitted by investiture.

b. The Rights. These include a seat in the Sanhedrin and prerogatives in relation to sacrifice.

c. The Tasks. The duties are primarily cultic and culminate with the unique privilege of entering the holy of holies once a year to offer sacrifice on the Day of Atonement. The high priest ministers during the week prior to this day and must carefully protect his ritual purity at this time. Ritual regulations (e.g., avoiding a corpse) are especially strict in his case. The succession is guarded by very strict rules concerning his bride (age, virginity, legitimacy, etc.).

3. The archiereús (Singular) in the NT.

a. The high priest most often mentioned in the NT is Caiaphas, son-in-law of Annas, who was high priest in the memorable year of Christ’s death (Jn. 11:49-50).

b. Annas, who had been replaced at this time, was still influential; five of his sons and his grandson as well as his son-in-law, held the office. The references in Jn. 18:15, 19ff. (and cf. Lk. 3:2. Acts 4:6. Jn. 18:13) may be to him.

c. Ananias is high priest in Acts 23:2; 24:1.

d. The archiereús presides over the Sanhedrin (Mt. 26:57. Mk. 14:53; Lk. 22:54).

4. The archiereís (Plural) as Chief Priests.

a. The Significance of Higher Priestly Offices. The chief priests seem to have been a priestly college that controlled the temple and its treasury and had seats in the Sanhedrin. This college included the ruler of the temple, the heads of weekly and daily courses, the temple proctors, and the temple treasurers.

b. The archiereís in the NT. There are more references in the NT (and Josephus) to chief priests than high priests. Often they are mentioned alone (Mt. 26:3-4 etc.); the probable reference here is to officeholders or to the whole Sanhedrin. They are also mentioned with one or more other groups in the Sanhedrin (Mt. 27:1-2 etc.). Chief priests and scribes is a general term for the religious authorities (Mt. 2:4), and cf. chief priests and elders (Mt. 21:23 etc.), or rulers (Lk. 23:13; 24:20), or principal men of the Jews (Acts 25:2). génos archieratikón in Acts 4:6 (cf. Josephus Antiquities 15.40) denotes membership in the priestly aristocracy that occupies the higher posts. Sceva in Ephesus (Acts 19:14) is a chief priest in the diaspora. The common references to the chief priests in the NT show that opposition to Jesus comes from the religious authorities in general and not from single individuals. The official religious representatives of the people resist his ministry.

D. Speculation concerning the High Priest in Philo.

1. The Concept of Mediator.

a. In Philo the high priest represents the people, and is identified with them in expiation. Yet he also stands in a special relationship to God, and his role is thus mediatorial. b. For Philo, however, the lógos is central in mediation. Thus Moses, the primary lógos, stands behind Aaron. lógos speculation alone makes possible the exaltation of the archiereús when he enters the holy of holies (cf. Lev. 16:17).

2. The Concept of Sinlessness.

a. Philo goes beyond Lev. 16:6 in postulating the sinlessness of the high-priestly mediator, whose mistakes fall back on the people and are easily made good. b. The Stoic ideal of the sage has an influence here. c. The lógos doctrine controls the formulation of this absolute sinlessness. d. Also at work is the fluid concept of the man of God—a phrase which may be used for the priest or prophet, as well as for Moses, the lógos, or archetypal man.

3. Cosmic Speculation. The lógos is high priest in the temple of the cosmos, which is God's exalted world. Reflecting the cosmos, the high priest, serving the Father, brings the cosmos into this service. As he prays mediatorially for the cosmos, it enters with him into the sanctuary. The high priest should fashion his life accordingly.

E. The High Priest in Hebrews.

1. The Basic Elements in the Scheme.

a. The view of the high priest in Hebrews rests on the powerful impression made by Christ's life and death.

b. It is illumined by such OT texts as Ps. 110:4, the Melchizedek story in Gen. 14, and covenant passages such as Jer. 31:31ff. The use made of Melchizedek is typological, the main point being that of superiority to the Levitical priesthood. The prophetic passages give dynamism to the cultic image with their stress on fulfilling God's will, fellowship with God, and forgiveness.

c. Christ's high priesthood is a way that we are also to tread. It leads through sacrificial death to the throne. It comprises both saving action and continuing intercession. The ministry on earth is denoted by a "once-for-all" (cf. Rom. 6:10); the present ministry is in heaven (8:4).

d. The Son fulfils the cultus but also transcends it. He is God's complete self-manifestation in person; the truth of sonship controls that of high priesthood. This entails a predicate of eternity that gives the high priesthood its impress and force. The prophetic category of inviolable covenant promise stresses the eternal character of this new and final revelation.

e. Focus on the cultic image not only will prevent readers from flirting with the old cultus but also does justice to the fact that the ancient theocracy is built on the Levitical priesthood personally represented by the high priest.

2. The Levitical High Priest.

a. The Deepest and Eternally Significant Dimensions and Tasks of the Priestly Ministry. The priest is divinely called, represents the people, is in solidarity with them, is also a sinner, and has as his chief task the offering of sacrifices in expiation (Heb. 2:17; 5:1ff.; 9:7).

b. The Office of the OT High Priest Finds Its Limit in Sin. The OT priest has to offer for his own sins (7:27), his mediation does not cover willful sins (5:2), and continuing guilt creates a constant need for fresh offering, so that the cultus is in fact a reminder of sin (10:3).

c. This failure is rooted in the earthly nature of the cultus. The priest is mortal, the sacrifice must be repeated, the purification is external, and the sanctuary belongs to corruptible creation. The temple curtain expresses the indirect and provisional nature of the relationship to God (9:9).

3. Christ the Exalted High priest.

a. Solidarity with Humanity. The synthesis of Son and high priest entails first the lowliness of the historical Jesus in compassionate solidarity with those he comes to help (4:15). In this regard he corresponds to the earthly high priest, yet with the exception of sinlessness (4:15; 7:26).

b. The Eternal High Priesthood Arises by Attestation of the Sonship. Jesus qualifies as high priest by showing himself to be the Son in loyal obedience through suffering (3:2; 5:7-8). His calling and institution rest on declaration of the sonship (Ps. 2:7) which he accredits by his perfection (7:28).

c. The Sinless High Priest. As high priest Jesus is unblemished like the OT high priest (7:27), but being also sinless he need not offer for himself (7:27-28), having demonstrated his sinlessness in an obedience that gives him the right to represent and save those with whom he is in solidarity (2:17).

d. The Contrast with the Carnal Offering. The sacrifice of this high priest is a supremely personal self-offering in which the priest is also victim (7:27). The offering of blood is also an offering of life which is made definitive by the eternal Spirit (9:14). This vicarious offering is once-for-all (7:27; 9:24ff.) in the double sense of being historically unique and eternally definitive.

e. The High Priest Christ Effects Access to the Throne, to God's Full Presence. This high priest passes into heaven as the earthly high priest does into the holy of holies. He thus makes the place of God's presence accessible to hope (4:14ff.; 6:17ff.). Christ the priest is also seated on the throne as king. He is eternally and omnipotently priest (7:16, 24-25). No change or chance, not even death, can interrupt his work.

4. Radical Deductions from the Christological Interpretation of the Cultus. A radical break with the ancient order occurs. The first offering ceases with the eternal validity of the high priest who brings fulfilment (10:9). God annuls the former commandment (7:18) and replaces the earlier covenant (8:13).

5. The Saving Efficacy and Practical Implications of the Truth Proclaimed.

a. The saving benefit is total redemption (cf. 9:12, 15; 10:18). This covers not only forgiveness but purifying of the conscience and sanctifying to God.

b. This salvation is a possession (4:14), an access (12:22), and a confessed reality (3:1) which the community may freely enjoy (4:16; 10:19, 22).

c. The only offerings that need now be made are those of thanksgiving and loving fellowship (13:15ff.). We must neither continue nor replace the ancient cultus, for Christ has definitively fulfilled it, and he alone abides.

F. archiereús and hiereús in the Early Church.

1. Christ as High Priest or Priest. Ignatius, 1 Clement, Justin, Clement, and Origen all reflect the language and thinking of Hebrews.

2. The General Priesthood of the Community. Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Origen refer in different connections to the general priesthood, and Justin can even use the term "high-priestly" for the church (Dialogue 116.3).

3. The Clergy as Priests. Did. 13.3 calls prophets "your high priests," 1 Clement uses the OT orders as a model for the church (40-41). Tertullian calls the bishop the chief priest, and Eusebius in Ecclesiastical History 10.4.2 has a passage in which the clergy are addressed as hiereís. [G. SCHRENK, III, 221-83]

hieróthytos, hieroprepḗs, hierosyléō, hierósylos, hierourgéō* → hierós; Hierousalḗm, Hierosólyma → Siṓn; hierōsýnē → *hierós

Iēsoús [Jesus]

1. Iēsoús is the Greek form of the OT Joshua (the name of the son of Nun in Exodus etc., of the high priest in Haggai and Zechariah, of two men in 1 Sam. 6:14 and 2 Kgs. 23:8, and of a Levite in 2 Chr. 31:15).

2. Iēsoús is a common name up to the early second century A.D. The NT uses Iēsoús for Joshua in Acts 7:45; Heb. 4:8, and cf. Iēsoús in Lk. 3:29, Iēsoús Barabbás in Mt. 27:16, Bariēsoús in Acts 13:6, and Iēsoús in Col. 4:11. After the second century Iēsoús disappears as a proper name, probably due to conscious avoidance.

3. The name Iēsoús expresses Christ's humanity. He goes by this name and is addressed and discussed by it. To distinguish him from others who bear it, we find such additions as "from Nazareth of Galilee" (Mt. 21:11) or "the son of David" (Mk. 10:47-48) (cf. also Mk. 1:24; Mt. 27:37; Jn. 18:5, etc.). The Christian community confesses this Iēsoús as the prince of life (Acts 3:15), as the Christ of God, as Lord and Savior, and as God's Son. But it makes no separation between Iēsoús and ho kýrios; Iēsoús is himself the one whom God has made both Lord and Judge (cf. Phil. 2:7; Gal. 3:1; Acts 17:31). In the Synoptic Gospels and Acts the simple Iēsoús is commonly used, though we also find ho kýrios (e.g., in Luke) and such fixed expressions as Iēsoús Christós and ho kýrios Iēsoús Christós. In the rest of the NT, however, the simple Iēsoús is rare. Paul has it mostly when thinking of Christ's life and death, as in 1 Th. 4:14; 2 Cor. 4:11ff.; Phil. 2:10. In Hebrews and Revelation, too, Iēsoús indicates that the history of Jesus forms the basis of faith (e.g., Heb. 2:9; 6:20; 10:19; Rev. 1:9; 14:12; 20:4; 22:16).

4. Matthew and Luke claim that the name is no accident; it is given because Jesus is to save his people from their sins (Mt. 1:21). The full name in Hebrew is a sentence name: "Yahweh saves." Some fathers link Iēsoús with Gk. iáomai, and a modern theory is that Jesus is a masculine form of Iasṓ, the goddess of salvation, but Eusebius recognizes the Hebrew basis, and the use of Iēsoús predates Christian contacts with the Hellenistic world.

5. The name Jesus is important from the standpoint of Christ's historicity. Those who deny this must show that there is a Jewish myth of a dying and rising God, that the Gospel records are nonhistorically intelligible, that Jesus is the name of a mythological figure, and that there is a pre-Christian Jesus cult (possibly related to Joshua the son of Nun, though arguments for this are purely speculative, as are suggestions that there was a Jesse sect, or that the Therapeutae worshipped a cultic god called Jesus). As regards Joshua, for later Judaism the exodus period is pivotal, yet the entry under Joshua is secondary to the giving of the law, and Joshua is nowhere a prototype of the Messiah. Furthermore, the law has in the NT only interim significance between Abraham and Christ, and if Joshua is mentioned it is only in relation to historical events (Heb. 11:30-31; Acts 7:45) or to show that the exodus did not bring fulfilment (Heb. 3:7ff.). If they were pre-Christian, the Naassene Psalm and magic papyri might point to a Jesus cult, but these texts are later and simply testify to the impact of the historical Jesus. The simple use of the name Jesus in the Gospels and Acts bears convincing (and wholly unintentional) testimony to the historicity of Jesus. [W. FOERSTER, III, 284-93]

→ ónoma

hikanós [sufficient], hikanótēs [fitness], hikanóō [to qualify]

hikanós has the basic sense of "sufficient," "enough," "large enough." It occurs in the NT for a large group, for a long period of time, or for a quality (cf. Mk. 10:46; Lk. 8:27; Mt. 3:11). It occurs mostly in Luke and Acts.

1. Among verses in which hikanós has theological significance is Mt. 3:11. That the Baptist is not "worthy" to carry the sandals of the Messiah denotes his servant status. He can give the baptism of repentance, but the coming Christ is the absolute Lord before whom there can be no claim and in whom God will act beyond all human measure. The centurion in Mt. 8:8; Lk. 7:6 makes a similar confession of the majesty of Jesus when recognizing his own unworthiness. In 1 Cor. 15:9 Paul is acknowledging his lack of qualifications for the apostolic office (cf. 2 Cor. 2:16). Yet recognition of personal inadequacy goes hand in hand with recognition of God as the source of all adequacy (2 Cor. 3:5-6; cf. 1 Cor. 7:25; 2 Cor. 4:1; Gal. 2:7; 1 Cor. 15:10; Col. 1:12).

2. In the Lucan passion story, when the disciples produce two swords, Jesus says: hikanón estin (Lk. 22:35ff.). The meaning is contested. One suggestion is that the two swords are all that is needed. But many exegetes see an implied censure, whether of the disciples' general lack of understanding, this specific misconception, or their foolish reliance on weapons. In this case the saying terminates the discussion: "That's enough." Another possibility is that Jesus is ironically pointing out the inadequacy of such arms. A final interpretation is that Jesus is trying to wean the disciples from trust in temporal weapons even while recognizing the love and loyalty which cause them to produce the swords. He must go to the cross alone, yet the hikanón estin points to his continuing fellowship with his followers. Boniface VIII uses this passage allegorically (Unam sanctam 1302) to prove that both the temporal and spiritual powers (the two swords) are under papal control. [K. H. RENGSTORF, III, 293-96]

hiketēría [supplication]

Deriving from hiktḗr, "one who asks protection," hiketēría denotes the request for protection, then, more generally, "urgent supplication." In Heb. 5:7 (with "prayers") it obviously has the more general sense in what is probably a conventional phrase. [F. BÜSCHEL, III, 296-97]

hilarós [cheerful], hilarótēs [cheerfulness]

1. Meaning “glad” or “cheerful,” hilarós can be used of daylight, songs, messages, and especially people. A later sense is “benevolent.”

2. Common usage in the LXX is for the “cheerful countenance” or the “favor” of a ruler. “Cheerful” is the common meaning in Philo, whether in relation to feasts, sages, or the face.

3. In 2 Cor. 9:7 (in loose allusion to Prov. 22:9) Paul refers to the cheerfulness of generosity. The sense approximates to liberality (cf. Rom. 12:8). This cheerfulness contrasts with the grumbling and questioning of Phil. 2:14. Reception of God’s gift provides the motivation (cf. 1 Pet. 4:9-10).

4. Among the apostolic fathers only Hermas has hilarós and hilarótēs. Nature and the human countenance are cheerful, generosity is a cheerful service, and the commandments are cheerful, while hilarótēs is contrasted with lýpē in Mandates 10.3. [R. BULTMANN, III, 297-99]

híleōs [gracious], hiláskomai [to expiate], hilasmós [expiation], hilastḗrion [mercy seat]

híleōs. A predicate of persons, híleos means “happy,” “friendly,” “gracious.” It is used especially of rulers and deities. In the LXX it is a predicate of God alone, e.g., in phrases for “to forgive,” “to have pity.” The only NT instances are in Heb. 8:12 (quoting Jer. 31:34) and the negative protestation in Mt. 16:22. [F. BÜSCHEL, III, 300-301] hiláskomai, hilasmós.

A. Expiation and Forms of Expiation in the OT.

1. kipper in the LXX. Mostly (83 times out of 100) the LXX has exiláskomai for Heb. kipper Other terms (e.g., hagiázō) are used by way of variation or on account of special content.

2. The Meaning of the Root kpr. The etymology of kpr is obscure. Gen. 32:21 favors the basic sense “to cover,” though “to wash away” and “to propitiate” are also possible.

3. kipper and Ransom. In Ex. 21:30 there is reference to the noncultic expiation by which an injury may be made good and the injured party reconciled (cf. Num. 35:31; Ps. 49:8. Ex. 30:12). A relation between this and kipper is rightly perceived.

4. Noncultic kipper. a. In its general use kipper signifies expiation by the substitution of human or animal life (Dt. 32:43; Ex. 32:30), or the averting of threatened destruction by gifts (Prov. 16:14) or, before God, by God’s own action (Jer. 18:23; Ps. 78:38).

b. In one or two passages the word occurs with sacrifice. Thus God is pleased in Gen. 8:20ff., and he abandons his wrath in 2 Sam. 24:25, but there can be no expiation by sacrifice for the serious sins of the sons of Eli in 1 Sam. 3:14.

5. The Cultic Use.

a. In relation to substitutionary expiation or ransom we may refer again to Ex. 30:15-16, as well as to Num. 35:33-34; 35:11ff.

b. Mostly, however, the use occurs in relation to the offerings prescribed by the law and along with such terms as “to free from sin,” “to purge,” and “to sanctify.” While expiation is clearly linked with blood, the usage is fluid. Among the offerings we read in 2 Kgs. 12:16 of guilt offerings, which seem here to be expiatory payments (cf. 1 Sam. 6:3ff.). To these are added the special offerings of Lev. 5 whereby those guilty of certain offenses must confess their fault and bring a specific sacrifice so that the priest may make atonement for them. This expiation is effected by blood on the basis of Lev. 17:11: “The life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it for you on the altar to make atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that makes atonement, by reason of the life."

---

Heb. Hebrew

c. In the sin offering of Lev. 4 the manipulation of blood and burning of fat constitute the climax, with forgiveness as the goal. The same applies in the trespass and guilt offerings of Lev. 7 and Lev. 5 (and cf. the priestly consecration in Ex. 29 and Lev. 8; also Lev. 9; Num. 8:5ff.; Lev. 12; 15:2ff.; Lev. 14). The concepts of purification and consecration may both be seen in the ritual of the Day of Atonement. If this includes burnt offerings, the blood of the sin offering lies at the heart of the expiation as the priest offers for himself, the people, and the sanctuary. The ritual in Ezek. 43:18ff. builds on that of the law but with the distinction that expiation is here the goal of all cultic actions (43:13ff.). The strength of the concept of expiation may be seen from the fact that in Num. 28-29 the sin offering now accompanies all other offerings. It should be noted that expiation and forgiveness are only for nondeliberate transgressions (Lev. 4:2; Num. 15:30). This obviously covers more than cultic offenses but none that are committed willfully and with evil intent. Purification goes hand in hand with expiation.

6. Conclusion. Among the people of God nothing is to be left unexpiated. God himself has provided the means of expiation. Expiation restores the disrupted relation with God except where sinners cut themselves off from the community by willful transgression. Whatever is affected by sin or uncleanness needs expiation, for it cannot stand before the holy God and his threatened judgment. Expiation is made supremely by the blood of offerings. God has ordained that this should be so, and blood is appropriate in view of the life that it contains. Life is threatened if expiation is not made, and preserved if it is. Since life is thus saved by life, the idea of vicariousness is undeniably present in some sense. [H. HERRMANN, III, 301-10]

B. hilasmós and katharmós in the Greek World. katharmós is purification from cultic or moral defects, hilasmós the propitiation of deities, demons, or the departed. While the two are not coincident, they constitute two aspects of the same process. The former is more important, since cleansing is essential to a right relation to deity. katharmoí may take the form of washings or rubbings, but they also include sacrifices (animal or human) in which the stains are transferred to the victim and hence removed. hilasmoí include such cultic acts as prayers, sacrifices, purifications, dances, and games. These are repeated annually, and are for both ritual and moral offenses. They cleanse as well as atone, and while they originally have the aim of appeasing the gods (whose anger is sometimes capricious), the stress in philosophy is on moral conduct and the essential benevolence of deity, so that katharmoí and hilasmoí lose their significance or undergo psychological reinterpretation.

C. Ideas of Expiation in Judaism.

1. The concept of sin is an urgent one in rabbinic theology. Sin is the chief obstacle to a right relation with God, and its removal or expiation is thus essential. This is achieved by the cultus and personal piety. The Day of Atonement, the sacrifices, and cultic objects all have atoning significance. So, too, do penitence, suffering, works of love, study of the law, fasting, martyrdom, and death. The suffering of the righteous can atone for the sins of the people or ward off suffering from others.

2. Jews of the dispersion hold essentially the same views as Palestinian Jews. They pay the temple tax and have an interest in its rituals. They also see the expiatory value of penitence, and Philo speaks of vicarious suffering.

D. hiláskomai.

1. From the same root as híleōs come the verbs hílēmi, "to be gracious," and hiláskomai (or exiláskomai), "to make gracious." In the latter case humans are the subjects and deities or the deceased the objects (except when the sense is "to bribe"). The passive aorist has the meaning "to be made gracious," i.e., "to show mercy." But in the prayer hilásthēti, the deity is active: "Be merciful."

2. In the LXX hiláskomai is rare; it bears the sense "to be merciful" or "to be or become gracious" (cf. Ex. 32:14; Lam. 3:42; 2 Kgs. 5:18). exiláskomai, however, is common for priestly acts in the purging or expiation of sin (kipper). It can have both the personal sense "to make gracious" and the cultic sense "to purge (the stain of sin or guilt)."

3. Philo makes little use of either term. For him hiláskomai usually means "to placate" (with persons as subject and God or persons as object) or "to atone" (by cultic or moral actions). While stating that good works atone for sin, Philo (on a cultic basis) perceives that it is God who acts in us to effect true purity; he thus gives expiation a personal dimension.

4. In the NT hiláskomai occurs only in Lk. 18:13; Heb. 2:17, exiláskomai not at all. In Lk. 18:13 hilásthēti is a cry to God for mercy. In Heb. 2:17 the task of Jesus as High Priest is to expiate sins before God. The idea is not to make God gracious nor to conquer sins ethically.

5. The interesting thing in the construction and meaning of hiláskomai and exiláskomai is the addition to the sense "to propitiate" (with accusative of the person propitiated) of the sense "to purge" (with accusative of the person or object purged) and "to expiate" (with accusative of the guilt expiated or with perí, apó, etc.). This was a natural development, since that which makes God gracious also purges from sin and expiates its guilt. No less striking, however, is that words that originally denote our human action in relation to God are now used instead for God's divine action in relation to us and on our behalf.

E. hilasmós. This is the action of propitiation and expiation. In the LXX, which also has exilasmós, it denotes cultic expiation and divine forgiveness. Philo also uses it for purging from sin. The only NT instances are in 1 Jn. 2:2; 4:10. Here it is God's own gracious action, and hence denotes the removal of guilt (cf. the confession of sin in 1:8, 10, and paráklētos in 2:1). The result in us is confidence in the judgment (4:17) and victory over the sense of sin. Demonstrating love, hilasmós begets love (4:7, 11, 20-21). Because Jesus has come for the removing (hilasmós) of sin, the regenerate cannot sin. When they do so, they are against the truth, and they have to come back again to Jesus as hilasmós. This hilasmós is not linked specifically to Christ's death but to his total mission (cf. 1:7; 3:16; 5:6). hilasmós is necessary in view of approaching judgment. It is not just a doctrine but a reality by which we live. [F. BÜSCHEL, III, 310-18] hilastḗrion.

1. hilastḗrion in the LXX.

a. The OT refers to a golden kappōreṯ over the ark (Ex. 25:17ff.). The cherubim are at the ends with their faces toward it (v. 20). God meets Moses there (v. 22; cf. Num. 7:89; Lev. 16:2). The high priest burns incense before it on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:13), and then sprinkles blood on and before it.

b. The kappōreṯ is no mere cover, nor is it part of the ark (cf. Ex. 26:34; 30:6). In Ex. 25:17 the LXX first calls it hilastḗrion epíthema ("an atoning handpiece"), then hilastḗrion ("place of expiation"), and once exilasmós (1 Chr. 28:11). The Hebrew term probably derives from the word "to cover," not "to expiate," but 1 Chr. 28:11 favors an equation with hilastḗrion, and the exegetical tradition supports this. [J. HERRMANN, III, 318-19] 2. tó hilastḗrion is a neuter noun from the adjective hilastḗrios. It could be an accusative masculine in Rom. 3:25, but there are no other instances of this.

3. The neuter noun is common for kappōreṯ in the LXX (Ex. 25:16ff.; 31:7; Lev. 16:2ff.; Num. 7:89). The sense is that of agent rather than place of expiation: “that which makes expiation.” The altar of burnt offering is tó hilastḗrion in Ezek. 43:14 (probably because of the sprinkled blood). Technically, however, the term denotes the kappōreṯ though outside the LXX and related works the sense is the more general one of “oblation.”

4. Rom. 3:25.

a. Whether Paul has the kappōreṯ in view in Rom. 3:25 is not wholly certain, but he undoubtedly means “that which expiates sin” and thus reveals God’s righteousness and brings redemption. God himself is the subject of the action, so that divine expiation rather than human propitiation is the point. “By faith” is to be taken with hilastḗrion. The object of faith is Jesus crucified and risen, who is thus our hilastḗrion as we believe in him, and the theme of the word of reconciliation (cf. the “put forward,” which seems to refer to apostolic preaching rather than divine selection). “In his blood” clearly relates to hilastḗrion rather than to faith. It is as the one who died for believers that Jesus is their hilastḗrion. The revelation of divine righteousness in Jesus as hilastḗrion is linked with the passing over of former sins, in which the kappōreṯ plays an important role. The point, then, seems to be that Jesus is a higher kappōreṯ which works through faith, not external observance, which is sprinkled with Jesus’ own blood, not that of animals, and which is open to view, not hidden in the holy of holies. In this way Paul personalizes and spiritualizes the concept of the kappōreṯ as elsewhere he does that of cultic service or of circumcision (Rom. 12:1; Col. 2:11). If he has the actual kappōreṯ in view, he reorients it to Jesus as the one in whom true and full expiation has been made.

b. The hilastḗrion does not make God gracious, for God’s grace is its presupposition. Those who are under God’s wrath are also under his patience (Rom. 2:4). The hilastḗrion reveals this. Yet this revelation comes only with God’s vicarious action. What is revealed is not just patience but the holiness of God which punishes sin (v. 26) and yet in so doing separates sin and sinner and thus brings the sinner to faith and repentance. Required to accomplish this is one who both reveals God to us and at the same time represents us to God by vicariously bearing the divine judgment and thus bringing us to the self-judgment of faith. Without this vicarious work the revelation could not bring true redemption. It is in the unity of divine revelation and human representation that Jesus is by faith an expiation in his blood, and thereby brings redemption.

5. Heb. 9:5 simply follows LXX usage when it speaks about the hilastḗrion in connection with the ark. [F. BÜSCHEL, III, 319-23]

hína [in order that]

If the final significance is not always too strict (cf. the Johannine writings), the NT does not follow the Koine in giving the word consecutive or causal significance. hína clauses are common in the NT chiefly because of its teleological understanding of God’s ways with us and of our human destiny.

A. Theological Final Clauses.

1. In Judaism.

a. The LXX uses hína to denote the point of God's action (e.g., in not abandoning Israel or championing the suffering), namely, to manifest his nature, power, and glory. The Wisdom literature sees God's purposeful work in all reality and events (cf. Sir. 39). Final clauses are important in Sir. 44ff. If God's historical action serves different ends, the final goal is still that he be acknowledged and glorified.

b. Apocalyptic broadens and deepens this view. It interprets everything (e.g., the law) teleologically. Much takes place to fulfil what is predicted. Individuals are sent to do specific works. Nations have their own destinies, especially Israel, whose present visitation is a means to a further end. True servants of God recognize God's teleological direction (cf. Joseph, and Mordecai's question to Esther in Esth. 4:14). The ultimate goal is eschatological; all historical goals point forward to the divine consummation when God's righteousness and majesty will be victoriously displayed and the goal of creation will be achieved in the future world and the righteous who inherit it. Teleology, of course, raises acutely the question of theodicy. One solution is that only a minority will reach the goal and the rest of human and other creatures will perish. Judaism in general, however, prefers to contrast the purposes of God for the Gentiles and for Israel by arguing that the Gentiles are now let loose with a view to later discipline, while Israel is now disciplined with a view to future forgiveness.

c. Rabbinic theology accepts the teleological principle that all that God does is for good. After A.D. 70 this is a defiant nevertheless, though it can easily become a facile slogan. The phrase "that it might be fulfilled" also occurs. As in all teleological thinking, fanciful reasons are sometimes found for God's actions.

2. In the NT.

a. The Christ event gives new life and meaning to the older teleology. Jesus himself speaks of his unique office in terms of commission (Mt. 5:17ff.; Jn. 3:17, etc.). The mighty works serve his revelation (Mk. 2:10 etc.). They thus bring about a crisis of decision. They will lead either to faith or to hardening (cf. Lk. 2:34). The hína clauses are final even when the reference is to hardening (Mk. 4:11-12). Jesus has come into the world for judgment (Jn. 9:39). Supremely, the cross itself has teleological significance even down to the fact that the prophets have to be fulfilled (Mt. 26:56).

b. The first Christian preaching borrows the Joseph formula and extols God's purposeful overruling at the cross (Acts 2:36 etc.). Paul puts this in the form of a paradox: Jesus has become poor so that by his poverty we might become rich (2 Cor. 8:9; cf. 5:21; Gal. 3:13-14, etc.). Along the lines of martyrdom theology, he does not die merely to be exalted but in order to save. The cross is thus seen in the light of the télos, and the télos concept permeates the total Christian understanding of God, the world, and history. Creation, the call of Abraham, the law, and the history of Israel all move forward to Christ, in whom alone the ancient witnesses and martyrs are made perfect (Heb. 11:40). The cross, however, does not rule out a future consummation. Like the martyrs, Christians undergo present suffering with a view to future glory (Rom. 8:17; 1 Pet. 1:6-7). God treads the way of conflict with his people, working everything for good to those who love him (Rom. 8:28; cf. Phlm. 15). Even the hardening of Israel is the means to a final end of grace and glory: "that they also may receive mercy" (Rom. 11:31); "that he may have mercy upon all" (v. 32).

c. The end of all God's ways is justification by faith, salvation, God's self-revelation, but above all the divine glorification in the victory, not of wrath, but of grace, when all things will be subject to God (1 Cor. 15:28) and his creation will achieve its original destiny (Rom. 11:36). This can be stated with confidence because already in the cross of Christ God has carried history to its goal through conflict, destroying human self-glorification and thereby establishing the divine glory in the soli deo gloria of the new creation.

B. Ethical Final Clauses.

1. In Judaism.

a. In ethical final clauses (cf. Ex. 20:12 and especially Proverbs), the good or bad results of conduct are stated. In the last resort, however, seeking to do God's will is the goal of right action (cf. Prov. 3:21-22). The basic form of blessings accords with this. God's action has specific human action as its goal.

b. Apocalyptic makes these theological concepts the basis of ethics. We have been made for a divine purpose. God has given us the law to show this. He intervenes to lead us to righteousness. We are shown the final reason or goal for acts and not just their immediate consequences. This comes out plainly in prayers that conclude with final clauses.

c. Rabbinic theology accepts the same principle, but with a tendency to formalize and trivialize it. The result can be a utilitarian moralism even though fulfilment of God's will is perceived as the goal of creation.

2. In the NT.

a. Jesus often uses imperatives with final clauses. These clauses direct our will and actions to the eschatological goal of salvation, to which our present life must be oriented in preparation, conflict, and sacrifice (Mt. 19:12, 23ff.). The supreme goal of conduct is entry into the kingdom (Lk. 16:9), or forgiveness (Mk. 11:25), or the glorifying of God (Mt. 5:16).

b. The divine action supplies the impulse for all human action. Creation is a divine calling and God's historical work a word of summons. Thus statements about God's action lead on to final clauses about human tasks and possibilities. Predestination (Rom. 8:29; 9:11-12) points to our final goal, not fatalistically, but in orientation to our human will. God wills this will, and directs it to its goal by liberating and governing it. He does this in the Christ event as his supreme word and work (cf. Eph. 2:8-9). The indicatives of this event lead on to imperatives (cf. 1 Cor. 5:7; 2 Cor. 5:15 etc.; Rom. 8:3-4). A final eis or hína brings out the force of the cross for the Christian life (cf. Rom. 7:4; Gal. 2:19). This applies especially to the apostolate (2 Cor. 4:10).

c. Final clauses in Paul also refer to the divine goals for us (1 Cor. 9:22ff.; 9:12ff.). Since these goals demand supreme self-sacrifice, utilitarianism is excluded. We are not just to pursue personal salvation. In a hierarchy of goals, the glorifying of God is again supreme (2 Cor. 4:15 etc.). This transcends our own ability; hence NT ethics is an ethics of prayer. Exhortations merge into blessings and petitions that are introduced by hína (cf. Jesus in Lk. 22:32; 21:36, and Paul in Col. 4:3-4; 1:9ff.). It is not just a stylistic device that Paul's epistles begin with requests and thanksgivings and close with blessings, for the apostle has more trust in God than in human goodwill or power. That God may be glorified is again the final goal of our ways as well as God's (cf. Phil. 1:9ff.; 2 Th. 1:11-12; 2 Cor. 1:8ff.; Eph. 1:17ff.). [E. STAUFFER, III, 323-33]

→ eis, diá

Iordánēs → potamós

iós [poison, rust], katióomai [to rust]

Of the two words iós, the first (meaning "arrow") does not occur in the NT, while we find the second (meaning "poison" or "rust") in Rom. 3:13; Jms. 3:8; 5:3.

1. iós as "Poison." In the OT the poison of snakes is a metaphor for the malicious speech of enemies (cf. Ps. 140:3). Evil, too, is compared to the gall of asps (Job 20:12ff.). Wine, though pleasant to the taste, has the sting of an adder. In the NT Paul uses the same comparison to describe sin: Our tongues are deceitful, our lips have the poison of serpents, and our mouths are full of cursing and bitterness. Sin produces enmity and makes words into treacherous weapons that bring destruction. Due to the power of the word, sins of the tongue are particularly sinister. James agrees when he calls the tongue a restless evil full of deadly poison (3:8). The tongue does not just bring evil; it is itself evil. Death lurks in its violent and deceitful word. Cf. also Hermas Similitudes 9.26.7; Ignatius Trallians 6.2.

2. iós as "Rust." In Jms. 5:3 iós as rust offers a warning against heaping up worldly wealth. The rust will not merely rot this but will serve as a testimony against its owners and sear their flesh like fire. The point is not just that rust proves the transitoriness of riches but that it accuses the rich for letting things rot rather than give them to the poor. As in Ezek. 24:3ff., rust is an indictment, though a warning against trust in transitory things may also be present (cf. Mt. 6:19-20). In the same verse the verb katióomai occurs for "to rust." [O. MICHEL, III, 334-36]

Ioudaía, Ioudaíos, ioudaízō, Ioudaismós → Israḗl

híppos [horse]

1. The Horse in Palestine, the OT, and Judaism. The horse is very early of military importance in Egypt, and from there (or Asia Minor) it comes into Palestine. Solomon receives horses as presents (1 Kgs. 10:5) and also buys them from Egypt (10:29). Horses and chariots form the core of the armies of Israel, Syria, Assyria, and Persia. Horses are lauded for their speed and strength (cf. Job 39:19ff.). God's power is depicted in terms of horsemen and chariots (2 Kgs. 2:11; 6:17). But the horse also denotes the alien power in which one is not to trust (Ps. 76:6; Hos. 1:7). It symbolizes carnal confidence (Is. 30:16). Thus the king of peace chooses an ass, not a horse (Zech. 9:9). The horse plays a special role in visions. Joel describes the locusts as chariots and horses (2:4-5). Zechariah sees horses of various colors (1:8ff.). 2 Macc. 3:25ff. tells of an avenging horse and rider, while in 10:29ff. we read of horsemen that protect the army of Judas.

2. The Horse in the NT

a. Jesus rides into Jerusalem on an ass, not on the warlike horse (Mk. 11:1ff.). Faith discerns here the coming of the messianic king of peace in fulfilment of Scripture and in disclosure of the messianic secret (cf. Mt. 21:5; Jn. 12:15).

b. Jms. 3:2-3 compares Christian mastery of the body to control of a horse.

c. Revelation follows apocalyptic in the use of horse imagery. The four horses of 6:1ff. represent conquest, civil strife, hardship, and pestilence. The demonic locusts of ch. 9 are compared to horses with heads like lions and the ability to kill with both head and tail. In 14:20 the terrible nature of the judgment is shown by the fact that there is blood to the horses' bridles. At the end, however, the Messiah and his host will appear on the white horses of victory (19:11ff.), though the Messiah alone "judges and makes war" (v. 11); he does this with the sword of his mouth (v. 15). [O. MICHEL, III, 336-39]

íris [rainbow]

A. Outside the NT.

1. íris is the usual word for "rainbow," though it can also mean "halo," "iris" of the eye, or "play of colors." The goddess Iris personifies the bow in reflection of the religious concepts and experiences associated with it.

2. In the OT the rainbow is a sign and witness of the covenant of Gen. 9:9ff. The Hebrew term can also denote the bow of the hunter or warrior; the underlying idea, then, might be that God's bow is laid up in the clouds. But in Ezek. 1:28 the bow demonstrates God's grace and glory, and in Sir. 43:11 it testifies with all creation to the Creator's power. The LXX always uses tózon, not íris.

3. The rabbis warn against looking at the rainbow both for fear of being blinded by the divine glory and also because of the danger of desecrating the divine name. They express the opinion that the rainbow appears only when there are no righteous on the earth; the existence of the righteous guarantees the world's preservation, and thus makes the rainbow unnecessary.

B. The NT.

1. Unlike the LXX, the NT, like Josephus and Philo, uses íris for rainbow so as to make the meaning clear to Greek readers.

2. The word occurs in Rev. 4:3 and 10:1. In 4:3 an emerald halo encircles the divine throne. In 10:1 the cloud and sun show that the emblem of the angel with the prophetic book is a rainbow. In both instances there is probably an allusion to the covenant sign of Gen. 9. Even when God judges, the rainbow is a reassuring indication of his good and gracious will. If God in 4:1ff. is the holy and transcendent God (cf. v. 6), the iris around the throne bears witness that he is also the near and loving God whose book of destiny is opened by the slain Lamb (ch. 5) and whose judgments still stand under the rainbow sign (10:1ff.). The covenant sign of Gen. 9 is thus given a christological reference and fulfilment. The enacted salvation of God, which precedes all human works, forms the basis of legitimate assurance in the judgment. [K. H. RENGSTORF, III, 339-42]

Isaák → Iakṓb; isángelos → ángelos

ísos [equal], isótēs [equality], isótimos [equal in value]

A. isótēs as a Quality.

1. Quantitative Equality.

a. The equality denoted by ísos is primarily one of size or number, or of value or force in a quantitative sense (as distinct from hómoios, which suggests quality). It may thus be used for equal sums, lengths of space or time, shares, pieces, or an equal voice (cf. Ex. 30:34; Ezek. 40:5ff.).

b. In Rev. 21:16 the three equal sides of the heavenly city, especially as three times twelve thousand, denote perfection. While cubes occur in antiquity (cf. the cubic tower of Marduk in Babylon and the cubic shape of the holy of holies in the temple), the idea is probably that the new Jerusalem fills both heaven and earth.

c. In Lk. 6:34 the basic thought is clear but not the precise sense, for tá ísa might be (1) the capital without interest, (2) the corresponding total of capital with interest, (3) a similar service, or (4) interest amounting to the original capital. In any case, giving in order to get is shown to be incompatible with unselfish love. Calculating exact correspondence (whether in repayment or revenge) is alien to the true Christian attitude (cf. 1 Cor. 13:5).

2. Equality of Content or Meaning. As ísos may denote exact equality in mathematics, so it may be used for precise agreement of content, e.g., in a duplicate or transcript. Thus the content of the witnesses in Mk. 14:56 is not consistent in detail, as the law requires.

3. Human Equality: the Greeks. The concept of human equality is important for the Greeks, especially as the necessary basis of law. Only legal equals can enter into legal relationships. Though different in nature, they may enjoy the same rights. This equality reflects or is a part of the equality which is for Plato the essential dynamic of the cosmos and the basis of order. Equality is a fundamental principle of democracy (along with freedom), not as essential equality, but as equality of position and rights (cf. 2 Macc. 9:15). It also underlies the personal society of friends, in whom is achieved a true blending of spirits. Legal equality also demands justice, i.e., the administration of law without respect of persons. At this point there is approximation to díkaios. Finally, isótēs is important in contracts in the sense that signatories accept equally the agreed rights and obligations.

4. Human Equality: Christians. Over against legal equality stands the Christian equality based on grace and love. This is an equality of spiritual possessions (Acts 11:17) and eternal salvation (Mt. 20:12) that God has set up without regard for origin, prior history (Acts 11:17), achievement, or merit (Mt. 20:12), and that demands equality in relationship. Paul uses an appeal to the Greek sense of equality when promoting the Jerusalem collection (2 Cor. 8:13-14). This is no mere appeal for giving in hope of return but an application of the golden rule of Lk. 6:31. The hína of v. 14 states the divine objective rather than the human motive. isótēs as a principle of mutual assistance serves the divine goal of isótēs. God himself establishes this equality by giving the same gift to Gentiles as to Jews, i.e., the Holy Spirit (Acts 11:17). 2 Pet. 1:1 uses the words that denote the same rank and status in civic life (isótimos and isotimía) to describe the equal faith by which we are equally righteous in the kingdom of God. Jesus in the parable of the laborers (Mt. 20:12) brings out the eschatological nature of this equality. Here is no legal principle involving equality of rights or achievement but an act of divine righteousness against which the sense of human justice protests (vv. 11-12). The equal reward is equal felicity such as we find expected in many rabbinic statements and stories. This equality does not exclude present differences in faith (Rom. 12:3), receptivity (Mk. 4:24), and charisms (1 Cor. 12). The NT presupposes differences in God's kingdom (Mt. 5:19; 10:41-42, etc.). Yet equality of eternal life and salvation remains.

5. Equality by Nature and Equality with God outside the NT. While ísos refers first to quantitative equality, it quickly acquires a qualitative aspect. It may thus be used for equality of character, or, in Stoicism, of good and bad actions, or, in the LXX, of our human equality in birth and death (Wis. 7:3). Human equality contrasts with God's equality only with himself (Is. 44:7 etc.). The divine image does not imply equality by nature. In Judaism God will finally establish a fuller likeness (cf. 1 Jn. 3:2), but to seek equality with God (Gen. 3:5; Is. 14:14) is a fundamental sin. Thus the Bible avoids such common Greek expressions as "godlike" (isótheos).

6. The Equality of Jesus with God in the NT.

a. In Jn. 5:18 Jesus is accused of making himself equal to God. While he does not expressly make the claim (cf. v. 19), he stresses the identity of works. In Jn. 1:1; 10:30 the unity of Father and Son is plainly stated even alongside the subjection of the Son to the Father; hence the accusation in 10:33 that "you, being a man, make yourself God." In this context ísos in 5:18 has a new depth and fullness, for with its inherent element of exactness, and its added dimension of quality, it denotes an essential equality which the later term homooúsios was designed to state and defend.

b. This is also the meaning of ísa in the difficult verse Phil. 2:6. The problems of the verse are whether being equal with God is a reality or a possibility and whether the action is that of the preexistent or the historical Christ. The first answer is that equality with God is a possession that can neither be renounced nor lost; it is the beginning of Christ's way (v. 6) and it will also be the end (vv. 9ff.). But Christ temporarily ceases to make use of it, taking the form of a servant, exercising his lordship in this strange form of humiliation, and thereby attaining to its public recognition. Because he does not have regard for himself—the point of the exhortation—the divine nature that is demonstrated in his humility is confirmed in his glory. The action, then, is that of the eternal Christ, and the emptying implies no loss of essential equality with God.

B. isótēs as Equity. Since isótēs approximates to dikaiosýnē ("justice"), the group takes on the sense of equity or fairness. The just judge is ísos (impartial), but the righteous person is also ísos (upright). Col. 4:1 reflects this usage when enjoining masters to treat their slaves both justly and fairly (tó díkaion kaí tḗn isotḗta toís doúlois paréchesthe). Their Master in heaven, who is unconditionally just and fair, is the one to whom they must give account (though Clement of Alexandria [in Stromateis 3.6.1; 6.47.4] has God's grace rather than judicial isótēs in mind when he uses the term with reference to God). [G. STÄHLIN, III, 343-55]

---

vv. verses

→ díkaios, heís, hómoios

Israḗl [Israel], Israēlítēs [Israelite], Ioudaíos [Jew], Ioudaía [Judea], Ioudaikós [Jewish], ioudaízō [to live as a Jew], Ioudaismós [Judaism], Hebraíos [Hebrew], Hebraikós [Hebrew], Hebraís [Hebrew (language)], Hebraistí [in Hebrew]

A. Israel, Judah, and Hebrews in the OT.

1. Israel and Judah. Israel is the name of the sacral tribal league of Josh. 24. It denotes the totality of God's elect and embraces their central beliefs. With the monarchy it still covers the whole group under Saul, but under David it comes to denote the northern tribes as distinct from Judah. David and Solomon hold the league together in spite of tensions, but with Rehoboam Israel breaks away and we have the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Judah is simply a political name for the tribe and then for the southern kingdom, and has no sacral significance. With the collapse of the northern kingdom, Israel again becomes the name for the whole people in the spiritual sense (as it had been for the prophets; cf. Is. 8:14), and this becomes the normative usage. In practice, of course, Judah is now Israel, but the concept of a greater Israel embracing all the tribes is never lost. Josiah attempts an actual restoration of the full Davidic kingdom, and reconstitution of the twelve tribes becomes a form of eschatological expectation.

2. Hebrews. The name Hebrews seems at first to be a legal rather than an ethnic term (perhaps connected with ḫabiru) (cf. Ex. 21:2ff.; Jer. 34:8ff.; 1 Sam. 14:21). But the term then becomes a more general one that is used by foreigners to denote Israel (often critically; cf. Gen. 39:14 etc.), or by Israelites to distinguish themselves from foreigners (Gen. 40:15; Ex. 1:19, etc.). It thus has almost a national sense in, e.g., Gen. 14:13 and Jon. 1:9. [G. VON RAD, III, 356-59]

B. Israḗl, Ioudaíos, Hebraíos in Jewish Literature after the OT.

1. Israḗl-Ioudaíos.

a. The Basis. In postexilic times two terms come into use for the people, the sacral term Israel (ite) and the political term Jew. Both denote the people in terms of religious confession as well as national allegiance. Israel is the fellowship of those who worship the true God and who have been chosen by him to do so. Every Jew stands in relationship to God, and outsiders can enter into this relationship only by becoming members of this people. Of the two designations, Israel is preferred by the people and stresses the religious aspect, while Jew is the non-Israelite usage (freely adopted by Jews of the dispersion) and carries at times (though infrequently) a disparaging nuance.

b. The Usage of Palestinian Judaism. (i) In 1 Maccabees Israel is the author's own term but Ioudaíoi is used (a) when non-Jews are speaking, (b) in diplomatic letters, treaties, etc., (c) by Jews themselves in diplomatic communications, (d) and by Jews also in official domestic documents (cf. 1 Macc. 13:42; also Hasmonean coins). (ii) Religious works like Sirach or Judith naturally use Israel with its religious orientation. The same applies to rabbinic works. (iii) When the rabbis do use Ioudaíos, it is mostly on the lips of non-Jews, or in adoption of the usage of non-Jews or Jews of the dispersion. How unusual the term is may be seen from the attempt to find a play on the word monotheist in the description of Mordecai as a Jew in Esth. 2:5.

c. The Usage of Hellenistic Judaism. (i) In 2 Maccabees Israel occurs only five times and always in strongly religious contexts, e.g., 1:25-26. Ioudaíos is freely used even in self-designation. We also find Ioudaismós for the Jewish religion (cf. 8:1). 3 Maccabees follows a similar pattern (cf. Israel in 2:6 etc., Ioudaíos elsewhere). (ii) The testimony of inscriptions is to the same effect. Even Jews call themselves Ioudaíoi. Cf., too, the Aramaic documents from the Elephantine colonists. (iii) 4 Maccabees may also be cited in this context, though the religious contents here give greater scope for Israel.

2. Hebraíos.

a. As a Term for the Language and Script. (i) Hebraíos is less common than Israḗl and Ioudaíos, and in the rabbis denotes the language (as distinct from Aramaic or Greek) and the script (as distinct from the Assyrian and Greek scripts). Only rarely are Hebrew and Aramaic lumped together. (ii) The Apocrypha and pseudepigrapha also use the term for Hebrew, but occasionally, and more commonly in Josephus and the NT, Aramaic is included. Josephus also extends the term to cover coins, measures, names of the month, and various national characteristics.

b. As an Archaic Name and Lofty Expression for the People of Israel. (i) The OT uses the word for the earliest period, and this leads to its use in references to the remoter past or in works cultivating an archaic style. (ii) As an archaic term, Hebraíos acquires dignity and thus comes into use as a lofty or polite term that will avoid the derogatory nuances of Ioudaíos, e.g., in the martyrdom stories in 4 Maccabees (5:2, 4 etc.) or in Judith. (iii) Possibly this is the point on some inscriptions, although in view of the accepted use of Ioudaíos here the reference may well be to national characteristics, primarily by clinging to the use of Aramaic. [K. G. KUHN, III, 359-69]

C. Ioudaíos, Israḗl, Hebraíos in Greek Hellenistic Literature.

1. Ioudaíos.

a. In Pagan Writers. (i) Postclassical Greek writings contain many references and mostly have Ioudaíos for the individual Jew and Ioudaíoi for the people (less commonly Hebraíoi). Historians take note of the people and show an interest in its history and politics (e.g., Hecataeus of Abdera, or Agatharchides). (ii) The term Ioudaíos also has a decisive religious connotation, e.g., in Megasthenes, Plutarch, etc. Plutarch describes Jewish rituals and festivals. (iii) A significant point is that Ioudaíos may denote religious adherence irrespective of nationality (cf. Plutarch).

b. Among Jews and Jewish Writers. (i) Dispersion Jews adopt the Gentile custom and soon come to call themselves Ioudaíoi. (ii) Philo follows this usage, with a stress on religious as well as national unity (though he does not go so far as to speak of Jews not belonging to the nation). (iii) Josephus rarely has Ioudaíoi for early Israel but uses nothing else when he comes to the postexilic and contemporary period. He interweaves the national and religious aspects and can sometimes call proselytes Ioudaíoi.

2. Israḗl.

a. In Pagan Writers. Since Israel is a specifically Jewish term, it is no surprise that pagan writers never use it for either past or present Israel. It occurs in papyri only under direct Jewish or Christian influence.

b. In Philo and Josephus. (i) Philo. With reference to the early period, Philo follows the OT in using Israel, often in quotations. (ii) Josephus. Josephus, too, uses Israel only with a past reference. Unlike Philo, who gives the term figurative significance, Josephus seems not to attach any particular religious meaning to

it. He prefers Israēlítai for the whole people, and shows acquaintance with the Palestinian use of this for ordinary people as distinct from priests and Levites.

3. Hebraíos.

a. In Pagan Writers. (i) Rare in Greek literature, this word usually has a national, geographical, or linguistic sense. (ii) Sometimes it is selected as a more ancient term. (iii) Once it plainly denotes the language. (iv) For Pausanias the term means inhabitant of Palestine.

b. Among Jews: Philo and Josephus. (i) Philo. Philo uses the word for Jews of ancient times, and also for that which, though Jewish, is not common to all Jews, e.g., the language. (ii) Josephus. We have here a similar usage for ancient Israel and for such things as language, script, coins, etc. that are peculiar to the Jews as a nation. (iii) On inscriptions the term denotes Aramaic-speaking Jews from Palestine.

D. *Ioudaíos, Isra*ḗ*l, Hebraíos* in the NT.

1. Ioudaíos, Ioudaía, Ioudaikós, ioudaízō, Ioudaismós.

a. Ioudaíos in the Synoptists. Ioudaíos is rare in the Synoptists. It occurs for the people only in the plural and only on the lips of foreigners (cf. Mt. 2:2). It has a national and geographical but especially a religious sense. In the passion story, as in that of the Wise Men, Jesus is called "king of the Jews," but Pilate obviously does not take the religious side seriously, and the crucifixion plainly strikes at any political claim (cf. Mt. 27:11, 29, 37). In contrast the leaders of the people mock Jesus as the "king of Israel" (Mt. 27:42). In Mt. 28:15 there is no article and the reference is to Jews who refuse to trust in Jesus. In Mk. 7:3 the explanatory note is for non-Jews and the word has a religious connotation. In Lk. 7:3 and 23:51 the author may well be adopting his own usage. The Synoptic use corresponds to that of 1 Maccabees: Ioudaíoi is used for the people either by non-Jews or by Jews in their dealings with them, while Israḗl is the proper Jewish term.

b. John. (i) Among the many uses in John, we note first a similarity to that of the Synoptics in the passion story (18:33, 39; 19:3), where "king of the Jews" occurs on non-Jewish lips (cf. also 18:35). It is also a Samaritan woman who speaks in 4:5, and distinction is made from the Samaritans in 4:22. (ii) John also uses Ioudaíos for inhabitants of Palestine, especially in explanation of Jewish customs or circumstances. The aim is obviously to make things clear to foreigners (cf. 2:6, 13; 5:1; 7:2). In such contexts the use is objective and nonemphatic. The same applies to 1:19; 3:1, etc. Some of these Jews may well be believers in Jesus (8:31; 11:45; 12:11). This usage corresponds to that of Josephus and need not imply that the author himself is distant in time or nationality. (iii) In some passages the Jews in John are opponents of Jesus, though opposition arises from the context and is not implicit in the term. Thus certain Jews criticize Jesus as such because he seems to reject the temple in 2:18ff., or calls himself the bread of life in 6:41ff., or claims unity with the Father in 10:31 (cf. also 5:16ff.; 8:48; 13:33). Some "Jews" take up an ambiguous attitude for fear of the "Jews" (7:13; 9:22). The point in all this is not that the Jews as a whole reject Jesus, or that a specific group of Zealots does so, but that opposition arises on the grounds of the Jewish religion (cf. 9:29). A gulf is thus implied between the Christian understanding of the OT and the Jewish understanding which resists it. For John the Jews are often those who adopt this Jewish understanding in rejection of Jesus. At the same time, the national basis remains. Not all Jews reject Jesus, and those who do so are first Jews by nationality, and only then Jews in opposition to Jesus.

c. Acts. The usage in Acts is like that in John. It differs, however, inasmuch as dispersion Jews are now included (but not proselytes except perhaps in 2:5). Ioudaíos is the normal term on the lips of non-Jews (18:14; 22:30) or of Jews in their dealings with them (21:39; 23:20; 24:5). Sometimes there is a religious connotation (cf. 10:22 and perhaps 16:20). There is no unfavorable implication in passages like 13:6; 18:4; 19:10, 17. Commitment to the law typifies the Jews in 10:28. This can yield a usage (as in John) for those who oppose Christ and his community (cf. 16:3; 9:23; 12:11;, 13:50; 17:5, 13). Yet this aspect is not indissolubly linked to the term, for there are Jews who believe (14:2) and these Jews are at odds with Ioudaíoi who are opponents.

d. Paul. Paul more commonly has Ioudaíos in the singular, and often without the article. This suggests that he has in mind a religious type. Even in 1 Th. 2:14, which refers to Palestinian Jews, those who reject both Christ and the prophets are in view. But the type includes the true Jew, who keeps the law, as distinct from the merely outward Jew (cf. Rom. 2:17ff.). Devotion to the law is what characterizes the Jew (cf. 1 Cor. 9:20). Thus the Jew of Gal. 2:13 is the adherent of the law. This contrasts with the "Jew by nature" of v. 15. It is because the Jew has the law that he differs from the Hellenes and the Gentiles (Rom. 3:1-2; 9:4-5). By the will of God the Jew has an inherent advantage, and the gospel is preached to the Jew first. Yet since the Jew does not keep the law (Rom. 2:17ff.), and God is also the God of the Gentiles and will bless all peoples in Abraham (Gal. 3:8), the radical distinction of Jew and Hellene no longer applies to those who are justified by faith in Christ (Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11; Rom. 9:24), though historical distinctions remain (1 Cor. 7:17ff.).

e. Revelation. In the two instances in Revelation (2:9; 3:9) those who are Jews only in claim and name are said to be the synagogue of Satan. They stand in implied contrast to true Jews who are committed to God and his will (cf. Rom. 2:18ff.). It does not have to follow, however, that the latter are Christians.

f. Ioudaía, Ioudaikós. Ioudaía as the name of the country is primarily adjectival (Mk. 1:5). More narrowly, it denotes Judea (cf. Mt. 3:5; 19:1), but it may also be used for all Palestine (cf. Rom. 15:31; 2 Cor. 1:16). It is a geographical word and has no theological significance. Ioudaikós, which occurs only in Tit. 1:14, has the sense of "related to," but the point is not that the mýthoi are Jewish by nature, but that they circulate among the Jews.

g. ioudaízein, Ioudaismós. Outside the NT ioudaízein means either conversion to Judaism or the partial adoption of Jewish customs. In the single NT passage in Gal. 2:14 the word has the latter sense. Ioudaismós occurs only in Gal. 1:14. In 2 Maccabees it means Jewishness in either an objective or a subjective sense. The sense is subjective in Gal. 1:14: Paul surpasses his contemporaries in the Jewishness of his life and thought.

2. Israḗl, Israelítēs.

a. The Patriarch Israḗl. While there is no direct reference to the patriarch Israḗl in the NT, there are possible allusions in Phil. 3:5 and Rom. 9:6, though the people is probably meant (as also in Mt. 10:6; Lk. 2:32; Heb. 11:22; Rev. 7:4, etc.).

b. The People of God. (i) In Matthew and Luke Israḗl is the usual word for God's people on Jewish lips. In Mt. 2:20 it occurs generally for the land and in Lk. 1:80; Mt. 10:23 it refers to the people in a purely objective sense. Usually, however, it has a religious connotation: Israḗl is in a special sense God's people. Thus God is the God of Israḗl in Mt. 15:31 and Jesus the true king of Israḗl (even if mocked as such) in Mt. 27:42 (cf. Lk. 2:25; 24:21). Because of her status as God's people, Jesus expects to find faith in Israḗl (Mt. 8:10). He is sent to her lost sheep (Mt. 10:6). God cares especially for Israḗl (Lk. 1:16). He brings her to decision through Christ (Lk. 2:34). The disciples will judge her twelve tribes (Mt. 19:28). Everywhere the historic people is in view.

(ii) John. Israḗl and Israelítēs are rare in John. In the four instances of the former it always denotes Israel as the people of God (e.g., 1:31, 49; 12:13). Nicodemus as a teacher of Israel ought to understand God's working (3:10). The one use of Israelítēs (for Nathanael) shows that one may be an external member of God's people but not a genuine Israelítēs (1:47; cf. Rom. 2:28-29; 9:6). There is no extension of the term, however, beyond the historic people to all believers.

(iii) In Acts Israḗl occurs mostly in the first part, Ioudaíos in the second. The use is neutral in Acts 5:21, though with the implication (as in 2:22; 3:12; 5:35; 13:16) that those who come face to face with the gospel face a special decision regarding her as the people of God. It is as this people that Israel is summoned to see what God has done in 2:36; 4:10; 13:24. A contrast between unbelieving Israel and the church may be found in 4:27 and 5:21, but it is to Israel that Christ will restore the kingdom (1:6; cf. 28:20), and this implies an extension of the term to cover the new people of God. Yet there is an identity of the old people and the new (cf. 13:23, in which the Israel of promise and the Israel of fulfilment are the same).

(iv) Paul mostly uses Israḗl specifically for God's people, especially in Rom. 9-11. God has not rejected his people, for Paul is an Israelítēs (11:1). Even carnal Israel enjoys the blessing of the law etc. (9:4). Seeking righteousness through the law (9:31-32), she is now in disobedience (10:21) and subject to a partial hardening (11:25). Yet in fulfilment of the promise all Israel will be saved (11:26), for she is more than the totality of her members. A similar use may be seen in Eph. 2:12. In neither case does the term cover the Christian community. There are, however, movements in this direction in Rom. 9:6 and 11:17ff., and it seems to be implied, though not specifically stated, in the Israḗl katá sárka of 1 Cor. 10:18, and also in the Israḗl toú theoú of Gal. 6:16, which comprises all those who follow Paul's rule, whether circumcised or uncircumcised.

3. Hebraíos, Hebraikós, Hebraís, Hebraistí.

a. The Derived Forms. (i) Hebraikós. This occurs in the NT only in some versions of Lk. 23:38. Elsewhere it normally denotes the language. (ii) Hebraís. In Acts 21:40; 22:2 we read that Paul spoke to the crowd in Aramaic. The brief sketch of his education in ch. 22 explains his knowledge of both Hebrew and Aramaic. He also hears the heavenly voice in Hebrew or Aramaic (26:14), probably because this is his mother tongue unless there is an allusion to Hebrew as the language of heaven. (iii) Hebraistí occurs only in John and Revelation. It is used either when a Greek expression is to be put in the original or when it is desired for some reason to give an original name. In contrast to hermēneúein, which implies clarification (cf. Jn. 1:38; 4:25), Hebraistí is designed to give greater historical precision (cf. Jn. 19:13, 17, 20; 20:16). In Revelation, which uses Hebrew in contrast to the Aramaic of John, the idea in 9:11; 16:16 may be to increase the element of mystery and strangeness. Alternatively, the Hebrew term may already be a familiar one.

b. Hebraíos. (i) In Acts 6:1 one of the two groups is called Hebraíoi. It seems unlikely that as distinct from the Hellenists these were just Aramaic speakers. More likely they were native Judeans, already well known to one another, whereas the Hellenists were from abroad, and were thus neglected simply because they were not well known, not out of ill-will. There might, of course, have been linguistic problems as well. (ii) In Phil. 3:5 Paul has descent in mind when he calls himself a Hebrew of the Hebrews. He is not a proselyte nor is he hellenized; he is of the tribe of Benjamin and has Aramaic as his mother tongue. (iii) Hebraíos has the same sense, and is not just a stylistic variation, in 2 Cor. 11:22. Like his opponents, Paul is of Palestinian descent, a full member of God's people, an heir of the promise, and a servant of Christ.

(iv) The title of Hebrews is to the same effect. The recipients are not just Aramaic speakers but Palestinian Jews, even though they are probably living in Italy at the time (13:24). [W. GUTBROD, III, 369-91] historéō [to investigate, visit], (historía [information, visit])

1. historéō seems to derive from hístōr, "one who knows and puts this knowledge to effect." The verb thus means "to investigate," "to bear witness." In tragedy and philosophy "inquiry" is usually the sense. historía comes to mean "information" based on research. From the time of Aristotle, and probably Herodotus, it then means "history."

2. In Greece poetic sagas at first fulfil the function of history. The conflict against Persia inspires Herodotus to write true history. Both he and Thucydides seek to bring out the great
[6]

íchnos [footprint]

1. íchnos may denote either an individual footprint or a track. It is used figuratively for the trace that is left by life or conduct and that others may mark and follow. In 2 Cor. 12:18 Paul and Titus have followed the line of responsible conduct in their handling of the collection. In Rom. 4:12 the faith of Abraham has left its impress by which circumcised believers may take their bearings and faith may also be accessible to the uncircumcised. "Features" is a possible rendering here, but it might suggest imitation of special aspects of Abraham's life, whereas the real point is that all faith is a following in the steps of Abraham.

2. In 1 Pet. 2:21 the implied sense of "example" is more apposite. Yet here again the idea is more that of a trail to follow than acts to imitate. The hypér of Christ's passion ("for you") removes it from the sphere of repetition. Believers suffer as disciples of him who has trodden the path of suffering, in fellowship with him, following the same direction, but not in detailed imitation. But does suffering exhaust the meaning of following in this sense? The immediate situation, being one of suffering, might seem to say so (cf. also 1 Pet. 4:1; Mt. 20:20ff.). Yet the disciples also receive commission and authority from Christ (Mt. 10:1ff.), and Paul speaks of being glorified with him (Rom. 8:17; cf. also Jn. 13:15; 15:12; Jms. 5:10-11).

3. The NT never suggests that the Christian life is to be an exact imitation of that of Christ. There may be echoes of this, e.g., in the healings, or in the death of Stephen (Acts 7:58ff.). Again, Paul often holds up Jesus as an example (Phil. 2:5ff.; Rom. 15:1ff.; Col. 1:24; Gal. 6:17). But discipleship is always the goal, not imitation. The apocryphal Acts hardly go beyond this. The early church, however, tends to move toward imitation, especially when it finds true discipleship in martyrdom (cf. Ignatius Ephesians 12.2; Mart. Pol. 22.1).

---

[6]Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (339). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

cf. confer, compare

NT New Testament

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

4. íchnos can also mean “sole” or “foot” (cf. in the LXX Dt. 11:24; 28:35; Josh. 1:3; 2 Sam. 14:25; 2 Kgs. 19:24; Dan. 10:10). There is reference to the foot of God in Ezek. 43:7. In pagan religions we find votive offerings with engraven footprints; these either commemorate the visits or healings of pilgrims or bear witness to visits by the gods. Obviously, however, such practices are alien to the NT, nor do we find there the idea of enduring footsteps (cf. Paul in Rom. 11:33 on the basis of Ps. 77:16ff. and Job 11:7 LXX: “Canst thou find the trace of the Lord?”).

→ anexichníastos [A. STUMPFF, III, 402-06]

Iōnás [Jona, Jonah]

A. Jona, the Father of the Apostles Peter and Andrew. In Mt. 16:17 Simon Peter is called Bariōná, while in Jn. 1:42; 21:15ff. his father’s name is Iōánnēs. Iōná, occurs as a variant of Iōán (n)ēs in the LXX (2 Kgs. 25:23). Elsewhere there are no first-century examples of Iōná. Hence it is probably a shorter form of Iōánnēs, unless John substitutes the more common form. Nothing else is known of Simon Peter’s father.

B. The Prophet Jonah.

1. The Later Jewish View of Jonah. Jonah was greatly magnified in later Judaism. He was supposedly the son of the widow of Zarephath, fled in the interests of Israel, and offered his life for his people.

2. The Prophet Jonah in the NT. The stay in the great fish (Mt. 12:40) and the preaching in Nineveh (Mt. 12:41; Lk. 11:32) are mentioned in the NT. There are also echoes of the story in the stilling of the storm (Mk. 4:35ff.). The repentance of Nineveh is presented as a warning now that one greater than Jonah is here. The double contrast between Gentiles and Jews and Jonah and Jesus gives point to the threat. What is meant by the sign of Jonah is much debated. Some have tried to find an original reference to John the Baptist, but this is linguistically dubious. The context of Lk. 11:29ff. has suggested that the preaching might be the sign, but it would be unusual for human preaching to be a divine sign. It thus seems that the sign is the deliverance after three days and nights (Mt. 12:40) which accredits Jonah as a preacher in the same way as the resurrection will accredit Jesus (Lk. 11:30). The contemporary concept of the self-offering of Jonah might be included. Jesus may validly give this enigmatic sign because it is not abstracted from his person and does not soften the offense and the related call for decision. [J. JEREMIAS, III, 406-10]

κ k

kathairéō [to take down, destroy], kathaíresis [tearing down, destruction]

kathairéō. This verb has the four main senses a. “to take down,” b. “to tear down,” c. “to destroy,” and d. “to dethrone.” The LXX uses it in all these senses for various Hebrew equivalents, e.g., taking down the brazen sea, tearing down houses etc., destroying cities, and dethroning rulers. In the NT we find a. for taking down from the cross in Mk. 15:36 (while living) and Mk. 15:46; Lk. 23:53; Acts 13:29 (when dead). Regard for the Passover did not allow Jesus and the thieves to be left on the cross. Sense b. occurs in Lk. 12:18: In his folly the rich farmer tears down the barns he has in order to build bigger ones. For sense c. we turn to Acts 13:19 (cf. Dt. 7:1), where God gives Israel the land by destroying seven nations. The word also has this sense figuratively in 2 Cor. 10:4. Lk. 1:52 has sense d.: God overthrows the powerful who do not do his will; the context here is eschatological. In Acts 19:27 the verb has the same sense in a different connection. The Ephesian silversmiths argue that Artemis may be deprived of her majesty through the ministry of Paul.

LXX Septuagint

kathaíresis. This noun has the same senses as the verb. In 2 Cor. 10:4 Paul's preaching will lead to the destruction of the bulwarks of human sophistry (cf. Prov. 21:22). In 2 Cor. 10:8 and 13:10 kathaíresis is the opposite of oikodomḗ (edifying). Once Paul tore down, but his commission now is not destroying but building up (cf. Jer. 1:10; 24:6). [C. SCHNEIDER, III, 411-13]

katharós [clean, pure], katharízō [to cleanse, purify], kathaírō [to make clean], katharótēs [purity], akáthartos [unclean, impure], akatharsía [impurity], katharismós [cleansing, purification], ekkathaírō [to cleanse], perikátharma [offscouring, refuse] katharós, katharízō, kathaírō, katharótēs.

A. The Usage. The group denotes physical, religious, and moral cleanness or purity in such senses as clean, free from stains or shame, and free from adulteration. In the LXX it is mostly used for ṭāhôr and zāḵaḵ with the usual connotations of clean, free, or innocent (cf. Ezek. 36:25; Ps. 51:10; Ex. 25:11, etc.).

B. Clean and Unclean outside the NT: Part I.

1. In Primitive Religion. Ideas of power are dominant in primitive thinking about cleanness. After coming into contact with power, e.g., in birth, sex, and death, cleansing is necessary to fit one for ordinary life. But since the numinous power may be deity as well as demon, cleansing is also needed for dealings with it. Cleanness and uncleanness are viewed quasi-physically, but the association of cleanness and holiness offers a starting point for moral spiritualizing.

2. In Greek Religion. At its primitive stage Greek religion follows the customary pattern. At the historical stage, however, the gods are seen as friendly forces, though they must be approached with cultic purity. Rules are thus devised to ward off what is demonic and to protect the holy nature of the gods. These rules are primarily cultic but in personal religion, and especially in philosophy, a sublimation takes place which affects the cultic sphere too. Moral purity as well as ritual purity is demanded in the approach to deity.

3. In OT Religion. The OT reflects the same general development. Uncleanness, which may be contracted in contact with birth or death (Lev. 12; Num. 19:11), is a positive defiling force. So is anything linked to a foreign cult. Animals formerly devoted to deities are disqualified (cf. Lev. 11). Hygiene, of course, plays a role (Lev. 11:29-30). Stress also falls, however, on the holiness of God, so that the concept of purity develops with special force. Purifications by washing, sacrifice, or transfer restore forfeited purity and open up access to God. As God's holiness has moral content, ritual purity symbolizes moral purity. The prophets emphasize this aspect even to the point of castigating purely ritual conceptions, though not of totally rejecting them. Some groups in later Judaism tend to the opposite extreme, but Hellenistic Judaism (cf. Philo) strongly spiritualizes the older cultic concept. The cultic rules of cleansing are upheld, but their significance is primarily symbolical; moral purity is what God requires. [F. HAUCK, III, 413-17]

C. Clean and Unclean outside the NT: Part II: Judaism.

1. Cultic Uncleanness.

a. For Judaism uncleanness clings to the unclean person or thing and can be transferred to others. The source and what is infected are distinguished, and there are four degrees of uncleanness, the intensity weakening at each stage of transmission.

b. Transmission is by touch, carrying, pressing, entry (e.g., of a leper), or place (e.g., being in the same house as a corpse).

OT Old Testament

c. Various degrees of exclusion result from the different degrees of uncleanness. One presentation distinguishes ten degrees, and divides up the land itself into ten areas of holiness, e.g., cities, the temple hill, the inner courts, etc.

d. As regards vessels, the degree of defilement depends not only on the kind of infection but also on the make and material. The use to which material is put (e.g., leather) may also determine its defilement.

e. Stricter sects view other groups as deficient from the standpoint of their view of purity. These groups include ordinary Jews and half-Jews as well as Samaritans and Gentiles. Gentiles are shut out from the temple, and strict Jews must avoid contact with pagan temples or vessels and purify what they buy from Gentiles.

f. Oddly enough, the canonical Scriptures are also thought to defile the hands. The original explanation of this puzzling fact is probably that they are devoted to deity and thus taboo. But a later explanation is that they were pronounced unclean for purposes of distinction.

2. Cultic Cleansing. Restoration of cleanness is primarily by water (washing, sprinkling, or bathing), though sin offering may also be required. Vessels, too, are cleansed by water (dipping or scalding); sometimes they may have to be destroyed. The most common act of cleansing is washing the hands (e.g., at grace or times of prayer). Purity is also demanded for the study of the law, but the rules vary. Prayer should cease if defilement takes place in the course of it.

3. The Attitude of the Rabbis to the Law. Rabbinic theology recognizes that the rules of purity are important only because it is the King of all kings that ordains them. At many points there is also a readiness for relaxation. Levitical uncleanness should not stop the reading of the law, since the law itself has purifying force. Yet the laws of purity may also be applied with legalistic stringency.

4. Inward Purity. The stress on ritual purity is accompanied in rabbinic Judaism by a strong and consistent requirement of moral purity. We have received the soul pure from God and must keep it so. The demand for inner purity covers the whole of life from such things as speech on the one hand to the administration of justice on the other. We are to keep our mouths from every sin and sanctify ourselves from all sin and guilt; God then gives promise of his enduring presence. [R. MEYER, III, 418-23]

D. Clean and Unclean in the NT.

1. Physical Cleanness. This sense is present in passages that follow the traditional view that what is physically clean is adapted for cultic (Heb. 10:22) or ritual (Mt. 23:26) or respectful (Mt. 27:59) use. Closest to Judaism are the statements about the new Jerusalem in Revelation (21:18, 21; cf. 15:6; 19:8, 14). What is clean is adapted for fellowship with God; what is profane is shut out (cf. 21:27).

2. Cultic Cleanness and Cleansing. The term has this reference when used for the ritual cleansing of vessels (Mt. 23:25), the cleansing of lepers (Mt. 8:2-3), or blood as a means of cleansing (Heb. 9:22). Yet Paul asserts the basic cleanness of all created things (Rom. 14:14, 20). Peter learns the same lesson in the vision of Acts 10 (cf. v. 15 and 11:9). If animals are clean, however, Gentiles are not debarred from the gospel by cultic impurity. The purification that counts is the cleansing of the heart by faith (Acts 15:9). Jesus himself points the way here with his teaching that the true defilement is inward (thus declaring all foods clean, as Mark comments; cf. Mk. 7:14ff.). Tit. 1:15 advances the principle that it is the person who makes things clean or unclean: To the pure all things are pure, to unbelievers nothing is pure. According to 1 Tim. 4:5 grace at meals sanctifies all foods, so that we may enjoy them without scruple. In the NT, then, the idea of material or purely cultic impurity drops away; the concept of moral and spiritual purity transcends and replaces it.

3. Moral Purity. Jesus shows us that a cultic purity that is concerned only with externalities is inadequate (Mt. 23:25-26; Lk. 11:41). The purity required of the NT community is moral and personal. It consists of a dedication to God that renews the inner being. Purity of heart—which is far above purity of hands—is what counts before God. Yet purity becomes a primary motif only in such writings as the Pastorals, Hebrews, John, James, and 1 Peter. Jms. 1:27 claims that pure religion consists of practical love, while Jms. 4:8 demands a purifying of the heart as well as a cleansing of the hands (cf. Is. 1:16-17). 1 Pet. 1:22 calls for a purifying of the soul in the obedience of faith and a sincere love. Eph. 5:26 uses the symbolism of baptism to portray the moral purification by Christ which determines future conduct. The death of Christ is above all the sacrifice that expiates sin and creates a new purity of life. By this death we are his people and zealous for good deeds (Tit. 2:14). We receive a pure heart and a good conscience that issue in love (1 Tim. 1:5). Hebrews opposes to the older ritual purity the superior moral purity of the new order (9:13). Cleansing is still needed (cf. 9:22), but only Christ's blood can achieve this with its cleansing from sin (1:3) and liberation from sinful impulses (9:14). It is by the death of Christ, then, that we have access to holiness and may live in God's presence. Purity is also an important theme in John. The disciples are clean through their association with Jesus (Jn. 15:3). This cleansing is by the word (cf. 17:14ff.). In Jn. 13 the foot-washing both serves as a symbol, pointing to baptism (Jn. 13:10), and offers an example, denoting Christ's loving service in daily forgiveness. 1 John attributes the power of this ongoing cleansing to the blood of Jesus (1:7). It is in virtue of this purifying that believers may attain to purity (3:3, 6). Revelation insists on the ritual purity of the new Jerusalem but obviously only as a symbol of its perfect inner sanctity.

---

v. verse

akáthartos, akatharsía. These two terms are used for physical, cultic, and moral impurity, which are closely intertwined. The use in the LXX is mostly cultic. Uncleanness clings like an infection and renders cultically unserviceable. Objects, animals, places, vessels, and people may be unclean, e.g., by contact, through sexual processes, or through idolatry. Priests decide what is unclean and conduct the rites of purification (cf. especially Lev. 7, 11, 13ff.; Num. 9, 19). Hellenistic Judaism deepens the concept along moral lines. In the NT 1. the sense of cultic impurity may be seen in Mt. 23:27; Acts 10:14, 28; Gal. 2:11-12, and cf. the term "unclean spirit." But the NT also has the term 2. for Gentile alienation from God in the form of licentiousness (cf. Rom. 1:24ff.; 1 Th. 4:7; Eph. 4:19; 2 Cor. 6:17). akatharsía is a work of the flesh, i.e., of the unregenerate person who is subject to natural desire (Gal. 5:19). Christian sanctification, however, covers the children of Christians so that they are no longer unclean (1 Cor. 7:14).

katharismós. This term means "physical," then "cultic cleansing." It is used in the LXX for ritual purification (cf. Lev. 15:13; Ex. 29:36; 30:10). The sense of cultic cleansing may be found in the NT in Mk. 1:44; Lk. 2:22; Jn. 2:6, but the term also denotes here cleansing from sin, in baptism (Jn. 3:25; Eph. 5:26; 2 Pet. 1:9), through Christ's death (Heb. 1:3; cf. 1 Jn. 1:7ff.). For the same concept Paul has hagiasmós in 1 Cor. 1:30; 1 Th. 4:7; Rom. 6:19—a more dynamic term.

ekkathaírō. "To cleanse," "to purge," "to separate": Paul uses this word in 1 Cor. 5:7 for purging out the leaven, i.e., removing all abominations, and in 2 Tim. 2:21 for setting aside what is shameful.

perikátharma. This more intensive form of kátharma is common in secular Greek for a. the expiatory offering, b. the unworthy and destitute, and c. what is thrown out after purification. All three senses are apposite in Paul's self-description as periktáharma toú kósmou in 1 Cor. 4:13. [F. HAUCK, III, 423-31]

katheúdō [to sleep]

A. The General Usage.

---

i.e. id est, that is

1. Of Humans.

a. The primary sense is “to sleep.” Sleep is highly rated in antiquity, but the activism of the Greeks and Romans finds too much sleep distasteful; the early hours up to sunrise are the main periods of intellectual production (lucubrations). Peaceful sleep in time of peril (cf. Socrates) is a mark of greatness.

b. Sleep is also viewed as an incursion of the suprasensual, so that antiquity pays great attention to dreams. Attempts are made to interpret these scientifically; they mostly have to do with such material things as prosperity or poverty, health or sickness, etc. Some religious significance attaches to temple sleep.

c. Figuratively sleep has a derogatory reference, e.g., to deficient concentration or the inactive or vegetative life.

d. Since sleep embraces the ambivalence of human life and death, the question arises whether life itself is not a sleep, and its activity a mere dream. But sleep and death are also equated, with immortality as the inference.

2. Of Gods and Heroes.

a. Homer finds it natural that the gods should sleep the secure sleep of heroes, but philosophy finds the idea meaningless, whether the reference be to personifications of nature or to God in the supreme sense.

b. The idea of sleeping gods persists in less intellectualized religion and stands closely related to the problem of death (cf. the lifeless but incorruptible Attis, sleeping Endymion with his eyes open, and the Cretan cult of the dying and reborn Zeus).

B. Sleep in the OT and Judaism.

1. Of Humans.

a. The OT, too, values sleep highly. It refreshes us (Jer. 31:26), and God protects it (Ex. 22:25-26). Even in sleep the righteous can meditate on the law (Ps. 1:2), and their sleep is sweet (Prov. 3:24), for God does not sleep (Ps. 121:3), and they are thus secure (Ps. 3:5). Indeed, God gives his beloved sleep (Ps. 127:2). On the other hand, too much sleep is culpable indolence (Prov. 10:5), the luxurious beds of the rich are condemned (Am. 6:4), and diligent servants do not sleep.

b. Visions from God come in sleep (Gen. 15:2; 1 Sam. 3:1ff.). These may take the form of dreams needing interpretation; cf. Jacob’s ladder (Gen. 28:10ff.), Joseph’s dreams (Gen. 37:5, 9) and interpretations (Gen. 40:5ff.; 41:1ff.), and the dreams of Zechariah and Daniel. Prophetic dreams denote divine favor, but dreams may also deceive (Num. 12:6-7; 1 Sam. 28:6; Joel 2:28). In divine judgment sleep may also be stupefaction (Is. 51:20).

c. The OT does not use katheúdein for laziness, but it has the term neutrally for death (cf. Dan. 12:2).

2. Of Idols Which Sleep and God Who Does Not. Elijah taunts the priests of Baal: Perhaps their god is asleep and has to be awakened (1 Kgs. 18:27). In contrast, the God of Israel “will neither slumber nor sleep‘” (Ps. 121:4). Only the mode of expression, not the concept, is mythological in, e.g., Pss. 44:23; 78:65.

C. The NT.

1. The Literal Sense.

a. The NT accepts sleep as a natural fact (Mt. 13:25; Acts 20:9), but shows more interest in activity than sleep (cf. Lk. 6:12; 1 Th. 2:9). In Gethsemane the disciples should not sleep but watch (Mt. 26:40ff.). Yet Jesus sleeps peacefully in the storm (Mk. 4:38), trusting implicitly in the Father’s care and thus secure in his fellowship with God (cf. the little faith of the disciples).

b. God gives directions in sleep, e.g., to Joseph (Mt. 1:20), the Wise Men (Mt. 2:12), Pilate’s wife (Mt. 27:19), and Paul (Acts 16:9). Yet dreams are only marginal in the NT, and there may be morally dangerous dreams (Jude 8).

2. The Metaphorical Sense.

a. The term occurs for death in 1 Th. 5:10. An authentic raising from the dead is at issue in Mt. 9:24. It is not taught that death is really only a sleep.

b. There is a specialized use in 1 Th. 5:6, where sleep is the opposite of the concentration and energy of faith in an eschatological situation. The wise as well as the foolish virgins sleep in Mt. 25:5, but the former are ready at the decisive moment.

D. The Early Church. katheúdō does not occur in the immediate post-NT writings. Legends like that of the seven sleepers, which borrow from ancient myth and Jewish concepts, arise only in the fifth century at the earliest. [A. OEPKE, III, 431-37]

→ hýpnos, egeírō

kathḗkō [to be fitting], (tó kathḗkon [what is proper])

1. Popular Usage. a. "To come down or to," b. "to be proper, fitting, appropriate."

2. Philosophical Usage. From popular use tó kathḗkon comes into philosophical vocabulary in the sense of "what is fitting or demanded," e.g., by nature, custom, or piety.

3. The LXX. The LXX has the term in all its shades of meaning; cf. Gen. 19:31 ("after the manner"), Ex. 5:13 ("daily task"), Lev. 5:10 ("according to the law"), and cf. Sir. 10:23; 2 Macc. 6:4; 3 Macc. 4:16.

4. The NT. The only NT instance (plural) is the negative one in Rom. 1:28, where Paul has in mind what is offensive even to natural human judgment. The decision against God leads to a complete loss of moral sensitivity, the unleashing of unnatural vices, and hence the type of conduct that even healthy pagans regard as improper. [H. SCHLIER, III, 437-40]

káthēmai [to sit], kathízō [to set, seat], kathézomai [to sit]

1. The Neutral Sense. Sitting is usually on a stool (2 Kgs. 4:10) or couch (Gen. 48:2; Ezek. 23:41), or outdoors on a stone (Ex. 17:2), preferably under a tree (Judg. 4:5), or on a hilltop (2 Kgs. 1:9) or the edge of a well (Ex. 2:15). Jesus sits by the shore (Mt. 13:1) or on mountains (Mt. 5:1). Peter sits in the court (Mt. 26:58; cf. Esth. 5:13). Oddly the soldiers sit at the foot of the cross (Mt. 27:36). In the OT sitting is common at meals (Gen. 27:19; Ezek. 44:3), but in the NT reclining (Mt. 9:10; Jn. 13:23, etc.).

2. Sitting as a Mark of Distinction.

a. Gods. Archaeology depicts gods as sitting while humans stand to pray. Thus the ark is thought of as God's throne (1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Sam. 6:2, etc.). In Is. 19:1 God sits, or rides, on a cloud. For Jesus the throne expresses divine dignity (Mt. 5:34-35). Revelation depicts God on the throne (4:2ff.; 5:1ff., etc.; cf. Is. 6), but antichrist can also sit on a throne (2 Th. 2:4).

b. Rulers. In antiquity rulers are often godlike figures and hence the throne is also their prerogative (Ex. 11:5; 1 Kgs. 1:17ff., etc.). The queen and royal favorites also sit on thrones. Rulers may even sit in God's presence (Ps. 110:1). The ornamentation of thrones symbolizes royal power (1 Kgs. 10:18ff.). In the NT the messianic king is enthroned alongside God, and he grants a seat with him to believers who conquer (Rev. 3:21). Influential in this regard are Ps. 110:1 and Dan. 7:13 (cf. Mt. 26:64; Mk. 14:62; Col. 3:1; Heb. 1:3; 8:1; 12:2).

c. Judges. As the Egyptian gods sit for judgment, so human judges sit in token of their dignity (cf. Mt. 27:19; Acts 25:6; 12:21; 23:3). The divine Judge sits at the last judgment (Mt. 19:28; 25:31).

d. Teachers. Like many teachers in antiquity, Jesus sits to teach (Mt. 5:1; 13:1-2, etc.), thus following rabbinic custom (Mk. 2:6; Mt. 23:2; Lk. 5:17).

e. Assemblies. Ancient assemblies are depicted as sitting, e.g., the senate, the Sanhedrin, Christian synods. Rev. 20:4 refers to a heavenly senate (cf. 4:4), though there the picture merges into one of worship.

f. For precedence in seating → dexiós.

3. Sitting as a Psychological Attitude.

a. As a Gesture of Grief. In the OT sitting is a sign of mourning. Denoting pathetic abandonment, it is the position in which to bewail oneself or others (Job 2:8ff.). Sitting in darkness is a technical term for mourning (Is. 9:1; Lk. 1:79). Beggars also sit (2 Kgs. 7:3; Mt. 20:30, etc.). The women who weep for Jesus sit (Mt. 27:61) (cf. those who mourn for Adonis in Ezek. 8:14). Penitents also sit to express sorrow (Jon. 3:6; Lk. 10:13).

b. For Practical Reasons. Some people sit for practical reasons, e.g, scholars (Mk. 3:32), tax gatherers (Mt. 9:9), fishermen (Mt. 13:48), money changers (Jn. 2:14), and children at some games (Mt. 11:16; Lk. 7:32).

4. Sitting at Divine Service. Standing was customary in ancient temples, but sitting became necessary with the long mystery services. In the synagogue Jesus (Lk. 4:20) and Paul (Acts 13:14) both sit, and sitting is general in the church (Acts 2:2; 20:9; 1 Cor. 14:30; Jms. 2:3, and perhaps Rev. 4:4).

5. Figurative Meanings. The verb can also mean a. "to stay" (Mt. 26:36), b. "to dwell" (Gen. 23:10; Lk. 21:35), c. "to ride, journey" (Mk. 11:2, 7; Jn. 12:14-15; Acts 8:28), d. "to instal" (1 Cor. 6:4; Eph. 1:20), e. "to sit to consider" (Lk. 14:28, 31), and f. "to alight, rest" (the tongues as of fire at Pentecost in Acts 2:3). [C. SCHNEIDER, III, 440-44]

kathístēmi [to bring, make, cause], akatastasía [disorder], akatástatos [restless] kathístēmi. From the basic sense "to set down," the following significant meanings develop.

1. "To conduct," "bring," "lead to" (Acts 17:15).

2. "To set in office," "instal," a. with accusative (Heb. 5:1), b. with accusative and epí and genitive (Mt. 25:21), dative (Mt. 24:47), or accusative (Ps. 8:6), c. with double accusative (Heb. 7:28), and d. with final infinitive, also in the genitive or with eis (Mt. 24:45; Heb.8:3).

3. "To make someone something" (double accusative). Theologically important in this regard is Rom. 5:19. The question arises how far our becoming righteous through the obedience of the one is a fact, and how far it is a judgment. The forensic element is present in the context (cf. v. 18) and the dominant nature of the creation is what counts for God rather than the nature of the individual (vv. 13ff.). Yet God's sentence decides both destiny and quality, so that while all became sinners in Adam, in Christ all virtually, and believers factually, become righteous, and will stand as such in the judgment. Pronounced righteous, they will be so in fact as well (Rom. 8:3-4), though the emphasis is on the judicial sentence. The theory that Paul has linked senses 1. and 2. in an eschatological riddle is too artificial.

4. In Jms. 3:6: "the tongue is a fire," the word expresses the aspect of affirmation better than a mere estín. Similarly in Jms. 4:4 the friend of the world proves to be an enemy of God.

akatastasía. This word signifies "disorder" a. as "political turmoil," b. as "personal unrest." Sense a. occurs in Lk. 21:9, sense b. in 2 Cor. 6:5. We also find in the NT a further sense c. "disruption" in the community through disputes (Jms. 3:16) or charismatic exaggeration (1 Cor. 14:33).

akatástatos. The meaning of this word is "restless" either a. as "exposed to unrest" or b. as "unsettled." We find only b. in the NT: The "unstable" person cannot pray effectively in Jms. 1:8, and the tongue is a "restless" evil in Jms. 3:8. [A. OEPKE, III, 444-46]

Heb. Hebrew

vv. verses

Káin* → *Ábel

kainós [new (in nature)], kainótēs [newness], anakainízō [to renew, restore], anakainóō [to make new], anakaínōsis [renewal], enkainízō [to renew] kainós.

1. Linguistic Data. As distinct from néos, "new in time," kainós means "new in nature" (with an implication of "better"). Both words suggest "unfamiliar," "unexpected," "wonderful," and the distinction fades with time. The NT has kainós for "not yet used" in Mt. 9:17, "unusual" in Acts 17:21, and "new in kind" in Mt. 13:52; Eph. 2:15; 2 Jn. 5; Heb. 8:13 (though an aspect of time is also present in 2 Cor. 5:17; Heb. 8:13,etc.).

2. Theological Data. kainós denotes the new and miraculous thing that the age of salvation brings. It is thus a key teleological term in eschatological promise: the new heaven and earth in Rev. 21:1; 2 Pet. 3:13, the new Jerusalem in Rev. 3:12; 21:2, the new wine in Mk. 14:25, the new name in Rev. 2:17; 3:12, the new song in Rev. 5:9, the new creation in Rev. 21:5. This new creation, which is the goal of hope, finds expression already in Christian life (2 Cor. 5:17). The new aeon has come with Christ. In him Jews and Gentiles are one new man (Eph. 2:15). Believers are to put on the new nature that they are given (Eph. 4:24). God's saving will is worked out in the promised new covenant that Jesus has now set up (Lk. 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25; Heb. 8:8ff.; 9:15). This is a better covenant (Heb. 7:22), infallible (8:7), everlasting (13:20), grounded on higher promises (8:6). The fact that the old and the new cannot be mixed (Mk. 2:21-22) stresses the element of distinctiveness. The new commandment of love has its basis in Christ's own love (Jn. 13:34); it is new without being novel (1 Jn. 2:7-8). The immediate post-NT writings retain the qualitative sense of kainós but with a legalistic tendency, especially in the idea of Christianity as a new law (cf. Barn. 2.6: Justin Dialogue 11.4; 12.3).

kainótēs. "Newness," with a secondary suggestion of the unusual. Only Paul uses the term in the NT. In accordance with the NT senses of kainós we are to walk in "newness" of life and serve in "newness" of the Spirit (Rom. 6:4; 7:6). New creation by the Spirit releases from bondage to sin and law and gives a new quality to life and service.

anakainízō (→ anakainóō, ananeóō). The meaning of this word is "to renew," "restore." It occurs in the NT in Heb. 6:4, which issues the warning that those who commit apostasy cannot be restored again to repentance, i.e., brought back to conversion (metánoian). In early Christian writings the term is a common one in connection with regeneration and baptism (Barn. 6:11; Hermas Similitudes 8.6.3 etc.).

anakainóō (→ anakainízō, ananeóō). This word means "to make new." Paul uses it in 2 Cor. 4:16, not for a process of moral change, but for the daily renewing and strengthening by the Spirit which lifts him above external pressures. Moral renewal, however, is the point in Col. 3:10, for with the gift of the new life in Christ there is continual renewal according to the standard of the divine image.

anakaínōsis. This word, meaning "renewal," is used in Rom. 12:2 for the renewal of mind and will that we must undergo, through the work of the Spirit (Rom. 8:9ff.), if we are to show that we belong to the new aeon. The reference in Tit. 3:5 is to the first and unique renewing, the creation of a life that was not there before, which is the work of the Holy Spirit associated with baptism.

enkainízō. Rare outside the Greek Bible, this word also means "to make new, renew." In Heb. 10:19-20 it occurs in connection with the new way into the sanctuary: Jesus has opened or dedicated this way, treading it himself for the first time. In the other instance in Heb. 9:18, with reference to the covenant, the idea is that of bringing into effect, or consecrating. As an ordinance in salvation history, the old covenant, like the new, is put into effect by death (Ex. 24:6ff.). [J. BEHM, III, 447-54]

kairós [decisive point], ákairos [untimely], akairéō [to have no time], eúkairos [well-timed], eukairía [right moment], próskairos [temporary, transitory] kairós.

A. The Nonbiblical Use. In its basic sense kairós seems to refer to a decisive point in place, situation, or time.

1. The spatial sense is rare.

2. The idea of a decisive situation develops after Hesiod with many nuances, e.g., danger, effect, favor, opportunity, advantage, success, or goal.

3. a. The term then has the sense of a "decisive moment," again with positive, neutral, or negative implications, though the positive one of fortune is the most common. Fortune in this sense is not fate, but the chance that must be boldly grasped. A connection with ethics thus arises, e.g., in Stoicism, which stresses responsibility of meeting the demands of the kairós. A cult of the god Kairos is also found; the god is depicted with a lock of hair at the front, so that even religiously a summons to action is implied. b. Yet kairós can also become a weaker term for time, (i) as a short space of time, and (ii) as a stretch of time.

B. The Use in the Septuagint.

1. Used mainly for Heb. ʼēṯ and môʻēḏ (also Aram. zənān), kairós first means "decisive point in time," but with more stress on divine appointment than ethical demand. The reference, then, is to God's time (cf. Job 39:18; Num. 23:23; Eccl. 3:11; Dan. 2:21). God gives the final time of felicity, fixes the time of death (Eccl. 7:17), and brings the last time or the time of judgment (Lam. 1:21). Ecclesiastes discerns God's hand in the kairoí through which the author passes (3:10ff.). A more secular use occurs in 1 Chr. 12:23 etc. ("critical situation") and Sir. 4:20 ("right moment") (cf. Hag. 1:2).

2. A purely temporal sense is more common, e.g., point of time in Gen. 17:21, 23 etc. or stretch of time (cf. Ezek. 12:27 etc.). We thus find a use for festivals, or for regular biological or meteorological times. Sections in life may also be indicated. In general, however, this more common use is of less theological interest.

C. kairós in the NT.

1.a. The spatial use does not occur in the NT, and the situational use only in Heb. 11:15 ("opportunity"), but the temporal sense of "decisive point" is common, often with a stress on the fact that it is divinely ordained. Jerusalem does not recognize the unique kairós when Jesus comes to save it (Lk. 19:44). The masses fail to see the decisive character of the kairós that is present with Jesus (Lk. 12:56). The presence of this kairós is God's fulfilment of OT prophecy (Mk. 1:15). The seriousness of decision is thus given a new intensity. The simultaneity of end and present fulfilment poses a demand and confers an ability for recognition and outworking in love (Rom. 13:11; Gal. 6:10; Eph. 5:16; Col. 4:5). Jesus' own life stands under the claim of the kairós. He discerns the moment and decides accordingly (Jn. 7:6, 8). This kairós is not just a favorable opportunity. Jesus awaits it from the Father and thus enjoys true certainty. His end especially stands under the kairós. He himself says when it has come (Mt. 26:18), but only as he sees and grasps and accepts the kairós that is given by God. It is thus the “right time” (Rom. 5:6).

---

Aram. Aramaic

b. The stress may sometimes be on the content, so that the element of human decision is weaker, but that of God’s ordination is no less clear. Thus God fixes the time for the manifestation of the Logos (Tit. 1:3), for the attestation of divine love in Jesus (1 Tim. 2:6), for the epiphany of Christ (1 Tim. 6:15) and the reaping of his people (Gal. 6:9). Among other kairoí of this kind, i.e., specific points in the development of God’s plan, are the beginning of messianic power over demons (Mt. 8:29), of imminent judgment (1 Pet. 4:17), of the removing of the power of the katéchon (2 Th. 2:6), and of the final judgment (1 Cor. 4:5; Rev. 11:18). Christians cannot calculate the times (Mk. 13:33; Acts 1:7); God has sovereign control over them. kairós can become a technical term for the last judgment (cf. Lk. 21:8; 1 Pet. 5:6; Rev. 1:3). Yet it may also denote individual points in the believer’s life (cf. 2 Tim. 4:6; Lk. 1:20).

2.a. Among many instances of the use for a “short space of time,” cf. Lk. 21:36; Eph. 6:18; Rom. 9:9; Mt. 24:45; Mk. 12:2; Mt. 13:30; Gal. 4:10 (with various references).

b. For a “stretch of time” (again with various references), cf. 1 Th. 2:17; 1 Cor. 7:5; Lk. 8:13; Heb. 11:11; Acts 17:26; Rom. 3:26; 2 Cor. 8:14; sometimes for a general indication of time, e.g., Mt. 11:25; Acts 12:1; 7:20; 1 Tim. 4:1.

ákairos, akairéō, eúkairos, eukairía. ákairos has the meanings a. “excessive,” b. “unwelcome,” and c. “unseasonable.” akairéō can mean “to have no time.” In the LXX we find ákairos only in Sirach for “untimely.” In contrast eúkairos and eukairía denote what is “propitious,” the “favorable” or “right” time (cf. Ps. 104:27). In 2 Tim. 4:2 the point of eúkairōs akaírōs is “whether convenient or not.” In Heb. 4:16 eúkairos denotes the “divinely appointed time”; the sympathy of our High Priest insures that this will also be the right time for us. eukairía occurs in Mt. 26:16: Judas has to seek a “favorable opportunity” to hand over Jesus (cf. Lk. 22:6). akairéō occurs only in Phil. 4:10: “to have no opportunity.”

próskairos. This late word means “temporally conditioned,” “temporally limited,” “unusual,” “transitory” (also in a qualitative sense). In the LXX it denotes “temporal” as distinct from “eternal,” i.e., belonging to this world (only 4 Macc. 15). In Mt. 13:21 the reference is simply to time (“for a while”), but Heb. 11:25 contains a moral judgment: sinful pleasures are fleeting. In 2 Cor. 4:18 we find the contrast between the temporal, which is also transitory, and the eternal, which is definitive. [G. DELLING, III, 455-64]

kaíō [to light, burn]

kaíō is theologically significant in Lk. 24:32 and 1 Cor. 13:3. 1. In Lk. 24:32 the idea of the heart burning within seems to rest on OT usage (Ps. 39:3), though there are also Greek and Latin parallels. 2. In 1 Cor. 13:3 various interpretations have been offered for giving one’s body to be burned. a. Martyrdom. Paul would have been familiar with the idea of martyrdom by fire (cf. Dan. 3:23ff.; rabbinic references; 2 Macc. 7:3ff.; 4 Maccabees; Heb. 11:34). Such martyrdom involves heroism, but Paul views it with reserve if it is oriented to self, since it opens the door to pride, offers a ground of self-righteousness, and may even obscure Christ’s cross. Paul is certainly not opposing love to faith here. b. Self-burning. Self-immolation by fire is sometimes extolled in antiquity as a supreme act of sacrifice or freedom (cf. Stoicism; also the Indian self-burning of widows). If this is what Paul has in view, he has against it the same objections as against a. c. Branding as a Slave. On this view Paul’s thought is that of giving the self to slavery on behalf of others. This is an unlikely interpretation, for most slaves were not branded (usually only runaways and criminals), and in any case this course would involve a measure of self-sacrificial love. We do best, then, to follow a., or b., or both. [K. L. SCHMIDT, III, 464-67]

kakologéō [to abuse, curse]

This rare word means "to abuse," "calumniate," "curse." The negative version of the fifth commandment in Mk. 7:10; Mt. 15:4 is based on Ex. 21:16 LXX. Jesus gives the commandment added depth by applying it to the withholding of what is due to parents on a hollow religious pretext (Mk. 7:11-12). In Mk. 9:39 we probably have a popular type of saying containing subtle humor. In Acts 19:9 Paul's opponents deride (not curse) his message. [C. SCHNEIDER, III, 468]

kakopátheia, -théō → páschō

kakós [evil], ákakos [upright], kakía [wickedness, trouble], kakóō [to hurt], kakoúrgos [evil-doer], kakoḗtheia [malice], kakopoiéō [to do evil], kakopoiós [evil-doer], enkakéō [to treat badly], anexíkakos [long-suffering] kakós. This word, expressing a lack, has the meanings a. "unserviceable," "incapable," b. "morally evil," "bad," c. "weak," and d. "ruinous." The presence of what is kakós raises the difficult question of the origin and purpose of evil in relation to God and human and cosmic destiny, i.e., the question of theodicy.

A. kakós in the Greek World. Two views of evil develop in the Greek world: first, that it comes from deity by divine necessity, and second, that it is partially caused by us. These views overlap in tragedy in the themes of guilt and fate. Philosophy suggests that ignorance is the reason for evil, but dualism is also present, e.g., in the thought that good necessarily implies evil, or in the theory that souls have been plunged into this earthly state as a punishment and have to rise up out of it to the supraterrestrial world of good. Socrates and Plato develop the concept that we do evil involuntarily through ignorance, but Plato also finds an emotional and even a cosmic dimension to evil in the form of a dialectical necessity connected with the matter which the deity used in fashioning the world (cosmological dualism of spirit and matter). Aristotle stays more closely with the idea that ignorance, itself culpable, is the cause of moral evil. Stoicism, too, rejects the idea of metaphysical necessity, attempting to bring evil into its monistic system by relativizing it as a counterpart of good, attributing it to a false view of the world, or arguing that the perfection of the whole excludes that of the individual. It cannot avoid a psychological dualism (cf. Epictetus).

B. kakós in Hellenism. For Philo evil is a possibility from birth. Even if we choose good, we are always in conflict with it in this life. It is a reality linked to the earth. It has, however, a religious dimension as sin, and is overcome by union with God. Plutarch offers a more metaphysical view, ascribing evil to an evil world soul. The Hermetic writings pose an absolute contrast based on having or not having noús. Plotinus finds the principle of evil in matter, which is at the farthest remove from the One. The soul, though sunk in matter, is still divine, and has an impulse toward a union with deity that it achieves in ecstasy and death. Evil is a reality, but it is so as a lack of true being.

C. In the Evil Principle in Parseeism. In Zoroastrianism we find two antithetical wills (or deities) rather than two opposing principles. The spirits of falsehood and truth fight for mastery in us. We work out in this life the choice that we make between them in pretemporal existence. All evil comes from the wicked spirit, which has the help of demons. A final judgment will separate the good and the bad, and in a last conflict evil and the wicked will be destroyed and perfection established.

D. kakós in the OT (LXX). In the OT the questions relating to kakós arise mainly in connection with such concepts as hamartía and adikía. kakós corresponds to the Hebrew stem ra‘, though it is used for other terms as well; it brings out impressively the moral judgment of Judaism on wickedness. There are 371 instances.

1. tó kakón as Evil. In the history books the LXX has the term for "disaster." Two thoughts are present here. First, evil in this sense is a punishment for sin, especially for idolatry and apostasy (cf. Dt. 21:17-18; Jer. 6:19). Second, God saves from evil in this sense (Jer. 26:13) when his people repents. Evils have, then, a political or national dimension. They come from God, the Lord of history, as the penalty for a walk that leads away from him. Yet God's final intentions are good, for even as evils are the response of his righteousness to human guilt, they are also expressions of his merciful seeking inasmuch as through them he recalls his people to true faith, obedience, and worship. This insight underlies the statement of Job in 2:10. It gives the concept of God a solemn and mysterious character, but carries with it the assurance that in its depths his being is peace and love.

2. tó kakón as an Ethical Concept. tó kakón is also an ethical concept (cf. Mic. 2:1; Ps. 28:3). Evil in this sense has its seat in the human heart (Jer. 7:24). In this regard the term is an important one in Proverbs (95 times). Often the translator substitutes it for different Hebrew originals (cf. Prov. 1:18; 2:16; 3:31). The point made is that we may choose good with the help of wisdom. If we do, we shall also find good. If, however, we willingly choose evil, through ignorance or ungodliness, evil results will follow (cf. 4:27; 13:10; 25:19). Often the term is used very generally, e.g., for strife in the Hebrew, and in many cases it is introduced by the translator (cf. 19:6, 27; 21:16, etc.). While noncommittal in itself, the term expresses the moral judgment of the period.

E. kakós in the NT. The term kakós is not a significant one in the NT, for the saving work of God in Christ robs the problem of theodicy of its main point, and kakós as a moral concept is far less important than hamartía and ponērós.

1. Jesus regards the heart as the seat of evil (Mt. 7:21), though behind it stands the ponērós. God himself is apart from everything evil (Jms. 1:13). The tongue (Jms. 3:8) and the love of money lie at its root (1 Tim. 6:10).

2. The NT uses tá kaká for the temporal or eternal ruin that might come upon us. Lazarus has tá kaká now, Dives later (Lk. 16:25). God's lordship decides the issues of perdition and salvation, but the divine decision is not fully worked out in this life. The point of the parable is not one of mechanical redress (evil for good and good for evil) but of response to the divine summons to trust and obedience, with eternal and not just temporal destiny at stake.

3. Paul in Rom. 13:3-4 recognizes that there is evil in the world and points out that God has committed to the state the task of restraining it.

4. In Rom. 7:19, 21 Paul realistically faces the fact that, while God wills the good from us, on our own we cannot do it. We thus come under the judgment of 2:9. Evil here is more than moral; it involves nonacknowledgment of God and self-assertion before him, i.e., ungodliness. Ambivalence obtains in this regard, for inwardly we consent to the good—we are God's creation and cannot negate our origin—but we cannot translate our good intentions into action, and thus fall victim to sin and death. Deliverance comes only when we are united by faith with Christ, who has borne our guilt.

5. When we are united with Christ in this way, the previous impossibility becomes a possibility that we are to grasp (Col. 3:5). The new reality of life in Christ means that we may be guileless as to what is evil (Rom. 16:19). In love we may now overcome evil with good (Rom. 12:21), for love neither thinks evil (1 Cor. 13:5) nor does it (Rom. 13:10). If evil is a force that disrupts fellowship, the love that derives from Christ makes true fellowship possible again.

ákakos. This word, the opposite of kakós, means "upright," "innocent." Philo uses it for newborn infants. Job is upright in 2:3 (cf. 8:20). The sense of innocent leads on to that of "guileless" (cf. Jer. 11:19). This is the point in Rom. 16:18: Those who cause divisions deceive the "simple-minded." In Heb.7:26, however, the meaning is "upright." Religiously our High Priest is holy, cultically without defect, and morally innocent. The final qualifications denote his majesty.

kakía. This word expresses the quality of kakós; it is the outworking of kakón or the principle of evil, mostly in the ethical field, though it may also denote incompetence, or, in a religious sense, guilt. kakíai play an important part in Philo's ethics. A possibility of human life, they cannot stand before God. In the LXX kakía may be an individual misdeed (1 Kgs. 2:44). Every kakía is kakía before God (Jer. 1:16). Yet kakía may also be a synonym of tó kakón in the sense of misfortune or disaster (1 Sam. 20:7).

In the NT kakía means "trouble" in this sense in Mt. 6:34. All work that caters to natural needs imposes a burden, though this should not oppress those who know God as a caring Father. Elsewhere the use is ethical. The word denotes a single sin in Acts 8:22 (the offense of Simon Magus), but Paul uses it more generally for the evil which is a penalty of sin and which is disruptive of fellowship (Rom. 1:28-29; Tit. 3:3). Christians may put off this evil (1 Pet. 2:1; cf. Jms. 1:21; Eph. 4:31). Yet the new freedom must not become a pretext for license (1 Pet. 2:16). We are to be babes in kakía (1 Cor. 14:20). In the main, the NT views kakía as a force that is destructive of fellowship.

kakóō. The meaning of this verb is "to hurt," "to maltreat," "to injure." The NT uses it for the oppression of Israel in Egypt (Acts 7:6, 19), for the persecution of the church (Acts 12:1; 14:2), and for averted attacks on Paul (Acts 18:10). Where there is zeal for the right, no true harm can be done (1 Pet. 3:13).

kakoúrgos (→ lēstḗs). The kakoúrgos is "one who does wrong," "malefactor," "villain." The NT uses the word for the two thieves crucified with Jesus (Lk. 23:32-33, 39). In 2 Tim. 2:9 the apostle finds a likeness between himself and his master when he speaks of being in fetters like a kakoúrgos.

kakoḗtheia. This word, found in Esth. 8:12-13 and meaning "wickedness," is part of the series in Rom. 1:29, where its position shows that it means "intentional wickedness" or "malice."

kakopoiéō, kakopoiós. The verb means "to do evil" and the noun "one who does evil." Instances in the LXX are in Gen. 31:7; Prov. 6:18; Jer. 4:22. In the NT the two words occur especially in 1 Peter (2:12; 3:17; 4:15). Believers will be regarded as evil-doers (2:12). They should respect rulers, whose office is to punish evil-doers (2:14). If they themselves suffer, it should not be for doing wrong (3:17). Suffering as a Christian and not as a wrongdoer is to God's glory (4:15-16). 3 Jn. 11 makes a basic distinction. When we see God, there arises in us the power for good action in love and mercy. Where evil is done, there is no vision of God. We see God, of course, when we see Christ (cf. Jn. 14:9).

enkakéō. This word has two senses, "to act or treat badly" and " (wrongly) to cease." In Lk. 18:1, just after the apocalyptic discourse in ch. 17, the point is obviously that, with a view to the end, the disciples should not grow slack in prayer. The meaning is the same in 2 Cor. 4:1: Paul will not let any difficulties cause him to fail or grow weary. In virtue of the eternal purpose of God, Paul in Eph. 3:13 asks his readers not to be discouraged by the pressures of his present situation, which are in fact their glory. Similarly, there is an exhortation not to grow weary in well-doing in 2 Th. 3:13; Gal. 6:9, with the promise of an ultimate reaping of eternal life (Gal. 6:8).

anexíkakos. This word, meaning "long-suffering," occurs in the NT only in 2 Tim. 2:24, which states that the Lord's servant must not be contentious but kindly, apt to teach, and "forbearing" even with opponents. [W. GRUNDMANN, III, 469-87]

→ agathós, hamartánō, ponērós

kaléō [to call], klḗsis [calling], klētós [called], antikaléō [to invite back], enkaléō [to accuse], énklēma [accusation], eiskaléō [to invite], metakaléō [to bring], prokaléō [to provoke], synkaléō [to call together], epikaléō [to call out, appeal], proskaléō [to invite, summon], ekklēsía [assembly, church] kaléō.

1. Data. kaléō, meaning "to call," appears often throughout the NT, especially in Luke and Acts, less frequently in Mark and John. It may always be rendered "to call," but often has the special nuance of divine calling or vocation.

a. In the active with accusative and vocative we find it in Lk. 6:46: "Why do you call me 'Lord, Lord'?" With accusative of object and predicative accusative it means "to name" in e.g., Mt. 10:25; Lk 1:59; Mt. 1:21, 23; Lk. 1:13. It also occurs in the passive in this sense in various constructions (cf. Mt. 2:23; Mk. 11:17; Lk. 1:32; Jn. 1:42; Acts 1:12, etc.).

b. Another fairly common use is for "to call to," "to invite," e.g., in Mt. 20:8; 22:4; Mk. 3:31; Lk. 7:39; Jn. 2:2; Acts 4:18 and 24:2 (in a legal sense); 1 Cor. 10:27.

c. Often it is God or Christ who calls. God calls his Son (Mt. 2:15). Jesus calls the disciples (Mt. 4:21). He calls sinners to repentance (Mt. 9:13). God calls us to himself or to salvation (Rom. 8:30). He has called the seed of Abraham (Rom. 9:7). He has called both Jews and Gentiles (Rom. 9:24). He has called Christians to fellowship with his Son (1 Cor. 1:9). He has called us to peace (1 Cor. 7:15), in grace (Gal. 1:6), to freedom (Gal. 5:13), to his kingdom and glory (1 Th. 2:12), in holiness (1 Th. 4:7; cf. 2:13-14), to eternal life (1 Tim. 6:12), to light (1 Pet. 2:9), yet at the same time to suffering (1 Pet. 2:20-21). Christ himself is called (Heb. 5:4). As Abraham is called (11:8), he is a type of Christians, who may simply be described as "the called" (9:15), and who are as such invited to the marriage feast of the Lamb (Rev. 19:9). If Jesus does the calling in the Gospels, he does so in fulfilment of a divine function, and the proper response is faith, which carries with it not only discipleship but also the blessings of salvation. Behind the term, then, stands the whole work of God, through Christ, in judgment and grace. This takes place either directly with Jesus' own calling or in the gospel ministry (cf. 2 Th. 2:14). In this use of the term there is thus a technical element even where this is not explicit.

2. Parallels.

a. For "to name" we find parallels in Gen. 17:19; 1 Sam. 1:20, etc. Names are important in the OT world. To be called something is equal to being it (cf. the parallelism in Lk. 1:32).

b. The use of the word for "to invite" is common from Homer and occurs in the papyri and LXX.

c. We also find parallels for the idea of God calling us with a view to our obedience (cf. in addition to more general parallels Prov. 1:24; Philo On the Special Laws 4.187; 1 Clem. 32.4 etc.; Hermas Similitudes 9.14.5; Mandates 4.3.4).

3. Origin.

a. The main origin of the NT usage is to be sought in the LXX. The richest source is to be found in Is. 40ff. (cf. 41:9; 42:6; 46:11; 48:12; 51:2; cf. also naming in 43:1; 45:3).

b. The Hebrew term is usually qārā’. The objective force of kaleín may also be seen from its use for words meaning “to take” and “to be.”

c. The idea of invitation or summons to salvation is a common one in rabbinic writings. An ordinary word thus acquires special significance through the fact a. that God is the subject and b. that salvation is the goal.

klḗsis.

1. Data. In Rom. 11:29 God’s klḗsis is his call or calling. In 1 Cor. 1:26 the Corinthians are to consider their call; God “chose” the foolish and weak etc. (v. 27). In 1 Cor. 7:20 they are to remain in the state of their calling. This is not their secular “vocation,” for they were called in the Lord and their klḗsis is with God (vv. 22ff.). In Eph. 1:18 the hope of one’s calling is the hope to which one is called (cf. 4:4). Eph. 4:1 speaks of a life worthy of calling, Phil. 3:14 of a prize of calling, 2 Th. 2:11 of being worthy of God’s call, 2 Tim. 1:9 of a holy calling, Heb. 3:1 of a heavenly call, and 2 Pet. 1:10 of the confirming of one’s call and election. In all these passages there is a technical nuance, so that “calling” is usually a better rendering than “call,” though call is always possible. The element of grace in calling comes out especially well in 2 Tim. 1:9.

2. Parallels.

a. There are a few instances of klḗsis for “naming” or “name.”

b. Invitation is more common (cf. Jdt. 12:10; 3 Macc. 5:14; Jer. 31:6 LXX).

c. The religious sense of “calling” occurs in Epictetus Dissertationes 1.29.49 (the imposing of a difficult task); Barn. 16.9 (the calling of the promise); Hermas Mandates 4.3.6 (great and august calling, i.e., baptism). [In a distinctive secular usage we find klḗsis or kalḗseis for the Roman classes.]

3. Origin. Since klḗsis as a verbal noun is equivalent to kaleín, the origin of its use in the NT is the same. Its absence from the LXX may be accidental, or may be due to the influence of Hebrew, which has fewer verbal nouns than verbs.

klētós.

1. Data.

a. This verbal adjective occurs ten or eleven times in the NT. It is sometimes a verb and sometimes a noun referring to Christians. Examples are Rom. 1:1, 6-7; 8:28; 1 Cor. 1:1, 2, 24; Jude 1; Rev. 17:14; Mt. 22:14, and some versions of Mt. 20:16.

b. klētós apóstolos in Rom. 1:1 might suggest a call to office, but for Paul calling as a Christian and as an apostle is the same thing.

c. Mt. 22:14, unlike other NT passages, seems to distinguish between the called (klētoí) and the elect (eklektoí) (cf. Rev. 17:14). To get the point we really need to know the Aramaic original. The saying may also be dialectical; its aim is perhaps to show that calling cannot be taken for granted, so that there is no real distinction between calling and electing. Similar paradoxes may be found in Jesus’ attitude to prayer and his description of opponents in Mt. 8:12 as sons of the kingdom.

2. Parallels. While the word goes back to Homer, parallels are few. a. The LXX has it for “named” in Ex. 12:16. b. Homer uses it for “invited,” “welcome,” in the Odyssey 17.286. c. “Divinely called” occurs only in the Christian sphere, e.g., 1 Clement.

3. Origin. The origin is similar to that of klḗsis. Ex. 12:16 probably lies behind the combination of klētós and hágios. There is no evidence that klētós was a cultic term in pagan religion.

anti-, enkaléō, énklēma, eis-, meta-, pro-, synkaléō. These compounds are not of theological significance in the NT. enkaléō occurs in a legal sense ("to accuse") in Acts, as does the noun énklēma. meta- for "to have brought" occurs only in Acts, syn- for "to call together" in Mk. 15:16; Lk. 15, 6, 9, eis- for "to invite" in Acts 10:23, anti- for "to invite back" in Lk. 14:12, and pro- ("to provoke") in Gal. 5:26.

epikaléō.

1. Data.

a. A first meaning is "to name" (cf. Mt. 10:25 [active]; Lk. 22:3; Acts 1:23, etc.; Heb. 11:16; Jms. 2:7 [passive]).

b. The middle use for "to appeal to someone" is a common legal one (cf. Paul's appeal to Caesar in Acts 25:11-12). Less technically, cf. the appeal to God in 2 Cor. 1:23. Often, too, there is appeal to God in prayer (cf. Acts 2:21; 7:59; 9:21; 22:16; Rom. 10:12; 2 Tim. 2:22: calling on God).

2. Parallels. There are many Greek parallels for the sense a. "to name" and also for b. "to appeal," whether in literature, the papyri, or Josephus. Calling on God is found in the LXX, but also in classical authors and the papyri.

3. Origin.

a. While NT usage reflects the general use, LXX influence is strong. Thus in Acts 15:17 naming the Gentiles by God's name implies that they are his by his self-revelation to them (cf. Jms. 2:7).

b. LXX influence is also strong in the idea of calling on God in prayer (cf. Pss. 50:15; 53:4; 86:5; 89:26; 91:15, etc.).

c. The usage in the LXX and NT suggests that calling on the name of the Lord is almost a technical term (cf. Gen. 13:4; 21:33; Ps. 79:6, etc.).

d. Often the LXX translates the Hebrew original by krázein, perhaps because of some similarity of sound. That we have in the Hebrew as well as the Greek equivalents a technical term for prayer may be seen from the absolute use.

e. In the NT "calling on the name of the Lord" (in prayer) may refer to God the Father (Acts 2:21) but also to God the Son (Acts 7:59; Rom. 10:12ff.; 2 Tim. 2:22). Those who "call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 1:2) are Christians. Directing prayer to Jesus is a mark of faith in him as the Messiah.

proskaléō.

1. Data. Only the middle occurs in the NT and the term rarely has theological significance; it is simply used when people call another, or others, to them (cf. Mk. 15:44; Lk. 7:18; 15:26; Acts 5:40; 6:2; 13:7, etc.; Jms. 5:14). God does the calling in Acts 2:39, the Holy Spirit in Acts 13:2, and Jesus in Mt. 10:1; Mk. 3:13, etc.

2. Parallels. Greek writings show that the middle is preferred, and it may be a legal term for "to bring to judgment" (cf. some of the instances in Acts).

3. Origin. LXX influence is plain in Acts 2:39 (Joel 2:32) and 16:10. In Matthew and Mark the style suggests that when Jesus calls to himself he is fulfilling the divine calling as the Christ (cf. the more or less fixed opening to the accounts).

ekklēsía.

A. Introduction. General dictionaries define ekklēsía as 1. "assembly" and 2. "church." NT lexicons then distinguish between church as a. the whole body and b. the local congregation or house church. The emphasis differs according to denomination, although sometimes the basic unity is perceived. Since the NT uses a single term, translations should also try to do so, but this raises the question whether "church" or "congregation" is always suitable, especially in view of the OT use for Israel and the underlying Hebrew and Aramaic. It must also be asked why the NT community avoids a cultic term for itself and selects a more secular one. “Assembly,” then, is perhaps the best single term, particularly as it has both a concrete and an abstract sense, i.e., for the assembling as well as the assembly.

B. The NT. An important question is why ekklēsía does not occur in such books as Mark, Luke, John, and 1 and 2 Peter. (Its absence from Jude is less significant, as also that from 2 Timothy and Titus in view of 1 Timothy, and 1 and 2 John in view of 3 John.)

1. Acts. The first passages in Acts (2:47; 5:11; 7:38; 8:1, 3; 9:31) are important in view of the use not only for the Jerusalem church (8:1) but for the church throughout Judea and also for OT Israel (7:38). The singular predominates, but later we also find the plural (possibly 9:31, probably 15:41, certainly 16:5). A pregnant saying is 20:28: “the ekklēsía of the Lord which he bought with his own blood.” In all these verses the local church is called ekklēsía with no question of precedence or of local emphasis. The singular and plural are interchangeable. Two or more churches do not make the church, nor are there many churches, but one church in many places, whether Jewish, Gentile, or mixed. The only descriptive term that is added is toú theoú (or kýriou), which clearly marks it off from a secular society (denoted in 2:47 by laós). In three instances there is a purely secular use (19:32, 39, 40), which shows that what matters is not assembling as such but who assembles and why. In the case of the church it is God (or the Lord) who assembles his people, so that the church is the ekklēsía of God consisting of all those who belong to him (cf. hólē in 5:11; 15:22). Applied to believers, the term is essentially a qualitative one, the assembly of those whom God himself gathers.

2. Pauline Episties, I. The usage in Paul is similar; cf. the free use of singular and plural (Rom. 16:23; 16:4, 16; Gal. 1:13, 22), the use of hólē (Rom. 16:23), and the references to a place (Rom. 16:1) or district (1 Cor. 16:19). Occasional omission of the article shows that ekklēsía is almost a proper name (cf. 1 Cor. 14:19; 2 Cor. 8:23). Even a small house church may be called ekklēsía (Rom. 16:5). Each local church represents the whole church (2 Cor. 1:1: “the church which is at Corinth”), so that what applies in it (1 Cor. 6:4; 11:18; 14:34) will apply everywhere. For Paul, too, toú theoú is the main definition, whether in the singular (1 Cor. 1:2) or the plural (1:16). (This shows that he does not differentiate church and churches, as is sometimes done.) Since God acts in Christ, en Christṓ (Gal. 1:22) or toú Christoú (Rom. 16:16) may also occur; “Christian” is too colorless a rendering for this. We also find “churches of the saints” in 1 Cor. 14:33—natural in view of the equation of the ekklēsía with the “sanctified in Christ Jesus” in 1:2. Materially, Paul shares his conception of the church with the early disciples. The church is still the ekklēsía toú theoú as in the OT, but with the new thing that God has fulfilled the covenant in Christ, and that Christ has manifested himself to his disciples and commissioned them to assemble a people in his name. The church is constituted and authorized by the appearances of the risen Lord, not by the charismatic experiences that are also enjoyed by the disciples and Paul. Paul thus recognizes the privileges of the first community and its leaders, as may be seen in his organizing of the collection for Jerusalem (which is not just a matter of benevolence or strategy) and his description of James etc. as “pillars” in Gal. 2:9 (even if there is irony here in view of their human fallibility and the mistaken desire of some to overexalt authoritative persons). Paul has no desire to impose a new view of the church, but rather to protect the original view against incipient innovations. For him the church stands or falls with its sole foundation in Christ, its acknowledgment of him alone as Lord, and the rejection of overemphasis on persons or places.

No description of the church is given, but Paul gets to the heart of the matter with his understanding of it (parallel to that of Acts) as an assembly which is the assembly of God in Christ.

3. Pauline Epistles, II: Colossians and Ephesians. A more specific doctrine of the church unfolds in these epistles. It is Christ's body, with Christ himself as head (Col. 1:18, 24; Eph. 1:22; 5:23). There is a relation of coordination and subordination between it and Christ (Eph. 5:24-25, 29). The church is to be holy and without blemish (5:27). Through it God's wisdom is to be made known (3:10). The human statements here circle around a divine mystery (3:4-5). All that concerns Christ and the church is God's doing. The mystery of their union forms a model for that of husband and wife even as it is also illustrated by this (5:25ff.). The images are taken from the contemporary world: the Redeemer overcomes hostile powers on his heavenly ascent (Eph. 4:8ff.), breaks down the wall of division (2:14ff.), creates the new man (2:15), loves and cherishes the church as his spouse (5:22ff.), and builds it up as his body (2:19ff.). Yet while these ideas are related to the world of Gnostic speculation, and can hardly be either derived from such passages as Rom. 12:4ff. or fused into a consistent picture, their import is practical rather than theoretical or esoteric. For a. they express the strict relation between Christ and the church, and thus serve a christological ecclesiology, and b. they protect an exalted Christology in the difficult situation caused by false teaching and the tensions between Jewish and Gentile Christians. These concerns are wholly Pauline even if a new set of concepts has to be used to meet the Jewish devaluation of the church by focusing on place and person and the Gnostic exaggeration which postulates a marriage between Christ and wisdom rather than between Christ and his people. Indeed, even the ideas of these letters are present materially, if not formally, in epistles like Romans and 1 and 2 Corinthians, where the church is the body in its interrelationships (1 Cor. 12) and Paul's aim is to present it as a pure bride to her husband (2 Cor. 11:2). The language may be Gnostic, but the point is to show that the church is not just a human society but is defined in terms of Christ. Ecclesiology is Christology and vice versa. All human distinctions are thus transcended (Col. 3:11; cf. Gal. 3:28). Yet this is no Christ mysticism, for the church can be Christ's body only by obeying God's call in Christ, and the God who calls in Christ is the God of the old covenant who has now established the new, so that the NT assembly is the fulfilled OT assembly. If holiness is ascribed to this community, it is not as a quality but in virtue of God's justifying and sanctifying work in Christ, on the basis of which the word of promise to Israel is now the word of fulfilled promise to Christians.

4. The Rest of the NT. The other NT passages add little to what has been said. Revelation uses the plural 13 times and also speaks of the church of Ephesus, Smyrna, etc. 3 John has the term twice with and once without the article. Jms. 5:4 mentions the elders of the church, probably referring to the whole community. Heb. 2:12 quotes Ps. 22:22, and Heb. 12:23 refers to the assembly of the firstborn, probably not in a technical sense, but simply in that of a festal gathering in heaven (cf. v. 22).

C. The Greek World. The Greek world uses ekklēsía for a popular assembly (cf. Acts 19:32, 39-40). The OT and NT give it its specific sense by adding toú theoú or en Christṓ. Did they choose this word because it had a cultic sense? It denotes the assembly of ekklētoí in Greek cities, but there is no sure evidence of use for a cultic society. The secular ekklēsía offers a formal parallel, and may have a religious undertone, as in the offering of prayers, but NT usage derives from that of the LXX. This explains why Latin adopts ecclesia rather than such renderings as curia, civitas Dei, or convocatio. The term ekklēsía has a sacred history in the sacred writings. It stresses the distinctiveness of Christianity as compared to cultic societies, for which there are special terms like thíasos. Hellenistic Jews are probably the first to apply the term to the church, preferring it to synagōgḗ because the latter was acquiring a more restricted sense, and perhaps because there is some similarity of sound between ekklēsía and Heb. qāhāl.

D. Parallel Expressions. Often ekklēsía may not be present, but the matter itself is presented under different terms. 1 Peter especially offers such expressions as "spiritual house" (2:5), "chosen race" etc. (2:9), and "God's people" (2:10). Gal. 6:16 speaks of the "Israel of God," Gal. 3:29 of "Abraham's offspring," and Jms. 1:1 and 1 Pet. 1:1 of the "twelve tribes" or "exiles" in the dispersion. Less closely related terms are the saints, the brethren, disciples, etc. In Jms. 2:2 the church can also call itself synagōgḗ, which also derives from the OT. The question arises which term might have been used by Aramaic-speaking Christians, and before that by Jesus himself.

E. Matt. 16:18 and 18:17.

1. The Problem. There are several difficulties relating to these two passages: their coordination with other ekklēsía passages, their authenticity, their Semitic equivalents, and their correct exposition. Complexity arises because the answers to these questions all affect one another.

2. The Relation of the Two Passages. A specific problem is that 16:18 seems to refer to the whole church and 18:17 to the local church, for which we might have expected synagōgḗ. Is qāhāl the underlying term in both instances?

3. Textual and Literary Criticism. Neither verse offers real textual problems. Literary criticism points out that there are no parallels to 16:18 in Mark or Luke, but it can supply no cogent arguments for the theory of interpolation (and in any case even an interpolation might rest on a genuine tradition).

4. Material Criticism. Mt. 16:17ff. has a Semitic flavor, but the two questions of Jesus and the church and the position of Peter involve statistical, eschatological, historical, and psychological problems. a. The statistical problem is the absence of ekklēsía elsewhere in the Gospels, but as in 1 Peter this fact is not decisive in view of the parallel "flock" in Mt. 26:31 and Jn. 10:16, the gathering of the Twelve as the nucleus of the true people of God, and Jesus' description of himself as the Son of Man, i.e., the representative of the people of the saints (Dan. 7). Furthermore, the messiahship of Jesus and his institution of the covenant (the Lord's Supper) show that he must be regarded as the founder of what is later most frequently called the ekklēsía. b. The eschatological problem is whether founding an ekklēsía fits in with the preaching of the kingdom. While the ekklēsía is obviously not the basileía, it is itself plainly an eschatological entity, and regards itself as such. c. The historical argument is that Peter does not occupy the position that he is given in 16:18 (cf. 1 Cor. 3:11; 10:4). On the other hand, he plays a part which is hard to explain on purely historical or psychological grounds, and if he may be challenged, as in Gal. 2 or Jn. 20:2ff., it is hard to see how 16:18 can have arisen and established itself if not authentic. d. The psychological objection is that Peter does not prove to be a rock. But this is only a special aspect of the miracle of grace that is seen in the election of Israel, or indeed of the church itself.

5. Hebrew and Aramaic Equivalents. A separate question is whether the Hebrew original of ekklēsía is qāhāl or the corresponding Aramaic loanword, which is in any case rare. Jesus and the disciples must have known Hebrew, but the rabbis do not necessarily use qāhāl for the Jewish congregation, whether national or local, and the normal Aramaic term (kəništā') suggests a specific group which might be regarded as a sect. The point, perhaps, is that Jesus might have used this term, but with the clear implication that this separated group represents the true Israel as the people of God. If this is so, in 18:17 the original reference might well be to the OT community, but rightly the church then applies it to itself with the rendering ekklēsía.

F. The OT and Judaism.

1. Greek Judaism. a. The LXX uses ekklēsía about 100 times, mostly for qāhāl. The term ekklēsía has the basic sense of "assembly" (cf. Dt. 9:10; 1 Kgs. 8:65); only the addition kyríou gives it a theological sense (cf. Dt. 23:2ff. etc.), or an expression like "of Israel" (1 Kgs. 8:14) or "of the saints" (Ps. 89:5 etc.). The use of synagōgḗ is similar. It, too, is often used for qāhāl, and it has both a general sense ("assembly") and a technical sense ("congregation of Israel"). b. In Philo and Josephus the position is much the same, but there is more reference to national assemblies, and the technical sense is also more pronounced.

2. The Hebrew Text. While ekklēsía is almost always used for qāhāl, qāhāl is rendered ekklēsía only in some books (e.g., Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Psalms). Elsewhere synagōgḗ is the equivalent, or occasionally other terms like óchlos or sýstasis. synagōgē, unlike ekklēsía, is also used ʻ ēḏâ, which is common in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers.

G. Etymology. Since the NT ekklēsía is given its specific impress by the OT, the history is more important than the etymology, especially as neither ekkaleín nor ékklētos occurs in the NT, and both are also very rare in the LXX. The NT writers are unlikely to have had the idea of "called out" in mind when they spoke about the ekklēsía (though cf. Eph. 5:25ff.; 1 Tim. 3:15; Heb. 12:23). If the church does in fact consist of those whom God has called out of the world, this relates to material rather than linguistic considerations. What is always meant is the "assembly (of God)." The word "church" suggests the universal aspect, and etymologically its belonging to the Lord (kyriakón), but it has the disadvantage of having acquired a hierarchical nuance. The word "congregation" makes the point that the small fellowship is already the church, and it stresses the aspect of gathering together, but it has the disadvantage of drawing attention to the individual group, sometimes in a sectarian sense. "Church community" might be commended as a possible alternative to both.

H. The Apostolic Fathers and Early Catholicism. In the early church we find signs of a shift in the use of adjectives and the rise of speculation. In the first works ekklēsía is common only in Hermas with its vision of the kyría, who is hagía and presbytéra, the morphḗ of a holy spirit (cf. Visions 1.1ff.). 1 Clement in three instances has a use similar to that of 1 Pet. 1:1 and Jms. 1:1. Ignatius has imposing epithets in his epistles, many of them quite extravagant. In Ephesians 5.5 God, Christ, and the church are presented as one entity to believers. The churches have single bishops, and the word katholikḗ appears in Smyrneans 8.2. In the Martyrdom of Polycarp the church is holy and catholic, sojourning in the different places. In the Didache the church is scattered but is to be gathered into the kingdom (9.4). An obscure phrase here speaks of the worldly mystery of the church enacted by the true prophet (11.11). 2 Clement stresses the dimension of mystery in 14.1. With its reference to the preexistence of the church, this links up with speculation about the aeon of the church and statements about the ideal church in contrast to the empirical church (cf. Augustine, and the later distinction between the invisible church and the visible).

J. Conclusion. The development of "Catholicism" as distinct from primitive Christianity is plainly apparent in the area of the church with the rise of Gnostic speculation and the influence of Platonism. The NT itself makes no distinction between an invisible triumphant church and a visible militant church. The church, as the individual congregation representing the whole, is always visible, and its righteousness and holiness are always imputed through faith. Luther recognizes this when he prefers the term "congregation" to "church" in his rendering of Scripture. Yet if the ideal is not to be played off against the reality, no more is the whole church against the local congregation. Every congregation represents the whole church, that at Corinth no less than that at Jerusalem. The development of larger organizations does not alter this basic truth. If there is an element of constitutional change, e.g., with the greater stress on bishops and deacons than on charismatics, this does not in the NT represent an essential change from a pneumatic to a juristic form. Such a change comes only later when lofty speculation about the church attributes divine significance to historical developments and thus makes possible the step from primitive Christianity to early and later "Catholicism." [K. L. SCHMIDT, III, 487-536]

→ anénklētos, parakaléō, paráklētos, symparakaléō

kalodidáskalos → *didáskō

kalós [beautiful, good]

A. The Meaning of kalós. Related to Indo-European words for "powerful," "excellent", "strong," kalós has the sense of a. "healthy," "serviceable," e.g., sterling metal, suitable place, or right time, b. "beautiful," "attractive," "lovely," and c. "good." All these senses may be brought together under the idea of "what is ordered or sound," and with this basic sense kalós is a key term in Greek thought. The noun tó kalón (tá kalá) means a. "the good," "virtue," and b. "the beautiful," "beauty."

B. kalós kaí agathós.

1. This combination occurs from the fifth century, at first with a political and social sense. The agathoí are the worthy or outstanding, and the kaloí kaí agathoí are leading citizens who also display some qualitative superiority related to character and culture. The phrase may be used for non-Greeks too.

2. Socrates then adds to the term a spiritual and ethical dimension. The kalós kagathós is a worthy citizen who has become such by instruction in virtue. kalokagathía begins inwardly and then expresses itself outwardly. Education is the secret, and the ordered life that results will bring happiness.

3. The influence of philosophical thinking on political life may be seen in the orators, e.g., Demosthenes, for whom the kalós kagathós is the ideal politician who considers only the public welfare and not his own interests or enmities.

4. The phrase later becomes stereotyped. Epictetus stresses the relating of desire to renunciation and the integrating of one's will to that of the deity. Philo follows the older philosophy.

C. kalós and tó kalón in the Greek World and Hellenism.

1. Plato relates the kalón very closely to the agathón. It is an aspect of it, or its form. The kalón is the moving force of the striving for harmony and fulfilment. It underlies education as the prototype of a higher image. An eternal idea of the kalón lies behind the earthly form. érōs is the ability to perceive the kalón. From the vision or knowledge of the kalón through érōs, come virtue and immortality. The kalón fuses deity, cosmos, and humanity, and in art and virtue it brings meaning, fellowship, and eternity into life.

2. Aristotle divides the kalón into the naturally beautiful and the morally beautiful. Defined by order, the kalón is the good in an absolute sense. Stoicism accepts this ethicizing of the concept. The main meaning now becomes "the virtuous," and the concept is that of a norm.

3. The religious aspect emerges again in Hellenism. Philo, influenced by the OT as well as Stoicism, gives the term a religious sense. The divine is the kalón, and the world is conjoined with it. Those who seek and achieve the kalón are God's children.

4. Plotinus revives the view of Plato. He begins with perceptible beauty, but presses on to the idea of the beautiful as true being. The beauty of this world reveals the glory and goodness of the spiritual world, where true beauty belongs. To see this transcendent beauty brings happiness. It is the goal of life, since the beautiful is the good and vice versa. We achieve it through beauty of soul attained in purification and in such virtues as self-discipline, courage, magnanimity, and wisdom.

5. In the Hermetic writings the kalón belongs to God's world. The ideal cosmos is the kalós kósmos. The kalón is here a transcendental thing like deity. Dualism shuts us off from it except by the knowledge of revelation and the corresponding piety.

D. kalós in the OT (LXX) and Judaism.

1. Used in the LXX for yāp̱eh, "beautiful" (e.g., Gen. 12:14), and ṭôḇ, "useful" (Gen. 2:9) or "morally good" (Prov. 17:26), kalós plays only a meager role in the OT. The more personal concept of the dóxa of God replaces much of what the Greek philosophers meant by it, and in an ethics determined by the law the ideal of life and education expressed in the kalós kagathós has no place. Where kalós means the good it denotes conformity to God's will, and while the sense of ordered beauty may be present in the creation story (cf. Gen. 1:4, 10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31), the aesthetic dimension is usually absent.

2. In the sense of "morally good," i.e., in accordance with the law, kalós is a synonym of agathós and occurs in Num. 24:1; Dt. 6:18; 2 Chr. 14:1; Is. 1:17; Mic. 6:8.

3. In parallelism kalós has the sense of "lovely" or "pleasing" in Ps. 135:3 (cf. also 1 Macc. 4:24).

E. kalós in the NT.

1. Synoptists. In the message of the Baptist and the preaching of Jesus we find the metaphor of "good fruit" (Mt. 3:10; 7:17ff.). The summons here is to metánoia with a view to becoming the good tree that produces good fruit. In the parables we also read of "good seed," i.e., the word of the kingdom of God (Mt. 13:24, 27, 37-38), and "good fish," i.e., those who come under the lordship of God by metánoia. Always, here, kalós is oriented to God's basileía.

2. The kalá érga to which Jesus summons us (cf. Mt. 5:16; 25:35ff.) are works of love and mercy such as we find in the OT (Is. 58:6-7) and the rabbinic writings, where God's own works of love and mercy are the model, e.g., his clothing of Adam and Eve (in Gen. 3:21), or visiting the sick Abraham (in Gen. 18:1), or comforting Isaac (in Gen. 25:11), or burying Moses (in Dt. 34:6). Jesus requires mercy and not sacrifice (Mt. 9:13), and displays this himself by coming to save sinners. Yet such good works are integrated into the divine lordship, so that even a work like burying one's parent must not be an end in itself (Lk. 9:59). Furthermore, all good words are now done to Jesus himself (Mt. 25:40). As he is our advocate with the Father, he is also an advocate with us for others. He comes to us in the needy, and seeks to pursue his saving work through us. The reward for this saving work is that God is glorified thereby (Mt. 5:16). All thought of reciprocity is thus eliminated (cf. Lk. 14:12ff.). Inheritance of the kingdom is the only recompense, and in this kingdom there is no scale of payment. The Good Samaritan is the model of the divinely willed mercy that acts spontaneously and seeks no reward (Lk. 10:30ff.). The anointing in Mk. 14:3ff. is extolled as a memorable work of love—more important than the almsgiving on which the disciples would have used the money (vv. 4-5)—because it meets the need of the moment and is proleptically performed for one who faces a criminal's death and the related threat of a criminal's grave without anointing.

3. John. A significant use in John is in the description of Jesus as the "good shepherd." This carries with it a unique claim in opposition to the shepherd gods of Hellenism and the shepherds (leaders) of the people. The basis of the claim is the shepherd's knowledge of his flock, and his giving his life to save it from the wolf. Taking up the flock into his own fellowship with the Father thereby, he proves himself to be the true shepherd, good, competent, and worthy of praise. In 10:31-32 Jesus asks for which of his good works the people wants to stone him. These works are good because they are works of God. As such, however, they carry with them a messianic claim that the people cannot or will not accept.

4. Paul. At times Paul uses tó kalón in the absolute as a synonym of tó agathón. Thus in Rom. 7:18, 21 tó kalón is the good that we want to do but cannot. In 2 Cor. 13:7 doing tó kalón is the new Christian possibility. We are not to tire of doing it (Gal. 6:9). The term may also denote specific things that are good or praiseworthy, e.g., sexual restraint (1 Cor. 7:1, 8, 26), or respecting the consciences of others (Rom. 14:21). As an adjective it characterizes the law in Rom. 7:16 but cannot be used for the Corinthians' boasting in 1 Cor. 5:6. Paul demands good works in the sense of works of love and mercy (cf. Rom. 12:13, 20; 1 Cor. 16:11), but he does not use kalá érga for these.

5. The Pastorals. kalós is a much more important term in these epistles. We read of kalá érga in 1 Tim. 5:10, 25; 6:18; Tit. 2:7, 14; 3:8, 14, and kalón érgon in 1 Tim. 3:1. Good works are Christ's intention for us (Tit. 3:8). To pray for all people is good (1 Tim. 2:3). We are to wage a good warfare (1 Tim. 1:18), and be good soldiers (2 Tim. 2:3). The author has fought a good fight (2 Tim. 4:7). Like Christ, we are to make a good confession (1 Tim. 6:12-13). We must also be rich in good works (1 Tim. 6:18). The law is kalós (1 Tim. 1:8). Bishops must have a good report (3:7), and deacons will gain a good standing by good service (3:13). The good minister teaches good doctrine (4:6). Finally, everything created by God is good (4:4). In these passages, kalós has for the most part the philosophical sense of "right," "orderly," or "excellent," manifested in such things as right conduct, correct teaching, and a proper attitude to the world. All this, however, is in orientation to Christ and the gospel. The usage in James, 1 Peter, and Hebrews is similar (cf. Jms. 2:7; 1 Pet. 4:10; Heb. 13:18; also Jms. 1:27; 1 Pet. 4:9; Heb. 13:2-3; 3 Jn. 5). [W. GRUNDMANN, III, 536-50]

F. kalós in Christological Statements in the Early Church.

1. The Influence of Is. 53 on the Early Church View of an Ugly Christ.

a. Is. 53 is one of two main passages that govern the early concept of Christ. Especially significant (with Is. 52:14) is Is. 53:2b in the LXX version. The actual terms play no role in the NT itself, which stresses Christ's humility rather than any lack of beauty, and which does not have outward appearance in view when it calls Jesus either God's image (2 Cor. 4:4) or Son of Man (Heb. 2:6-7). 1 Clem. 16 agrees with the NT when quoting Is. 53 and Ps. 21: Christ's humility is the point at issue.

b. Justin shows a similar concern to that of 1 Clement in his use of Is. 53 in Apology 50.1ff.; Dialogue 100.2, etc. Outward appearance is not the issue, but the renunciation of divine glory. This does lead, however, to human dishonoring, so that the heavenly powers, at Christ's ascension, have to ask: "Who is this king of glory?" (Dialogue 36.6). The theme of nonrecognition finds a basis in 1 Cor. 2:8.

c. That Christ's humility involves ugliness comes out in Acts of Thomas 45, though again divine glory rather than human beauty is the opposite. In similar works this is linked with a dualistic depreciation of humanity which ignores the biblical doctrine of the divine image.

d. In its striving against docetic trends the church is led to lay more stress on the physical appearance of Christ, and it turns to Is. 53 for guidance. Thus many Christians accept the view that the Lord intentionally does not appear in a beautiful form so as not to distract from his teaching. Origen, replying to Celsus' objections in this regard, discounts the relevance of Is. 53. Among other fathers there is vacillation and disagreement; the only consensus is that Is. 53 refers to the lowliness of Christ, and supremely to his passion.

2. The Concept of a Beautiful Christ in the Early Church.

a. Another influential passage is Ps. 45. The idea that beauty is intrinsic to deity predisposes many theologians to claim outstanding beauty for Christ in spite of Is. 53. This Hellenistic idea finds echoes in Wis. 13:5; Sir. 39:16, in obvious allusion to the creation story. In the LXX we also find such passages as Pss. 49:1, 96:6. Christian apologists like Athenagoras refer to the beauty of creation (Supplication 10.1 etc.), and 1 Clement speaks of the beauty of the bond of divine love (49.1). This view of beauty makes an ugly Christ unthinkable.

b. In this light we can understand the messianic application of Ps. 45:2-3. Jewish writers take the passage messianically too. Types of Christ are also found in the handsome Moses (Ex. 2:2) and Joseph (Gen. 39:6). The bridegroom of the Song of Songs serves as a messianic type, and sometimes Is. 33:17 (where the LXX has dóxa) is given a messianic interpretation.

c. Gnostic depictions go beyond the OT data with their depiction of the eternal youth and beauty of the exalted Lord. While human terms are used, these depictions lack historical realism, so that the total result is docetic.

d. In the art of the catacombs we also find a young and beautiful Christ, usually in connection with the good shepherd (though perhaps on the basis of Ezek. 34:23; Zech. 11:7ff. rather than Jn. 10:1ff.). The divine shepherd is an ideal embodiment of the Christian view of salvation even if formally religious and secular models from the contemporary world have had some impact. Popular piety takes up the thought of the beautiful Christ, in spite of gruesome depictions of the passion, and gives it expression in both art and song. [G. BERTRAM, III, 550-56]

→ agathós, kakós, ponērós

kalýptō [to cover, hide], kálymma [covering, veil], anakalýptō [to uncover], katakalýptō [to cover, veil], apokalýptō [to uncover, reveal], apokálypsis [revelation] kalýptō. The basic meaning seems to be “to bury,” and this yields “to hide,” “to cover.” The main use in classical Greek is poetic. The word is common in the LXX (cf. Ex. 14:28; 27:2). The cloud covers the tent in Ex. 24:15-16, and priests cover themselves when ministering. A figurative use for the covering of sin occurs in Ps. 32:5. In the NT we find the literal use in Mt. 8:24; Lk. 23:30 (with a hint of “to bury”); Lk. 8:16. Mt. 10:26 has the term in a figurative sense: God will see that the message is declared in spite of all attempts to suppress it. In 2 Cor. 4:3 Paul faces the charge that his message is obscure; he accepts this in the case of unbelievers, whose minds are blinded by the god of this world. Jms. 5:20 and 1 Pet. 4:8 are based on Prov. 10:12 when they speak about the covering of sin by loving action. Love insures access to divine forgiveness (though the rabbis sometimes refer the love of Prov. 10:12 to God’s love or to the law). A parallel thought is perhaps that only those who forgive will be forgiven (Mt. 6:15) if the sins that are covered are those of the one who loves.

kálymma.

1. In early classical works this word, too, is poetic. One meaning is “veil” or “head covering.” Veiling is linked with sorrow, the warding off of evil, fruitfulness (in a bride), and the presence of the numinous (masking).

2. In the OT Moses wears a “cover” over his face in Ex. 34:33ff. Attempts to explain this comparatively (e.g., in terms of a cultic mask) are speculative. Whether the cover is to protect the people from the divine glory or to protect the divine glory from profanation may be debated. Perhaps there is an element of both. God’s glory can be seen only as he himself wills.

3. In 2 Cor. 3:7ff. Paul uses the story of Moses in his comparison of the OT revelation and the gospel. kálymma is literal in v. 13. The application is then twofold. a. The veil conceals the fading splendor, glorious though this was. If the transitory splendor is so glorious, how much more so is the lasting splendor of the gospel (cf. vv. 7ff.). b. The veil symbolizes the veil that now rests on the minds of obdurate Israelites when they read the old covenant. What they ought to see there is the glory of Christ, and only when they turn to the Lord will the veil be removed by Christ so that they not only see the Lord's glory but are themselves changed into its likeness. (The experience of Moses in the tent seems to underlie the thought of vv. 16ff.; cf. Ex. 34:34-35.)

anakalýptō. This word means "to uncover" a. with an impersonal object (a package, character, etc.), and b. with an inner object "to remove." Sense b. occurs in 2 Cor. 3:14: The veil remains "unremoved" or "unlifted." On the other hand, the sense in 2 Cor. 3:18 is a. (a figurative use of the literal sense): We all with "unveiled" face (in contrast to vv. 13 and 15). The term expresses here the directness of revelation and of fellowship with God in the NT.

katakalýptō.

1. Outside the NT the word means "to veil (oneself)." In the LXX Moses hides the ark behind a curtain (Ex. 26:34), the seraphim cover their faces (Is. 6:2), and while women customarily veil themselves, a muffled up woman by the wayside is a harlot (Gen. 38:15).

2. In the NT the term occurs only in 1 Cor. 11:6-7. Here Paul requires women to wear a covering for prayer or prophecy. There is no evidence to support the view that Greek women were under any compulsion to be veiled in public. In Tertullian's day Jewish women were prominent in North Africa because they wore veils on the streets. The custom seems in fact to have belonged to the Near East, as in the Assyrian law that married women and widows should be veiled in public, and harlots (slaves) unveiled. Paul's hometown Tarsus, being on the frontier of the Near East, is stricter in this regard than Greece or most of Asia Minor, but even here there are many exceptions. The practice that Paul commends, then, derives from the Near East, and he restricts it to the sphere that is under church jurisdiction, i.e., worship.

3. In the Christian era the veiling of women for worship has had a mixed history. The catacombs depict women at prayer only partially veiled, and we often find Mary and holy women depicted without covering. Veils have been regarded as obligatory for nuns and sometimes for other women workers in the church. Many women, especially Roman Catholics, will also use some covering when at worship. But there neither has been nor is a universal application of the rule.

apokalýptō, apokálypsis. These terms raise special problems because dogmatic ideas may easily be imported into the NT passages with the usual renderings "to reveal" and "revelation." Yet one cannot take refuge in purely philological exposition by using such translations as "to disclose" or "to unveil." The terms are to some degree ambivalent, but they have a good measure of inner unity that is best brought out by "revelation" as the manifestation of deity, so long as this is first put on a broader basis.

A. The Idea of Revelation in Religious History. Modern religious inquiry, while not neglecting phenomena, looks behind them for an objective element. Religion has to do with the manifestation of deity. Deity is hidden; there is no direct access. Yet there can be no dealings with it if it remains hidden. It is a general view, then, that deity manifests itself. Religion seeks the right method to bring this about. To this end we find the use of fetishes, dreams, oracles, astrology, auspices, etc. These things, when institutionalized, may be counterbalanced by the word of gifted individuals, who sometimes become the founders of religion and whose teachings take on more permanent form as writings.

B. Revelation in the Greek World and Hellenism.

1. Popular Religion. While the Romans stress regularity in revelation, the Greeks find deity primarily in the unusual. Common means may be used, however, to declare the forces of destiny. Dreams and their interpretation are important, but above all the oracle. The Greeks do not use apokalýptein for divine revelation. For them deity is as open and hidden as the reality of which it is the basic form; one may thus see it or miss it. If it is still of the essence of deity to manifest itself, there is no unique revelation. The gods only give hints, and they are as fickle as fortune, having no standard of an inviolable moral will. Greek religion knows revelations but is not a religion of revelation.

2. Believing and Unbelieving Criticism. Antiquity can be critical of revelations. It does not accept myth as history, allegorizes its objectionable features, and contests miraculous signs (cf. the Epicureans, and the stress of Epictetus that we should be guided by duty). Plutarch, discussing the oracle, accepts the fact that the soul may be an instrument of deity but points out that it is an imperfect instrument. The deity uses inspired people, but does not enter into them bodily or use them involuntarily. Physical phenomena may stir up the mantic gift, however, so that if we understand the matter correctly we are not to dismiss the oracular as undeserving of confidence.

3. The Turning to History. Although magical conceptions may form the starting point, the idea of the "divine man" marks a turning to history. Outstanding rulers, statesmen, poets, physicians, scholars, and philosophers (cf. Empedocles, Pythagoras, and Apollonius; also Socrates, Plato, and even Epicurus) make such an impress on their own and succeeding generations that they are seen and honored as divine revealers.

4. The Rationalization of the Idea of Revelation. Greek philosophy inclines toward causal and immanent explanations. This might seem to exclude the idea of revelation. But meaning, embraced by thought, is injected into nature. Being and thought form a unity, whether as lógos, noús, or idea. The cosmos manifests thinking spirit, and when Poseidonius gives this a religious turn, the idea of natural revelation results. Thus Cicero infers from creation that it must have either a creator or a governor. Hidden from the senses, the deity, like the human spirit, may be grasped by the noús, with no need for a special revelation.

5. Mysticism and Gnosticism. Mysticism accepts the hiddenness of deity and the occurrence of special revelations. Initiates, however, know the deity, if only step by step, so that deity is veiled only by lack of initiation, not by essence. The roots of mysticism are in magic. An enhancement of life by divinization is postulated, and this is attained by the use of the right methods or formulas. This rules out historical singularity in revelation. As the sacral actions are spiritualized, they gradually yield to vision and contemplation, which may be purely inward and cognitive rather than emotional. A compact may thus be made with Gnosticism and philosophy, as in the Hermetic writings. These embody the esoteric knowledge entrusted to Hermes Trismegistos. God has given the word of revelation which leads to regeneration, which is to be received with reverence and thanksgiving, which must be kept secret, but which also impels to witness. In spite of the terms, here again is no historical revelation but simply the handing on of knowledge of the factually but not intrinsically hidden ground of the world that may just as well be impersonal as personal.

6. The Use of Terms. When the Greeks speak of something analogous to revelation, they mostly use other words. The Hermetic corpus has apokalýptein for the illegitimate disclosure of mysteries, which is worthy of execration. Iamblichus, however, has it for beneficial exposition. The noun usually has such ordinary senses as uncovering the head or finding hidden springs. It is, however, a technical term in soothsaying, finds a place in astrology and alchemy, and may signify cultically the revealing of secret matters. Theological use of either verb or noun is fundamentally alien to the Greeks and perhaps derives from the Greek Bible, though this is philologically debatable.

C. Revelation in the OT.

1. The Basis in Religious History. OT religion, too, knows such means of revelation as signs (Gen. 24: 12ff.), seers (1 Sam. 9:6ff.), dreams (Gen. 28: 12ff.), oracles (1 Sam. 14:37ff.), priestly directions (Dt. 17:9, 12), and ecstasy and prophecy. Fasting may be preparatory (Dan. 9:3).

2. The Revelation of the Living God. The new factor is that the God of Israel is the living God (Josh. 3:10; Is. 37:4; Dt. 5:23) in distinction from dead idols. As true God, he is hidden (Is. 45:15). He reveals himself as he himself wills. We thus have true revelation, which is worked out in three main directions.

a. God reveals himself as Lord of history. The exodus is basic here (Ex. 14:18). By it God separates Israel for himself (Ex. 19:4ff.). This confers no claim, for he rules over all nations (cf. Am. 9:7). Yet it is constitutive for the covenant. What counts is not so much what is as what happens. History is God's work (Is. 7:1ff.). The kingdoms are subject to him and his purposes (Is. 7:18ff.). He uses Assyria and breaks it; he makes Cyrus an agent of restoration from exile (Is. 45:1ff.). Revelation, then, is not just the imparting of knowledge, though knowledge comes through it. It is God's action as he removes essential concealment and offers himself for fellowship on a moral basis.

b. God reveals himself as gracious and holy. He is holy in the ethical sense (the Ten Commandments). The people often inclines to natural or cultic religion, but the prophets constantly issue a call to obedience, without which the cultus is an abomination (2 Sam. 12:7ff.; 1 Kgs. 17:1; Am. 2:6ff.; Hos. 6:6; Is. 1:10ff., etc.). In his holiness God is concerned for his glory (Ex. 20:5). He is not governed by an abstract idea of goodness. His will is good, even though its goodness may not always be apparent (cf. Ps. 73; Job). Yet God is also gracious. He shows mercy and forgives (Ex. 34:6-7). His overruling leads through judgment to blessing (Is. 40:1ff.; 53; 61:1ff.). In this is manifested his almighty power as Creator and Lord.

c. God reveals himself as the world's Creator and Sustainer. He made heaven and earth (Is. 37:16). From the fact that he acts in power it may be seen that the world has its origin in his will and word. Mythological cosmogonies are thus radically purified in the creation stories. The world exists by the word, and by the same word it is upheld and ruled (cf. Pss. 18:7ff.; 19:1ff.; 29:33; 96:10ff.; 97:1ff.; 104; 148; Is. 40:12ff. etc.; Am. 5:8; Job 38-39). In contrast to the Greek conception, which involves a mastering of the world by thought, God is central here. It is not we who unveil God, but God who reveals himself to us.

3. The Delimitation of Revelation. While the Greek view moves between compression into a mystery and cosmopolitan extension, worship in the OT is neither a mystery nor a world religion. God is the God of his freely chosen people (Ex. 19:4ff.). As such he is the God of the world who declares himself to other nations as well in his judgments (Is. 13ff.) and blessings (Am. 9:7). He can summon other peoples to repentance (Jon. 3:4ff.), and by leading his own people to salvation will share his revelation with them (Is. 41:1ff.; 45:4ff.; 49:1ff., etc.). Yet all this takes place within the covenant relation to his people and as God's own act to which no none has a claim. It is because revelation is God's own act that he may reveal himself outside of Israel and that false revelation as well as true may be found in Israel (cf. 1 Kgs. 22:19ff.). Due to the people's sinfulness, indeed, a conflict with false prophecy, which seems to take institutional form, rages for centuries (1 Kgs. 22:5ff.; Jer. 2:26; 6:13ff.; 18:18ff.; etc.). God himself may even use such prophecy in judgment (1 Kgs. 22:19ff.). So acute is the problem that the OT advances criteria whereby to distinguish true prophets from false (Dt. 18:21): a. motivation (cf. Mic. 3:5; Am. 7:14, though also 2 Kgs. 4:8ff.); b. reception, with the powerful impact of reception of the word (rather than dreams) as the decisive point (Jer. 23:28; Ex. 33:11; Am. 3:8; linked to visions, Is. 6; Am. 7-9; Zech 1ff.); c. fulfilment (1 Sam. 3:19; 1 Kgs. 8:56; Dt. 18:22), though God's will is not unalterable and will adjust to a changing situation (Is. 28:23ff.); d. content, which in true prophets will always be faithful rather than pleasing, whether it be a message of judgment or salvation (1 Kgs. 22:5ff.; Mic. 3:5; Is. 7:1ff.). True prophecy, while not moralistic, will always have a moral orientation (Jer. 23:21-22). It does not reflect our own judgment but puts us under God's judgment and then leads on through judgment to grace. God makes himself known to his messengers both inwardly and historically. They often have inner qualms (Jer. 20:7ff.) but revelation imposes constraint upon them and confers the confidence they need.

4. Revelation and Eschatology. OT revelation is especially distinctive in relation to the future. It does not refer to what always is but to what is to be. This future is not the utopia of natural optimism. God's day is first a day of darkness (Am. 5:18ff.) and only then a day of final salvation (Am. 9:11-12; Is. 9:1ff.). Apocalyptic develops with the disclosure of future glory (cf. already Ezek. 40ff.; Pss. 46-47; 96-99).

5. The Usage. apokalýptein first has the ordinary sense “to uncover” (Ex. 20:26 etc.) or figuratively “to initiate” (1 Sam. 20:2). It has theological import only when God is the subject (Num. 22:31); 1 Sam. 2:27; 2 Sam. 7:27). Yet there is no fixed term for revelation, and apokálypsis is not used in this sense. The verb finds an important use in Is. 56:1, where it denotes the eschatological manifestation of the existent divine deliverance.

D. The Attitude of Judaism to Revelation.

1. General Points. Judaism no longer expects direct revelation. The focus is on past revelation in the law, prophets, and writings. Oral tradition is meant only as exposition. God’s will is now known, and is to be done. New revelation will come in the last time, but in part as new exposition. In Hellenistic Judaism the terms apokalýptein and apokálypsis are rare; Philo does not use either.

2. Apocalyptic. Apocalyptic forms a substitute for revelation (the term comes from the last NT book). It is distinctively Palestinian, though hard to link with any specific group and popular also in Hellenistic Judaism. The genre is pseudepigraphal; the revelations supposedly derive from great figures of the past. Divine transcendence is stressed. The new aeon already exists, and when evil reaches a climax it will break in with power. For the seers the veil has already been lifted in visions, and they impart these so as to encourage God’s struggling servants. The seriousness of the themes, the concept of world history, and the dynamic understanding of revelation make apocalyptic an important force.

3. Natural Revelation. Partly for apologetic and partly for polemical reasons, Hellenistic Judaism inclines more to immanentism. Philo and Wisdom (e.g., 13:3ff.) discern God in the beauty and teleology of the world, so that idolatry, while inexcusable, is also pitiable. The problem here is that in Philo, as in Greek philosophy, the movement is from below upward, so that Philo finds it hard to ward off the threat of pantheism. A parallel development is the equation of revealed law and natural law.

E. Revelation in the NT. The NT inherits and presupposes OT revelation. It thus bypasses Judaism except for the eschatological impact of apocalyptic. The distinctive dynamic of its view of revelation arises from the relationship between history and eschatology.

1. Revelation in the Synoptists. The Baptist’s witness (Mt. 3:2) and the initial message of Jesus (Mk. 1:15) imply that God is coming and will manifest his kingdom. We must prepare for this revelatory divine act. Yet it soon becomes apparent that Jesus himself is the kingdom. It is present in him as an eschatological reality. He grants revelation (Mt. 11:27), embodies it, and will finally manifest it (Mk. 8:38) as he himself is manifested (Lk. 17:30). By the Father, believers may see him already as he is (Mt. 16:17). The making known of the revelation that is present in Jesus is itself an act of revelation. Human knowledge on its own is a hindrance here (Mt. 11:25). Yet even for the simple, revelation is equivocal (cf. Mk. 4:1lff.). The parables may conceal even as they reveal. If use is made of such general presuppositions as God’s rule in nature and a sense of the good; if the law may be summarized (Mk. 12:28ff.) and wisdom sayings find a place (Lk. 14:7ff.), a cosmic ground of being does not crowd out the living God, nor natural morality God’s holy will, as these may be known in Scripture. The aim of Jesus is the honoring and fulfilment of the revelation of the covenant God (cf. Mk. 7:8ff.; Mt. 5:17). This revelation is for all people (Mt. 8:11), but only in the sense of God’s self-offering to all sinners and with a view to their response in obedient faith and confession.

2. The Understanding of Revelation in the Primitive Community. Here we find an even stronger orientation to the future. The Messiah who has come will come again. Concealed in heaven, he will one day be manifested (Acts 3:21). The earthly words and works fulfil the OT promises but the goal will be reached only with this manifestation in glory (10:36ff.). The giving of the Spirit is the present link between past and future. While Hellenists have a freer attitude to the cultus (cf. Stephen), we have no documentation for a Hellenism, whether Jewish or Gentile, that might have replaced historical revelation with mystical ecstaticism, as in later Gnosticism.

3. Revelation in the NT Epistles.

a. In the epistles revelation is primarily the historical coming of God that is fulfilled in Jesus and will be consummated in the last day. The OT is the sacred letter of revelation, not itself called revelation, but set in the service of the NT fulfilment (Rom. 4:23-24). The true locus is eschatology, i.e., the manifestation of Christ (1 Cor. 1:7), of God's judgment (Rom. 2:5) or wrath (1:18), of antichrist (2 Th. 2:3), but also of God's righteousness (Rom. 1:16), of his children (Rom. 8:19), of their glory (8:18) and salvation (1 Pet. 1:5). The destiny of believers through God's grace is a mystery that is disclosed through Christ's self-revelation and is known to Christ's messengers (Eph. 3:3ff.; Rom. 16:25-26; Gal. 1:12, 16). By divine overruling, faith is revealed as the means of salvation (Gal. 3:23). Proclamation and reception are revelation as well as the message (cf. 1 Th. 2:13). We cannot teach or learn the decisive thing; the Spirit reveals it (1 Cor. 2:10- 11), not mystically, but in orientation to God's historical self-offering to us in Christ. Paul does not use apokálypsis for Jesus' earthly life. This has the character of concealment. Yet God's revelation is now by way of this concealment (1 Cor. 1: 18ff.). Even in concealment, the earthly life is eschatological revelation. The preexistence of Christ, while not stressed, makes this apparent (cf. Phil. 2:6ff.; Gal. 4:4; 2 Cor. 8:9). Christ is present even with Israel in the desert (1 Cor. 10:4). His Spirit inspired the prophets (1 Pet. 1:11-12). All salvation history is thus set in the morning light of the revelation that will climax with the parousia. There may, of course, be direct revelations too (cf. Acts 16:9-10; 2 Cor. 12:1, 7; Gal. 2:2). Yet this more general use is integrated into the narrower use, for these special revelations of Christ are for confirmation, direction, or edification. They must meet the test of Christian love and service.

b. The question of natural revelation in Paul is a difficult one. He plainly states that God makes himself known in creation, that the Gentiles know God, and that they do by nature what is written in the law (Rom. 1-2; cf. Acts 14:15ff.; 17:22ff.). Yet he also argues that this makes them inexcusable because of their sin and idolatry (Rom. 1:20, 32; 2:12ff.). This explains why he can say that the Gentiles do not know God (Gal. 4:8), that the world does not know God through wisdom (1 Cor. 1:21), and that knowledge of God's decree does not mean its observance (Rom. 1:32). God plainly intends that all people should know him, but they frustrate his purpose by resistance and hence become guilty of inexcusable disobedience and ignorance. Paul's use of such terms here is not systematic but missionary and polemical. His theological assessment lies in 1 Cor. 2:14. The natural thinking of sinners cannot grasp the things of the Spirit. Only when it passes under the judgment of the cross does it attain to true knowledge. Even in Rom. 1 Paul speaks from within the knowledge of revelation, and he never uses the present terms when he speaks about what the Gentiles either know or can know about God. The only revelation is that of the judgment of God and the concurrent righteousness of God which means salvation for believers.

4. Revelation in the Johannine Literature.

a. The Gospels and Epistles. Johannine theology does not use the present terms, yet it is a supreme theology of revelation. By claiming the term lógos for Christ, it binds all creation to revelation in Christ and thus makes an exclusive claim for Christ. If the Logos is cosmic (Jn. 1:3), it is also personal and, in Jesus, historical (1:14). All concerns, whether messianic or mystical (light, life, joy, spiritual union with God), are met in the incarnate Logos. Yet this is not by syncretism or natural revelation, but by the one, absolute, historical revelation. The supreme note is love. Eschatology is not excluded, but hope now rests on possession. Pre-Christian salvation history is linked to the Preexistent (cf. 8:58). The earthly work of Jesus is seen primarily from the angle of manifestation (1:14; 1 Jn. 1:1ff.). Dividing, the reality of God shines into the world of sin and death in the person of Jesus (Jn. 3: 14ff.). Hidden from unbelievers, he is seen in all his grace and truth by believers (1:14).

b. Revelation. This book calls itself apokálypsis. It shares with John the use of the term lógos, but the orientation is now to the future in an unveiling of the heavenly world. In spite of some affinities to Jewish apocalyptic, it is closer to prophecy and has more of the content of biblical revelation. It is designed to strengthen the church in its clash with the self-absolutizing power of the state. Above both brutal state and suffering church stands the world of eternity which is the world of the final conquest and the kingdom of God and his Christ.

5. The Limitation and Confirmation of Revelation. Fulfilling the OT covenant, the NT recognizes that Israel is the locus of saving revelation (cf. Jn. 4:22) even though God has nowhere left himself without a witness (Acts 14:16-17). Yet this revelation is now more fully directed to all humanity (cf. Mk. 13:10; Acts 1:8, etc.). At the same time, the NT is concerned to confirm true revelation against false. Signs indicate it (Mt. 11:5-6; Jn. 5:36; 1 Cor. 2:4), but demonic miracles also exist (Mk. 13:22-23; 2 Th. 2:9-10). Even an angel cannot be the guarantee of an authentic revelation (Gal. 1:8; cf. 2 Cor. 11:14). A better test is to be found in the fruits (Mt. 7:15ff.). The Holy Spirit has also given the charisma of discernment (1 Cor. 12:10). Confession of Jesus as Lord is the clearest standard (1 Cor. 12:3). But love must accompany this (13:1ff.). The office of the Spirit is to glorify Christ (Jn. 16:13ff.), i.e., the incarnate Christ (1 Jn. 4:1ff.). Revelation must thus verify itself by commitment to Christ, but again with the backing of love (1 Jn. 4:8; cf. Jn. 13:35). Love protects the confession from formalism, and the confession protects love from moralism.

6. The Terms in the NT. For divine manifestations the NT uses in ascending order the groups gnōrízein, dēloún, phaneroún, and apokalýptein. The first of these finds the greatest secular use, the last two occur mostly in a religious sense, usually in the passive. The distribution of phaneroún and apokalýptein varies. The former occurs in the Synoptics only in Mk. 4:22 and not at all in Galatians, Philippians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, James, or 2 Peter. It is common in John, 1 John, 2 Corinthians, Colossians, and the Pastorals. apokalýptein is common in the Synoptics, most of Paul, and 1 Peter, but does not occur in John (except in the quotation in 12:38), 1-3 John, or Colossians. These two terms are less intellectual than the first two, but phaneroún is more neutral and apokalýptein more Jewish. Thus phaneroún suggests that what is seen is in principle accessible, apokalýptein that there is disclosure only by an act of divine will. The latter term is closer to the core of the biblical concept. The former is perhaps adopted in the missionary encounter to show that the gospel meets all human concerns, but in this adoption it takes on much of the sense of the basic term, namely, that God reveals what is otherwise hidden by his own historical speech and acts that climax in Christ.

7. Theological Summary. In the NT revelation denotes the unveiling of hidden facts and the manifestation of the transcendent God. It is God's gracious turning to those who are lost in sin. Prepared in the OT, it is actualized in Christ's life, death, and resurrection, and awaits consummation at the parousia. But it is then also the message that transmits this content, i.e., its effective transmission. In this way it becomes revelation for individuals, too, but only because it is already revelation with a claim to be heard and the power to make itself heard. In sum, it is the Father's self-offering for fellowship in Christ.

F. Historical Survey. The terms are fairly common in the early church. In Hermas they denote visionary experiences. Justin uses them mostly for individual directions (Dialogue 78.2ff.). A more central use is when he quotes Mt. 11:27, but his understanding is intellectualistic (Apology 63.3ff.). Ignatius is closer to the NT view when he speaks of entry into knowledge of the divine economy regarding Christ (Ephesians 20.1). Diognetus is even closer in 8.11. Origen includes knowledge of future things in his definition. Theologians like Irenaeus discern the cleft that runs across creation through the fall, and show an acute awareness that only God's saving work in Christ can and does bridge it. [A. OEPKE, III, 556-92]

kámēlos [camel]

Common throughout the Near East, the camel is used in the OT by the patriarchs (Gen. 24:10ff.) and is favored by bedouins (cf. Judg. 6:5; 7:12).

1. In the NT the word occurs only in the Synoptics. The Baptist wears a garment of camel's hair (Mk. 1:6). This is cheap, hard-wearing, and distinctive (cf. Mt. 11:8). People of faith will see the prophet behind the rough exterior (cf. Zech. 13:4). A desert motif is present (cf. the food); God is again speaking to his people in the wilderness (Hos. 2:14-15). Perhaps there is also some assimilation to Elijah (2 Kgs. 1:8: the hairy garment and leathern girdle).

2. In Mt. 19:24, after the interview with the rich young ruler, Jesus uses a typical Near Eastern image to stress the fact that entry into the kingdom is normally impossible for the rich, though this does not rule out God's gracious action (Mk. 10:27). A large animal and a small aperture are chosen to stress the impossibility, as in several rabbinic parallels (often an elephant).

3. The denunciation of the scribes and Pharisees contains a similar image in Mt. 23:24. In anxious legalism they will strain out dead insects from their drinks but will be virtually swallowing camels with their unconcern for righteousness and mercy and their sins of extortion and rapacity (23:23, 25). They have lost all sense of proportion relative to the law, and this loss is their judgment. [O. MICHEL, III, 592-94]

kámptō [to bend, bow]

Used with góny, this word signifies bending the knee in submission and worship. It is linked with universal recognition of God in Rom. 14:11 and Phil. 2:10. Not yielding to Baal worship is the point in Rom. 11:4. The attitude of prayer is denoted in Eph. 3:14. Paul derives the formula from the LXX (cf. Is. 45:23; 1 Chr. 29:20, etc.). Secular Greek uses kámptein with góny for bending the knees to sit or rest, but not as a formula for prayer. [H. SCHLIER, III, 594-95]

→ góny, proskynéō

kanṓn [rule, standard]

A. kanṓn outside the NT.

1. The underlying sense is "reed." In the LXX the word is not used for the Hebrew term for measuring rod, but occurs only in Judith for "bedpost," in Mic. 7:4 with no clear sense, and in 4 Macc. 7:21. Philo has it for "statute" and Josephus for "model," "measure."

2. In secular use the basic sense of "reed" yields to that of "straight rod." a. Literally it may be used for a weaver's beam, or for scales, or in building for a measuring rod. b. Figuratively it then becomes a "norm" or "ideal." c. In sculpture it denotes the perfect human frame. d. In music it is the controlling monochord. e. In grammar there is a canon of model writers. f. In law it is the binding ideal. g. In philosophy it is used by Epicurus for the basis by which to know what is true or false, what is to be sought or avoided. kanónes are criteria of truth and value, or rules for the right use of free will. h. The word may finally denote a "list" or "table," e.g., a mathematical list or a historical timetable.

B. kanṓn in the NT.

1. Paul uses kanṓn, though rarely, as a measure of assessment for the self or others. Thus in Gal. 6:16 Christians have only the one "canon"; they see that all previous concepts and standards are set aside and they must now live by the new reality of the freedom that Christ gives. This will both determine their own conduct and enable them to see whether others truly belong to the Israel of God. The word has a similar sense in some readings of Phil. 3:16.

2. The threefold use in 2 Cor. 10: 13ff. is more difficult. In contrast to his opponents' claims, Paul advances here a canon for his own apostolic ministry. It lies in his pioneering work under God's direction.

This probably does not mean that he has in view either a measuring line of God or the allocation of a geographical district giving him exclusive rights. The point is rather that it has been divinely granted to him historically to come to Corinth and then to press on when his ministry is successful. He will not stop where the gospel is already known; this would involve boasting beyond limit in the labors of others (v. 16). The law of his canon lies in Is. 52:15b, which he expounds in Rom. 15:20-21 in support of his preaching where Christ is not yet named.

C. kanṓn in the Christian Church.

1. If in the NT kanṓn is used only in Gal. 6:16 for what is normative for Christians, the idea of norm, whether for life, doctrine, worship, or accepted Scripture, becomes a primary one in the early church due to constant disputes. 1 Clement has it in an ethical sense in 7.2; it is the measure of allotted service in 41.1. The phrase "canon of truth" occurs in Irenaeus 1.9.4-5 for the binding truth of the gospel (cf. canon of faith and the ecclesiastical canon). The canon is thus the norm, to canonize is to recognize as such, and ekklēsiazómenos is a synonym of kanonizómenos.

2. After the fourth century we find the following uses. (i) First, the canon is the collection of the sacred writings of the OT and NT. The concept of norm rather than model or list is primary here. (ii) Rulings of church councils are also canons. (iii) Canon law is the collection of such rulings, along with papal decretals. (iv) There is a canon of ordained clergy, as well as of monks and nuns, in the sense of list. (v) The term can also be used for a rule of life, and consequently may denote clergy living according to such a rule, e.g., in cathedrals or colleges. (vi) The fixed central part of the mass comes to be called the canon. (vii) Saints are said to be canonized from A.D. 993; it is hard to say which sense predominates in this use. [H. W. BEYER, III, 596-602]

kapēleúō [to peddle, trade]

1. The Greek Usage. This word means "to engage in retail trade" and carries a nuance of trickery and avarice. In philosophy it denotes the selling of teaching for money.

2. The Usage in the LXX and Philo. The verb does not occur in the LXX, but kápēlos ("retailer") in Is. 1:22 has the usual derogatory ring. Philo has kapēleía ("retail business") for the conduct of the Essenes but uses other words for the merchandising of false prophets.

3. kapēleúein in the NT. The only NT instance is in 2 Cor. 2:17, where Paul protests that he is not one of those who make merchandise of God's word (cf. Acts 20:33; 1 Th. 2:3ff.). What he has in mind is (i) offering the word for money (as distinct from receiving gifts in return for it, 1 Cor. 9:14) and (ii) adulterating the word (cf. the parallel in 2 Cor. 4:2). While Paul accepts the Lord's rule in Mt. 10:10, he himself forgoes his right to support lest he be accused of avarice and false dealing. The preacher must be governed by commitment to the word, responsibility before God, and allegiance to Christ. [H. WINDISCH, III, 603-05]

kardía [heart], kardiognṓstēs [knower of hearts], sklērokardía [hardness of heart] kardía.

A. lēḇ and lēḇāḇ in the OT.

1. The literal meaning is a. "breast" and b. "seat of physical vitality."

2. Figuratively the heart stands a. for courage (2 Chr. 17:6) in various expressions, b. for the seat of rational functions (Dt. 29:3), c. for the place of willing and planning (Jer 23:20 and d. for the source of religious and ethical conduct (1 Sam. 12:20). (For details see TDNT, III, 606-07.)

3. Another figurative use is for the midst of the sea. [F. BAUMGÄRTEL, III, 605-07]

B. kardía among the Greeks.

1. Physiologically kardía denotes the central bodily organ.

2. Figuratively it is a. the seat of the emotions and b. the seat of thought.

3. Another figurative use in nature is for the central part, e.g., the core or kernel of a plant or tree. (For details cf. TDNT, III, 608-09.)

C. The LXX and Hellenistic and Rabbinic Judaism.

1. For Heb. lēḇ and lēḇāḇ kardía is the true equivalent, though we also find diánoia, psychḗ, and, rarely, noús, phrénes, and stḗthos. kardía in the LXX is the chief organ of human life, including the intellectual, the volitional, and the religious.

2. Hellenistic Judaism, e.g., Philo, can adopt the same usage, though for Philo kardía is an inexact term, since a physical organ cannot be the seat of the higher life. In Josephus kardía is simply the physical organ, though he uses eukardíōs figuratively for "of good courage."

3. Rabbinic Judaism follows the OT in its use of lēḇ and lēḇāḇ.

D. kardía in the NT.

1. The thought that the heart is the central organ and the seat of physical vitality occurs in the NT only in Lk. 21:34 and Jms. 5:5.

2. There is in the NT a rich usage of kardía for a. the seat of feelings, desires, and passions (e.g., joy, pain, love, desire, and lust; cf. Acts 2:26; Jn. 16:6; 2 Cor. 7:3; Rom. 10:1; 1:24); b. the seat of thought and understanding (cf. Mt. 7:21; Jn. 12:40; Acts 8:22; Mk. 11:23; Rev. 18:7; Rom. 1:21); c. the seat of the will (e.g., Acts 11:23; 2 Cor. 9:7; Lk. 21:14); and d. the religious center to which God turns, which is the root of religious life, and which determines moral conduct (e.g., Lk. 16:15; Rom. 5:5; 8:27; Eph. 3:17; Heb. 8:10; 2 Pet. 1:19; as the heart of the sinner, Mk. 7:21; Jn. 12:40; Eph. 4:18; Jms. 1:26; as the heart of the redeemed, Mt. 11:29; 1 Tim. 1:5; 1 Th. 3:13; Col. 3:22; 1 Pet. 3:15; Jms. 4:8, etc.).

3. The meaning "inward part of the earth" occurs in Mt. 12:40.

kardiognṓstēs. This term, first found in the NT, applies to God as the one who knows the heart (Acts 1:24; 15:8). It expresses the familiar thought that God (or Christ) can see into the innermost being where decision is made concerning him (cf. Lk. 16:15; Rom. 8:27; 1 Th. 2:4; Rev. 2:23, and in the OT 1 Sam. 16:7; 1 Kgs. 8:39, etc.).

sklērokardía (→ sklērós, sklērótēs, sklērýnō). "Hardness of heart" is the sense of this LXX and NT word (coined from Heb. ʿ orlāṯ lēḇāḇ). Found in Mk. 10:5 (and par.) and 16:14 (with apistía; cf. Rom. 2:5), it denotes persistent unreceptivity to the declaration of God's saving will. [J. BEHM, III, 608-14]

karpós [fruit], ákarpos [unfruitful], karpophoréō [to bear fruit]

karpós [fruit], ákarpos [unfruitful], karpophoréō [to bear fruit]

karpós. In secular Greek we find a. the literal sense "fruit" and b. the general sense "product" or "gain." LXX usage is similar; cf. a. in Num. 13:27; Dt. 11:17, and b. in Prov. 12:14; Am. 6:12; Hos. 10:13;

---

par. paragraph

LXX Septuagint

Ps. 104:13. In Iranian writings the soul is compared to a plant that is to bring forth fruit. Later Judaism often calls the result of an action its fruit, and in a financial image this might express the idea of retribution (sometimes simply as interest, i.e., the consequences in this life as distinct from the capital which will be credited only in the judgment).

In the NT we find the literal sense (a.) in Jms. 5:7, 18; Mt. 21:19; Mk. 4:29; Rev. 22:2; Lk. 1:42 (children). The general sense (b.) first denotes the results of human actions, as in Mt. 3:8 (as a test of metánoia); Mt. 7:16 (an expression of the inner nature); Mt. 21:43. Fruits here are a decisive standard for judgment. The power which produces them is either the power of sin in the case of bad fruits (Rom. 6:20-21), or fellowship with Christ (Jn. 15:2ff.) or the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:22) in the case of good fruits (cf. Rom. 6:22). But karpós in this sense may also be the result of ministry (Rom. 1:13; Phil. 1:22). The collection for Jerusalem is a fruit in this sense (Rom. 15:28). Support for Paul will bring fruit to the Philippians (Phil. 4:17). Righteousness is the fruit of God's discipline (Heb. 12:11) or the fruit that God gives to those who seek wisdom (Jms. 3:18). Christ's death is the precondition of a rich harvest in Jn. 12:24.

ákarpos. This word, meaning "unfruitful" (cf. Jer. 2:6), is always figurative in the NT except in Jude 12. Christians are to translate their commitment into righteousness; hence they must not be unfruitful at the judgment (Tit. 3:14; 2 Pet. 1:8). Bad works are unfruitful since they bring no salvation (Eph. 5:11). The noús is unfruitful in tongue-speaking (1 Cor. 14:14), and the word itself may be unfruitful when it falls among thorns (Mt. 13:22). In Jude 12 the false teachers are compared to fruitless trees.

karpophoréō. This word, meaning "to bear fruit," has the literal sense in the parable in Mk. 4:26ff., but elsewhere the use is figurative. Those who accept the word bear fruit in Mk. 4:20. Works are the fruit of the righteous in Col. 1:10 (cf. Rom. 7:4 in contrast to 7:5). The word of gospel truth bears fruit in the Colossians and throughout the world (Col. 1:6). [F. HAUCK, III, 614-16]

karteréō [to be strong, endure], proskarteréō [to persist, hold fast], proskartérēsis [perseverance]

karteréō. This word has the two senses a. "to be strong" and b. "to endure steadfastly." It has the meaning "to endure" in the LXX in Job 2:9 and Is. 42:14 ("to cry out" in Hebrew). It also has this sense in 4 Macc. 9:9, 28; 10:1, etc. in connection with martyrdom. It means "to persevere" in 2 Macc. 7:17.

The only NT instance is in Heb. 11:27, where Moses, having left Egypt, endures by the faith that reaches to him who is invisible but efficacious. This faith in the invisible God is the presupposition of NT faith in the God who has revealed and given himself in Jesus Christ.

proskarteréō. This word finds two uses: 1. with persons "to be devoted to," and 2. with objects a. "to focus on," b. "to hold fast to," and c. "to be in continually." In the LXX it is a stronger form of karteréō in Num. 13:20. In the NT sense 2.c. occurs in Mk. 3:9 ("to be continually ready") and Acts 2:4, and sense 2.a. in Rom. 13:6, where the authorities focus constantly on their divinely given task. An instance of sense 1. may be found in Acts 10:7 (the loyal soldier; cf. also Acts 8:13, where Simon Magus attaches himself to Philip). Sense 2.b. is theologically significant in Acts 1:14, where the disciples hold on in prayer. This persistent praying precedes the choice of a replacement for Judas in 1:15ff. Jesus himself prays similarly,

---

cf. confer, compare

i.e. id est, that is

NT New Testament

e.g., when in nightlong prayer he brings his decisions before God. He directs his disciples to pray in this way (Lk. 11:1ff.) and to persist in prayer (Lk. 18:1ff.), not just observing set times, but enjoying continuing fellowship with God in the obedience and confidence of children. The apostles accept this as part of their primary task in Acts 6:4, and the community as a whole devotes itself to teaching, fellowship, breaking of bread, and prayer in Acts 2:42. Apostolic exhortations to persistence in prayer occur in Rom. 12:12 and Col. 4:2. In proskartereín, then, we find expressed one important aspect of the vitality and power of the NT church.

proskartérēsis. This word occurs only in Eph. 6:18. Perseverance in prayer and intercession is part of the spiritual warfare. Prayer, which has its roots deep in the life and power of God, knits the church together with a firm bond. It is not just a pious discipline but serious work which demands persistence. [W. GRUNDMANN, III, 617-20]

katabaíno → baínō

katabolḗ [foundation, beginning]

1. This word, which means "laying down," is used for, e.g., the casting of seed, human begetting, the sowing of war, and the establishment of government. In the NT the word means "foundation" of the world, either to denote time (Mt. 13:35; Lk. 11:50), or, more often, to denote the eternity of God's plan of salvation (Mt. 25:34; Rev. 13:8). With pró it is used for God's pretemporal love of the Son (Jn. 17:24), election of the Son (1 Pet. 1:20), and election of believers (Eph. 1:4). This concept is found in the rabbis.

2. A second meaning in Heb. 11:11 relates to the sexual function of the male. The verse might refer to Sarah, but the context, especially v. 12, suggests that Abraham is the subject and that kaí autḗ Sárra is due to textual corruption. [F. HAUCK, III, 620-21]

katangeleús, katangéllō→ angelía; katageláō → geláō; katagōnízomai → agṓn

katadizkázō [to condemn], katadíkē [condemnation, punishment] katadikázō.

A. Outside the NT.

1. In the active this verb means "to condemn," either in the absolute or with person (genitive or accusative) and object (accusative or dative), with the ground of condemnation in the genitive.

2. In the passive katadikastheís is common. The meaning in the passive is judicial condemnation, judgment by default, or losing a case.

3. In the middle the plaintiff achieves condemnation of an opponent, or wins a case (cf. Ps. 94:21).

B. In the NT. Except in Mt. 12:7 the use is always in the absolute in the NT. The ek in Mt. 12:37 gives the ground or proof. In Lk. 6:37 the opposite is apolýein, "to acquit." Jms. 5:6 complains of the hard-hearted rich who secure the condemnation of the innocent poor by an abuse of justice.

katadíkē. 1. "Condemnation," a. in the judicial sense (to exile, crucifixion, etc.), and b. in the moral sense (Philo On the Special Laws 3.116).

---

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

v. verse

2. “Punishment,” a. financial, and b. of the dead, in fanciful depictions. The only NT use is in Acts 25:15: Festus tells Agrippa that the chief priests and elders at Jerusalem want Paul’s condemnation. [G. SCHRENK, III, 621-23]

katadoulóō* → doúlos; katáthema, katathematízō → anatíthēmi; kataischýnō → aischýnō; katakaucháomai → kaucháomai; kataklēronoméō → klḗros; katákrima, katakrínō, katákrisis → krínō; katakyrieúō → kýrios; katalaléō, -lalía, -lalos → laléō; katalambánō → lambánō; kataleípō, katáleimma → leípō; katalitházō → litházō; katalýō, katályma → lýō; katamanthánō → manthánō; katamartyréō → *martyréō

katantáō [to arrive at], hypantáō [to come to meet], hypántēsis [coming to meet] katantáō. This word, which means literally “to come down to a meeting,” usually has the sense “to reach a goal” (with eis), which may be set or ordained. It occurs in the NT only in Acts and Paul. In Acts 26:7 the twelve tribes hope to attain to the promise, though for all their zeal they do not achieve true knowledge (Rom. 10:2). Paul in Phil. 3:11 shares Christ’s sufferings, and therefore the likeness of his death, with resurrection as the goal. In Eph. 4:11 the goal of the community is unity of faith and of knowledge of God’s Son. Here again God has set the goal, and likeness to Christ in his unity is its content. As in Acts 26 and Phil. 3, the goal is eschatological, but it also poses a task for the ministry of the word. Linked with unity are maturity, totality, and perfection. Individuals have a share in this with the community. A slightly different use occurs in 1 Cor. 10:11, where Paul says that the end of the old aeon and the dawn of the new have come upon us. Here again, however, we have God’s action with a teleological and eschatological implication. In 1 Cor. 14:36 Paul reminds the Corinthians that God’s word did not start with them nor are they the only ones that it reached. They should thus pay attention to what other churches do, and test their own practices accordingly.

hypantáō, hypántēsis. The idea behind these words is that of “encounter.” Thus we find “come out to meet” in Mt. 8:34; 25:1; Jn. 12:13, and “meet” in Mt. 8:28; Mk. 5:2; Lk. 8:27; Jn. 4:51, etc. A hostile encounter is in view in Lk. 14:31. → apántēsis [O. MICHEL, III, 623-26]

katanýssō [to pierce], katányxis [spirit of stupor]

The noun occurs in the NT only in Rom. 11:8 (quoting Is. 29:10). The hardening of Israel (apart from the elect) is God’s work; he gave them a spirit of stupefaction. The related verb occurs in Acts 2:37 (based on Ps. 109:16) in the sense of “pierced to the heart.” [H. GREEVEN, III, 626]

kataxióō* → áxios; katapatéō → *patéō

katapaúō [to stop, rest], katápausis [rest, resting place]

katapaúō . This word means “to cause to cease” with the nuances a. “to end” (actions or conditions), b. “to restrain” (persons), also “to dismiss,” “to kill,” c. “to give rest” (i.e., cause suffering to cease), usually with God as subject in the LXX, and d. “to rest” (cf. Ex. 20:11). In the NT we find b. in Acts 14:18. Heb. 4 relates Joshua’s bringing the people to rest (c. in v. 8) and God’s resting (d. in v. 4). The OT is thus seen to point beyond itself; in a true fulfilment God will bring a rest that properly corresponds to his own rest. Those who have a share in Christ today are summoned to persist with a view to this final goal (3:14).

OT Old Testament

katápausis. This word, meaning “resting” (active) or “rest” (passive), is common in the LXX for God’s rest Is. 66:1), the people’s rest (1 Kgs. 8:56), or the sabbath rest (Ex. 35:2 etc.). In Acts 7:49 (based on Is. 66:1) it denotes God’s rest, i.e., the place where he fixes his presence. In Heb. 3-4 (cf. Ps. 95:11), the reference is to the rest (or resting place) that God gives to his people. As the OT promise points beyond Moses to Christ, so the rest of God in Gen. 2:2 points beyond Joshua and David (4:7-8) to the final rest to which believers in Christ will attain if they hold fast to their faith. [O. BAUERNFEIND, III, 627-28]

→ anapaúō, anápausis, epanapaúō

katapétasma [curtain]

A. Outside the NT.

1. Literally meaning “that which spreads out downwards,” this word seems to have been used as a technical term for temple curtains. Thick and gaily colored, these curtains covered images that were displayed only at high feasts, and often had symbolical significance.

2. The LXX uses the term similarly for curtains in the tent or temple, e.g., between the holy place and the holiest of all (Ex. 26:31ff. etc.), or between the sanctuary and the forecourt (Ex. 26:37 etc.). The outer curtain has no cultic significance, but the inner one, traditionally depicting the two cherubim, is an important dividing mark. Whether there was a single curtain (Josephus) or a double (Talmud) is debatable.

3. The inner curtain has cultic significance, for it conceals the holiest of all, and only the high priest may pass it on the Day of Atonement, when it, too, is sprinkled with blood.

4. Synagogues probably had curtains from an early period, e.g., in front of the ark of the law, but these were not supposed to copy the temple curtains.

B. In the NT.

1. The temple curtain that was torn on Jesus’ death (Mk. 15:38 and par.) is the inner curtain. Implied is that Jesus opens up access to the holiest of all.

2. Heb. 6:19; 9:3; 10:20 interprets the inner curtain theologically. Jesus has passed through the heavenly curtain which is its prototype. He has done so as a forerunner on our behalf. The curtain is identified as his flesh, which serves as a veil (cf. 2 Cor. 5:16) but which is also the way into the holiest of all. On this basis the Greek Orthodox Church finds a place for the katapétasma in its liturgy. [C. SCHNEIDER, III, 628-30]

katapínō → pínō; katapíptō → píptō; katára, kataráomai → ará; katargéō → argós; katartízō, katártisis, katartismós → ártios; kataskēnóō → skḗnos; kataskopéō, katáskopos → skopéō; katastéllō, katastolḗ → stéllō

katastrēniáō [to grow wanton]

This compound of strēniáō, “to burn,” “to be covetous” (cf. Rev. 18:7, 9), noun strḗnos (“arrogance”; cf. 2 Kgs. 19:28; Rev. 18:3), occurs in the NT only in 1 Tim. 5:11, where the idea is that younger widows may “grow wanton” against Christ and are not, therefore, to be put on the official list. The concept is figurative, as we see from v. 14. No moral condemnation of remarriage is involved, nor is asceticism commended. The point is simply that a conflict may arise between ministry for Christ and the desire to remarry. [C. SCHNEIDER, III, 631]

katasphragízō → sphragís; katatomḗ → témnō

---

par. paragraph

kataphronéō [to despise], _kataphronētḗs_ [scoffer], _periphronéō_ [to despise, disregard] kataphronéō. With genitive, double genitive, accusative, or epí, this verb means “to despise,” “to disparage,” “to treat with disinterest.” The NT warns us against despising God’s goodness (Rom. 2:4), the church (1 Cor. 11:22), little ones (Mt. 18:10), younger leaders (1 Tim. 4:12), and masters (1 Tim. 6:2). Positively, Jesus despises the shame of the cross (Heb. 12:2). Common proverbial use underlies Mt. 6:24. In 2 Pet. 2:10 opponents despise angels, or Christ’s lordship.

kataphronētḗs. Acts 13:41 quotes Hab. 1:5 in a warning to Jewish and proselyte hearers (v. 26) not to be “scoffers” when they hear the gospel of forgiveness through Christ.

periphronéō. Originally meaning “to consider,” then “to dismiss,” “to despise,” this word occurs in the NT only in Tit. 2:15. Titus is to let no one disregard or disparage him. [C. SCHNEIDER, III, 631-33]

katachthónios [under the earth]

katachthónios is common in secular Greek relative to the underworld. In the NT it occurs only in Phil. 2:10 in a phrase denoting, without further specification, the totality of beings (cf. Rev. 5:13). To attempt classification, e.g., by seeing in the katachthónioi the dead who rest in the earth, is to miss the poetical-liturgical nature of the passage. [H. SASSE, III, 633-34]

kateídōlos → _eídōlon_

katergázomai [to overcome, accomplish]

katergázomai means a. “to overcome,” then b. “to work at, make” (also “to prepare, equip”). Its main use in the NT is in Romans and 2 Corinthians, but it is found once each in 1 Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians, and 1 Peter, and twice in James. It has a bad sense in Rom. 1:23; 1 Cor. 5:3 (to do a wrong action) and 2 Cor. 7:10 (to cause death); cf. also Rom. 7:8 (sin works covetousness). But it may also have a good sense, as in Rom. 7:18 (doing good); 5:3 (working endurance); 2 Cor. 7:10 (producing repentance to salvation), etc. In Eph. 6:13 it may refer to preparation for battle or the overcoming of opposition. The ultimate subject of the word in this good sense is God or Christ (cf. Rom. 15:18; 2 Cor. 12:12), for it is he who makes the gift of salvation and fashions us for new and eternal life (2 Cor. 5:5). [G. BERTRAM, III, 634-35]

katéchō → _échō_

katḗgoros [accusing] _katḗgōr_ [accuser], _katēgoréō_ [to accuse], _katēgoría_ [accusation] katḗgoros, katḗgōr. katḗgoros, meaning “speaking against,” “accusing,” is used judicially in the NT in Acts 23:30, 35; 26:16, 18; Rev. 12:10, though this should probably be katḗgōr, “accuser,” i.e., the devil. The devil as katḗgōr occurs in Job 1:6ff.; Zech. 3:1ff., and the idea is common in Judaism. In the NT, see Jn. 12:31 as well as Rev. 12:10. In Rom. 8:33 Paul refers only to accusation.

katēgoréō. This means “to accuse,” or, more broadly, “to betray,” “to make known,” “to declare.” In the NT it has mostly the judicial sense (Mk. 3:2; 15:3, 4; Lk. 23:10; Jn. 5:45; Acts 22:30, etc.). More general accusation is the point in Rom. 2:15. We never find the meaning “to declare” in the NT.

katēgoría. This means judicial “accusation” (also “predicate” in grammar and “category” in logic). In the NT it means “accusation” in Lk. 6:7; Jn. 18:29; 1 Tim. 5:19; Tit. 1:6. [F. BÜSCHEL, III, 636-37]

katēchéō [to instruct]

1. This rare and late word means “to sound from above” (e.g., in address from a stage), then a. “to recount something” and b. “to instruct someone.”

2. In the NT we find a. (“to tell something,” passive “to receive news”) in Acts 21:21, 24 with reference to the false rumor about Paul. Paul himself uses the word in sense b. Thus in Rom. 2:18 the Jew is “instructed” in the law. In 1 Cor. 14:19 Paul prefers to speak five words with the mind so as to “instruct” others. Gal. 6:6 points out that those who are taught should support those who teach. It may be that Paul chooses this rare word (rather than didáskein) so as to stress the distinctive nature of Christian instruction (cf. our present use of “catechism”). In Acts Apollos has been “instructed” in the way of the Lord, i.e., the will of God, with its claim and promise, as manifested by and in Jesus (18:25). In Lk. 1:4 two thoughts are possible: 1. the stories “reported” to you, and 2. the doctrines in which you have been “instructed.” In context 1. seems more likely. Theophilus has received information, and the aim of the author is to confirm its truth.   [H. W. BEYER, III, 638-40]

katióomai → iós; katoikéō, katoikízō, katoikētḗrion, katoikía → oíkos; katischýō → ischýō; katoptrízomai → ésoptron

kátṓ [below, down], katōtérō [under], katṓteros [lower, lowest] katṓ, katōtérō. katō is an adverb denoting “below,” “down” (in the NT cf. Mk. 14:66; Acts 2:19 for “below” and Mt. 4:6; Jn. 8:6; Acts 20:9 for “down”). “Below” denotes the earth as the abode of sinners and “above” heaven as the abode of the holy God (cf. Acts 2:19; Jn. 8:23). katōtérō in Mt. 2:16 means two years old or “under.”

katṓteros. This comparative (or superlative) of kátō occurs in the NT only in the much debated passage Eph. 4:9. The redeemer who has now ascended first descended to “the lower (or lowest) parts” of the earth. This might refer to the realm of the dead (the underworld as the lowest part) or simply to the earth itself. The reference to “above all the heavens” in v. 10 suggests that “under the earth” is in view here, and Christ’s death rather than his incarnation offers a better antithesis to his resurrection and ascension. Ephesians also stresses the saving significance of Christ’s death (1:20; 2:16; 5:2). The idea of leading captives is not so much that he liberates the dead in Hades as that he subdues the spirits that kept us captive (1:21; 2:1ff.). The descent and ascent make possible the imparting of gifts (4:7ff.) for the equipping of the saints to withstand false teachings (4:14), behind which stand the evil forces of 6:12, and for bringing the community to the fullness of Christ (4:13), who by his ascent and descent has traversed the whole cosmos from the place of the dead to the right hand of God.   [F. BÜSCHEL, III, 640-42]

kaúma [burning heat], kaumatízō [to burn (up)]

kaúma. This word means “burning heat,” or, figuratively, “heat of fever” or “fire of love.” In Rev. 16:9 it denotes God’s fierce wrath. In the age of salvation the saints are protected from scorching heat (Rev. 7:16).

kaumatízō. This word means “to wither up” (figuratively “to suffer from fever”). In Rev. 16:8-9 God’s anger burns up sinners like fire or fierce heat.   [J. SCHNEIDER, III, 642-43]

kaúsis [burning], kaúsōn [heat], kausóomai [to burn up], kaustēriázomai [to brand] kaúsis. This word, meaning "burning," "consuming," occurs in the NT only in Heb. 6:8. The unfruitful earth will finally be given up to burning; similarly, apostate believers will fall victim to the fire of divine wrath.

kaúsōn. This word might mean either "heat" or "hot wind" (LXX). "Heat" is the sense in Mt. 20:12; Lk. 12:55. "Hot wind" is possible, but not so likely, in Jms. 1:11.

kausóomai. Meaning "to suffer from heat (or fever)," this word is used apocalyptically in 2 Pet. 3:10, 12 for the dissolving of the elements with fire in a final conflagration.

kaustēriázomai. This rare term, which means "to burn with glowing iron," occurs figuratively in 1 Tim. 4:2, where false teachers are said to have "branded" consciences. The thought seems to be that they are the slaves of demonic forces. Runaway slaves and criminals were branded in antiquity; also sometimes prisoners of war, workers in the mines and munitions, and army recruits. This practice underlies the metaphor. [J. SCHNEIDER, III, 643-45] kaucháomai [to boast], kaúchēma [boast], kaúchēsis [boasting], enkaucháomai [to boast], katakaucháomai [to boast against] kaucháomai, kaúchēma, kaúchēsis.

A. Greek Usage. The meaning of this group is "to boast," "boasting," usually in a bad sense, so that we find warnings against it in the philosophers and satirists.

B. The OT, LXX, and Judaism.

1. The LXX uses the group for various Hebrew terms for self-glorying. While the OT finds a place for justifiable pride (Prov. 16:31; 17:6), there are many proverbs against boasting (1 Kgs. 20:11; Prov. 25:14). It is the basic attitude of fools and the ungodly (Pss. 52:1; 74:4). To boast of wealth is to trust in it (Ps. 49:6). There can be no boasting before God (Judg. 7:2). Yet one may glory in the knowledge of God (Jer. 9:23-24). God deals with Israel to his own glory (Dt. 26:19). Thus the righteous may boast of his help (Ps. 5:11). To boast in this sense is equivalent to "to rejoice" and it has eschatological significance, since it will finally be actualized in the last time (Zech. 10:12). This glorying goes hand in hand with looking away from self and confident confession of God.

2. Judaism maintains the same tension between false boasting and true boasting, but with a tendency to stress the law as a reason for true boasting (Sir. 39:8).

3. The rabbis find a source of boasting in the law, or even in its fulfilment, but they emphasize that the law must not be observed in self-interest, warn against pride, and find in righteous suffering, too, an occasion for boasting.

4. For Philo self-glorying is wrong because in it we do not acknowledge God as the Giver of all good but forget him and usurp his glory. The righteous, by humbly submitting to divine grace, stand high with God and thus achieve true glory.

C. The NT and Early Christianity.

1. Paul.

a. The Basic Christian Attitude. Paul, who almost exclusively uses the group in the NT, opposes to self-assured boasting the appropriate attitude of faith which is made possible and demanded by Christ. Faith precludes boasting (Rom. 3:27); Abraham, the father of faith, has nothing to boast about before God (4:2). The valid boasting of Judaism has become a false boasting in the law (2:17, 23). Our only legitimate boasting is in Christ (5:11), who has negated all the greatness of both Jews and Gentiles (1 Cor. 1: 18ff.). Believers, boasting in Christ alone (Phil. 3:3), have left off all self-boasting (3:7ff.). They glory only in the cross (Gal. 6:14). On this basis, by God's grace, they may stand before God, yet only as recipients of the divine gift (1 Cor. 3:21; 4:7). Paradoxically, then, believers may glory in their sufferings, not because they are ascetic achievements, but because the power of God is manifested in them (2 Cor. 11:23ff.; 12:9; 4:10-11), so that, rejoicing in them, they rejoice also in the hope of God's glory (Rom. 5:2).

b. Apostolic Self-Boasting. Rejection of self-boasting does not exclude for Paul a valid boasting in his apostolic work (2 Cor. 7:4, 14 etc.), partly because this expresses trust in the churches, but chiefly because what he does rests on what Christ does through him (Rom. 15:17-18; 1 Cor. 15:10). Thus the work depends on grace rather than merit, and the boasting is only within the assigned limits of the work (2 Cor. 10:13) and is not by comparison with the work of others (10:12ff.). Paul can commend himself only because God commends him, and he measures himself only by his own commission (2:14-7:4). We are not even to measure ourselves against unbelieving Israel (Rom. 11: 18ff.) but to boast only on the basis of self-scrutiny (Gal. 6:4). Boasting will then be an occasion for thanksgiving and joy, since it will be acknowledgment of God's grace. In this sense Paul finds his glory in the churches (1 Th. 2:19-20). Indeed, he himself should be the boast of these churches (2 Cor. 1:14), for his work strengthens their faith and they thus have greater cause to glory in Christ (Phil. 1:26). The fact that all is by grace explains why it is that for Paul refusal of the right to support is paradoxically an occasion for boasting (1 Cor. 9:15-16); this right has no basis in human achievement. At the same time, Corinthian resistance to Paul's valid authority as an apostle forces him into self-boasting, not in his own cause, but in Christ's (2 Cor. 10:8ff.). He recognizes that this is foolish (11:16), and when he has listed all his natural advantages (11:22), he switches quickly to a listing of his sufferings (11:23ff.). If he goes on to speak of visions and revelations (12:1ff.), he does not pursue this theme. Instead, he returns at once to the theme of weakness (12:5ff.). He finally closes the discussion with the statement that, while he is not in fact inferior to others, this is all folly, for in himself he is nothing (12:11).

2. Early Christianity after Paul. The basic theme of Paul occurs briefly also in Eph. 2:8-9 and 2 Th. 1:4. Boasting in God may be seen in Heb. 3:6. Jms. 1:9 expresses the OT theme that the lowly should boast in their exaltation by God, while the rich should boast in their humiliation, trusting in God alone (cf. 4:13ff.). In later writings outside the NT, 1 Clement warns against boasting and admonishes to humility (13.1; 21.5), Hermas lists boasting as a vice in Mandates 8.3, Ignatius follows Paul in Ephesians 18.1 and Trallians 4.1, and Jesus is a model in Justin Dialogue 101.1. The valid boasting of the righteous in God comes to expression in 1 Clem. 34.5.

enkaucháomai. This word, sparsely attested, means the same as kauchásthai (2 Th. 1:4; cf. 1 Clem. 21.5).

katakaucháomai. This word expresses the element of comparative superiority in boasting (cf. Rom. 11:18; Jms. 2:13 [figurative]; Jms. 3:14). The context shows with whom there is comparison (unbelieving Jews in Rom. 11:18, judgment in Jms. 2:13). [R. BULTMANN, III, 645-54]

keímai [to lie], anákeimai [to rest on], synanákeimai [to recline at table with], antíkeimai [to confront], apókeimai [to be laid up], epíkeimai [to lie on], katákeimai [to lie down], parákeimai [to lie ready], períkeimai [to lie around], prókeimai [to lie in front of] keímai. This word means "to lie" with reference to either the fact or the result, and may be figurative as well as spatial. In the NT it is usually spatial, "to lie" or "to be laid or set" (Lk. 2:12, 16; Mt. 5:14; 28:6; Rev. 4:2), but may also be figurative, "to be appointed" (Lk. 2:34), "to be laid down" (1 Tim. 1:9), "to lie in" (1 Jn. 5:19).

aná-, synanákeimai. This verb means "to be laid up" (votive offerings), "to rest on," "to recline (at table)." In the NT it has the third sense (Mk. 14:18; Mt. 9:10; 22:10-11; Lk. 22:27; Jn. 6:11). In antiquity people reclined to eat, resting on the left side (though women, children, and slaves ate standing or in other ways). Reclining at the Passover symbolizes the freedom achieved at the exodus.

antíkeimai. From “to confront,” this word takes the sense “to be opposed,” as in Gal. 5:17; 1 Tim. 1:10. ho antikeímenos is “the adversary” (Lk. 13:17; 1 Cor. 16:9; Phil. 1:28).

apókeimai. This word, which has such varied senses as “to be laid up,” “to come upon,” and “to be despised,” means “to be laid aside or up” in Lk. 19:20; Col. 1:5; 2 Tim. 4:8, “to be appointed for” in Heb. 9:27. In the last three references what is expressed is the certainty of the divinely ordained future.

epíkeimai. In the NT this word means “to lie on” in Jn. 11:38, “to beat upon” in Acts 27:20, “to throng” in Lk. 5:1, and “to be imposed” in Heb. 9:10; 1 Cor. 9:16.

katákeimai. This compound means “to lie down” (e.g., in sickness, at sleep, or at meals); cf. Mk. 1:30; 2:4; Jn. 5:3, 6; Acts 9:33 (the sick), Mk. 2:15; 1 Cor. 8:10 (at table).

parákeimai. The only use of this word in the NT is in Rom. 7:18, 21: “to lie ready, at hand.”

períkeimai. This word, meaning “to lie around” (passive “to have around”), is used for the millstone in Mk. 9:42, Paul’s chain in Acts 28:20, and figuratively weakness in Heb. 5:2 (cf. also 12:1).

prókeimai. This word means “to be displayed” in Jude 7 and “to be before one” in Heb. 12:2 (the appointed joy) and 6:18 (the promised hope). [F. BÜSCHEL, III, 654-56]

kéleusma [cry of command]

With a basic sense of “what is impelled,” kéleusma has such meanings as “command,” “summons,” “cry of encouragement,” and “cry.” In ordinary speech it tends to be replaced by kéleusis, which becomes a technical term for a government decree. It is used in the NT only in 1 Th. 4:16 for the shout of command, though it is not clear who gives this or what is its relation to the archangel’s call. The command, the call, and the trumpet sound seem to relate primarily to the awakening of the dead, but they also intimate the end in a general sense (cf. 1 Cor. 15:52). The “first” and “then” of vv. 16-17 have qualitative rather than chronological significance; the goal is that all believers should be with the Lord. [L. SCHMID, III, 656-59] kenós [empty], kenóō [to make empty], kenódoxos [boaster], kenodoxía [conceit, delusion] kenós.

A. Outside the NT.

1. Literally the meaning is “empty”—usually things, but also persons.

2. Figuratively the reference is to vain or frivolous persons or futile things, e.g., opinions, boastings, speech, and cf. the expression eis kenón, “in vain.”

B. In the NT.

1. The literal sense occurs in Mk. 12:3; Lk. 1:53; 20:10-11. In Lk. 1:53 (cf. 1 Sam. 2:7-8) we have the thought of the great reversal when the rich go away empty (cf. Mt. 5:3ff.).

2. Jms. 2:20 has the figurative sense for persons: an “empty” or “foolish” person. Mostly, however, the NT uses the word figuratively for things, e.g., empty words in Eph. 5:6 (cf. Jms. 4:5), empty deceit in Col. 2:8, futile grace in 1 Cor. 15:10, futile work in 1 Cor. 15:58. In saying that neither grace nor our service is in vain, Paul expresses a strong sense of confidence in God’s gift and of the resultant responsibility this imposes on us. His visit (1 Th. 2:1) was not “in vain” both because there was no guile or self-seeking in it and because it was successful in the power of God at work in it (1:5-6). In contrast, his preaching would be kenós, i.e., without content and also ineffective, if Christ were not risen (1 Cor. 15:14).

---

vv. verses

kenóō. This word means "to make empty" (passive "to be desolate") and "to nullify" (passive "to come to nothing"). The first sense occurs in the NT only in Phil. 2:6-7 (of Christ). This can hardly mean that Christ negated himself, nor is it suggested that he aspires beyond his existing state. The point, then, is that Christ does not selfishly exploit his divine form but lays it aside to take the form of a servant. The preexistent Lord is the subject. He remains himself, but changes his mode of being (cf. 2 Cor. 8:9). For the second sense, we turn to 1 Cor. 9:15 and 2 Cor. 9:3. Paul would rather die than allow anyone (by supporting him) to nullify his ground of boasting, and he presses the collection lest his boasting about the Corinthians come to nothing. In Rom. 4:14 inheritance by the law would invalidate faith. Similarly, in 1 Cor. 1:17 a synthesis of content and brilliance of technique would rob the cross of its force, i.e., of its saving content, its consequent offense, and its related divine efficacy.

kenódoxos. This word means "one who talks big," "boaster," as in Gal. 5:26.

kenodoxía. This word has the two senses a. "delusion," and b. "conceit." Only b. occurs in the NT (Phil. 2:3), though we find both in the apostolic fathers (a. in Hermas Similitudes 8.9.3, and b. in Hermas Mandates 8.5). [A. OEPKE, III, 659-62]

kéntron [goad, sting]

A. Outside the NT. With the basic sense of "something that pierces," this word is used 1. for animal claws, 2. for such human instruments as spurs, goads, scourges, or nails, 3. figuratively for torments or incitements, 4. for authority (cf. the common expression "to kick against the goads"), and 5. mathematically for the point of a compass or the center of a circle. The LXX uses the term for goad (e.g., Prov. 26:3). Philo compares God to a charioteer with rein and whip, but he also uses the term for center (the earth as the center of the cosmos). Josephus refers to the kéntron of passion (cf. Antiquities 7. 169) (Amnon for Tamar) or attraction (cf. Jewish War 2.385).

B. In the NT.

1. In Acts 26:14, in Paul's conversion story, Christ tells Paul that it hurts him to kick against the goads. Although the idea of the goad for oxen is common in the Jewish world, Paul (or Luke) seems to be adopting the Greek proverb here; this is most suitable in an address to the Hellenist Agrippa. It is hardly possible to prove a direct quotation (by Luke) from Euripides, who has the saying (with the plural goads) in a similar situation. In any case, the proverb (also in the plural) is a stock quotation by the first century A.D.

2. In 1 Cor. 15:55ff. Paul quotes Is. 25:8 and Hos. 13:14, and then adds that the kéntron of death is sin. The idea here is not so much that death is a tyrant with a goad, or a soldier with a lance or arrow, or a beast with a poison tip, but rather that it is like an insect with its sting. When sin, on which its power rests, is vanquished by Christ, the sting is withdrawn and death becomes impotent.

3. In Rev. 9:10 the locust-scorpions that arise from the abyss when the fifth trumpet sounds have poisonous stings in their tails with which they torment those who do not have God's seal. [L. SCHMID, III, 663-68]

kéras [horn]

A. The Horn outside the NT. This word, used for animal horns, is also a symbol of divine or human strength. In the OT it depicts God's power in a prophetic action (1 Kgs. 22:11) and is also a direct term for power (Zech. 2:1 ff.). A common OT metaphor is that of exalting or destroying a horn, which is God's prerogative, not ours (cf. Ps. 75:4-5). In later Judaism we read of the growing of horns on lambs to denote their increasing power, and the Messiah is a white bullock with big, black horns. The horns of the altar (Ex. 27:2) are its hornlike corners (cf. Rev. 9:13).

B. The Horn in the NT.

1. Lk. 1:69 uses OT terminology when it speaks of God raising up a horn of salvation (cf. Ps. 18:2). God is here the Lord of history putting forth his power to help and bless through his Messiah ("in the house of his servant David").

2. The horn is an important symbol in Revelation. The second beast in 13:11 has two horns like a lamb but speaks like a dragon (cf. wolves in sheep's clothing). The seven horns of the Lamb express the divine plenitude of his power. The ten horns of the dragon and the beast (cf. 12:3; 13:1, etc.) are ten future kings (cf. Dan. 7:7, 24). Some commentators have seen in these kings Parthian satraps who would support the returning Nero in his attack on Rome. Others have suggested a list of Roman emperors, and yet others demonic powers. It is to be noted that these are kings of the whole earth (16:14, 16) and that they do not war against Babylon (Rome?) but against the Lamb in a final open battle. The serpent with ten horns is Satan, who uses the amassed power of the race in the last struggle. [W. FOERSTER, III, 669-71]

kérdos [gain], kerdaínō [to gain, save] kérdos means "gain," "advantage," "profit," with the desire for it as a derived sense, also crafty counsels in the plural. kerdaínō is "to procure gain, advantage, or profit," but more generally "to win something" or "to save oneself something." Neither word occurs in the LXX. In the NT Tit. 1:11 refers to those who give false teaching for "gain" (in the bad sense). In Phil. 1:21 Paul reckons that it will be "gain" to die and be with Christ. In contrast, he reckons the "advantages" of his pre-Christian life to be loss for Christ's sake (Phil. 3:7). The verb means "to get profit" in Jms. 4:13, "to spare oneself something" in Acts 27:21, and "to win something" in Mt. 25:16-17 (more talents) and Phil. 3:8 (Christ). In 1 Cor. 9:19ff. it has the sense "to win" (for Christ) (cf. 9:22: "to save"). A parallel is winning the erring brother in Mt. 18:15. In Mt. 16:26 winning the cosmos might just conceivably mean winning humanity by missionary endeavor, but the more obvious sense is winning dominion over the world as the sphere of earthly power, resources, and possibilities. [H. SCHLIER, III, 672-73]

kephalḗ [head], anakephalaióomai [to sum up]

A. kephalḗ outside the NT.

1. Denoting what is first, supreme, or extreme, kephalḗ is used for the human or animal "head" but also for a "point," "tip," or "end," e.g., prow of a ship, top of a wall, mouth of a river (or source), start of an era, point of departure. A further sense then develops, what is "prominent" or "outstanding," and in yet another development the kephalḗ denotes the "whole person," e.g., in such phrases as phílē kephalḗ or megálē kephalḗ (dear or great person).

2. The LXX adopts the Greek usage for "head" and "point" or "top," along with the sense of the whole "person," but also adds a new meaning: the "head" or "ruler" of a society (cf. Dt. 28:13; Is. 9:13-14). Comparison of the people with the body lies in the background in Is. 1:4ff. (cf. 7:20).

3. Judaism sometimes follows this usage in Dt. 28:13. We also find such phrases as "head of the priesthood" or "of the world's idolaters," and Adam is called the "head of all created things."

4. In Hellenistic and Gnostic circles the word acquires a special sense in connection with the aeon and the primal man. The cosmic aeon embraces the totality of all things in its head and body. In Gnosticism the divine aeon becomes primal man embracing the substance of the cosmos, but also redeemer man embracing the remaining substance of a fallen world. Primal man, who bears the cosmos, recovers from the fall as redeemer man, who gathers the cosmos to himself. In this scheme the kephalḗ is both apart from (and superior to) the body but also in unity with it. Elements of this view may be seen in Philo's commentary on Exodus, where the lógos is the kephalḗ which rules the cosmos and in which the cosmos finds its fullness. Gnostic texts are more complicated but in various combinations contain the idea of the primal man and/or the redeemer as the kephalḗ (sometimes equated with Christ).

B. kephalḗ in the NT.

1. The term often means here the human or animal "head" with no theological significance (cf. the head of Jesus in Mt. 8:20; Lk. 9:58), and especially in the passion narrative (Mt. 26:7; 27:30, 37; Mk. 15:19; Jn. 19:2, 30; 20:7, 12); the head of the risen Lord (Rev. 14:14; 19:12).

2. In 1 Cor. 11:3, Christ is the head of man, man of woman, and God of Christ. Hence man should not cover his head, since he is the image and glory of God, but woman should do so, since she is the glory of man. The distinction between man and woman is seen here to have an ontological ground, for while man is God's reflection directly, woman is so only indirectly, having her life from man and for man. It is by reason of this basic distinction that charismatically gifted women should cover the kephalḗ when praying or prophesying. Not to do so is to offend against the head in the twofold sense; the long hair that phýsis gives women for a covering is an indication of this.

3. a. In Eph. 1:22-23; 4:15-16; 5:23; Col. 1:18; 2:10, 19 Christ is the head of the church, which as his body grows up into him to form the new and perfect man. In a distinctive application of primal man-redeemer thinking, the stress here is on the unity of Christ and his church. He, as the heavenly head, is present in earthly form in the church, while the church, as his body, is present in heavenly form in Christ. As head Christ directs the church's growth to himself and to its fulfilment in him. He is its archḗ or principle (Col. 1:18). He is also its goal (Eph. 2:15). This goal is attained in faith and knowledge, and consequently in subjection to the head (Eph. 5:23-24).

b. As head of the church, Christ is also before all things and hence the head of creation as well (Col. 1: 15ff.; 2:20). The first man is at work in the redeemer, displaying the body of creation in the body of the church. Things cohere only in him. The gospel, then, discloses the mystery hidden before time inasmuch as God's wisdom in creation (i.e., Christ) is made known through the church. In the plḗrōma of the church which is his body Christ draws all things into the plḗrōma. Christ is the Lord of the world, and as the risen Lord he takes control over it through the church, which is thus relevant to all things.

anakephalaióomai. This rare term means "to bring to a kephalḗ," "to sum up," or "to divide into the main portions." Other nuances are "to bring to a conclusion" and "to recapitulate." In the one NT use in Eph. 1:10 the context suggests that there is a definitive, comprehensive, and recapitulatory summation of the totality of things as the church receives it head. In Christ, this head, the totality is comprehended afresh as its sum. [H. SCHLIER, III, 673-82] kḗryx [herald, preacher], (hierokḗryx [temple herald]), kērýssō [to announce, proclaim], kḗrygma [proclamation], prokērýssō [to proclaim publicly or beforehand] kḗryx (hierokḗryx).

A. The kḗryx in the Greek World.

1. The Dignity and Social Position of the Herald. The herald has a high place in Greek antiquity; he belongs to the court, carries a sceptre, and is renowned for cleverness and wisdom. Yet he also performs menial tasks and runs very ordinary errands. Later there are heralds of mysteries, games, festivals, and markets. As state officials heralds come to be poorly regarded but still render important services, belong to the higher classes, and are often given high honors and rewards.

2. The Qualities Demanded of a Herald. A strong and resonant voice is the basic requirement, since the herald has to issue summons, keep the peace, and make announcements. The games include contests to test the strength and diction of heralds. To restrict garrulity and exaggeration, it is important that heralds deliver news or pass on messages strictly as these are given to them. In negotiations they seldom act on their own initiative but simply deliver short messages, put a few questions, and report back for further instructions. In the assembly or in court they act only as the voice of the chairman or president.

3. The Religious Significance of the Herald.

a. His Inviolability on Diplomatic Missions. Since politics and religion are inseparable for the Greeks, heralds on foreign missions are regarded as under the protection not only of their country but also of the gods. To violate them is to bring down divine wrath. Even if their message is unwelcome, they must be hospitably received. They have a special sanctity which enables them to speak without fear or favor. For this reason they often accompany envoys. Even in war they may go to the enemy camp to open up negotiations for peace. Similarly, they may go to an enemy capital to declare war.

b. His Participation in Cultic Life. Heralds offer prayers at the opening of assemblies or the mustering of the army. They invoke divine blessing on their cities and cursing on traitors and public offenders. They also have a part in preparations for sacrifices and lead in prayer at the actual sacrifices. They have a part, too, in the religious act of making treaties. Their intimation of festivals and games may also have a cultic aspect, and some heralds are specifically employed by cultic societies (cf. their role in the Eleusinian mysteries, in which they issue the call to worship, lead in prayer, help in the sacrifices, and make important announcements).

4. The Herald of the Gods. While all heralds stand under the protection of the gods, the gods have their own special heralds. Hermes is the herald-god who plays the herald role in the divine assemblies. Birds are also at times heralds of the gods. So, too, are Stoic philosophers, who, according to Epictetus, go through the world in simple style with the task of presenting divine teaching with its truth and claim, bringing a higher peace than even the emperor can grant, but also issuing a call for decision, chiding error, and summoning to emulation. Formally one sees a close parallel here to the work of early Christian missionaries. A primary distinction is that the Stoic sees himself as a katáskopos, an inspector of people who declares his message on the basis of his observations. The Stoic starting point, then, is human need or wickedness, whereas the Christian starting point is God’s gracious presence in Christ. This points to the fundamental difference, namely, between the god whose heralds the Stoics are and the Father of Christ whose message the apostles declare. The message itself differs in consequence, for while the Stoics have high ideals, they can finally hope only to quicken a slumbering seed of morality, whereas the gospel ushers in the new age of the kingdom which involves radical conversion and renewal. Philosophical heralds proclaim human development and divinization, apostolic messengers the incarnation, the forgiveness of sins, and the gift of eternal life.

B. The Herald and the Jewish World.

1. Josephus and Philo. The use in Josephus seems mainly to be in connection with war and diplomacy; Philo avoids the term.

2. The LXX. kḗryx occurs only four times in the LXX. In Gen. 41:43 there is no Hebrew original. In Dan. 3:4 Nebuchadnezzar’s herald commands the people to worship. The use in 4 Macc. 6:4 is similar (the herald of Antiochus). Sir. 20:15 has the word in a comparison. That there is no true equivalent shows that the idea is an alien one.

3. The Rabbis. In the rabbis, however, the herald is again prominent with the adoption of the loanword kārôz. The origin of this term is disputed (Greek? Persian?), but it finds frequent and varied use for town criers, court heralds, temple criers to awaken the priests, the announcers of rabbinic judgments, and God's angelic or human heralds (e.g., Noah in the generation of the flood).

C. The kḗryx in the NT. The herald is strangely unimportant in the NT. There are only three instances of the term. Noah is a herald of righteousness in 2 Pet. 2:5 (cf. 1 Clem. 7.6; 9.4), and Paul is a herald and apostle (and teacher) in 1 Tim. 2:7 and 2 Tim. 1:11. (Some texts also have the word in Col. 1:23.) Since the word might seem to be so suitable for the NT preacher, this paucity of use is surely intentional. There are perhaps two main reasons for it. First, the focus of the NT is on the message rather than the messenger, or on God himself as the real messenger. Second, the Greek concept is too precisely defined; NT preachers are not sacral personages who can claim inviolability. Rather, they are like sheep among wolves (Mt. 10:16), will be persecuted as their Master was (Jn. 15:20), and are as it were dedicated to death (Rev. 12:11). Yet this does not prevent the message from taking its irresistible and victorious course through the world (2 Tim. 2:9; 2 Th. 3:1). The stress, then, falls on the verb kerýssō, not the noun kḗryx.

kērýssō.

A. kērýssō in the Greek World.

1. Shades of Meaning and Synonyms. The verb is a much less significant word in Greek than the noun. It means "to cry out loud, declare, announce." It may carry such nuances as "to offer, order, forbid, ask," and commercially "to offer for sale, auction." A general sense is "to make known," though specifically it may also mean "to herald."

2. kērýssō in Passages of Religious Significance.

a. A first religious use is for announcements relative to games and feasts, e.g., in proclaiming contests, announcing winners, conferring honors.

b. Another use is in aretalogies for declaring the works of deity by divine instruction and, in spite of hesitation, by divine constraint.

c. In the Hermetic writings we find close parallels to the NT in the concept of prophetic proclamation. The message, however, is not that of forgiveness and liberation from sin, but of liberation from the body and divinization. Nor is there any declaration of God's rule and act; the proclamation is instruction in what to do, and exhortation to do it, in order to move from error to knowledge.

B. kērýssō in the OT. In the Greek OT the word occurs 33 times for various Hebrew equivalents. It may have the general sense "to cry" but also denotes proclamation, either by a herald (Gen. 41:43) or in a more general sense (Ex. 36:6; 2 Chr. 24:9). The proclamation may even be in writing (2 Chr. 36:22). Only rarely does kērýssō describe the work of prophets, e.g., false prophets in Mic. 3:5, Jonah in 1:2; 3:2, and Jeremiah in 20:8. Is. 61:1 refers to the proclamation of liberty to the captives in an efficacious, eschatological event (fulfilled by Jesus in Lk. 4:21). In Hos 5:8 the sense is to "sound the alarm" in face of the approaching enemy. This is also the point in Joel 2:1, except that now it is the day of the Lord that is imminent. In Joel 3:9, however, we have a summons to arms, while in Zeph. 3:14 and Zech. 9:9 the call is to exultation because the salvation of God has come. In the OT kērýssō never has the prominent place it has in the NT.

C. krz in the Rabbis. In rabbinic writings we find four main uses of krz: to clear the way for an important person, to give legal findings validity by proclamation, to make cultic intimations, and (with God as subject) to reveal, either directly or through Scripture.

D. kērýssō in the NT.

1. kērýssō and Other Words for Proclamation. The NT uses many words for the proclaiming of the Christian message, e.g., légein, laleín, martyreín, didáskein. It is a mistake simply to render such terms, and kērýssein itself, by "to preach." Fundamentally kērýssein is the declaration of an event. Except in Rev. 5:2 we do not find it in the Johannine writings, which prefer martyreín, nor in Hebrews. It occurs 61 times in the NT (nine in Matthew, 14 in Mark, 17 in Luke-Acts, 19 in Paul, once in 1 Peter, and once in Revelation.) Its greater importance than kḗryx or kḗrygma shows that the stress is on dynamic proclaiming.

2. The Use of kērýssō. The use is mainly active. The content is denoted by an accusative noun, an infinitive, hóti or hína, a relative clause, or direct speech (at times with légōn). The person addressed is in the dative, and place may be indicated by en or eis. The verb also occurs in the absolute (e.g., Mt. 11:1; Mk. 1:39).

3. The Secular Meaning in Lk. 12:3. The reference in Lk. 12:3 is not to the work of the disciples; Jesus is here adducing a popular saying to indicate that the hidden designs of the Pharisees will be made public.

4. Proclamation by different preachers.

a. The Jews. These proclaim the law (Rom. 2:21). Moses is proclaimed in the synagogue (Acts 15:21).

b. The Baptist. John heralds the messianic age in the desert (Mk. 1:4 and par.). He does not preach the law but calls for repentance, and points prophetically to Christ in a promise that is sure of immediate fulfilment. His baptism seals those who await God's rule and anticipates messianic remission (Acts 13:24).

c. Jesus Christ. (i) Incarnate. Proclaiming God's word is Jesus' mission in Mk. 1:38. He delivers the same message as the Baptist (Mk. 4:17), but does so as the prophet of fulfilment, so that the declaration is itself the event (Lk. 4:18ff.). In him the word is a creative force; it gives what it declares. (ii) Crucified. Between Good Friday and Easter Day Jesus proclaims remission in the realm of the dead (1 Pet. 3:19-20). The spirits are probably the souls of the dead rather than the OT righteous or fallen angels. The prison seems to be a special place in Hades. The timing falls between the death (v. 18) and the resurrection and ascension (vv. 21-22). The preacher is Christ. The content of the message is not given but is surely the gospel, as the immediate context in vv. 18-22 suggests. (iii) Risen. The risen Christ is also present in the word of his messengers (cf. Lk. 10:16), though only believers hear his summons in it (cf. Rom. 10:14ff.). Paul relates Christ and his message very closely in 2 Cor. 1:18-19. The NT word is God's act as Christ himself speaks through it.

d. The Healed. Those who are healed by Jesus tell others what has happened even though he orders them not to do so (Mk. 1:44). Since they do not do so by commission, their action is witness (cf. Mk. 1:44-45) rather than proclamation in the true NT sense (even though kērýssō is used). The prohibition seems designed to prevent astonishment at the miracle taking the place of faith. Where the miracle is opposed, as in Mk. 5: 17ff., Jesus authorizes the cured person to tell what has been done, and so he begins to proclaim it.

e. Disciples and Apostles. The disciples are sent out to proclaim repentance and the nearness of the kingdom, and also to heal. They are to proclaim fearlessly what they have heard from Jesus (Mt. 10:17). The end will come when the whole world has heard (Mt. 24:14). Like the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, this proclamation is part of God's saving plan. It is the declaration of the saving facts in order that they may be also a saving reality for believers. The word of the cross, as well as the cross itself, is God's power (1 Cor. 1:18). Sinners are commissioned to declare it. The efficacy does not depend on them, whether on their skills, or on their purity of motive (1 Cor. 1:22-23; Phil. 1:15). The Christ whom they preach is greater than they are; they proclaim him, not themselves (2 Cor. 4:5). Although there should be no discrepancy between their message and their conduct, they do not act in their own interests but seek to win people to Christ, presenting themselves only as servants for his sake.

f. An Angel. In Rev. 5:2 an angel puts to the world the question who is worthy to open the book with seven seals.

5. The Content of the Specific NT Message. While the stress in the NT is on the act of proclamation, the content is by no means secondary. If the word enacts what it proclaims, the content is indeed of supreme importance. It is not determined either by the situation of the hearers or by the ideas of the proclaimer but by the divine kingdom or lordship that Jesus himself announces and brings. The imminence of the kingdom poses the demand for metánoia as the possibility of participation. With this demand goes the declaration of forgiveness as a divine act of judgment and grace that will mean condemnation for some and deliverance for others. Which it will be depends on the response to Christ (1 Cor. 1:23-24). The king is intrinsic to the kingdom: the total Christ who is Lord by death and resurrection, and who is proclaimed as such (2 Cor. 4:5). Here is no myth of a dying and rising god, for the reference is to the factual event of a life in history. Yet the mere life, edifying though it might be, has significance only in the light of the resurrection. What is proclaimed, then, is not just a human history any more than it is merely human dogma. Salvation history is proclaimed, and its proclamation is itself saving event. At work here is not just the content of what is proclaimed, but God himself. For this reason, it is God's power (1 Cor. 1:24), it will permit no adulteration (Gal. 5:11), and it must be proclaimed in season and out (2 Tim. 4:2). As in the Greek world, kērýssein stands linguistically in close relation to euangelízesthai (cf. also kḗryx and euángelos), although with the special nuances and content which the NT gives to both terms.

6. The Hearers. The goal of proclamation is faith rather than understanding. Jesus does not bring a teaching but a message. People of all cultures resist it (1 Cor. 1:21ff.) but believers accept it. Proclamation is important because through it faith arises. True hearing brings the faith that is also obedience; this is effected by the word (Rom. 10:8). Since faith comes by proclamation, the two have the same content (1 Cor. 15:14).

7. Sending and Proclamation. Proclamation demands messengers, and messengers imply commissioning. During his life Jesus commissions the Twelve and the Seventy (Mt. 10:7; Lk. 9:2; 10:1). He renews the commission after the resurrection (Mk. 16:15). The sending is now to the world and not just to Israel (Mk. 13:10; Col. 1:23). If the sending entails restriction, it also confers authority. Those who are sent proclaim what they are commissioned to proclaim (Mt. 10:27). They do not report their own experiences but declare the acts and will of him who sends them. If there were no sending, there would be no divine proclamation, only human propaganda.

8. Teaching and Proclamation in the Synoptists. In the NT, especially the Synoptists, kērýssein and didáskein often go together (Mt. 4:23; 11:1; cf. Acts 28:31). In the main, teaching is synagogue exposition that is designed for believers, while proclaiming may take place anywhere as a call to sinners. Yet Jesus "proclaims" in the synagogue, too, for his teaching is no mere exposition. Even as exposition, it takes the form of an address that demands decision in the light of God's present action (cf. Mt. 7:29).

9. Miracles and Proclamation. If proclamation is God's active word, and God's rule is a present reality, signs and wonders occur, accompanying and confirming the word (Mk. 16:20; Heb. 2:3-4). For believers miracles demonstrate the reality of the message, but signs are refused to unbelievers, for they are not meant to force faith on people. Jesus himself plays them down (cf. Mt. 4:3ff.; Mk. 5:43). After the healings of Mk. 1:32ff., he moves on to preach in other towns, for that is why he has come (v. 38). Proclamation is what counts; the mighty acts are simply signs that God's kingdom has indeed come therewith (Mt. 11:5).

kḗrygma.

A. Outside the NT.

1. The Greek World. This word denotes both the act and the content of proclamation. It can have such senses as “news,” “declaration,” “decree,” “announcement,” etc.

2. Philo. Philo often uses the term for the herald’s “cry,” a “decree,” or especially the “publication” of honors or victories (figuratively).

3. The LXX makes little use of the word (cf. 2 Chr. 30:5; Jon. 3:2).

4. The rabbis have it for court proclamations or in connection with property.

B. In the NT. In Mt. 12:41 par. Lk. 11:32 Jonah’s preaching is meant. The act is at issue in 1 Cor. 2:4; it is effective, not as oratory, but in the spirit and power. What is meant in Mk. 16 is the content or message, but this in itself is powerful to save in 1 Cor. 1:21. It includes the resurrection in 1 Cor. 15:14. Paul’s gospel is the same as the preaching of Jesus in Rom. 16:25. The act is again meant in Tit. 1:3; by it the divine Word comes to us, and it is entrusted to the apostle by divine command. The preaching office comes into view in 2 Tim. 4:17. God has strengthened the apostle to fulfil the office of a preacher (cf. 4:5, 7). He does not stand as a defendant but as a herald, so that representatives of all nations hear the word through him.

prokērýssō. pro in Greek can mean either “forth” or “before,” thus yielding the sense “to speak forth‘” or, rarely, “to proclaim beforehand.” “To offer publicly” (i.e., “auction”) and “to promise” are other meanings. In the one solid use in the NT in Acts 13:24 the addition of pro suggests that John is the last of the prophets before the time of fulfilment, although even here John preaches rather than foretells the baptism of repentance. Due to the imminence of the kingdom, this is no mere promise but anticipation. [G. FRIEDRICH, III, 683-718]

kephalḗ gōnías → gōnía; Kēphás → Pétros

kinéō [to set in motion, cause], metakinéō [to remove, shift away]

kinéō. This word means “to set in motion,” “to stir,” “to cause,” with such nuances as “to disturb,” “to move,” “to instigate,” and in the papyri “to demand,” “to bring a suit or complaint.” In Mt. 23:4 it stresses the contrast between the burdens laid on others and the failure to move a finger to help them. Ephesus is warned in Rev. 2:5 that its lampstand will be removed if it does not repent. Paul in Acts 17:28 uses Stoic terms to prepare the ground for the gospel; in God we live and move and have our being. Elsewhere only two of the terms occur together but the underlying thought is a common one. It goes back to Plato’s idea of the world soul from which all movement comes. Philo has the same thought: God, himself unmoved, sets all things in motion. Paul in his own theology would no doubt prefer to say “through God,” but finds in the statement a starting point for his missionary address.

metakinéō. This uncommon word means a. “to remove” and b. “to alter.” In the Greek OT it is used for “to remove (a landmark)” (Dt. 19:14) and “to put to flight” (Is. 54:10). In the only NT instance the use is figurative; the Colossians in 1:23 are not to shift away from the hope of the gospel. [J. SCHNEIDER, III, 718-20]

kládos [branch]

kládos means “shoot,” “bud,” “branch,” and is used figuratively for children. In Rom. 11:16ff. Paul uses the term for the branches that are grafted into the one olive tree. Paul accepts the continuity of the community, but for him Christ is the “seed” of Abraham (Gal. 3:16), and hence the community consists of believers in Christ, both Jews and Gentiles. Faith in Christ, and God’s saving work in him, is the one qualification of membership. A relationship of faith replaces that of blood. The tree remains, but some branches are broken off, and new ones replace them. In Ignatius Trallians 11.2 Christians are called kládoi of the cross, in Hermas Simitudes 8.1ff. there is an allegory of engrafting, and in Justin Dialogue 110.4 we find a parable of the vine and its continual shoots. [J. SCHNEIDER, III, 720-22]

klaíō [to cry, weep], klauthmós [crying, weeping]

klaíō. This word, meaning "to cry" or "bewail," expresses grief at parting, remorse, sorrow for the dead, but sometimes also joy (cf. Gen. 46:29). Jesus in Lk. 6:21 blesses those who weep and promises them laughter, whereas those who laugh shall weep. As in the rabbis, laughter before God denotes human self-affirmation and self-confidence, but weeping expresses acknowledgment and acceptance of God and his rule. At the end, however, those who now ignore God will see their lostness and those who trust in him will enjoy his grace and fellowship. This transvaluation of all values will manifest the difference between true and false security. OT examples of this type of weeping may be found in 2 Kgs. 20:3ff. and 22:18-19 (Hezekiah and Josiah). Other references are Judg. 15:18; Hos. 12:4; Ps. 126:5-6. Included in the biblical usage is the idea of tears of remorse due to a sense of guilt. This is alien in the Greek world, where what is bewailed is fate rather than one's own sinful deeds. Behind the distinction stands the different relationship to God, in whom there may be humble trust because he directs human destinies to salvation. Where judgment is expressed by klaíein, its full severity is denoted by the use of milder terms (pentheín, thrēneín, etc.) to denote the actual lamenting (cf. Lk. 6:25; Jms. 4:9; Rev. 18:11; Jn. 16:20). Disclosure of God will mean both subjection to him and the grief of realizing what this entails. In Lk. 23:28 the women bewail and lament Jesus; they are full of grief because they see the irreversibility of the march to the cross. But Jesus tells them not to weep, for he is fulfilling God's plan, and this is his glory. By their weeping they show their lack of understanding, and Jesus responds by another call to repentance as he tells them that they should weep for their children, who will suffer the consequences of what is being done. He himself weeps for Jerusalem in Lk. 19:41-42.

klauthmós. This word is used literally for lamentation or grief in Mt. 2:18 and Acts 20:37. Elsewhere it occurs with "gnashing of teeth" to denote the terror of God's self-manifestation for those who reject his invitation (Mt. 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Lk. 13:28). Gnashing of teeth suggests racking remorse. [K. H. RENGSTORF, III, 722-26]

kláō [to break off], klásis [breaking off], klāsma [piece, crumb]

A. General Usage.

1. kláō means "to break," "to break off" (cf. Rom. 11:19-20 [variant reading]), "to shatter," klásis means "breaking off" (of shoots of the vine), and klāsma means "fragment" or a "bite" or "piece" of bread.

2. The word group is used in the NT for the common custom of breaking bread at meals which initiates the sharing of the main course. Jesus follows the practice at the feeding of the multitude (Mk. 6:41), the Last Supper (Mk. 14:22), and the Emmaus meeting (Lk. 24:30). For Paul cf. Acts 20:11; 27:35. The common church meal is called the klásis of bread in Acts 2:42 and cf. 20:7. The fragments that remain in Mk. 6:43 and Jn. 6:12-13 are klásmata; according to custom Jesus orders that they be gathered up after the meal.

B. Breaking of Bread as a Term for the Lord's Supper. Breaking of bread is not as such a cultic act, even at the Last Supper; it is part of the initiatory process. Thus the breaking of bread in Acts 2:42 (cf. 20:7) is simply a term for ordinary meals in which the believers find table fellowship in recollection of Jesus' own table fellowship with the disciples. Yet within the ordinary meal we also find a special, cultic breaking of bread (1 Cor. 11:20). Thus, as we learn from Ignatius Ephesians 20.2 and Did. 14. 1, breaking of bread becomes perhaps the first title for the new liturgical meal, the Lord's Supper. This usage continues, but the title is later replaced by eucharistía, and the breaking of bread becomes a special part of the celebration, symbolizing Christ's violent death.

C. The Lord's Supper in Primitive Christianity.

1. Sources.

a. Survey. In addition 1 Cor. 11:23ff.; Mk. 14:22ff.; Mt. 26:26ff.; Lk. 22: 15ff., we have to consider 1 Cor. 10; 11; 16:20, 22; Acts 20:7, 11; Jn. 6, especially vv. 51ff.; and passages in Ignatius, the Didache, and Justin.

b. Appraisal. The accounts of institution are of three types: Pauline, Markan, and Lucan. Paul and Mark share the narrative, the word of interpretation, and an eschatological saying, but with variations in the cup saying. Luke both abbreviates by ending with "This is my body" and expands by putting the institution more firmly in the Passover setting and giving a more specific eschatological context.

2. The Last Supper

a. Traces of the Passover Setting. The Last Supper is in all probability the Passover, since many details fit in best with the external forms of the Passover.

b. The Jewish Passover of the Time. The meal at the time was held on the 14th of Nisan in Jerusalem, with at least ten persons present. After blessings of the feast and the wine, a first cup was drunk, the food was served, and instruction was given with a call to thanksgiving and hope. The first part of the Hallel was then sung, the second cup drunk, bread taken, blessed, and broken, and the meal started. The Passover concluded with the third cup (of thanksgiving), the rest of the Hallel, and a fourth cup.

c. Traces of the Passover in the Tradition. The following details may be discerned: (1) the drinking of the cup; (2) the linking of interpretative sayings with parts of the meal; (3) the eschatological reference; (4) the express equation in Lk. 22:15 (cf. v. 17); (5) the time (evening); (6) the place (Jerusalem); (7) the careful preparation; (8) reclining, which is prescribed for the Passover; (9) the multiple cups (Lk. 22:17, 19); (10) the cup of thanksgiving (1 Cor. 11:25; cf. 10:16); and (11) the concluding hymn (Hallel). Remarkably, however, there is no reference to the paschal lamb.

3. The Meaning of the Sayings of Jesus at the Supper.

a. The Groups of Sayings in the Oldest Texts. There are two groups, those about the present and future Passover (Lk. 22: 15ff.; Mk. 14:25), and those about the bread and wine (1 Cor. 11:24-25; Mk. 14:22ff.; Lk. 22:19). The sayings of the first group relate to the opening blessings and the first cup, those of the second to the distribution of the broken bread and the sharing of the cup of thanksgiving.

b. The Passover Sayings. The first saying (Lk. 22:15-16) expresses joy at the feast and the coming consummation along with the solemnity of parting and imminent death. The second (22:18) presupposes that the disciples will hold table fellowship without Jesus but looks ahead to the consummating banquet when the kingdom comes.

c. The Sayings about the Bread and Wine. These sayings in the second group refer to Jesus himself. They are parabolic, but this time the parable is accompanied by an action, so that the disciples do not just hear but partake as well. Within the Passover the sayings are widely separated. As regards the first saying, the Aramaic original that was probably used for "body" does not denote the physical body as such but the person: "This bread, I am myself." The saying is thus a pledge of Christ's presence when the disciples hold future table fellowship. The second saying relates the cup to the new diathḗkē, the new divine order that is based on the shed blood of Christ. The saying is thus a pledge that the Master who is going to a violent death is present with the fullness of enacted salvation. Taken together, the sayings direct attention away from the past to Jesus himself, who now fulfils the divine will to save, and who offers the promise of his personal presence as Savior (in virtue of his self-sacrificial death) during the period up to the establishment of definitive fellowship at the final banquet.

d. Alterations and Additions. The cup saying in Mk. 14:24 relates Christ's death to Is. 53:12, while Mt. 26:27 suggests Jer. 31:34. The forms of distribution in Mark and Matthew stress the handing out of the elements. Paul with his "do this" (1 Cor. 11:24) expresses the presupposition that the disciples are to repeat the action as Israel celebrates the deliverance of the Passover.

e. Maranatha. This phrase in 1 Cor. 16:22 ("Our Lord, come") is a cry of longing for the parousia but also a eucharistic prayer for a foretaste of the final fellowship in the Supper (cf. Did. 10.6; also Rev. 22:20).

4. The Lord's Supper in Paul.

a. Relation to the Lord's Supper in the Primitive Community. Since Acts 2:42, 46 can hardly refer to the Lord's Supper, we have no direct information about its observance in the primitive church. The phrase "breaking of bread," which denotes a common meal, does not justify communion in bread alone.

b. 1 Cor. 10 and 11. The evening meal of 1 Cor. 11:20 (held on Sunday in Acts 20:7; cf. 1 Cor. 16:2; 11:20ff.) is no longer connected to the Passover. The association of the Lord's Supper with the bread and wine, not the lamb, makes the dissociation easier. The rite takes place in the context of a shared meal, which gives rise to scandals in Corinth. As a remembrance of Christ's death it demands appropriate seriousness (1 Cor. 11:23ff.). Judgment falls when there is failure to realize this (vv. 28ff.). Fellowship with the Lord rules out fellowship with demons at idol feasts (1 Cor. 10: 14ff.).

c. Paul's Thinking about the Supper. The meaning is personal fellowship with Christ (1 Cor. 10:3-4, 16-17; 16:22). Fellowship with Christ creates fellowship with one another (1 Cor. 10:16-17). Christ's vicarious death is the central content of the eucharistic sayings (11:26); by it a new covenant is set up. The Supper is observed between the times; in it we look back to the first coming and ahead to the second (11:24ff.). There is a strong focus on the elements as these represent Christ's body and blood. If the feast is a feast of remembrance, it is so in the same sense as the Passover, i.e., as a re-presentation, as the proclamation of the present reality of God's saving act in history. The Supper is a solemn cultic action, yet it differs from pagan feasts inasmuch as sacrificial ritual is excluded and the fellowship is not crassly sensory. Participation in Christ's presence relates, not to eating and drinking alone, but to the whole action. The union is not a result of a mere observance of the rite but comes through Christ's own action by the word and Spirit, so that the Supper is neither spiritualized not materialized, but given a realistic yet historical and spiritual interpretation. It demands an appropriate attitude, which is to be tested by self-examination and which may be corrected by divine chastisement. Participants must ask whether they are as they should be according to the indicative and imperative of the gospel.

5. The Lord's Supper in John.

a. The Discourse in Jn. 6. Instead of an account of the institution, John offers reflections on it in connection with the feeding of the five thousand (Jn. 6). Jesus is the bread of life, his bread is his vicariously offered flesh, and taking his flesh and blood brings fellowship with him and eternal life. Yet it is not the actual flesh and blood, but the Spirit, that gives life.

b. John's Understanding. When bread and wine are taken, Christ is present. The bread and wine represent the flesh and blood that constitute his person. They mediate eternal life by union with Christ. The elements themselves do not do this, for it is the living, spiritual, exalted Christ who is present and who imparts himself. The concepts of presence and fellowship agree with the earliest traditions. John's realism is remote from either a symbolical or a magical view; the presence of Christ by the Spirit confers the gift of saving fellowship.

6. The Lord's Supper in the Post-Apostolic Age.

a. Didache. In this work the Supper is to be celebrated on Sunday, within a common meal, and with specified prayer and eschatological expectation (cf. the use of Maranatha). The idea of fellowship is present. Qualifications are given for participation, and new elements include the concept of sacrifice and the inclusion of immortality and knowledge among the gifts (9-14).

b. Ignatius. In scattered references, Ignatius finds the risen Christ at work in the eucharist, warns against unworthy reception, and sees in the Supper a representation of unity. He tends, however, to hellenize the concept of life and to materialize the operation with his understanding of the eucharist as the medicine of immortality. The eucharist is called a sacrifice of prayer and the bishop ought to preside at it (cf. Ephesians 13.1; Philadelphians 4; Smyrneans 7.1; 8.1; Ephesians 20.2).

c. Apocryphal Acts. These slip over into magical sacramentalism and cult mysticism, making the eucharist into a Gnostic mystery (cf. Acts of John 109; Acts of Thomas 27; 49-50; 121; 133; 158). [J. BEHM, III, 726-43]

kleís [key]

A. The Different Applications of the Image of the Keys in the NT.

1. Common in antiquity is the idea that heaven is closed off by doors and that certain deities or angels have the keys to it. In later Judaism we also find a few references to angels (e.g. Michael) as keepers of the keys. God himself may be said to carry the key. In another figure he keeps the key of rain. Lk. 4:25 alludes to the key of rain when it says that heaven was shut up in Elijah’s day. The two witnesses of Rev. 11:6 also have the power to shut heaven.

2. The Keys of the Underworld. Antiquity also depicts the underworld as sealed off by gates to which various keepers have the keys, e.g., Nedu, Pluto, Kronos, or Isis. Judaism makes only isolated use of this concept. Revelation in 9:1 and 20:1 refers to the sealed abyss to which God or an angel has the key. The risen Christ himself has the keys of death and Hades (1:18); the idea here is probably that Christ has taken over the keys of the underworld from personified death and Hades; he thus has the power to open the doors of this world and to summon the dead to resurrection (cf. 1 Pet. 3:19-20; Acts 2:25ff.). Since the rabbis allot to God the key of quickening the dead, Christ is thus given here a divine predicate.

3. The Key of (to) knowledge. In Lk. 11:52 Jesus complains that the scribes have taken away the key of knowledge. The meaning may be that they have taken away either a. knowledge as the key to the kingdom, or b. the key to knowledge. In the original the former is more likely (cf. Mt. 23:13), although in the Hellenistic world the latter would be more natural. Either way the thought is that the scribes hold the key of theological knowledge, but instead of opening the door of salvation they withhold the key and thus keep the door closed.

4. The Eschatological Use.

a. The Key of David. In Rev. 3:7 the risen Christ has the key of David (cf. Is. 22:22). As the promised shoot of David, he has the key to God’s eternal palace, controlling judgment and grace.

b. The Keys of God’s Royal Dominion. In Mt. 16:19 Jesus grants to Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven. In the Gospels this can hardly mean that Peter has the key to the doors of the heavenly world, for the kingdom of heaven is God’s royal dominion in the end-time (cf. Rev. 3:7). In what sense does Peter have the key to this?

B. The Power of the Keys.

1. Mt. 16:19.

a. This passage is strongly Semitic in vocabulary, style, and rhythm. This is important as regards both its authenticity and its interpretation.

b. In biblical and Judaic usage handing over the keys does not mean appointment as a porter but carries the thought of full authorization (cf. Mt. 13:52; Rev. 3:7).

c. The scribes claim the power of the keys and exercise it (or fail to do so) by declaring God’s will in Scripture, i.e., by preaching, teaching, and judging. The implication is that Jesus takes away this authority from the scribes and grants it to Peter.

d. The latter part of Mt. 16:19 equates the power of the keys with binding and loosing. Among the rabbis this has the sense of rendering decisions as to what is allowed or forbidden, but originally the terms denote acquittal or condemnation, and they may be used for executing or averting divine judgment by prayer. The authority of Mt. 16:19, then, covers the pronouncing of judgment on unbelievers and the promising of forgiveness to believers, i.e., dispensing the word of grace and judgment.

2. The Extension of the Power of Binding and Loosing to the Apostles. Mt. 18:18 and probably Jn. 20:23 refer back to Mt. 16:19. Jn. 20:23 extends the right to the eleven. Mt. 18:18 might seem to have the congregation in view (v. 17), but the address is to the disciples, and after vv. 12ff. the section vv. 15ff. is designed to show that there is a ministry of discipline as well as love (cf. Tit. 3:10).

3. The Exercise of the Power of Binding in the Primitive Community. Exercise of the power of binding involves a threefold process that culminates in public rebuke and excommunication when there are serious moral lapses or falsifications of the gospel (1 Cor. 5:1 ff.; Acts 8:18ff.; Gal. 1:8-9; Tit. 3:9-10). Excommunication carries with it cursing (Gal. 1:8-9) and handing over to Satan (1 Cor. 5:3-4). In Jn. 20:23 God's judgment is intimated.

4. The Power of Loosing. This is the power to promise forgiveness. In Jn. 20:23 it is perhaps associated with baptism (cf. Mt. 28:16ff.; Lk. 24:47). It rests on the imparting of the Spirit, who equips the apostles for their ministry when Jesus sends them out. Through the Spirit Christ himself is at work as the one who forgives. → thýra, pýlē [J. JEREMIAS, III, 744-53]

kléptō [to steal], kléptēs [thief]

kléptō means a. "to steal" (either objects or people), b. "to cheat" or "bewitch," and c. "to conceal." kléptēs means a. "thief," and b. "one who acts with subterfuge." While stealing may sometimes be excused in the Greek world, it is a chief sin in the OT (Ex. 20:14; Dt. 5:19), whether the objects stolen be valuable articles, idols, animals, or words of God. As a sin against God (Ex. 20:14), it incurs punishment (Ex. 22:2). Even need or poverty does not excuse it (Prov. 30:9). The locusts of Joel 2:9 are compared to thieves, and Obad. 5 suggests that God's judgment is more destructive than burglary (cf. Jer. 49:9). Stealing takes place by night (Job 24:14) and by force (24:16); its marks, then, are secrecy and violence. In the NT the new life of love in the Spirit means that the Ten Commandments are given added seriousness and that a new power is available to keep them (cf. Mk. 10:19; Mt. 19:18; Lk. 18:20; Rom. 13:9; Eph. 4:28). Stealing is a breach of fellowship (cf. Jn. 12:6); work in the service of others replaces it. Yet the NT often uses kléptēs with reference to the breaking in of the messianic age. The disciples must watch, for their Lord will come as unexpectedly as a thief (1 Th. 5:2ff.). This coming will take unbelievers by surprise, but believers, who live in the light of the new age, should be ready (cf. Mt. 24:43,; 2 Pet. 3:10; Rev. 3:3; 16:15). If the Lord comes as a thief, thieves also break in and steal earthly treasures (Mt. 6:19-20), and those who raise false claims to lordship are thieves and robbers (Jn. 10:8, 10). The use of the simile of a thief for the Lord at his coming shows a. that only one point in a parable is important (here the suddenness of the coming), and b. that the freedom of faith rids the church of fear of such comparisons. [H. PREISKER, III, 754-56]

klḗma [branch]

klḗma, meaning "shoot," "twig," "slip," usually denotes the shoot of the vine in the LXX (Joel 1:7; Nah. 2:3; Ezek. 17:6ff.; also Mal. 3:19). In Jn. 15:1ff. the parable indicates the vital organic relation between the vine and the branches. To bear fruit, the branches must abide in the vine and must undergo the discipline of pruning. If they do not abide they are discarded and wither. [J. BEHM, III, 757]

klḗros [lot, inheritance], klēróō [to appoint by lot], prosklēróō [to allot], holóklēros [complete], holoklēría [completeness], klēronómos [heir], synklēronómos [joint heir], klēronoméō [to inherit], kataklēronoméō [to give or receive an inheritance], klēronomía [inheritance] klḗros.

1. Greek Usage. The basic sense of klḗros is "lot" (in drawing lots), then "portion," and finally "inheritance" (also in Egyptian papyri "land in fee").

2. klḗros and klēronomía in the LXX. klḗros means "lot" (cf. Jon. 1:7; Josh. 18:7) and then "lot of land" (Num. 16:14). klēronomía means "inheritance," but because of the mode of apportionment of Canaan (e.g., in Josh. 17:4), klḗros is an equivalent. Thus we find klēronomeín klḗron in Num. 18:24, and the Lord is the Levites' klḗros in Dt. 10:9. Indeed, klēronomía may take on originally alien senses of klḗros. Nevertheless, the land as a whole is never said to be Israel's klḗros, klḗros can be used in the plural (Num. 32:19), but not klēronomía, and we can read of a klḗros tḗs klēronomías (Num. 36:3: "lot of inheritance") but not vice versa. When the whole land is said to be given en klḗrō, it is unlikely that this means "in fee." The probable meaning is that it is given for apportionment into individual klḗroi (Num. 36:2). The assignment guarantees the legitimacy of possession. klḗros and klēronomía both recognize that the land is not Israel's by conquest but by God's gift. klḗros stresses assignment and klēronomía the validity of possession. As the whole land is assigned to Israel, individual portions are assigned to tribes, clans, and families. A figurative use then develops whereby Israel is God's klḗros (Dt. 9:29), or klḗros (like merís) is the "destiny" or "lot" of nations (Is. 17:14) or individuals (Prov. 1:14). With the rise of the hope of resurrection, klḗros can finally denote one's allotted portion after death (Dan. 12:3). The whole usage is rooted in the sense of God's overruling of history.

3. klḗros in Later Judaism. In Judaism we still find the two senses of "lot" and "portion." Thus in A.D. 67 the Zealots choose a new high priest by lot, and Josephus tells us that Philip went to Rome "to acquire a share (in the inheritance)" (cf. Josephus Jewish War 4.153ff.; 2.83). In the pseudepigrapha Israelites have a portion in Moses (his blessings) and the phrase "the portion of the righteous" denotes eternal life.

4. klḗros in Philo. Philo stands on OT soil when he uses klḗros for "lot," "portion," "inheritance," or "patrimony." He also calls the righteous God's klḗros and vice versa. He explains that God is the Levites' portion in the way that art is the portion of artists. He can say, too, that nobility is the klḗros of the soul in a spiritual participation which is not without a natural basis.

5. klḗros in the NT. A first meaning in the NT is "lot," as in Mk. 15:24 (with emphasis on the humiliation of Christ) and Acts 1:26 (with emphasis on seeking the will of God). The main sense, however, is "allotted portion." Thus Judas has a share in the apostles' ministry in Acts 1:17. Simon Magus has no share in God's word or gift in Acts 8:21, and there is reference to an eschatological portion in Acts 26:18; Col. 1:12. Ignatius expands on this sense in Ephesians 11.2 etc. and Polycarp in Polycarp 12.2. In 1 Pet. 5:2-3 what is meant is not the elders' personal possessions, and certainly not offerings on their behalf, but the portions assigned to them (i.e., to their charge).

klēróō. This means first "to appoint by lot" and then "to apportion." The only plain use in the LXX is in 1 Sam. 14:41. Philo has the word for orderly appointment in the natural and moral world. The only NT instance is in Eph. 1:11-12, where it does not denote a pretemporal act but God's determination as this affects our being and assigns us a goal, namely, "to live for the praise of his glory."

prosklēróō. Meaning “to distribute by lot,” then just “to distribute,” this is a common word in Philo for the natural ordering of things to God, and then for the self-ordering of the righteous. The only NT use is in Acts 17:4, where the meaning might be “they were assigned (by God) to,” but the preceding persuasion supports an active sense: “they joined Paul and Silas.”

holóklēros (→ hygiḗs). This word denotes “complete” in extent or compass. In the LXX it is used for whole (i.e., unhewn) stones in Dt. 27:6, a whole vine in Ezek. 15:5, and whole weeks in Lev. 23:15. Elsewhere the term may denote animals or men that are without defect, or a true people, or full righteousness, or in Philo the unadulterated world of God. In the NT the idea in 1 Th. 5:23 is that believers may be kept whole in every respect; the reference to the body may suggest a wish that they be kept alive for the parousia. It is the God of peace who can do this; peace here embraces the wholeness (the total bodily and spiritual salvation) which God alone can bring but which he can and does bring even to those who are broken in spirit, soul, and body. In Jms. 1:4, the only other NT instance, the achievement of “completeness,” which will include curbing the tongue (3:1 ff.), is the goal of our various trials or testings.

holoklēría. Meaning “completeness,” this word occurs in Acts 3:16 for the physical wholeness or intactness which is restored to the lame man.

klēronómos, synklēronómos, klēronoméō, kataklēronoméō, klēronomía.

A. Greek Usage of the Group. In Greek the central point of the group is inheritance. The klēronómos is the “heir,” the synklēronómos is the “joint heir,” klēronoméō is “to be heir,” “to inherit,” and klēronomía is “inheritance,” then “possession.” It may be noted that in Greek, Egyptian, Hellenistic, and Jewish law children were always heirs, but Roman law allowed parents a freedom of testamentary disposition. [W. FOERSTER, III, 758-69]

B. The OT.

1. Linguistic Survey. While klḗros occurs 129 times, klēróō occurs only three times, synklēróō not at all, and klēronómos four times. klēronoméō, however, occurs 163 times, kataklēronoméō 59 times, and klēronomía 143 times (mostly for Heb. naḥ□lâ). (For details and full Hebrew equivalents see TDNT, III, 769.)

2. The Promise of Possession of Canaan to the Patriarchs. The patriarchal stories begin with the command and promise of Gen. 12:1ff. On this basis Israel believes that possession of Canaan is by divine promise and ordination. The land is “the land of their fathers” (Gen. 31:3; 48:21).

3. The Promise of Possession of Canaan in the Moses Stories. The story of Moses opens with the same promise (Ex. 3:7-8). If this is at first presented independently, it is later taken up into the patriarchal promise as a renewal of it (cf. Ex. 32:13; Dt. 34:4).

4. Canaan as Israel’s Inheritance in Exodus to Numbers. In Exodus to Numbers the thought that God gives Israel the land is common, but the idea of inheritance is less prominent than that of apportionment except when the reference is to the tribes (cf. Num. 26:52ff.; 33:50ff.; 36:2ff.; 18:20ff.; 27:1ff.).

5. Canaan as Israel’s Inheritance in Deuteronomy. Since Deuteronomy presents Moses‘ last addresses prior to entry into the land, it is not surprising to find many references to the land which God promised to give to the patriarchs and their descendants (cf. 1:7ff.; 2:12, 29; 3:18ff.; 4:1ff., etc.). In this context the inheritance comprises both the whole land and individual portions (cf. 19:14). Possession is possible only because God has given the land and will drive out the Canaanites (3:20; 9:4-5).

Heb. Hebrew

6. Canaan as Israel's Inheritance in Joshua. Joshua receives and repeats the divine command (Josh. 1:2, 10-11), takes the land, and then divides it by lot (13:1, 7). The division is by families and individuals as well as tribes (19:49; 24:30), and it is the basis of the rulings protecting inheritance in Num. 27.

7. Canaan as Israel's inheritance in Judges to Nehemiah. In the books that follow we find the common themes that God gives Israel the land (1 Kgs. 8:36), that she should keep the commands of God in order to maintain possession (1 Chr. 28:8), that the whole land is Israel's inheritance (Judg. 20:6), and that the tribes are allotted portions (Judg. 2:6) and must occupy these in detail (1:3), which the Danites fail to do (cf. 1:34 and ch. 18). Ezra sums up the general understanding in his great prayer in Neh. 9:8ff.

8. The Land of Canaan and the People of Israel as God's Inheritance. The land is called God's inheritance in 1 Sam. 26:19; 2 Sam. 21:3; 1 Kgs. 8:36; 2 Chr. 20:11; cf. Ex. 15:17. More commonly Israel herself is God's possession (Ex. 19:5; cf. Dt. 7:6; 1 Kgs. 8:51; 2 Kgs. 21:14; 1 Sam. 10:1; 2 Sam. 14:16; 20:19). When God gave the nations their portions, he chose Israel as his own portion and heritage (Dt. 32:8-9).

9. The Prophets. In general the prophets make little use of the theme. Amos refers only to the taking of Canaan in possession (2:9-10). Micah calls the land the people's portion (2:4). Jeremiah says that God has given Israel the most beautiful heritage (3:19). They will possess it forever if they do God's will (7:7), but in fact they have made it an abomination (2:7) and he has thus handed it over to their enemies (12:7ff.). Ezekiel presents similar thoughts (20:5-6; 37:25; 35:15), but with the promise of new and eternal possession after the exile (36:12; 27:25; cf. 40ff.). At the end of Isaiah the righteous will possess the land (60:21), and there is reference to God's heritage in 63:17. In Zechariah God will inherit Judah as his portion (2:12), and he will cause the righteous to possess all Judah (8:12). Joel calls Israel God's people and heritage (2:17), and the land is also his (2:18).

10. The Psalms. In the Psalms consolation and strength are found in a rehearsal of God's saving acts, so that we often find references to the promise (105:9ff.), the winning (44:2ff.), the giving (135:12), and the allotment of the land (78:55). Israel, too, is God's own heritage (28:9 etc.), although all nations are his possession inasmuch as he is universal Lord and Judge (82:8). The land is God's inheritance only in 79:1;, elsewhere it is Israel's in both recollection (37:18 etc.) and hope (37:18). God is himself the lot of the writer in 16:5-6, and God's law in 119:111.

11. Conclusion. a. The references show that the Hebrew terms denote allotment, and possession only on this basis. They thus express the element of divine ordination. b. The sense of apportionment is also present. Tribes, families, and individuals have their own shares by sacred lot, and hence also by divine appointment. c. The basic concept is that of possession of land, and the law takes various steps to safeguard this (Ex. 20:17; Lev. 20:5; cf. Is. 5:8; Mic. 2:2). d. Since God promised the land to the patriarchs, it could be called an inheritance even though it was not possessed or handed down, but given by God at the conquest. The individual portions then become inheritances, as in the case of Naboth in 1 Kgs. 21:3. While an inheritance may embrace goods, it consists primarily of land (Num. 27:1ff.; Ruth 4:5ff.). e. The above developments explain why Israel may be called God's portion and heritage. f. They also explain the use for destiny as one's "lot"—a lot which may be equated with God himself (Ps. 16:5-6). [J. HERRMANN, III, 769-76]

C. The Group klēronómos in the LXX.

1. Linguistic Data. As noted, klēronómos is rare in the LXX; it means "heir" in 2 Sam. 4:7 and "owner" in Mic. 1:5. synklēronómos does not occur. klēronoméō is common and has such varied senses as "to inherit," "to possess," "to take" (cf. Gen. 22:17; 1 Kgs. 20: 15ff.), and "to hold." kataklēronoméō is fairly common, especially for "to divide an inheritance" or "to cause someone to inherit or take possession.” klēronomía, another common word, means “inheritance,” “possession,” but also merges with klḗros in the sense of “share” or “portion.”

2. Material Data. Important in a material survey are the relations of the group to the Hebrew originals (for details see TDNT, III, 777). From these we gather that the main point of klēronoméō and klēronomía is not so much inheritance as enduring possession (Josh. 18:3). This is based on the promise (Dt. 30:5) and established by violent seizure. Incidentally, then, it also entails inheritance (Num. 27:8), for the seizure of the land is an irreversible process that carries with it tribal and family rights to the portions that are allotted. On this basis the description of land or people as God’s klēronomía expresses a lasting relationship that has its basis in the divine gift.

D. The Group in Later Judaism.

1. Linguistically the terms have here the legal sense of inheritance, but the religious usage of the OT still exerts a strong influence.

2. Materially the idea of the seizure and possession of the land is important, especially with an eschatological reference. The promise to Abraham is extended to cover permanent possession of the whole earth, e.g., in a messianic fulfilment of Gen. 28:14. The thought of inheriting eternal life is also prominent, although with no particular reference to God as Father and Israel as son. Conversely, hell is the portion of the wicked. klēronomía can sometimes be used for Israel as God’s heritage or possession, and the law is a precious possession for Israel.

E. The Group in the NT.

1. The Usage. klēronómos means “heir” in Mk. 12:7, “heir” religiously in Gal. 4:1; Rom. 8:17, and “recipient” of the divine promises in Rom. 4:13-14; Tit. 3:7; Heb. 6:17; Jms. 2:5. synklēronómos occurs for “fellow heir” in Rom. 8:17; Heb. 11:9; 1 Pet. 3:7; Eph. 3:6. klēronoméō means “to inherit” in Gal. 4:30; Heb. 1:4 (Christ) and “to receive” God’s gifts or promises in Mt. 5:5; 19:29; Lk. 10:25; 1 Cor. 6:9-10; Gal. 5:21; Heb. 1:14; 6:12. kataklēronoméō means “to give in possession” (Acts 13:9). klēronomía means “inheritance” in Mk. 12:7 and Gal. 3:18, “possession” in Acts 7:5; Heb. 11:8, and “eternal inheritance” in Acts 20:32; Eph. 1:4, 18; Col. 3:24; Heb. 9:15; 1 Pet. 1:4.

2. The Theological Usage. A special NT sense may be seen in the parable of Mk. 12:1ff., where the Son is the heir and the inheritance is the kingdom. This links sonship and inheritance much more closely than in the OT and Judaism. Paul expresses the same thought when he relates inheritance to sonship in Rom. 8:17-18 (cf. Gal. 3:29; 4:7). Similarly Heb. 1:2 says that the Son is appointed heir of all things. In the parable inheritance does not yet denote actual possession; only the risen Lord enters upon this (Mt. 28:18). Inheritance is expressly linked with the kingdom in Mt. 21:43; this frees it from earthly limitations and equates it with the new world of God’s sovereign rule. If Christ is heir, his people are fellow heirs, yet only by divine call and appointment. The children of the kingdom are shut out (Mt. 8:11- 12). Inheritance is by a new creation (1 Cor. 15:5), or by adoption (Rom. 8:23), and as such it is an object of hope. Salvation (Heb. 1:4), glory (Rom. 8:17), redemption (8:23), grace (1 Pet. 3:7), blessing (3:9), in sum, eternal life (Tit. 3:7), constitutes the content of the inheritance. Spatial ideas are unimportant, even in Mt. 5:5. Reigning with God is the issue (Rom. 5:17; Rev. 5:10). Rev. 21:2ff. indicates clearly what is meant by the inheritance (cf. v. 7). The heavenly portion (1 Pet. 1:4) does not denote a spatially distinct part of heaven but a part in God’s eternal rule. Inheritance is not acquired but rests on filial relationship to God, and there is no reference to a parallel inheriting of hell. In Galatians Paul meets the Judaizing view that only those who keep the law may rank as the children of Abraham who inherit the promises. This involves the contradiction that inheritance is no longer by promise but by law (Gal. 3:18). In fact, however, this promise precedes the law, faith makes Abraham its recipient, Christ is the seed to whom the promise is given, and all those who belong to him by faith are the true progeny of Abraham, not by natural descent but by adoption (4:5ff.). The emphasis here is on the eschatological promise to Abraham which has found initiatory fulfilment in Christ. Similar lines of thought occur in Rom. 4:13-14 and Eph. 3:6. Hebrews, too, regards klēronomía as the content of the OT promise (9:15). Christians are heirs of the promise (6:17) as those who have taken it over and attained to it. Yet the promise, guaranteed by God, is set before the readers in order that by faith and patience they may receive it. Like the fathers (cf. 11) they live in the "not yet" of the inheritance. They are not to be irreligious as Esau was, who, when he desired to inherit the blessing, was rejected (12:16- 17). [W. FOERSTER, III, 776-85]

klḗsis, klētós → kaléō

koilía [belly, womb]

A. Outside the NT.

1. Meaning "hollow," koilía is used for a. "the hollow part of the body," b. "the belly," "entrails," "intestines," and c. (rarely) "the womb."

2. In the LXX it is used for "belly" (Jon. 2:1), fairly commonly for the "womb" (Gen. 25:24; Dt. 28:4, 11), as well as for the male sex organ (Ps. 132:11), and figuratively for the "underworld" (Jon. 2:3) and for "hidden thoughts" (Job 15:35). In Philo it is the digestive system, which, as in Greek philosophy, is regarded as the seat of desire. Josephus uses it for the diseased lower part of the body.

3. The rabbinic equivalents have the usual senses "belly" and "womb," and we find a figurative use for the "vault" of a house.

B. In the NT.

1. In the NT "belly" is the sense in Mk. 7:19; Lk. 15:16; 1 Cor. 6:13; Rev. 10:9-10, "womb" in Mt. 19:12; Lk. 1:15 etc.; 2:21; Jn. 3:4; Acts 3:2; Gal. 1:15, and "inward part" in Jn. 7:38.

2. In Mk. 7:14ff. Jesus explains sin in terms of the difference between the koilía and the kardía. What is external does not disrupt our relationship to God. Evil is rooted in the evil heart. In 1 Cor. 6:13 Paul accepts the thesis of the libertines that the koilía is corruptible. But he does not agree either that it is morally indifferent or that it is the seat of sinful desire. Belonging to the creaturely world, it will perish, but the body (sṓma) belongs to the risen Lord, and hence it must not be surrendered to licentiousness (vv. 13-14). In Rom. 16:18 and Phil. 3:19 it might be that Paul is referring to unbridled licentiousness and gluttony (cf. the rendering "appetites"), but another possibility is that he has in mind Judaizers who lay too much stress on dietary regulations.

3. The sense of "inward part" is present in Jn. 7:38. When Jesus quenches the inner thirst of believers, their refreshed inner being becomes a source of wider refreshing (cf. Is. 58:,11; Zech. 14:8; Ezek. 47:1ff.) in an outflow to others. [J. BEHM, III, 786-89] koinós [common], koinōnós [companion, participant], koinōnéō [to share in], koinōía [fellowship, participation], synkoinōnós [partner], synkoinōnéō [to participate in, share], koinōnikós [generous], koinóō [to make common] koinós.

A. In Secular Greek.

1. This word means "common" a. in the sense of common ownership, property, ideas, etc., b. in the sense of what concerns all, e.g., societies, monies, resolves, and c. in the sense of what is of little value.

2. A second line of use is for "fellows," "participants."

B. In the OT and Judaism.

1. The general sense of common is found only a few times in Proverbs (e.g. 1:14; 15:23; 21:9; 25:24).

2. Another sense (Heb. ḥōl) has reference to what is in general or ordinary use as distinct from what is consecrated (though the LXX uses bébēlos in such cases). Thus the rabbis use ḥōl for working days, or for ordinary ground, money, or food, or for animals slaughtered for common use. Only in apocryphal works (e.g., 1 Macc. 1:47) and Josephus do we find koinós as an equivalent for this.

C. The Individual and Society, Theories and Forms of Society.

1. The Greeks value individuals and individual rights, yet with a strong sense of the duty to society and of integration into it, since order is the principle of all reality. Common ownership of the land underlies society, but except where military needs demand a degree of communal economy (as in Sparta), private property soon develops with the resultant distinction between rich and poor. Theories of society seek to redress the balance. Thus Pythagoras establishes a communal society for his followers. Plato in his portrayal of the ideal state suggests that rulers and soldiers should be put on a public basis, and in his modified proposals he advocates nationalization of the land and strict economic supervision. Aristotle preserves private ownership but with the proviso that one portion of the land be held in common, and that the nearest possible equality of ownership be achieved. Poets like Hesiod depict an ideal state in either past or present. The Cynics believe that common possession of all things is the true order of nature. The Stoics seek the best possible realization of a better age by fostering the spirit of brotherhood. The Neo-Pythagoreans renew the ideal of a common life and a community of goods (for the earth is a common mother) in which one may possess nothing and yet be the owner of all things.

2. Apart from the Pythagoreans, the Greeks only theorize about common ownership, but Jewish groups like the Essenes practice it, sharing both meals and property. The Therapeutae also live communally and in ascetic isolation for the intenser study of Scripture.

D. koinós in the NT.

1. Tit. 1:4 speaks of the "common" faith and Jude 3 of the "common" salvation. In Acts 2:44; 4:32 the disciples live a "common" life, following the example of Jesus (Lk. 8:1ff.) and anticipating the last days (Dt. 15:4). This life in community is not based on economic theory, legal socialization, or philosophical imitation of nature, but expresses the loving fellowship which renounces ownership (cf. Lk. 12:33) in order to help others (Acts 2:45). The phrase in Acts ("having all things or everything in common") is a Hellenistic one.

2. The sense "profane" occurs in Rev. 21:27; Heb. 10:29 ("profaning the blood of the covenant"); Mk. 7:2 ("cultically unclean hands"). The NT denies that anything that God created is ritually profane (cf. Acts 10:28; Rom. 14:14). Weaker brethren may still think in these terms, and allowance must be made for them, but they are objectively mistaken (Rom. 14:14).

koinōnós, koinōnéō, koinōnía, synkoinōnós, synkoinōnéō.

A. The Meaning and Construction of the Terms. koinōnós means "fellow," "participant." koinōnéō means 1. "to share in" and more rarely 2. "to impart." It is used in the absolute, or with genitive of object, dative of person, or both. koinōnía means "participation," "impartation," or "fellowship." It is used with the objective genitive (what is shared), the subjective genitive (the person or thing sharing), the recipient being in the dative or with a preposition and the objective genitive (the person in whom there is sharing).

B. The Group in Secular Greek.

1. Human Life. Sharing occurs in many fields, e.g., enterprises, legal relations, and marriage. Friendship is for the Greeks a supreme expression of fellowship. Citizenship is also important, since the preservation of society, and indeed of the cosmos, depends on political or cosmopolitan sharing.

2. Sacral Speech. Sharing in divine power through common meals is an ancient idea which persists in the Greek concept of communion with the gods at sacrificial feasts or even by sexual union. Philosophy purifies the idea. Thus for Plato communion with God is the supreme form of fellowship, while Stoicism with its idea of an integrated universe stresses human fellowship and the fellowship of all humanity with deity. Mysticism replaces communion with union.

C. The Group in the Israelite-Jewish Sphere.

1. The OT. The group is not common in the OT (less so than the equivalent Hebrew group ḥbr, which denotes association with other people for various purposes, or association with idols, but never with God). koinōnía occurs only in Lev. 6:2 for "deposit," and in Is. 44:11 those who worship idols are their "fellows." In Sirach koinōnós may be used for table fellowship (6:10) but also for association in unlawful acts (41:19). koinōnéō denotes close comradeship with the wicked or the rich in Sir. 13:1. koinōnía is used for material participation in Wis. 8:18.

2. The OT: God. The absence of the group for fellowship with God marks off the OT from the Greek world. The righteous in the OT depend on God and trust in him, but do not regard themselves as his fellows. This is surprising in view of the fact that the cultus expresses the entry of God into sacral fellowship. A sense of distance rather than association prevails even where there is rejoicing before God (cf. Dt. 12).

3. Rabbinic Literature. Among the rabbis the basic sense of "fellow" carries such nuances as "companion" (in good or evil), "person in a legal relation," "member of a society," and, among the rabbis themselves, "colleague." "Fellowship" has a general sense but also has religious overtones when it denotes table fellowship, e.g., at the Passover.

4. Philo distinctively uses the group for human fellowship with God, e.g., in the cultus. He also has it for the ideal common life of the Essenes. He gives koinōnéō and koinōnía the rare sense of "giving a share" or "imparting."

D. The Group in the NT.

1. The Sense "To Share in Something."

a. In Lk. 5:10 the point is partnership in work. In Heb. 2:14 the children share a common mortality which Christ himself partakes of in order to overcome death and the devil. In 2 Pet. 1:4 redemption brings participation in the divine nature. In Rom. 11:17 the engrafted branches share the total life of the cultivated tree. Participation in what is holy has an exclusive character (2 Cor. 6:14). As the children of light Christians cannot have a part in sin (Eph. 5:11). Participating in the sins of others entangles one in a common guilt and judgment (Mt. 23:30; cf. 1 Tim. 5:22; 2 Jn. 11). God's people must leave Babylon lest they share her sins and judgment (Rev. 18:4).

b. Paul often gives the group a religious content. In 1 Cor. 1:9 Christians are called to fellowship with God's Son. Since there is no mystical absorption, this fellowship is by faith, which identifies their life with his. If it is a present possession, it awaits future consummation (cf. 1 Th. 4:17). It carries with it participation in the gospel (1 Cor. 9:23; cf. Phil. 1:5) and a sharing of faith (Phlm. 6).

c. In this regard the fellowship of the Lord's Supper is important as an enhanced expression of fellowship with Christ (1 Cor. 10: 16ff.). For Paul sacrificial feasts denote divine fellowship (vv. 18, 20). Those who share the Supper are companions of Christ; for this reason they should shun idolatrous feasts. By taking bread and wine they share with Christ in an inward communion which carries with it the blessing of the forgiveness won by his death. This communion extends to all the participants, as represented by the one loaf (v. 17).

d. Fellowship with Christ also means living, suffering, dying, inheriting, and reigning with him (Rom. 6:8; 8:17; 6:6; 2 Tim. 2:12; cf. also 2 Cor. 7:3; Col. 2:12-13; Eph. 2:5-6). There are here two phases of fellowship, the first with Christ's humiliation and the second with his exaltation. In his life and work Paul has a share in Christ's total sufferings (Phil. 3:10; Col. 1:24), but he hopes to share analogously in his glory (Phil. 3:10; Rom. 8:17). 1 Pet. 4:13 makes the same point. For Paul individual sufferings are part of the burden that rests on the whole community according to the law of fellowship (Col. 1:24; 2 Cor. 1:5, 7).

e. Believers also share in the Spirit (2 Cor. 13:13) by whom Christ comes to them. In Phil. 2:1 this is a participation in the Spirit rather than the Spirit's gift.

f. Fellowship with Christ means fellowship with other Christians in a partnership of faith (cf. Phlm. 17) and service (2 Cor. 8:23). Since Gentile Christians share the same blessings as Jewish Christians, they should share their material goods with them (Rom. 15:27; cf. 12:13). Sharing each other's sufferings, they share each other's grace (Phil. 1:7; cf. 4:14). Even when they themselves do not suffer, they are partners of those who do (Heb. 10:33).

g. koinōnía is a favorite term in 1 John for the living bond that unites Christians. It begins as fellowship with the Father and the Son (1:3, 6) by an abiding that commences here and is fulfilled hereafter (3:2, 24; 4:13). It issues in the family fellowship of believers (1:3, 7).

2. The Sense "To Give a Share in Something." This rare Greek meaning is fairly common in the NT. We find it in the reciprocal sharing of Phil. 4:15 and Gal. 6:6 (cf. 1 Cor. 9:11). Paul also has it in connection with the collection for the Jerusalem church, which gives a definite form to the fellowship between the two parts of Christianity (Gal. 2:9; Rom. 15:26). The collection has the significance of fellowship in service (2 Cor. 8:4) in a sincere and ready sharing (2 Cor. 9:13). Active sharing is also the point in Heb. 13:16.

3. The Absolute Sense: "Fellowship." In Gal. 2:9 shaking hands expresses the full fellowship of common faith in Christ. In Acts 2:42 koinōnía denotes, not the Christian society nor its community of goods, but the family fellowship established and expressed in the church's life.

koinōnikós. a. A first sense of this word is "belonging or appointed to society." b. Another meaning is "gladly giving others a share." The word does not occur in the LXX, and in the NT it is used only in 1 Tim. 6:18 in sense b. koinóō. This word, meaning "to make common" or "to share," is not used in the LXX but occurs in three senses in the NT. 1. In Acts 21:28 it means "to profane" the temple. 2. In Mt. 15:11, 18, 20 it means "to defile," not by ritual impurity, but by personal sin. 3. In Acts 10:15; 11:9 it means "to declare profane, unclean." [F. HAUCK, III, 789-809][7]

kókkos [seed], kókkinos [scarlet] kókkos.

1. This word, meaning "seed," occurs in the NT in the parables of Jesus. The mustard seed that grows into a great shrub (Mt. 13:31-32 and par.) stands for the unassuming preaching of Jesus which as the divine action has all-embracing significance. The tree in whose branches birds nest (cf. Ezek. 17:22-23) symbolizes a rule that will extend to all peoples. In Lk. 17:6 the mustard seed is small compared to the solid sycamine tree, but it can uproot and remove it (cf. Mt. 17:20). The point here is not so much the power of even a tiny faith, but the fact that God's power is not proportionate to human faith. Faith, then, should look away from itself, and then the impossible becomes possible.

---

[7]Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (416). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

NT New Testament

2. Paul and John both find in the grain of wheat (1 Cor. 15:37; Jn. 12:24) a sign of divine action and creation. Paul perceives in the burying and coming to life of the seed a symbol of the continuity of the old corporeality and the new, while John finds in it a symbol of the necessity of Christ's death and resurrection and of the divine law that links Master and disciple. The eschatological picture takes on christological urgency in John.

3. Outside the NT kókkos also denotes the scarlet berry and the color scarlet (cf. 1 Clem. 8.3).

kókkinos. This word means "scarlet" (cf. the furnishings of the sanctuary in Ex. 26:1 etc., the scarlet stuff in Lev. 14:4, and the scarlet clothing of 2 Sam. 1:24). In the prophets scarlet is linked with sin, either as the opposite of white (Is. 1:18) or as a sign of luxury (Is. 3:23; Jer. 4:30). In the NT 1. Jesus is clothed in a scarlet robe in Mt. 27:28. This was probably a soldier's cloak; the king of peace, in a mocking misrepresentation, is thus clothed in warlike garb. 2. In Heb. 9:19 scarlet wool is mentioned in connection with atonement under the law (cf. Lev. 14:4, 6). 3. Scarlet and purple denote the pomp of Babylon's demonic power in Revelation. Arrayed in purple and scarlet, the woman sits on a scarlet beast (17:3-4). The fiery red of 6:4; 12:3 differs from the scarlet here, which epitomizes demonic abomination, lasciviousness, and ungodly power. The Messiah's army is clothed in white linen and rides on white horses (19:1lff.); the robes are made white in the atoning blood of the Lamb (7:14). We thus have a striking contrast to the woman who is clothed in scarlet and rides on a scarlet beast. [O. MICHEL, III, 810-14]

kolázō [to cut short, punish], kólasis [punishment]

kolázō. This means "to cut short," "to lop," "to trim," and figuratively a. "to impede," "restrain," and b. "to punish," and in the passive "to suffer loss." A common use is for divine chastisement. In inscriptions the deity punishes those who violate cultic laws. Some classical authors regard evil as divine retribution. Philo finds in beneficence and retribution the two primary powers of being, though God would rather forgive than punish, and punishes only those who are not amenable to reason. Punishment brings blessing by freeing from a false frame of soul. The NT uses kolázō in Acts 4:21 and 2 Pet. 2:9. Only the latter refers to God's punishment. The wicked will be under punishment between death and judgment, i.e., until their destiny is finally fixed.

kólasis. This word, meaning "punishment," is used for divine punishment in 2 Macc. 4:38; 4 Macc. 8:9. In the NT it occurs in Mt. 25:46: Those who fail the practical ethical task will go away to eternal punishment. The only other instance is in 1 Jn. 4:18, which says that fear is its own punishment (cf. 3:18). This fear is driven out by love, which is free from every fear. [J. SCHNEIDER, III, 814-17]

kolakeúō) [to flatter], kolakía [flattery]

---

par. paragraph

cf. confer, compare

i.e. id est, that is

The word kolakía derives from kolakeúō (“to flatter”), which does not occur in the NT. kolakía is not found in the LXX but is common in Philo. The one NT example is in 1 Th. 2:5, where Paul says that he does not use flattery in his preaching (unlike many Hellenistic orators). [J. SCHNEIDER, III, 817-18]

kolaphízō [to buffet]

This rare term occurs a few times in the NT and Christian writings. It means “to buffet,” “to ill-treat,” “to revile.” The sense is literal in the passion story (Mt. 26:67). Spiritual pain is also involved in 1 Cor. 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:20 (which reflects the passion of Christ, vv. 21ff.). In 2 Cor. 12:7 Paul is buffeted by an angel of Satan. The thorn in the flesh can hardly refer to persecution or the temptation to licentiousness, but may have to do with intense pain accompanying Paul’s visions. Various diagnoses have been attempted in explanation of such pain, e.g., an eye ailment, epilepsy, neurasthenia, migraine, malaria, etc., but none is fully convincing. Paul himself comes in prayer to the realization that his affliction has profound meaning. Christ, too, was buffeted by Satan and his agents, but Christ is still the victor, and his power is made perfect in Paul’s weakness. [K. L. SCHMIDT, III, 818-21]

kolláō [to join together, unite], proskolláō [to join, unite] kolláō.

1. In the NT kolláō, meaning “to glue or join together,” occurs only in the middle or passive. Thus in Lk. 10:11 it means figuratively “to touch” and in Acts 8:29 “to join” (the chariot). In Rom. 12:9 Christians are to “hold fast” to what is good, while in Lk. 15:15 the prodigal “joins” a citizen in the far country, and in Acts 5:13 none dared “join” the apostles.

2. A specific sense of kollásthai is for sexual intercourse; cf. Mt. 19:5 (quoting Gen. 2:24); Eph. 5:31 (quoting Gen. 2:24 more literally with proskollēthḗsetai); 1 Cor. 6:16 (where the opposite is union with the Lord, v. 17).

proskolláō.

1. One reading has this word in Acts 5:36 in the sense “to join.”

2. In Eph. 5:31 and one reading of Mt. 19:5 it denotes marital union. [K. L. SCHMIDT, III, 822-23]

kolobóō [to mutilate, cut short] kolobóō occurs in the NT in Mt. 24:22 in the figurative sense “to cut short.” God has cut short the time of affliction, i.e., made it less than the oppressors purpose, so that the elect may be preserved from physical destruction (as indicated by the “all flesh” of Mk. 13:20, the physical nature of the sufferings, and the presence of the elect at the parousia, Mk. 13:27). [G. DELLING, III, 823-24]

kólpos [bosom, fold]

LXX Septuagint

vv. verses

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

v. verse

kólpos has the senses “bosom,” “fold” (of a garment), and “arch” or “hollow,” e.g., the floor of a valley or bosom of the sea. The LXX uses it to express marital fellowship (Dt. 13:7), for the fold of a garment (Ex. 4:6-7), and for the bottom of a chariot (1 Kgs. 22:35) or the altar (Ezek. 43:13). In the NT the beloved disciple takes the place of honor by reclining on Jesus’ “breast” (Jn. 13:25; cf. the Son and the Father in Jn. 1:18). “Fold” of a garment is the sense in Lk. 6:38 and “bay” of the sea in Acts 27:39. In Lk. 16:22-23 the point may be that Lazarus has the place of honor on Abraham’s “bosom,” but it is also possible that what is expressed is loving fellowship. Both ideas are present in rabbinic Judaism. [R. MEYER, III, 824-26]

koniáō [to whitewash]

koniáō means “to daub with lime,” “to plaster,” “to whitewash” (Dt. 27:2). Paul in Acts 23:3 calls the high priest Ananias a “whitewashed” wall to denote his carefully concealed wickedness. In Mt. 23:27 Jesus similarly calls the hypocritical scribes and Pharisees “whitewashed” tombs. The irony of the saying is that they represent the very thing they avoid. They are not what they appear to be, and they are to be avoided as unclean (even though they claim to be clean). [J. SCHNEIDER, III, 827]

kópos [labor, trouble], kopiáō [to become weary]

In secular Greek kópos means a. “beating” or the “weariness” caused by it, and b. the “exertion” (e.g., of manual work) that brings on physical tiredness. kopiáō, then, means “to tire,” “to wear oneself out.” The LXX uses it for tiring in battle (2 Sam. 23:10), for exertion in work (Josh. 24:13), and for the groans of the afflicted (Ps. 6:6). kópos is the human lot in the OT (Job 5:7; Ps. 25:17-18). Present toil is contrasted with future rest (Is. 65:23). God, who never wearies (Is. 40:28ff.), will grant rest to the righteous (33:24). In the NT 1. the sense “to weary” occurs literally in Jn. 4:6 and figuratively in Rev. 2:3. 2. “To tire oneself out” occurs literally in Mt. 6:28; Lk. 5:5; Eph. 4:28; 2 Tim. 2:6, and figuratively in Mt. 11:28-29 (fainting under the legal burden). kópos has a general sense in Mt. 14:6 and an eschatological reference in Rev. 2:2. Paul as an apostle accepts troubles as normal (2 Cor. 6:5; cf. Mt. 5:11-12). His special troubles strengthen his assurance (2 Cor. 11:23); kópoi take precedence in his appeal to things that show him to be a true servant of Christ (loc. cit.).

3. A distinctive NT use is for Christian work in and for the community. Paul has it for his own work in 1 Cor. 15:10 etc. It describes his manual work in 1 Cor. 4:12, but, since he is not under obligation to do this, it forms part of the work that he does for Christ (1 Th. 2:9; 1 Cor. 9: 15ff.). All his service for Christ may indeed be regarded as strenuous work, though it is also his pride and joy (2 Cor. 11:23). His aim is to present mature Christians to Christ (Col. 1:29). He shows concern for the success of this work (Gal. 4:9) and aims at an eschatological reward (1 Th. 3:5; Phil. 2:16). Paul uses the kop- group for the work of others too (1 Cor. 15:58), which as labor in the Lord (Rom. 16:12) deserves the highest esteem (1 Cor. 16:16). Love is the mainspring of this labor (1 Th. 1:3), which is carried on especially by officebearers (1 Th. 5:12). The same usage may be found in 1 Tim. 4:10; 5:17; Jn. 4:38; Acts 20:35, but it becomes less prominent in later Christian authors, who perhaps think that kópos, with its nuance of manual work, is not a fitting term for ministry. [F. HAUCK, III, 827-30]

OT Old Testament

kopetós [beating, mourning], kóptō [to beat, mourn], apokóptō [to cut off, castrate], enkopḗ [obstacle], enkóptō [to block], ekkóptō [to cut off, cut down] kopetós, kóptō.

A. The General Custom of Mourning.

1. In Greek, as in many other tongues, "to beat" takes on the specific sense "to mourn." Women especially beat their breasts in mourning (men beat themselves in remorse or pain). The idea is probably to give bodily expression to grief, though there may be an underlying cultic (even sacrificial) concept.

2. Lamentation for the dead takes other external forms, e.g., outcries punctuating individual laments (often by paid mourners supplementing women relatives).

3. The common posture of mourning is sitting on the ground. We also read of a death dance in which women may beat their cheeks to the wail of tambourines.

4. The reasons for noisy lamentation are varied, e.g., frightening off demons, cultic honoring of the dead, and the kindling of sympathy.

B. Mourning in the Greek and Roman World.

I. Popular Mourning.

1. Beating the body and loud crying are customary in Greece from early days. They probably come to Greece from the Near East.

2. Solon legislates against extreme violence and extravagance at funerals, as does Roman law, but the customs continue at the showing of the corpse and the interment, and in Rome burial societies are formed to meet the high costs. Philosophy expresses abhorrence of exaggerated mourning.

3. As a chief part of mourning, beating the body (kopetós) comes to be used for mourning itself. The verb, originally used with the part of the body beaten, is thus found in the absolute or with the accusative of the person lamented.

4. In the Near East women are the main mourners (either relatives or paid professionals). Their purpose is to express grief, to honor the dead, to stir up sympathy, and to ease the grief of relatives with consoling thoughts. Women are the mourners in Greece too. Solon tries to restrict them to relatives, but we find paid mourners in Athens. These may include both sexes in both Greece and the Near East, and sometimes we find men as well as women beating their breasts, rumpling their hair, and scratching their cheeks in mourning.

II. Mourning in the Cultus.

1. Mourning takes a violent form in cults that focus on the dying and rising again of deity; cf. the Babylonian cult of Tammuz (Ezek. 8:14), the Syrian cult of Adonis, the Phrygian cult of Attis, and the Egyptian cult of Osiris, in which the goddesses Ishtar, Astarte, Cybele, and Isis, along with the devotees, weep for the dying gods at the great annual festivals.

2. Similar rites may be found in the Greek mysteries, in which the repeated cultic dramas (Persephone and Dionysus) involve wild lamentation and rejoicing. The mourning feast for the hero Achilles may also be mentioned.

C. Mourning in the OT.

I. Popular Mourning.

1. Linguistic Data. The exact equivalent of kóptomai in Hebrew is spd, though the Greek is also used for other terms. Mourning is normally the sense, and other words such as klaíō (2 Sam. 1:12), alalázō (Jer. 4:8), penthéō (Jer. 16:5), and thrēnéō (Mic. 1:8) often accompany kóptomai; cf. also klauthmós (Is. 22:12) and thrḗnos (Jer. 9:9) with kopetós. The verb is often used either for or with such gestures of grief as cutting off the hair, tearing the clothes, and donning sackcloth. kóptomai kopetón is the phrase for instituting mourning.

2. Practices. In the OT one finds various mourning customs, e.g., going barefoot, rumpling or cutting the hair, tearing clothes, scattering ashes, fasting, lamenting, and beating the breast or hip. Mourning begins with death (or very soon after) and continues up to interment. A mourning period of fasts and laments follows burial and lasts seven days (or longer in the case of prominent people). Sometimes there might be annual mourning (Jephthah’s daughter and Josiah).

3. The Mourners. These are first the immediate family (husband, wife, bride, father, etc.; cf. the cries “Alas, sister” etc. in passages like Jer. 22:18). Others are then included (friends etc.), and sometimes the whole nation, as for Moses, Samuel, Abner, and Josiah. Women are prominent, and we find choruses of women or even all the women of a town or country (e.g., 2 Sam. 1:24). Professional mourners play a part (Jer. 9:16; 2 Chr. 35:25).

4. Expressions of Grief. Grief first comes to expression in formless cries (Lam. 1:1 etc.). These cries then become brief laments for the departed (“Alas my brother” in 1 Kgs. 13:30). Out of these develop the fuller laments for which the professional mourners train (cf. the lament for Josiah in 2 Chr. 35:25). Some such laments come down through the generations and serve as models for others. They might be sung responsively or antiphonally (2 Chr. 35:25; Zech. 12:10ff.). The dead are often addressed in the second person (Ezek. 27:3ff.), and the lament is uttered on behalf of the relatives (Lam. 1: 12ff.) or even the dead (Jer. 9:18). Abuses arise through violence of outcry and extravagance, as in Greece and Rome.

5. A distinctive feature of the OT is that full mourning is a sign of normality. Divine judgment carries with it the curse of death without proper burial or mourning (Jer. 8:2; 22:18; Job 27:15). This is humiliation to the status of a beast (Jer. 22:19). It is a fate that overtakes all of Jeroboam’s house apart from Abijah (1 Kgs. 14: 10ff.).

II. Prophetic Lamentation (→ thrēnéō).

1. Mourning has a specific form in the OT, but this is prophetic rather than cultic. It consists partly of public acts and partly of spoken or written laments. The laments follow popular models (Ezek. 32: 19ff.; Jer. 9:20-21). The aim, however, is not to comfort but to startle, not to excite sympathy but to bring to repentance. Prophetic mourning, uttered in God’s name, is usually for future death in the form of national destruction. The main concern, however, is with the nation’s rebellion rather than its overthrow. This mourning does not accept death; it seeks renewal of life (cf. Am. 5:14) and carries the assurance of restoration.

2. The lament of Am. 5:1-2 is typical. The fact that it is for the virgin daughter awakens the deepest sense of loss, since unfulfilled purpose is expressed hereby. The laments of Micah (1:8), Jeremiah (9:18), and Ezekiel (ch. 19) should also be noted; also the ironical and scornful laments for Egypt (Ezek. 32) and Babylon (Is. 14). Such laments rise to great poetic heights.

3. A secondary aspect is that the prophet may have to forgo ordinary mourning (Ezek. 24:16; Jer. 16:5). The aim of such symbols is to portray the terrible state when there will be no mourning because of divine judgment (Ezek. 24:22ff.; Jer. 16:4ff.).

4. Prophetic activity also includes the declaration of mourning or the need for it. The lamentation may be for sin (Joel 2:12) or for the destruction that God’s judgments bring (Is. 22:12). It can take an ironical form, as in the lamentation for universal catastrophe in Jer. 25:34, or for the dispossession of the god Milcom in Jer. 49:1ff.

5. Assurance of restoration comes with intimation of disaster; this will mean the replacement of mourning with dancing (Ps. 30:11). Yet mourning for the Messiah (Zech. 12:10ff.) is part of the message of salvation; here is a sorrow which issues in life.

D. Mourning in Judaism.

1. Sources and Usage. Various tractates bear witness to the mourning customs of Judaism. The usage is much the same as in the OT.

2. Customs and Times. The first part of mourning is during the funeral procession. It consists of lamentation and beating the breast. A second part follows interment; this is divided into a one-day period, a main period of seven days (three very strict), and a longer but not so strict period of thirty days (a whole year for parents). Extra commemorations, encouraged by wandering orators, might follow.

3. The Mourners. Hired women with their cries, banging of instruments, and beating the breast play a large role in the funeral procession, though restrictions are put on their activity. Only lamentation is prescribed after interment. Family members, both men and women, join in the funeral procession and express their grief by stamping the feet, wringing the hands, and beating the breast. Male orators honor the dead with eulogies at the grave. Larger groups of friends are also found, and there is national mourning for important leaders, especially rabbis.

4. Signficance and Motifs. Mourning is regarded as a duty of love (Ex. 18:20). It has atoning force (1 Kgs. 14:13) and consoles the deceased. Fear of demons, which are potent and dangerous near tombs, may also be a reason for it.

E. Mourning in the NT.

I. Popular Mourning.

1. The case of Jairus' daughter gives evidence of the first period of mourning, which begins with death, and which takes a conventional form, involving the presence of relatives, condoling acquaintances, flute players, and mourning women (Mk. 5:38; Mt. 9:23; Lk. 8:52). The case of Lazarus (Jn. 11:17) puts us in the second period of seven days, when the three strictest days are over, and visits are the most important feature according to the ceremonial of Judaism.

2. The children's game of Mt. 11:16-17 reflects burial customs of the day. It presupposes that a leader strikes up the lament and that the others should join in with hand movements, probably beating the forehead or breast.

3. Jesus himself experiences in anticipation the first stage of mourning when the women of Jerusalem weep over him on the way to the cross (Lk. 22:37). This is a symbol of national mourning in spite of the prohibition of such mourning in cases of execution. Either courageous confession that Jesus is no criminal, or involuntary recognition that he is truly Israel's King, finds expression in it. The Gospels, however, mention no second period of mourning for Jesus.

4. The disciples follow Jewish customs in the burial of Stephen (Acts 8:2). Here men, who have a role in Greek mourning but are more prominent in that of Judaism, seem to play an exclusive part. The "devout men" are probably Jewish Christians who by public mourning protest against Stephen's condemnation. In Acts 9:39 it is the women (widows) whom we find weeping for Dorcas.

5. Mourning has really lost its point with the resurrection triumph of Christ, but in the early church custom lags behind faith. Hence mourning remains a seat of tenacious paganism against which, e.g., Chrysostom protests, and even much later governments (cf. Venice) have to pass restrictive laws.

II. Mourning in the Life, at the Death, and on the Coming Again of Christ.

1. Jesus, when he meets mourning, resists it. As the Victor over death, he turns it into joyful awe in Mk. 5:42, grateful faith in Jn. 11:45, and cheerful praise in Lk. 7:16. There is no sense in expecting mourning from the Messiah (Lk. 7:30). The Pharisees who do so have a false picture of the Messiah as a pitiless Judge who prefers to kill on the sabbath and fasts with no less severity than they do. Ironically they have no more liking for John the Baptist, for they are unwilling to follow him in serious repentance. Their answer to the Savior Messiah is to deal him a mortal blow which brings a lamentation they do not desire.

2. Before this, however, comes the proleptic mourning for Jesus himself, for it is through death that he gains the decisive victory over death. In this mourning there is perhaps a fulfilment of Zech. 12:10, which carries the motifs of sorrow for the martyrdom of the divine prophet and concern for the misfortune which comes on the people in consequence (cf. Barn. 7.5). Jesus himself tells the women, however, not to weep for him but to weep for themselves and their children. In so doing he takes up the prophetic demand for lamentation but also manifests his self-forgetful love.

3. The NT speaks, too, of an eschatological mourning in which there is no longer a place for repentance. Zech. 12:10 is usually interpreted as a prophecy of this final mourning (cf. Mt. 24:30; Rev. 1:7). This mourning, which is now universal, combines remorse for the death of Jesus with grief at personal loss in the judgment. Realization of the truth comes with the manifestation of the exalted Christ, but it comes too late. The lament for Babylon in Rev. 19 is a special form of this intimation of eschatological mourning. The sinful world has to bewail the fall of its representative, and in so doing it laments its own fate (vv. 11, 15).

4. Summary. The witness of Scripture is that death belongs to the world that is against God, that it cannot be where God is, and that it thus entails distance from God. It is in death, therefore, that pagan hopelessness finds its fullest manifestation. Pagan mourning vividly symbolizes this. Even in paganism, however, there is a sense that it ought not to be, and this is even more true in the biblical sphere. Here lies the ultimate reason for the many attempts to check excessive mourning. Yet legislation alone cannot do it. Only the death and resurrection of Christ, which overcome the alienation of sin and replace death with life, can rob pagan lamentation of its point. Grief at parting remains, but it is now illumined by the assurance of new life with God (Rev. 21:4). Violent mourning may thus yield to a quiet sorrow whose very quietness anticipates the blessed rest when sorrow is changed forever into the fullness of joy.

apokóptō (→ ekkóptō, eunoúchos, eunouchízō). This word means literally “to cut off,” “to chop,” “to break,” “to hew down,” symbolically “to mourn,” and figuratively “to remove,” “to conclude abruptly” (in rhetoric), and “to omit letters” at the end of a word (in grammar). There are two important instances in the NT.

1. Jesus’ Saying in Mk. 9:43, 45. In secular Greek the term is used for “cutting off” members of the body in battle, in amputations, and in punishment (of prisoners of war, cf. Judg. 1:6-7; for various offenses, cf. Dt. 25:11-12; Ex. 21:23-24, etc.). The cutting off of members in punishment probably underlies the metaphor in Mark. Prevention of further temptation can hardly be the point. Self-punishment inflicted on the erring member will weaken the force of sin, but above all it will anticipate future punishment and thus prevent eternal judgment.

2. Paul’s Saying in Gal. 5:12. A special sense of apokóptō is “emasculation.” The participle, then, can be used for “eunuchs.” In the Near East eunuchs served as chamberlains at court and as ministers in various cults (cf. in the OT 1 Sam. 8:15; 2 Kgs. 8:6, etc.). The OT excludes eunuchs from the people (Dt. 23:2): emasculation is a sin against the Creator, is alien to the life of the covenant people, and is an offense against the pure worship that demands no blemish. A place is found for faithful eunuchs, however, in Is. 56:3ff. (cf. Jer. 41:16); in the NT cf. Acts 8:27. The reference in Mt. 19:12 is, of course, a figurative one; Jesus has celibacy in view. In Gal. 5:12, where emasculation is probably in mind, Paul is not commending it. There is thus no reason to weaken the sense to “separation” or even to the more general but vaguer “mutilation.” In an ironical play on his opponents’ demand for circumcision, Paul is suggesting a radical surpassing of circumcision that would bring exclusion from the community instead of entrance into it-an exclusion which is already the true situation. The wish is obviously not meant to be taken literally. [Some rabbis advocate celibacy, but they condemn pagan self-emasculation; the Romans also repudiate it.]

enkopḗ, enkóptō (→ proskopḗ, próskomma). The basic idea expressed by this group is that of “blocking the way.” This yields the sense of “obstacle.”

1. In the NT the obstacles denoted by the group are always religious. What is hindered is the course of the apostle (Rom. 15:22), the progress of the gospel (1 Cor. 9:12), the walk of Christians (Gal. 5:7), or the ascent of prayer (1 Pet. 3:7).

2.a. The one who primarily impedes is Satan (1 Th. 2:8). Since Paul elsewhere finds other reasons for changes of plan (cf. 2 Cor. 1:15ff.; Rom. 1:13; Acts 16:6-7), and since he does not view Satan as the lord of nature, what he probably has in mind in 1 Th. 2:18 is the devil's opposition through human action (cf. perhaps vv. 14ff.). Satan may also be the one who hinders in Gal. 5:7. This time, as the opposite of the one "who called you," he works through the Judaizers.

b. Since the NT finds the source of evil in the human heart as well as the devil, humans, too, can be the ones who hinder. Even the apostle himself might become an obstacle by using his right to support, i.e., by giving the impression that he was doing his work for personal profit, or by frightening away the poor (1 Cor. 9:12). Paul's supreme concern is that there be no enkopḗ to the prokopḗ of the gospel (Phil. 1:12). In 1 Pet. 3:7 human sin in the form of a perverted marital relation may constitute a hindrance to prayer. We have here the specific form of a general problem-sin impedes prayer-that only Christ's saving work has solved.

ekkóptō.

A. General Greek Usage. a. The first sense of ekkóptō is "to strike out" (e.g., the eyes, branches in pruning, etc.). b. A second sense is "to break open" (doors, locks, etc.). c. A third meaning is "to hew down" (trees; cf. Jer. 22:7; Mt. 7:19). d. Figuratively we then have the sense "to drive out" or e. "to exclude" or "repel." f. Another figurative meaning is "to extirpate" or "destroy" (cities etc., but also states of mind, impulses, claims, etc.; cf. 2 Cor. 11:12).

B. Radical ekkóptein in the Sayings of Jesus.

1. In the repeated parable of the unfruitful tree (Mt. 7:19; Lk. 13:7, 9), hewing down denotes irrevocable destruction either temporal or eternal (Mt. 3:10; 7:19). The warning against Gentile arrogance in Rom. 11:22 is a parallel.

2. The demanded cutting off of an offending member in Mt. 5:30; 18:8 denotes the seriousness of the decision that discipleship requires. The principle of punishing the sinning member is often found in rabbinic writings. In the sayings of Jesus, however, we have self-punishment rather than a judicious penalty. Against the eschatological background of the teaching of Jesus, the thought is that it is better to lose members in this life, or even this life itself, if that is the only way to avoid eternal loss and attain to eternal life (cf. Mt. 16:26). [G. STÄHLIN, III, 830-60]

korbán [gift], korbanás [temple treasury]

1. korbán is the loanword from the Hebrew. It is a technical term which Josephus explains as referring to advantages that accrue from the dedication of oneself to God (Antiquities 4.72-73). The form korbanás denotes the temple treasury as the repository of what is offered as korbán (Jewish War 2.175).

2. korbán in the OT and Later Judaism. In the OT korbán is "what is offered," more particularly to God (cf. Num. 7:3). All kinds of offerings, not just sacrifices, are included. We find the same general use in later Judaism, but now the term is also a vow formula when something is offered to God, either in sacrifice or by a transfer of use, i.e., a withdrawal from secular use and control. The "something" may be objects, foods, etc., but it may also be individuals or groups or even the whole people. It does not mean that the people or objects are made over to the temple but simply that they are subject to a transfer of control. korbán may take the form of personal renunciation but it may also be a means of denying to others the use of one's person or possessions (whether to exert pressure, to take revenge, or to inflict injury). It can thus lead to a breach of relations even within the marriage or family, and in view of the simplicity but drastic consequences of the process the rabbis try to find ways to reverse the vow or to soften the consequences, though the date of such efforts is much disputed.

3. korbán in the NT

a. In Mt. 27:6 the chief priests rule that the silver pieces that Judas wants to return are not suitable for the korbanás, i.e., the temple treasury, even though Judas has put them in the temple and they probably come originally from the treasury. The reason given is that they are blood money and hence unclean.

b. korbán occurs only in Mk. 7:10ff. in the debate with the scribes and Pharisees. Mt. 15:3ff. uses dṓron in the sense of "offering" (cf. 5:23-24; 8:4, etc.; also Heb. 5:1; 8:3-4; 9:9; 11:4). The argument of Jesus is that the scribes uphold a vow (korbán) taken by a son even though it releases him from all obligations to his parents. The scribal argument (based on Num. 30:2-3) is that vows to God always take precedence. In reply Jesus quotes Is. 29:13. The scribes cannot truly do justice to their concern for fulfilment of the law because they forget that God's love and justice coincide and that God's concern is for human welfare. Jesus does not wish to weaken the validity of Scripture but to put it in its full context in which the goal may be sanctification but sanctification itself leads on to lovingkindness. The fourth commandment expresses this, but the defended practice of korbán becomes a means of evasion.

4. The Early Church. Early exegesis takes the saying only along the lines of Lk. 21:4 (which has tá dṓra); the Latin corban is the poor box, and almsgiving is viewed as a sacrifice that is brought to God. Later this usage drops away. [K. H. RENGSTORF, III, 860-66]

kosméō [to order], kósmos [world], kósmios [well-mannered], kosmikós [earthly, worldly] kosméō. This verb means "to order," hence "to command" or "to regulate," also "to adorn," "to furnish," and "to bring honor to." The LXX has it for "to adorn" (e.g., Jer. 4:30; 2 Chr. 3:6); we find "to order" in Sir. 29:26. In the NT the only instance of "to put in order" is in Mt. 25:7; elsewhere the sense is "to adorn," e.g., women (1 Tim. 2:9), the temple (Lk. 21:5), graves (Mt. 23:29), and figuratively the doctrine (Tit. 2:10).

kósmos.

A. Nonbiblical Usage.

1. Of uncertain etymology, kósmos has various senses connected with "order." It thus denotes "what is well assembled or constructed from its individual parts."

2. When what is constructed consists of people, we find the sense of "human order," e.g., of rowers, of an army, or of a city or state.

3. The general sense of "order" (e.g., "right order") is also common.

4. Since what is well ordered is also beautiful, kósmos may denote "adornment" (women, buildings, walls, cultic actions, etc.).

5. kósmos as "World." I. The Greek View.

a. The senses previously mentioned all merge in that of the cosmic order. The use of kósmos for the universe is widespread and goes back to an early period. The idea is that there is an order of things that corresponds to the order of human law. Individual things are at odds, as people engage in disputes, but an immanent cosmic norm holds things together as law does society. The world itself is thus viewed as an ordered society.

b. The first use of kósmos for the universe refers to the order that constitutes it a totality rather than to the universe itself. Only later does the term come to mean the totality that is constituted by this order. When exactly the word acquires the spatial sense is much debated. The idea of a cosmos in the spatial sense is undoubtedly present in the fifth century B.C.; questions of space and infinity arise already in the natural philosophy of this period.

c. Plato uses kósmos in the spatial sense, though with an underlying sense of order. For Plato the kósmos, manifesting the "idea" in space, is a living creature. Embracing the visible, it reflects what can be known only by reason. An interesting point in Plato, as in other authors, is the merging of the ideas of cosmic space and heavenly space, so that heaven and cosmos tend to be exchangeable terms.

d. Aristotle makes the same equation of heaven and cosmos, but in this connection he is not using heaven in its narrower sense. The cosmos is the totality of things. It is for Aristotle a spherical body with the unmoved spherical earth at its heart. Embracing time and space, the cosmos is itself infinite. But it has no soul or reason; reason controls only the heavenly spheres, and only what is supracosmic enjoys the perfection that is incorruptible and impassible. There can be no plurality of worlds, whether successively or simultaneously.

e. After Aristotle Near Eastern influences affect ancient cosmology. The Aristotelian view prevails in philosophy in NT times. This puts the earth at the center of things. Firm and unmoved, it is the source and home of living creatures. The universe is above it on every side, and what is above all is the abode of the gods that is called heaven.

f. The distinctive features of the Greek view are as follows. (i) Unity characterizes the cosmos. Even though individual things might be called kósmoi, each of such kósmoi is a perfect unity of individual constituents. (ii) This cosmic unity derives from an immanent norm that integrates the individual things into a totality. Various attempts are made to describe this norm, e.g., in terms of the social order, mathematics, or the lógos that is also the norm of human thought and conduct. (iii) Beauty is a feature of the ordered cosmos. Its form and movement express this; to contemplate it is supreme bliss. (iv) Human beings stand in unique relation to the cosmos; law and lógos are special connecting points.

6. kósmos as "World." II. God and the Cosmos for the Greeks.

a. Greek philosophy discusses the theologically important questions of the origin and duration of the cosmos.

b. Heraclitus postulates an infinite cosmos, with no beginning or end, but with periodic glowing and dying down. What he opposes is not the creation of the cosmos but its formation from original matter.

c. In contrast Plato accepts the ordering or fashioning of the cosmos in space in accordance with an idea of perfect being. There is here no true distinction between Creator and creature, for Plato's demiurge is not truly God and the cosmos itself is in a lower sense divine.

d. For Aristotle the cosmos is eternal and God is not a demiurge (or architect of the world) but noús, pure form, the unmoved mover, the object and not the subject of love.

e. In Stoicism we find a becoming and perishing of the world but also the idea of eternal recurrence, so that the genesis is not an absolute beginning nor the perishing an absolute end. God is here neither demiurge nor unmoved mover but the world soul that permeates all things, the reason that rules all things. In later Stoicism, however, this pure pantheism yields to a new belief in transcendental divine power.

f. Philo, heir to both Judaism and Hellenism, makes great use of the term cosmos. On the basis of Gen. 1:1-2 he distinguishes the noetic cosmos and the empirical cosmos; the former is a spiritual model of the latter, and it is this world of ideas that is created on the first day. The empirical cosmos is a perfect world of order whose beauty Philo extols. God is the transcendent Creator, but Philo does justice to Stoic concerns by means of the mediating lógos. While speaking of a beginning of the cosmos, he seems to assume that it is made out of formless matter, and it has no apparent end. Like Plato, he calls God the Father of the cosmos, but develops this concept in Near Eastern fashion when he teaches the birth of the cosmos from God.

g. Plotinus postulates two worlds, the intelligible and the phenomenal. While both are ordered and beautiful, the former, which is the archetype, is far more so. It contains nothing finite, evil, imperfect, or discordant. The phenomenal world is beautiful as its copy or reflection.

h. The term kósmos also makes its way into religious and cultic speech. Although it banishes earlier nature myths, syncretistic Gnosticism combines it with cosmogonic materials from Near Eastern religions. The cosmos becomes here a kind of mythological personage and the subject of fantastic speculations, e.g., as a living creature with a soul, as the image of God, or even as the body of a god with its parts or elements as the members. The cosmos is also integrated with such entities as God, aeon, and time into a ladder of being.

7. kósmos as World in the Sense of Earth, Inhabited World, Humanity. As the term kósmos might mean "heaven," so it can be used for "earth" as distinct from heaven or the underworld. It can also denote the totality of creatures inhabiting the world, or the human inhabitants, i.e., humanity.

B. kósmos in the LXX. The Concept of the Cosmos in Judaism.

1. The adoption of the term kósmos by the LXX is an important event in its history, for this makes of it a biblical as well as a philosophical concept. The LXX uses kósmos for (a) the "host (of heaven)" (cf. Gen. 2:1; Dt. 4:19), thus combining such ideas as order, adornment, world, heaven, and stars; (b) "adornment" as the equivalent of various Hebrew terms, as in Ex. 33:5; Prov. 20:29; Is. 3:24; Nah. 2:10; (c) "adornment" with no Hebrew equivalent, as in Is. 49:18; Prov. 28:17; Sir. 6:30, etc.; 1 Macc. 1:22; 2:11; (d) "universe," substituting it in such books as Wisdom and Maccabees for the older term "heaven and earth."

2. Since kósmos for "universe" becomes common only in the later Greek works, it is obviously adopted by Hellenistic Judaism from contemporary usage and bears some imprint of philosophical teaching. The fact that God can be called the Creator, Lord, and King of the cosmos shows that it has probably come into liturgical use. The phrase "to come into the world" is a stereotyped one.

3. Under the influence of the use of kósmos a Hebrew term like 'ôlām takes on a new spatial sense (cf. the rabbinic adoption of kosmikós as a loanword). The Greek idea of humanity as microcosm also finds entry into rabbinic thinking.

C. kósmos in the NT.

l. General. kósmos in the Sense of Adornment. In the NT kósmos never means "order," and it occurs for "adornment" only in 1 Pet. 3:3 (women). In all the other references the meaning is "world." The distribution is uneven: 78 references in John, 22 in 1 John, one in 2 John, three in Revelation, 46 in Paul, 15 in the Synoptists, five each in Hebrews, James, and 2 Peter, and one in Acts. Jesus himself constantly uses "heaven and earth" for the cosmos. Whether kósmos ever means "totality" depends on the exposition of Jms. 3:6, which might mean that the tongue is the "epitome" of unrighteousness, but is more likely calling it a "world" of iniquity, or the evil "world" among our members.

2. kósmos as World. I. The Universe, the Sum of All Created Being.

a. As "universe," kósmos is synonymous with the OT "heaven and earth" (Acts 17:24). It is the place where all creatures dwell, and has a spatial reference (cf. Jn. 21:25). It may still be distinguished from the things that fill it (Acts 17:24; cf. 4:24), and under OT influence, which does not yet see the universe as a unity, it may be indicated by its constituent parts (Rev. 10:6). Yet the idea that the cosmos is the totality of all created things finds expression in verses like Jn. 1:10, where kósmos is the equivalent of "all things" (cf. 1 Cor. 8:6; 15:27-28; Phil. 3:21; Col. 1:16-17; Eph. 1:10; Heb. 1:2-3).

b. The kósmos is of limited duration. Thus we read of its beginning (Mt. 24:21), creation (Rom. 1:20), or foundation (Lk. 11:50; Heb. 4:3), and also of its end as the end of the age (Eph. 2:2). Transitoriness characterizes all that is created (2 Pet. 1:4). The world passes away (1 Jn. 2:17); it is thus "this world" in contrast to the imperishable world to come (1 Cor. 3:19; cf. 2:6; Jn. 12:31; 16:11). The NT, however, avoids ko'smos when speaking of the world to come. The present kósmos is alienated from its Creator. It is thus thought that the term is unsuitable to denote the eternal world of eschatological hope. The term aión is preferred for this. Similarly, the NT usually avoids kósmos in relation to God (apart from Acts 17:24). Thus it never calls God the King or Lord of the cosmos but has instead King of the ages (1 Tim. 1:17) or Lord of heaven and earth (Mt. 11:25; cf. Acts 17:24). For the present, this world stands in the power of the ruler of this world (Jn. 14:30); the fulfilment of God's lordship over it is the object of eschatological expectation. Only when the victory is fully won will it be sung that the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ (Rev. 11:15).

c. In detail it may be noted that the kósmos is a system of spheres, notably heaven and earth, with the sea or the underworld as a third sphere. The spatial aeons of Heb. 1:2; 11:3 are to be taken in this sense.

d. Various cosmological conceptions are linked with the term kósmos in the NT (cf. the elements or elemental spirits of Gal. 4:3; Col. 2:8, 20). It should be noted, however, that (1) these may be clearly indicated but they are not the theme of proclamation; (2) there are no distinctive NT conceptions, only such as are shared with contemporary systems; (3) the various pieces cannot be fitted into a coherent NT cosmology or worldview on account of the differences in different books (cf. Mk. 13; 1 Cor. 15; Revelation; John); and (4) there is already in the NT (Pastorals; 2 Peter; 1 John; Jude) an incipient demarcation from Gnosticism and its cosmological interests.

3. kósmos as World. II. The Abode of Humanity, the Theater of History, the Inhabited World, the Earth.

a. When seen as the theater of human life, the kósmos is the "inhabited world." This is the sense in Mt. 4:8; Lk. 12:30; Mk. 8:36; Rom. 4:13 (merging into the "nations"); Rom. 1:8, etc.

b. There is an approximation to the sense of "humanity" in phrases like "to come into the world" (e.g., Jn. 1:9; 3:19; 11:27; 1 Tim. 1:15; 1 Jn. 4:1; 2 Jn. 7), "to be in the world" (Jn. 1:10; 9:5; 13:1; 1 Jn. 4:17; 2 Cor. 1:12; 1 Jn. 4:3), and "to go out of the world" (1 Cor. 5:10; Jn. 13:1). What is suggested in such phrases is the theater of human life. The same applies when it is said that we brought nothing into this world (1 Tim. 6:7) or when death is a departing from this world. Only when Christ is said to come into or to be in the world does a greater stress fall on cosmos, for it now has a new and distinctive NT sense as the setting of God's saving work.

4. kósmos as World. III. Humanity, Fallen Creation, and the Setting of Salvation History.

a. As the inhabited world, the cosmos can narrow down yet again to the "human world" or "humanity" (cf. the LXX, the Koine, and the rabbis). This sense occurs, e.g., in the great commission in Mk. 16:15; cf. Lk. 2:10; Acts 1:8. In Mt. 26:13 kósmos might still be taken in a spatial sense, but in Mk. 16:15 the main idea is that of preaching to all the dwellers on earth. The meaning "human world" is also the main point in verses like Mt. 5:14; 13:38; 18:7; 2 Pet. 2:5; Heb. 11:7; 1 Cor. 4:13; 4:9 (angels are included here). The human world that is hostile to God is implied in 1 Cor. 1:27-28; Heb. 11:38.

b. Since the Bible regards the kósmos as the object of divine creation, the OT view of God as its Judge necessarily comes to bear upon it once it is regarded as the human world (cf. Gen. 18:25; Ps. 94:2). The implication is that the human world falls victim to divine judgment because it is the evil world. Judaism develops this thought to some extent, especially in apocalyptic, which shows some influence of Persian dualism. Yet Hellenistic Judaism, which inherits Hellenistic joy in the world, maintains a more optimistic view on the basis of the fact that the cosmos is God's creation. The NT, in spite of some difference in usage, e.g., between the Synoptists and John, or Paul and John, presents a new view which puts the kósmos in a different light, for it is now the theater of salvation history and Christ is its Savior (Jn. 4:42; 1 Jn. 4:14).

c. Paul equates the kósmos and this aeon. Thus the spirit of the cosmos is the antithesis of the Spirit from God (1 Cor. 2:12). The wise of the world do not understand God's wisdom (1 Cor. 2:6ff.). Godly sorrow leads to salvation but that of the world does not (2 Cor. 7:10). It is sin that has brought this deep gulf between God and the cosmos (Rom. 5:12). The whole cosmos (humanity) is thus guilty before God (Rom. 3:19) and under his judgment (3:6) and condemnation (1 Cor. 11:32). Only the saints, who will judge the cosmos, are outside this condemnation (cf. 1 Cor. 6:2). It was the rulers of the cosmos who crucified the Lord of glory (1 Cor. 2:8). Yet as the death of Christ brings the antithesis most fully to light, Christ also removes the antithesis, for God was in Christ reconciling the cosmos to himself (2 Cor. 5:19). The reference here is primarily to humanity, yet as the cosmos is the theater of God's saving work, the term takes on a broader significance. Christ's history is true human history, but the whole universe (Rom. 8:22; Col. 1:16) has a part in it. The final goal is the destruction of every other power and the handing of the kingdom to the Father (1 Cor. 15:24-25). This view yields a full unity of concept; the cosmos comprises the universe, all individual creatures, nature and history, humanity and the spirit world. When reconciled and redeemed, the cosmos ceases to be cosmos; it is the kingdom of God, the coming aeon, the new heaven and earth. Christ comes into the cosmos to save sinners (1 Tim. 1:15); the saved are taken out of the dominion of darkness and put in the kingdom of the Son (Col. 1:13). Believers live in the cosmos (1 Cor. 5:10), honor its Creator (Acts 17:24), receive his gifts (14:15ff.), and care for things of the cosmos (1 Cor. 7:32ff.), but their true life is no longer in the cosmos (Col. 2:20). The cosmos is crucified to them and they to the cosmos (Gal. 6:14). The cosmos, then, epitomizes unredeemed creation. Believers are not to be conformed to it (Rom. 12:2; cf. Jms. 1:27). To be its friend is to be God's enemy (Jms. 4:4).

d. These thoughts come to full development in the Johannine writings. The cosmos is the universe of which Christ is the light (Jn. 8:12) and to which he comes or is sent (3:17; 10:36; 11:27, etc.). Christ and his kingdom are not of it (8:23; 18:36). In divine love he has come to save it (3:16-17). As the Lamb of God he takes away its sin (1:29). But the cosmos knows neither him nor God (1:10; 17:25). Outwardly it goes after him (12:19), but it really meets him with hatred (7:7). Hence his mission entails its judgment (12:31; 16:11). In such references the cosmos is as it were a collective person represented by its prince. Christ and the cosmos are thus opponents (14:27; cf. 1 Jn. 4:4; 5:18-19). Salvation history is a struggle between Christ and the cosmos, or the evil one who rules it (1 Jn. 4:3; 5:19). Christ is victorious in this conflict (Jn. 16:33). Believers are elected out of the cosmos (15:19; 17:6). In them the cosmos is to see that the Father in love has sent the Son (17:21). The cosmos will turn its hatred on them (15:18-19; 17:14; 1 Jn. 3:13). But they will overcome the cosmos (16:33; cf. 1 Jn. 5:4-5). They are in the world as Christ was (Jn. 17:11; cf. 9:5), but, born of God, they are no longer of it (17:16). Thus, although they are sent into it (17:17), they are not to love it, i.e., as the world of the lust of the flesh and the eyes, and the pride of life. This is not negation of the world, or contempt for it; it is the faith that overcomes the evil world.

kósmios. At first a philosophical term for the well-ordered and balanced person, this term later takes on a weaker social sense, "well-mannered" or "honorable." In the NT the only instances are in 1 Timothy.

In 1 Tim. 2:9 the women are to adorn themselves in a decorous manner, and in 3:2 bishops should be disciplined and honorable.

kosmikós. This word means “cosmic,” i.e., “pertaining to the world.” In Heb. 9:1, 11 the OT sanctuary is “earthly” in contrast to that which is perfect; the suggestion here is that what belongs to the cosmos is transitory. In Tit. 2:12 God’s grace trains us to renounce “worldly‘” passions, i.e., those that belong to this world and are thus hostile to God (cf. 1 Jn. 2:16). In postcanonical works the martyrs despise “earthly” torments (Mart. Pol. 2.3). Did. 11.11 refers, in a difficult phrase, to the “earthly” mystery of the church, perhaps the ascetic life that symbolizes the mystery of Eph. 5:32, or prophetic actions that represent supernatural truths. [H. SASSE, III, 867-98]

kosmokrátōr → krátos

krázō [to cry], anakrázō [to cry out], kraugḗ [outcry], kraugázō [to cry]

Suggesting a croaking sound, krázō means a. “to croak or cry,” and b. “to demand with cries.” anakrázō means “to cry out,” kraugḗ “outcry,” and kraugázō “to cry.”

A. The Use of the Terms outside the NT.

1. In the Greek world the group has religious significance in connection with the demonic sphere (invoking the gods of the underworld) and magic (incantations). The Greeks and Romans mostly felt that such crying was unworthy of the gods. The verbs also occur for proclamation, e.g., of the mysteries of Eleusis.

2. The Greek OT uses the group for crying to God in times of need. God graciously hears such crying (Ex. 22:22; Judg. 3:9; Pss. 22:5; 34:7, 17, etc.), but he will not hear the cries of the wicked (Mic. 3:4; Jer. 11:11). In the Psalms this crying takes on a special form which expresses a confident appeal for a hearing and an answer (Pss. 27:7; 28:1). There is here no magical attempt to force God; the crying to God may be both sorrowful (Ps. 22:2) and joyful (Ps. 55:17). A different usage occurs in Is. 6, where the seraphim cry “Holy, holy, holy” (v. 3). Different again is Is. 42:2, where the Servant will not cry or lift up his voice. Jeremiah, however, is to cry to God, and he is granted a great vision of restoration (33:3ff.).

3. In Judaism Josephus uses the group for the proclamation of the prophets, while the rabbis use the equivalents to introduce quotations, i.e., in the formula: “The Holy Spirit (or a prophet) cries and says....”

B. The Use of the Terms in the NT.

1. In the NT the demons cry out when Jesus expels them. These are either inarticulate sounds (Mk. 5:5; 9:26) or cries of recognition (Mk. 3:11 etc.). They express the demonic resistance that Jesus overcomes. Cries for help are also addressed to Jesus, e.g., by the blind men in Mt. 9:27, the Canaanite woman in Mt. 15:22, the father of the possessed boy in Mk. 9:23, Peter on the lake in Mt. 14:30. Cries of jubilation meet Jesus on his entry into Jerusalem (Mt. 21:9, 15); if the disciples were silent, Jesus says that even the stones would cry out (Lk. 19:40). In contrast are the cries that demand his crucifixion (Mt. 27:23) and seek the release of Barabbas (Lk. 23:18). Jesus himself cries with a loud voice at his death (Mt. 27:50); this is not an inarticulate cry but a final prayer to God (Lk. 23:46). The ministry of Jesus bears the marks of the Servant of Is. 42:2 according to the quotation in Mt. 12:17ff.: “He will not wrangle or cry aloud.”

2. John uses kraugázein rather than (ana)krázein for the rejoicing on Christ’s entry (12:13), the demand for crucifixion (19:6), the cry that Pilate would not be Caesar’s friend if he let Jesus go (19:12), and the cry: “Away with him” (19:15). Jesus himself cries with a loud voice when he raises Lazarus; he puts forth all his resources to rob death of its prey (11:43). krázein has a special sense in John. It denotes the declaration of the message in spite of opposition (1:15; 7:28, 37-38; 12:44-45). The mysteries of Jesus’ person and work are solemnly intimated by it.

3. In Acts 19:28 the group is used for the tumultuous outcries of the mob, while in 7:60 it denotes Stephen's final prayer (cf. Lk. 23:46), in 14:14 it is crying to make oneself heard, in 23:6 it is crying to say something at a crucial point, and in 16:17 it is the crying of the possessed girl. In Revelation krázein has the various senses of calling on God (6:10), jubilation (7:10), proclamation (18:2), command (7:2), and lamentation (18:18-19).

4. Rom. 8:15 and Gal. 4:6 refer to the special cry of sonship, i.e., crying "Abba, Father." The point in both passages is that Christ's work results in a new relation to God in which believers are led by the Spirit (Rom. 8:14). The difference is that in Gal. 4:6 it is the Spirit who cries, whereas in Rom. 8:15 believers themselves utter the cry. There is no suggestion in either case that this is an ecstatic outcry; indeed, Rom. 8:16 implies full self-awareness. This crying is more likely that of a calling on God in which the Father of Jesus is now addressed as the Father of believers, possibly in the words that Jesus himself taught his disciples. The reference to the Spirit reminds us of the rabbinic formula ("The Spirit cries and says...."), but the Spirit is now known in his dynamic reality and gives the full confidence of a hearing as believers come to God, not as servants, but as children.

5. The noun kraugḗ occurs as a cry of joy when Elizabeth greets Mary (Lk. 1:42), and when the bridegroom comes at midnight (Mt. 25:6). In Acts 23:9 it is used for the clamor after Paul's speech; believers are to avoid this kind of kraugḗ in Eph. 4:31. In Rev. 21:4 it is the anxious crying that is banished from God's eternal kingdom (cf. Jesus' prayers on the way of suffering in Heb. 5:7). [W. GRUNDMANN, III, 898-903]

kráspedon [hem, border, tassel]

Originally meaning "tip of the head," this word is used for "hem," "border," and "wing" (of an army). In the NT it is used for the "tassels" which were worn on the corners of outer garments as a reminder of the commandments. Jesus accuses the Pharisees of making these unduly long in self-righteous display (Mt. 23:5). The word is also used for the "hem" of Jesus' own garment which the sick woman touches (Mt. 9:20; Lk. 8:44). Although the action verges on the magical, Jesus perceives her faith and assures her of healing. [J. SCHNEIDER, III, 904]

krátos [power, strength], (theokratía [rule of God]), kratéō [to be strong, to seize], krataiós [strong, mighty], krataióō [to be (come) strong], kosmokrátōr[world ruler], pantokrátōr [the Almighty] krátos (theokratía).

1. This word, denoting the presence of strength, means a. "natural strength," b. the "power" that one has, or with which one is invested (e.g., divine power, political power, especially in the legal sense), c. "control," and d. "supremacy," "superiority," "victory."

2. In the LXX only 20 of 50 instances are in the Hebrew canon. The reference may be to human strength (Dt. 8:17) or the strength of the bow (Ps. 76:3) or even the sea (Ps. 89:9), but mostly it is to God's strength (Ps. 62:11).

3. krátos occurs in Philo but is less common than dýnamis and ischýs. It usually means "strength" or "supremacy" and is often used for God's "might," with adjectives to denote its uniqueness. For Philo all things are subject to God's power; all other power is lent or derived. Knowledge of God's power induces both fear and trust.

4. The NT never says that humans can either have or gain krátos. In Heb. 2:14 the devil has the power of death; he controls it and uses it as an instrument (cf. 1 Cor. 15:24, 26). Elsewhere in the NT krátos always refers to the power of God (although in Acts 19:20 katá krátos is an adverbial phrase for "mightily"). The only Synoptic use is in Lk. 1:51, which stresses God's overwhelming might. Eph. 1:19-20 finds a demonstration of this power in believers on the basis of Christ's resurrection, while in Eph. 6:10 believers are to be strong in the strength of Christ's might. Col. 1:11 refers to the effective working of the divine glory in the lives of believers. In doxologies krátos occurs alone in 1 Pet. 5:11, with time in 1 Tim. 6:16, with dóxa in 1 Pet. 4:11; Rev. 1:6; 5:13, and with exousía in Jude 25. It denotes God's supreme and victorious power.

5. theokratía, which does not occur in the NT, is a term that we owe to Josephus. He coins it in analogy to aristocracy, democracy, and plutocracy. It is not, then, a term for the kingdom of God (which Josephus does not use), but has a narrower sense than what is meant by God's rule in the OT. By it he tries to describe the constitution of the Jewish state in terms familiar to his readers. Although the divine kingdom and what Josephus calls theocracy obviously overlap, so that one cannot over-rigidly distinguish the two concepts, it is important to see that for Josephus theocracy has a distinctive constitutional reference which is alien to the NT understanding of the kingdom. Since Josephus himself has theokratía only once in Against Apion 2.164-65, and the term is not immediately taken up by others, it is of no direct significance on the NT scene.

kratéō.

1. This verb, meaning "to be strong," has such nuances as "to conquer," "to seize," "to arrest," "to have the use of," and "to distrain."

2. It occurs some 170 times in the LXX in such senses as "to be strong," "to have power," "to rule," "to take control," and "to hold." The meanings in Philo are "to rule," "to conquer," and "to be lord over."

3. In the NT the main sense is "to seize." The term is used for the arrest of the Baptist (Mk. 6:17), the attempt of Jesus' family to seize him (Mk. 3:21), the attempts of his enemies to arrest him (Mk. 12:12), and the arrest of Paul (Acts 24:6). A common NT phrase is "to take by the hand" (Mk. 1:31 etc.; cf. Gen. 19:16; Is. 42:6). In Lk. 24:16 the eyes of the two disciples were "held" so that they did not recognize Jesus. Death could not "hold" Jesus (Acts 2:24), but the sailors thought that they had "obtained" their purpose with a south wind (Acts 27:13). In Revelation we find such nuances as "holding on" to a possession in 2:25, and "holding" a teaching in 2:14. "Holding fast" is the point in Mk. 7:3-4; 2 Th. 2:15; Heb. 4:14, "grasping" in Heb. 6:18. In Jn. 20:23, as the opposite of aphíēmi, kratéō means "to retain."

krataiós. This word, meaning "strong," "mighty," occurs 68 times in the LXX, 31 times with cheír, usually in connection with God's mighty hand, especially in the election and deliverance of Israel. The only NT instance is in 1 Pet. 5:6, which exhorts us to submit to the mighty blows of God (cf. Job 30:21).

krataióō. This word, which means "to make strong," occurs 64 times in the LXX. In the NT we find only the passive "to become strong." In Lk. 1:80; 2:40 it denotes childhood growth. In 1 Cor. 16:13, with andrízesthe, the exhortation is to "be strong" (cf. 2 Sam. 10:12). Eph. 3:16 traces such strengthening to the inward operation of the Holy Spirit (cf. 2 Sam. 22:33).

kosmokrátōr. This rare and late word is used for the gods, and in astrology for the planets, as heavenly rulers. In Eph. 6:12 it is one of the terms used to describe the evil forces with which believers have to contend. It denotes the force and comprehensiveness of their designs.

pantokrátōr. This word, meaning "the almighty," "the ruler of all things," is used occasionally for the gods. The LXX adopts it as an equivalent for ṣəḇā'ôṯ or šadday. Philo has it only twice and Josephus not at all, but we find it in Jewish prayers. In the NT it comes after a series of OT quotations in 2 Cor. 6:18, and Revelation uses it for God (or Christ) in 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7, 14; 19:6, 15; 21:22. The reference is to God's universal supremacy, but in a static sense as compared with the more dynamic sense of omnipotence. [W. MICHAELIS, III, 905-15]

kremánnymi [to hang on, from], (kremáō [to hang]), krémamai [to hang], ekkrémamai [to hang out, on]

These words have the basic sense of "to hang on or from," and are used for the hanging of vessels, e.g., shields, helmets, quivers, as well as amulets (Ezek. 13:18). The earth hangs on nothing (Job 26:7). Absalom hangs in the branches of the tree (2 Sam. 18:9-10). The snake hangs from Paul's hand (Acts 28:4).

1. Mt. 18:6. The reference here is to a millstone hanging from or around the neck. This is not a Jewish punishment. Only God can establish this fault and impose the penalty. It is debatable whether the sense is comparative: "It would be better," or positive: "It is fitting." The suggestion seems to be that this terrible earthly punishment is preferable to the loss of eternal salvation (cf. vv. 8ff.). Salvation at the cost of life is found in rabbinic teaching (cf. also 1 Cor. 5:5).

2. Gal. 3:13. A common use of the verb in the Bible is for judicial hanging. Corpses are hung up after stoning (Dt. 21:22-23). But the term may cover not only this hanging up of the dead but also putting to death by hanging, impaling, or crucifixion (cf. Gen. 40:19, 22; Lam. 5:12). Thus it is used for the crucifixion of Jesus in Lk. 23:39; Acts 5:30; 10:39. This is what makes possible Paul's reference to Dt. 21:23. The rabbinic tradition makes the same identification when it places Jesus under a curse (like Haman or Absalom). Paul accepts the fact that Jesus comes under the curse of Dt. 21:23, but by his vicarious bearing of this curse he redeems us from the curse of the law and brings the promised blessing of Abraham to all peoples.

3. Mt. 22:40. The verb has here the figurative sense "to be dependent on." There are parallels for this sense in the Greek world (usually with a preposition), and we also find efforts to reduce moral laws to basic principles both in classical and rabbinic authors. In the NT the law of love is everywhere regarded as preeminent (cf. Rom. 13:9; Gal. 5:14). The fact that love of neighbor is sometimes mentioned alone, sometimes made secondary, and sometimes set alongside love of God, is of no essential significance. The metaphor of Mt. 22:40 makes all other commands depend on the law of love as on a nail. They are not ways of fulfilling this command, nor are they judged by their closeness to it. Rather, this command is their sustaining basis. God is the God of love, and his children must be impelled by his love and reflect it in their lives. The many commands do not derive logically from the one, nor may they be logically reduced to it. The one command of love is the fundamental law of all action in faith. Acting in the power of love, believers are freed from other demands and enjoy the liberty of sonship.

4. Lk. 19:48. The sense here is that of close attention ("hanging on Jesus' words"). We have in this alternative to Mt. 22:23 one of the human touches in Luke. [G. BERTRAM, III, 915-21]

krínō [to judge], krísis [judgment], kríma [decision], kritḗs [judge], kritḗrion [means of judgment], kritikós [able to judge], anakrínō [to investigate], anákrisis [hearing], apokrínō [to answer], antapokrínomai [to reply], apókrima [decision], apókrisis [answer], diakrínō [to judge], diákrisis [discernment], adiákritos [impartial], enkrínō [to class with], katakrínō [to condemn], katákrima [condemnation], katákrisis [condemnation], akatákritos [uncondemned], autokatákritos [self-condemned], prókrima [prejudgment], synkrínō [to interpret]

A. Linguistic Data. The word krínō means “to sunder,” then “to select,” “to decide,” “to judge,” “to assess,” “to go to law,” “to seek justice,” also “to expound,” then “to believe,” “to resolve.” The LXX mostly has krínō for legal terms, though it may also denote deliverance for the oppressed (Ps. 72:2). The NT sense is usually “to judge” with God or man as subject and in either an official or a personal sense. We also find “to determine” in Acts 16:4, “to value” in Rom. 14:5, “to regard as” in Acts 13:46, “to think” in Acts 15:19, and “to rule” in Mt. 19:28 (a biblical sense). Theologically the most important use is for divine judgment (e.g., Rom. 2:16).

[F. BÜSCHEL, III, 921-23]

B. The OT Term mišpāṭ.

1. The Stem špṭ. This stem carries the double sense “to rule” and “to judge.” In judging the point is not to reach a decision but to restore a relationship (Gen. 16:5). This is the emphasis in Is. 2:4 (though cf. 1 Sam. 24:13). Ruling and judging go together (1 Sam. 8:20; 2 Sam. 15:4); it is hard to say which has priority (cf. Ex. 2:14). To do justice is part of the royal office. The noun, formed with m, denotes judgment as a decision but also as a process. It carries the nuances of legal use, norm, and claim, but with a distinctive transition to the concepts of divine grace and salvation.

2. God as the Giver and Guardian of mišpāṭ. It is an ancient OT idea that God is Judge. He is both legislator and legal partner, watching over the relationships of the people and acting for it against its enemies. As the people’s Ruler, God is also its Judge. His judging manifests his lordship and gives it an ethical orientation. God has made a covenant with the people. Hence all law is referred to him. The historical relation makes it possible to use legal terms theologically; this is not possible with nature gods, to which such attributes as justice and righteousness are fundamentally alien. The historical situation presupposed by “I am the Lord thy God” means that God has taken the initiative and bases covenant commands on the covenant promise. There is no place for secular law in Israel; all legal enactments have their source in the covenant. As Judge, God is also the Guardian and Helper of his people against foreign threats (Judg. 11:27; 2 Sam. 18:31; Dt. 33:21). Israel’s victories are his judgments. His protection of Israel is the universal establishment of his just rule.

3. mišpāṭ as a Relationship. Divine mišpāṭ is not just a legal principle or moral norm. It regulates the relationships in a specific society. God is involved with his people. He is concerned both to keep his promise and to enforce the observance of his command. His judicial decisions serve his covenant purpose, which is a purpose of salvation. Other peoples may have similar relations with other gods (cf. 1 Kgs. 18:28; 2 Kgs. 17:24ff.), but these stand in sharp contrast, as is seen in their modes of worship.

4. The Ethical and Religious Meaning of mišpāṭ. In the covenant God makes the people his own people. All the legal enactments expound the basic decision: “I will be your God, and you shall be my people.” The revelation of this mišpāṭ underlies the obligations, but also the claims, that arise for the whole people and for each individual within it. Although there is no abstract norm of morality, God’s judging necessarily means justice. The prophets give this implication ethical concreteness, especially in the ability to differentiate between right and wrong (cf. 1 Kgs. 3:9; Mic. 3:1-2; Is. 1:17; Am. 5:7), or in the championing of the cause of the poor and needy (Dt. 10:18; Is. 10:2; Am. 5:11; Jer. 5:28; Ezek. 22:29), who may not be morally superior but are at least in the right against their oppressors. A corollary is that, since the ways of God are upright, all that opposes him will finally be made subject (cf. Is. 2). God will bind up the broken and destroy the strong (Ezek. 34:16). Yet the primary orientation of mišpāṭ is religious; it goes forth as light, demanding that the people do right on the basis of God’s self-revelation (Hos. 6:5-6; cf. Mic. 3:8; Zeph. 3:5). Jer. 9:23-24 expresses the same thought: One’s only boast should be to know God, but to know God is to know his mišpāṭ, with an implication of an obligation to execute it too. In this light one can understand the prophetic summons to repentance. If God's judgments reveal his will, the full seriousness of commitment becomes clear. The people is set under God's blessing and curse; failure to keep God's revealed judgment means the possibility of breaking covenant. Hence the day of the Lord may be a day of judgment on Israel instead of victory over its foes (Am. 1; Hos. 4:1ff.; Is. 1:2, 18ff.; Zeph. 3:8). Judgment on Israel is at the heart of universal judgment. The only privilege of election is that of judgment with special severity. At the most only a remnant survives, and the covenant is so broken that it can continue only if God in his grace and mercy reinstitutes it.

5. The Change in Meaning of mišpāṭ. That mišpāṭ may thus come to mean grace and mercy is evident in Is. 30:18ff. Here it signifies salvation for an afflicted remnant. This ties in with the existing sense of judgment for the needy and oppressed. Yet this is now an act, not of justice, but of love. If mišpāṭ means destruction for the proud, it means help for the weak (Ex. 34:16). The Israel of the exile is weak. It may thus claim the mišpāṭ that protects the weak (Dt. 32:4). Yet it recognizes that meeting this claim is an exercise of mercy as well as justice (Dt. 10:18). This alters the legal content of mišpāṭ, for forgiveness is in tension with retribution, and judgment is shown to the people even though it has not kept the judgments of God. The lordship of God defies purely legal categorizing. As may be seen from Job, God's justice is beyond human comprehension. No one teaches God the path of justice (Is. 40:14). Yet this is not just a matter of omnipotence; it is a matter of God's faithfulness to the covenant of grace. This is his mišpāṭ (Dt. 32:4; Pss. 105:5ff.; 111). The elect people is judged for its sin. For this reason mišpāṭ is far from it (Is. 59:9ff.). The presence of righteous individuals does not alter this. The only hope is divine mišpāṭ which will cancel sin and set up the covenant afresh (cf. Jer. 30-31; Hos. 2:20ff.; Is. 28:17). The Messiah will establish the kingdom with justice and righteousness (Is. 9:6ff.). The people, having God's Spirit, will observe his judgments (Ezek. 36:27). Judgment of the wicked is the reverse side of this saving mišpāṭ (Is. 1:27-28), but this is not a causal succession, since the only basis of salvation is pardoning grace. Tension remains, however, in view of the fact that mišpāṭ denotes both salvation and judgment.

6. mišpāṭ in Its Relation to the Nations. God's mišpāṭ is part of his rule. It thus applies to the nations that have observed their own judgments instead of God's (Ezek. 5:6ff.). In a sense such judgments come from God (Ezek. 22:25) in execution of his negative judgment. Yet God's mišpāṭ may also be positive in relation to the nations. Thus God puts his Spirit on his Servant so that he may bring mišpāṭ to the nations. In a universal extension this means salvation for the nations and mercy for the oppressed. God himself sends forth his mišpāṭ as a light for the peoples (Is. 51:4); this will mean deliverance and salvation for them (v. 5). mišpāṭ then, is the gracious revelation of God which is the basis of his relationship not merely to the chosen people but to all peoples. [V. HERNTRICH, III, 923-33]

C. The Concept of Judgment in the Greek World. For the Greeks the gods are the guardians of right and custom. At first, they are themselves capricious, so that they have to be placated. They are also the executors of fate. But the belief develops that Zeus rules as judge and causes right to triumph and wrong to be punished in this world. There is at first no thought of future judgment; death is the common lot. The Orphics, with their belief in transmigration, are the first to proclaim a judgment in the underworld, although this is not final retribution but assignment of the next transitional stage. Adopted by Pindar, Plato, etc., the idea of fire judgment becomes part of the philosophical tradition. The enlightenment destroys the belief in gods of judgment, but the concept of judgment after death persists in both popular belief and philosophical teaching.

D. The Concept of Judgment in Judaism. It is a cardinal article of Judaism that God judges, that he resists evil and rewards good, that he upholds the law, and enforces it in spite of infractions. Individual judgments are seen for individual sins, but since this does not always work out, there develops an expectation of future judgment on sinners (both Jewish and Gentile) which will also bring salvation to Israel. Since judgment will fall on individual Jewish sinners, Pharisaic groups experience some tension between fear of judgment and the confidence granted by scrupulous observance of the law. On the details of judgment, there is the widest possible variety of views. The hope of forgiveness, of course, never dies.

E. The Concept of Judgment in the NT. 1. The Baptist. John the Baptist proclaims the direct imminence of divine judgment and therefore the urgent need to repent and be baptized with a view to divine forgiveness and the amendment of life (Mt. 3:7ff.).

2. The Synoptic Preaching of Jesus. Jesus issues a similar call to repentance because of the seriousness of sin and of God's judgment on it (cf. Mt. 5:22ff.; 7:21ff.; 10:28, 33; 13:47ff.; 24:50-51; 11:20ff.; 23:13ff.). Merits are of no avail (Lk. 17:7ff.). The law is the standard, i.e., the law of love. Judgment may be executed by God (Mt. 10:32-33) or by Jesus himself (Mt. 7:22-23), and it falls on both Jews and Gentiles (Mt. 25:32), for all are responsible to God. The ground of deliverance is forgiveness. A gift of grace, this is promised by Jesus (Mk. 2:9; Lk. 7:36ff.), so that his disciples may look forward to the last day, and pray for the coming of the kingdom (Mt. 6:10). Forgiveness is enjoyed only in personal fellowship with Jesus. It must be prayed for (Mt. 6:12) and involves a readiness to forgive others (Mt. 6:14). This does not mean that divine forgiveness is made conditional on our human forgiveness; it means that the absence of human forgiveness is meaningless and nonsensical where divine forgiveness is known. The fact that the preacher is the judge (cf. Mk. 14:62) gives a unique urgency to the message of Jesus. It means that the message itself entails eternal decision. If rejected, it leaves no other ground of hope at the last judgment. If accepted, it brings true liberation from judgment. Jesus' opponents cannot understand this assurance of liberation (Mk. 2:7), and they thus bring Jesus to the death by which this liberation is effected. Jesus' concept of judgment is crucial. If it is wrong, his ministry has no relevance for our relationship with God. If it is right, our situation is hopeless and intolerable apart from his forgiving word.

3. Paul. Paul proclaims the coming day of God's righteous judgment (Rom. 2:1ff.). All must come before God's judgment seat (2 Cor. 5:10). God's wrath on wicked works is already manifest (Rom. 1: 18ff.), but his goodness leaves space for repentance (Rom. 2:4). The final decision is still future, and this makes the question of justification the critical one in human life. The answer lies in God's justifying grace set forth in Christ (Rom. 5:9-10). On this basis sinners can have assurance of salvation in the judgment (Rom. 8:31ff.; 1 Cor. 3:15).

4. John. John, too, expects a last judgment when the dead shall be raised (Jn. 5:28-29; 1 Jn. 4:17). Judgment is committed to the Son (Jn. 5:22). Jesus has come to save, not to judge (Jn. 3:17), but his word will still judge on the last day (12:48). Indeed, judgment takes place already on unbelievers (3:18-19). Similarly, believers will not come into judgment (5:24). They need have no fear of the last day (1 Jn. 4:17). This word and its ruler are also judged already (Jn. 12:31; 16:11) with the self-dedication of the Son (12:27ff.). In the assurance of faith, the eternal is present in time.

5. Revelation. Revelation presents a terrifying picture of judgment (20:11ff.) and issues serious warnings to the churches (2-3). Christ himself has a crucial role in the judgment which establishes God's rule and initiates the new heaven and earth.

6. Peter and Hebrews. 1 Peter urges fear of God as Judge (2:17) and warns that judgment must begin in God's house (4:17). Hebrews has a plea against taking judgment too lightly (10:26ff.) and an exhortation to serve God with reverence and awe, for he is a consuming fire (12:28-29).

7. Human Judgment. In the light of God's judgment, we should not judge one another (Mt. 7:1-2; Jms. 4:11; Rom. 14:4, 10; 1 Cor. 4:5). This does not mean flabby indifference to moral wrong but recognition of solidarity in guilt. Thus church discipline must not be harsh and condemnatory; it must use the methods of edification and pastoral care. The very seriousness of divine judgment preserves the church from legalistic judgmentalism.

8. Conclusion. In the NT judgment does not have the capricious and emotional aspects that mark divine judgments in myth. All human acts are a sowing (Gal. 6:7-8). God's judgment is a repayment (Rom. 1:27). There is an organic relation between act and consequence. God judges in holy wrath, not in mere passion. As Creator he has established a moral order of being. His demands correspond to the very structure of human life and thus decide its destiny. Obedience or disobedience to them will mean integration with the created order or friction with it. If obedience brings life, disobedience means restriction of life and finally death (Rom. 6:23). This judgment begins in this life and is consummated in the next (Rom. 1:18ff. and 2:3ff.). The restriction is not just external; it is primarily internal, leading to the hollowness portrayed by Jesus in Lk. 16:19ff.; 18:10ff.; 12:16ff., and the impoverishment depicted by Paul in Rom. 1:21ff. It is God who has established the relation between the order of being and his demands, and it is God, therefore, who may justly judge. The images associated with judgment may be traditional, but judgment itself lays bare our hidden essence (Rom. 2:16), exposing the hypocrisy of acting only for show, for hope of reward, or for fear (cf. Mt. 6:1ff.; 1 Cor. 4:5-6), and summoning us to true love of God on the basis and in the power of God's love for us. The very proclamation of God's love presupposes that without God's saving work we are moving hopelessly to judgment. To excise or restrict the thought of divine judgment is thus to destroy the gospel.

krísis. This word, denoting an act, has such senses as a. "estrangement," "conflict," b. "selection," c. "decision," "judgment," "verdict," even "accusation," and d. "decision" in a battle or illness.

1. In the NT it means first "judicial decision," "judgment."

2. In John it is the world "judgment" of Christ, future (Jn. 5:28-29), yet already present (3:18ff.). The sense of "decision" is included, but this does not wholly replace that of "judgment."

3. The LXX uses krísis for the "right" of the oppressed (Ps. 101:1), and this explains the use in Mt. 23:23; Lk. 11:42, where the reproach is not that the Pharisees neglect judgment but that they are indifferent to the rights of the poor (cf. Mt. 12: 18ff. quoting Is. 42:1ff. and Acts 8:32-33 quoting Is. 53:7-8).

kríma. This word means the "decision" of a judge a. as an action (Jn. 9:39; Acts 24:25, etc.) and b. as a sentence, usually condemnation (human as well as divine). In 1 Cor. 6:7 the reference is to a legal action or process. In Rev. 18:20, on an LXX basis, the thought of a legal claim is present (cf. Zech. 7:9; Jer. 21:12).

kritḗs. In the NT the kritḗs is usually a judge, whether official (Mt. 5:25 etc.) or not (Jms. 2:4). The OT judges are kritaí in Acts 13:20. God is kritḗs in 2 Tim. 4:8; Heb. 12:23; Jms. 4:12, and Christ in Acts 10:42.

kritḗrion. This word denotes the means of judging, the place of judgment, or judgment. The sense in 1 Cor. 6:2, 4 is "legal process."

kritikós. This word has reference to the manner, ability, right, or action of a judge. In Heb. 4:12 it describes God's word as able to judge inner thoughts and intents.

anakrínō, anákrisis. anakrínō means "to investigate," and refers mostly to judicial interrogation (Lk. 23:14; Acts 4:9; 12:19, etc.). Paul uses it ironically in 1 Cor. 4:3. In 1 Cor. 14:24 it means "to inquire into." It can be used for the searching of Scripture in Acts 17:11 and for spiritual discernment in 1 Cor. 2:14-15. The spiritual judge all things and are judged by none, not in superiority, but because they are subject to the Lord and are thus the servants of others. They respect the consciences of others (Rom. 14) but correct them when they live after the flesh (2 Cor. 12:19ff.). The communities are united only through Christ; they are thus pneumatic organisms with a unity of love and not of compulsion.

apokrínō, antapokrínomai. apokrínō has such senses as “to separate,” “to secrete,” “to dedicate,” and “to condemn,” while apokrínomai means “to separate oneself,” “to vindicate oneself,” and “to answer.” The NT has apokrínomai only for “to answer” (a question, request, etc.), usually with légein etc. Often there is no answer to anything that has just been said, so that the force is “to begin to speak” (an idiom of the LXX based on the Hebrew). antapokrínomai is a stronger form in Lk. 14:6; Rom. 9:20; it carries the implication that the objections raised are groundless.

apókrima. This rare word denotes an official resolution that decides a matter. This is the point in 2 Cor. 1:9. From a human angle Paul is like a person who has received a sentence of condemnation. He does not name the author of the decision; he is condemned to death, not by it.

apókrisis. This common word means a. “separation,” “secretion,” and b. “answer.” The NT has it only in sense b. (Lk. 2:47; 20:26; Jn. 1:22; 19:9).

diakrínō.

1. A stronger form of krínō, this word has many senses. In the NT it means “to distinguish between persons” (Acts 15:9), then “to judge” (1 Cor. 6:5; Mt. 16:3). In the middle diakrínomai means “to contend” (Jude 9) and “to doubt” (Mk. 11:23; Mt. 21:21; Jms. 1:6; Rom. 4:20).

2. NT doubt comes to expression in prayer and action, not in thought. What is doubted is God’s word. Doubt is not philosophical skepticism nor is it the uncertainty of conflicting motives. In Mk. 11:23 it is a final lack of faith that God can really do what is requested. It involves wavering or inconstancy (Jms. 1:6). Abraham is an example of truth faith; he accepts God’s promise without distrust or wavering (Rom. 4:20). The element of inner division is apparent in Rom. 14:23, where the doubter has no certainty of faith that what is done is right (cf. Acts 10:20). Inconsistency is the point in Jms. 2:4. Despising the poor is at odds with the faith that is professed by going to the assembly.

3. This kind of doubt does not appear in the OT, where rejection of God’s word is a deliberate attitude rather than a lack of certainty or consistency. Job is a fighter rather than a doubter. Later Judaism censures pusillanimity in prayer (cf. Mk. 11:23), but doubt in the NT sense comes only with the full unconditionality of grace in Christ, which intensifies the demand for a full committal of faith.

4. Greek normally uses distázō for “to doubt” (cf. in the NT Mt. 14:31; 28:17). The NT has dialogismós in the same sense. diakrínesthai for “to doubt” is rare even in later Christian writings, which prefer distázō. The Semitic originals express the thought of “divided or divergent opinion.”

diákrisis. This word has such varied meanings as “separation,” “distinction,” “strife,” “appraisal,” and “exposition.” In the NT it usually means “discernment” or “differentiation” (between spirits in 1 Cor. 12:10, between good and evil in Heb. 5:14). In Rom. 14:1 the point is obscure. The meaning might be “not for disputes,” but another possibility is “not for evaluation.”

adiákritos. This word, too, has many senses, e.g., “indistinguishable,” “imprecise,” “obscure,” “impartial,” “without distinction.” In the only LXX instance (Prov. 25:1) it perhaps means “uncertain.” In Jms. 3:17, the one occurrence in the NT, it means “without doubts or hypocrisy.” In the apostolic fathers we find it in Ignatius for “unshakable” (Ephesians 3.2; Trallians 1.1, etc.).

enkrínō. Found in the NT only in 2 Cor. 10:12, this word means “to count among,” “to class with.”

katakrínō, katákrima, kátakrisis. katakrínō means “to condemn.” In human judgment it is the verdict as distinguished from its execution, but the two converge in divine judgment (cf. Mk. 16:16; 1 Cor. 11:32; 2 Pet. 2:6). Both sentence and execution seem to be in view in Rom. 8:3; Paul has in mind the totality of what God has done and does through Christ, i.e., the whole movement from the incarnation to the imparting of the Spirit (v. 4). The condemnation is universally valid but is efficacious only for those who are in Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17). It is the removal of the enmity between God and us (Rom. 8:7). The law condemns us and we perish, but in Christ God condemns sin and we are free.

katákrima, too, refers in the NT to the total divine “condemnation” (Rom. 5:16, 18; 8:1). In Rom. 8:1 it covers the results as well (cf. v. 2).

katákrisis, “condemnation,” is used in the NT only by Paul in 2 Cor. 3:9; 7:3. By reason of sin the old covenant is one of condemnation that can only bring death (3:6ff.). Paul does not speak in condemnation but in self-sacrificial love (7:2ff.).

akatákritos, autokatákritos. The former of these words occurs in the NT only in a legal connection in Acts 16:37, where Paul protests that he and Silas have been badly treated while still “uncondemned.” The later term, meaning “self-condemned,” occurs in Tit. 3:11 for the person who is unrepentant even after a twofold admonition.

prókrima. This word occurs in the NT only in 1 Tim. 5:21. It has here, not the stricter legal sense of a “precedent,” but the more general moral sense of “prejudgment.”

synkrínō. This word has the varied senses “to unite,” “to compare,” “to measure,” “to evaluate,” and “to interpret.” In 2 Cor. 10:12 it means “to compare.” Paul will not be compared with the arrogant pseudo-apostles; let them compare themselves with one another. The sense in 1 Cor. 2:13 is hard to fix. “To unite” is too weak, “to compare” brings in an alien thought, “to evaluate” hardly fits the context, and it thus seems best to render “to interpret” or “to expound”: interpreting the truths revealed by the Spirit. [F. BÜSCHEL, III, 933-54]
[8]

kroúō [to knock]

kroúō means “to strike,” “to knock” in various contexts, e.g., driving in nails, or knocking at doors. The NT has the secular sense of knocking at a door in Acts 12:13, 16, but it also makes double use of knocking at the door as a metaphor.

1. In Mt. 7:7-8 and Lk. 11:9-10 knocking signifies the seeking of entry by believers. Seeking and knocking stress the material content of asking. The point is not the general one that prayer may count on an answer, or that action is the presupposition of fulfilment, but the specific one that God’s promise of salvation gives us the assurance in faith that when we knock the door will be opened and access made possible. In contrast, there is a useless knocking in Lk. 13:25. This knocking is a tardy attempt to gain entry

---

[8] Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (450). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

NT New Testament

after an earlier refusal to knock in faith (cf. v. 24) when the door would have been readily opened. Those who engage in this futile knocking do not trust in him who opens and shuts (Rev. 3:7). Refusing to knock and enter when they should, they have shut themselves out.

2. In Lk. 12:36 and Rev. 3:20 the Lord himself knocks. Lk. 12:35-36 is an exhortation to watchfulness, so that there may be an instant readiness to receive Christ at his coming. In Rev. 3:20 it is the risen Lord who speaks. On the basis of Cant. 5:2, 6 this is often taken to refer to personal union with Christ, but in context it carries a serious admonition and promise to the church of Laodicea. The saying transcends both eschatology and mysticism and proclaims the gospel of the coming of Christ, both present and future, with the decision that this demands and the life that it brings for those who receive him. [G. BERTRAM, III, 954-57]

kryptō [to hide], apokrýptō [to hide], kryptós [hidden, secret], kryphaíos [hidden], kryphḗ [secretly], krýptē [cellar], apókryphos [hidden]

A. Occurrence and Meaning. krýptō has the basic sense "to cover," "to conceal" (either protectively or for selfish reasons). It then means a. "to bury," and b. "to set" (of constellations, also used in eclipses). Figuratively it means "to keep secret" (with accusative, double accusative, or preposition, often shameful things), but also "to overlook" and hence "to pardon." krýptein may also denote the keeping of entrusted secrets, as in the mysteries. apokrýrtō means "to cover," "to conceal," and figuratively "to keep secret" (usually in a good sense). Intransitively both terms may be used for "to disappear from sight." kryptós means "covered," "hidden," and figuratively "secret. The kryptoí are secret police in Sparta, and the word at times acquires a nuance of cunning. Secret sins are particularly shameful or abominable. kryphaíos is a rare word for "hidden," kryphḗ means "secretly," krýptē is a "vault" or "cellar," and apókryphos means "hidden" (e.g., treasure) or "secret."

B. Theological Significance of the Terms.

I. The Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. Popular Religion. The hiddenness of deity produces a numinous element in Greek religion. The riddle of death and the related cult of chthonic deities and heroes strengthens this. Yet the numinous aspect should not be overrated, for the deity does not have absolute knowledge or control (being subject to fate). Indeed, the Greeks show great familiarity with their gods (who finally may become affable and even impotent), so that the group is not at first common in religious contexts.

2. Mysticism, Gnosticism, and Philosophy.

a. The mysteries do not stress secrecy. The Eleusinians are like a private cult society. Alien mysteries make a difference, but often with more reference to the secrecy of the cult than to the concealment of the deity.

b. Orphism teaches a deity that is visible in all things but also hidden inasmuch as the universal body of the deity is an esoteric doctrine. Greek and Near Eastern influences converge in Gnosticism with its concepts of hidden but self-revealing deity and of esoteric knowledge. apókryphos becomes here a technical term for secret books or inscriptions (written in cryptograms). Astrologers make much use of the

---

cf. confer, compare

v. verse

group; thus apókrypha are dark affairs (either criminal or mantic) which mýstai alone can penetrate; these mýstai are grouped with mathematicians and athletes.

c. At a later period Greek philosophy is connected with the secret wisdom of the Near East. There is some truth in this, and although natural philosophy seeks a scientific explanation of things, it accepts the inscrutability of nature and the gods. The element of hiddenness increases as antiquity declines, but the kpýptō group is rare. The term "to conceal" is important in Stoic ethics; the Cynic differs from others in living an open life and having nothing to hide.

II. The Old Testament.

1. Hebrew has seven roots (see TDNT, III, 967) to express the idea of concealment, and their use is extremely loose and varied. A first theological use is to denote the essential distinction between God and us. God may show himself but he wills concealment (1 Kgs. 8:12), his works are hidden (Sir. 11:4), he knows hidden things (Dt. 29:28), and to see him is fatal (Is. 6:5).

2. Nothing is hidden from God (Dan. 2:22). Sinners cannot remain hidden (Jer. 16:17). God has total knowledge of his human creatures (Ps. 139).

3. Sinners try to flee from God. They lurk in darkness (Ps. 10:8), offend in secret (Ezek. 8:12), set up images in secret (Dt. 27:15), avoid God (cf. Adam, Cain, and Achan), and when judgment comes try to hide in the rocks (Is. 2:10).

4. The righteous disclose everything, and this opens the way to the restoration of fellowship (Pss. 32:1ff.; 19:12). The penitential psalms are formally parallel to those of Babylon, but the latter are polytheistic, ritual, and pessimistic.

5. When fellowship is restored, the righteous take comfort in knowing that their ways are not hidden from God. No less than their sin, their sighing is not hidden (Ps. 38:9). Only those of little faith think the contrary (Is. 40:27).

6. God gives the elect a share in his own hidden life. He covers them in his tent in times of trouble (Ps. 27:5; cf. Is. 49:2; 4:6). Even in Sheol Job thinks he might be hidden by God (Job 14:13). God teaches wisdom in the secret heart (Ps. 51:6). Yet there is no occultism; one must keep to what is revealed (Dt. 29:29).

7. God comes out of hiddenness in self-revelation to chosen individuals (Gen. 18:17; Is. 29:10) and to the whole people once this self-revelation is available in the law (Ps. 119:19). But he hides himself from the Gentiles (Is. 45:15).

8. God controls his self-revelation. He may hide his purposes even from the prophets (2 Kgs. 4:27). There is judicial self-concealment from a sinful people (Is. 29:10). The righteous, too, experience the hiding of God's face (Job 13:24; Pss. 10:11; 44:24, etc.). This hiddenness can become intolerable (Lam. 3:6). But grace is not at an end (Lam. 3:22). One may still flee from the hidden God to the revealed God.

9. Since God's word is a treasure, one must hide it in oneself (Ps. 119:11; Prov. 2:1). What is hidden is not cosmic gnosis but the historically given word.

10. Yet what is hidden in oneself is also to be declared to others (Ps. 40:10). Jeremiah finds it impossible to stop speaking about God (Jer. 20:9). God's words and deeds are to be published among the nations (Ps. 96:2-3).

III. Judaism.

1. Palestinian Judaism. In the main, Palestinian Judaism thinks that present revelation has ceased. Apocalyptic tries to fill the gap, linking the discovery of hidden guilt or divine purpose with eschatology. In spite of their love for what is hidden, the rabbis have a strong sense of God's presence in nature and history and of his revelation in the law. Yet the ways of God are mysterious, especially after A.D. 70. The tension of the secret and open comes out in exegesis. Secret guilt is to be openly punished and the secret hallowing of God's name will be publicly recognized.

2. Hellenistic Judaism. Mystical influences may be seen in the theological use of the group in Hellenistic Judaism. Thus Reuben wants to reveal the hidden things of his heart in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, while Philo stresses God's hiddenness, uses mystical terms for the knowledge that he reads into the OT, describes God as a mystagogue, and brings the group into his ethics.

3. Gnosticism Influenced by Judaism. The Essenes move in a Gnostic direction with their oaths of secrecy and secret writings. In later Jewish Gnosticism the idea that hiddenness confers honor, and the accessibility of deity only to a few elect, is a common theme. The Mandaeans speak of hidden mysteries and also of the offering to God of hidden prayers.

IV. The New Testament.

1. The Synoptists. In general the NT adopts the presuppositions of the OT, and in part of Judaism, but with the difference that eschatological expectation is now fulfilled. The kingdom is compared to hidden treasure (Mt. 13:44) or leaven (Lk. 13:21), for only God can reveal himself. Yet it has come out of concealment and God will publicly declare it (Lk. 12:2-3). Human unreceptivity forms an impediment (Lk. 18:34). God judicially withholds knowledge of himself from those who do not seriously seek it (Lk. 10:21; 19:42). This is stressed with grim severity in Mk. 4:11-12; cf. Mt. 13:34-35. Those who do find the treasure hide it again with joy (Mt. 13:44). In contrast to the Pharisees, for whose display of piety there is much rabbinic evidence, they give and fast and pray in secret, so that their Father who sees in secret may reward them openly (Mt. 6:4, 6, 18). On the other hand, they are not to conceal the talents that they receive (Mt. 25:18), but are to be like cities on a hill, or lamps on a stand, so that others may see their good works and glorify their Father in heaven (Mt. 5:16).

2. John's Gospel. This gospel mentions secret disciples (19:38; cf. 3:2; 7:50; 19:39), but with understanding rather than reproach. In the main, however, the terms are used here for the mission of Jesus, who puzzlingly seems to work in secret while seeking to be known openly (7:4). Thus he visits the feast secretly (7:10), and hides when the people wants to stone him (8:59; cf. 12:36), yet he can also claim with truth that he has spoken openly and said nothing secretly (18:20).

3. The Other NT Writings. In 2 Cor. 4:2 Paul avoids anything underhanded. The wicked, however, try to hide from God (Eph. 5:12). In the last time rulers will try in vain to seek a hiding place in the rocks (Rev. 6:15-16). God the Judge will bring all hidden things to light, both good and bad (1 Tim. 5:25; 1 Cor. 4:5). God is hidden by nature, but he gives his people a share in his hidden life (cf. the hidden manna of Rev. 2:17). The mystery concealed for aeons is now manifest to the saints (Col. 1:26). The hidden treasures of wisdom are present in Christ (Col. 2:3). The gospel proclaims God's hidden wisdom (1 Cor. 2:7ff.). Paul's language here is well suited to those with Gnostic leanings but it has its basis in the OT. This hidden wisdom relates to the plan of salvation that finds historical fulfilment in Christ (1 Cor. 2:6ff.). If true faith is a hidden matter of the heart (Rom. 2:29), the true hiddenness of Christians is eschatological, i.e., their hiddenness with Christ in God (Col. 3:3).

4. Conclusion. NT usage is rooted in OT usage; the ten aspects noted under II. all recur in it. Echoes of Gnosticism may be heard, but the true NT distinction is between Creator and creature, not between Gnostic and non-Gnostic, and the concept of the hidden but self-revealing God leads to world mission, not to esotericism. Election is present, but it bears strongly the character of decision.

V. Transition to Church History. The first writings after the NT use the group mostly in biblical quotations. For the rest, God discloses what is hidden and we find the twin thoughts of revelation and judgment. A singular use occurs in Diog. 9.5 when the death of Jesus is said to hide the sin of many. [A. OEPKE, III, 957-78]

OT Old Testament

i.e. id est, that is

C. Supplement on the Canon and the Apocrypha.

I. The Canon and the Apocrypha in Judaism.

1. The Term Canon. In Judaism one may speak of a closed and normative canon from the beginning of the second centary (A.D.). This is the result of a process of collection, evaluation, and selection.

2. The Early History of the Canon.

a. The Law. This is fixed from 300 B.C. From the temple it comes into the synagogue, where it has a central role in worship, and functions as a normative code on which there can only be commentaries.

b. The Prophets. The rabbinic order lists Joshua to 2 Kings with all the prophetic books (except Daniel) in a second canonical group, but there is considerable freedom relative to them in the pre-NT period, and in the later cultus only selected portions are used, liberties are taken in reading, and edification is the primary goal in their use.

c. The Writings. These are the other books of the OT (mentioned in the Prologue to Sirach) as they are finally listed by the rabbis. At an earlier point Ruth and Lamentations are sometimes grouped with Judges and Jeremiah, Job and Daniel are reckoned as prophets, and Chronicles and Esther are also put among the historical prophets. In general, there is no fixed canon in the late second century B.C. Only the law has a secure place. This is accompanied by works of edification that are partly history and prophecy and partly poetry and instruction.

3. The OT in the First Century A.D. By this time we find the concept of a normative Scripture based on the law, although the full consequences of this idea are not yet drawn.

a. Canonical Works. Philo and the NT bear witness to the idea of Scripture as a totality. Philo refers to sacred writings, and the NT authors use the term “scripture” or “scriptures,” also “law” for the whole of the OT. Other titles are “law and tradition,” “law and prophets,” and “law, prophets, and psalms” (Lk. 24:44; cf. 24:27). Mt. 24:15 numbers Daniel among the prophets, and Mt. 23:35 is perhaps putting Chronicles at the end of the canon.

b. The Later Apocrypha. In NT times the line between canon and Apocrypha is not rigidly fixed. Philo puts Proverbs and Sirach on the same level, Josephus quotes from apocryphal works, Palestinian Judaism has a high regard for Sirach and apocalypses, and early Christian authors quote apocryphal works (cf. Jude 14).

c. The LXX as a Preliminary Stage. The LXX rests on the idea of OT Scripture as a totality, although it still includes 1 Maccabees and Sirach.

4. The Closing of the Canon by the Rabbis.

a. The Restriction of the Prophetic Age. A sense of decline after the exile promotes the formation of the canon (cf. Zech. 13:2ff.). The rabbis (also Josephus) see prophecy as ending in the fifth or fourth century B.C., with some debate about the status of Sirach. It is also postulated that no written work precedes Moses. Possible patriarchal writings are enshrined in the law.

b. The Sacramental Holiness of the Scriptures. The idea of a material holiness indwelling Scripture, associated in part with the holiness of the divine name, gives rise to the notion that true scriptures defile the hands. Defiling the hands becomes a technical term for the concept of canonical validity. A similar notion is that of the hiding of Scripture, i.e., its abandonment to natural corruption when it becomes unserviceable or is desecrated or has a blemish. In the case of a noncanonical work, e.g., Sirach, the concept has the different sense of a withdrawal from cultic use, i.e., in reading and exposition.

c. The Battle for Individual Writings. The closing of the canon is not without friction. Thus Ezekiel has to meet the objection that it is contrary to the law and that Ezek. 1 opens the door to theosophical speculation. Ecclesiastes is also attacked as antinomian and self-contradictory. Proverbs runs into a charge of inner contradiction. Canticles seems to be too worldly until its allegorical interpretation prevails. Esther is thought by some to be too nationalistic. In each case, however, the objections are finally overcome.

---

LXX Septuagint

d. The Canon and Apocryphal Literature. With the closing of the canon there is discussion as to the number of books. The usual number is 24, but some favor 22, not treating Ruth and Lamentations separately. The division into the three groups of law, prophets, and writings establishes itself, but with initial debate as to the place of Job, Daniel, Chronicles, Lamentations, and Ruth. Excluded books are not necessarily heretical but their religious use is forbidden in order to make a clean break between the canon and other works. These other works may be used only for secular reading.

5. The Influence of the Noncanonical Writings. Although the apocryphal writings lose their equality with canonical works, they still exert an expository influence. Thus we find quotations from Sirach in the rabbis. Motifs from apocalyptic works, e.g., the rapture of the Messiah, or from apocryphal history, e.g., the martyrdom of the mother and her seven sons, also occur. [R. MEYER, III, 978-87]

II. bíbloi apókryphoi in Christianity.

I. The LXX and Hebrew Canon in the Early Church. Since Christianity develops in the Greek-speaking world, the LXX is its first OT canon. The NT mostly uses the LXX in quotations, as do the fathers. The NT, however, hardly ever quotes from the noncanonical works included in the LXX. The early fathers are less discriminating, but doubts about such works soon arise and quickly grow.

2. Apocryphal Quotations in the NT. The surest NT instance of reference to a noncanonical work is Jude 14 (cf. also Jude 9; Heb. 11:37). A possible apocryphal quotation occurs in 1 Cor. 2:9, but this is much debated and we perhaps have here a paraphrase of Is. 64:4. Gal. 6:15 is also debatable, and Eph. 5:14 is more likely a bit of ancient Christian poetry. The names in 2 Tim. 3:8 derive from apocryphal tradition. Jms. 4:5 contains a quotation of uncertain provenance, while Jn. 7:38 seems to be a paraphrase of a passage like Is. 58:11. Mt. 27:9 undoubtedly seems to have in mind Jer. 18:3 and Zech. 11:13, so that there is no need to postulate a Jeremiah apocryphon. As regards Lk. 11:49, cf. Jer. 7:25-26.

3. The Apocrypha in the Fathers.

a. The Apostolic Fathers. We should distinguish in these works between inexact OT quotations and genuine apocryphal quotations, of which there are a few instances, e.g., in Barn. 4.3; Hermas Visions 2.3.4.

b. Later Fathers. Justin, Irenaeus, and especially the Alexandrians Clement and Origen make use of apocryphal works (e.g., Justin Dialogue 120; Irenaeus Against Heresies 4.6.2; Clement of Alexandria Stromateis 1.23.153.1; Origen Commentary on Matthew 10.18 [13:57]). Origen defends the use of the Apocrypha in exposition of the NT, but after his day there is a sharp decline in the estimation of noncanonical works.

4. The Christian Preservation, Revision, and Canonization of the Jewish Apocrypha. Since the Jews tend to scorn Christian use of the Apocrypha, the church plays a big part in preserving noncanonical works, although not without revising them. Some such works pass into the canonical lists of various churches.

5. Christian Apocrypha. During the first centuries Christianity itself produces various Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Revelations that have been called apocryphal. The attitude of the church to such works is not wholly consistent. Hermas commands some early support, while Clement of Alexandria seems to accept the Gospel of the Egyptians (Stromateis 3.5.45.3). Yet apocryphal Acts are never thought to be valid, and even works that have initial support never gain entry into the canon.

6. The Term Apocryphal. In Judaism apocryphal works are noncanonical writings that are not only not to be read publicly, but are excluded totally from religious use. In the early church, on the other hand, the term occurs first in the struggle against false teachers and refers to their esoteric writings, with an implication of obscurity of origin and falsification. Later, the church comes to appropriate the term for Jewish works (especially apocalypses) that do not belong to the OT canon. When reaction against such works comes, the way is open for the application of the term to works that do not belong to the Hebrew OT but are acceptable because of their place in the LXX. But while Jerome and others offer a basis for this distinction, it is only in Protestantism that this usage establishes itself. In the patristic period the term finds varied use for prohibited Jewish and NT pseudepigrapha and for works that are not condemned as such but are simply not regarded as canonical (e.g., 1 and 2 Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp). By this final distinction, which does not necessarily amount to total avoidance, the church recognizes that it has all that is necessary in the canon and it protects itself from possible doctrinal danger. [A. OEPKE, III, 987-1000]

ktízō [to create], ktísis [creation], ktísma [creature, creation], ktístēs [Creator]

Since the question of the "whence" of the world also involves the questions of its goal and purpose, the concept of creation plays a leading part in philosophical discussion.

A. Historical Review. In many religions chaos stands at the beginning of all things as formless matter, devoid of true being or quality but constituting the seed or mother from which all nature comes into being. A psychological parallel is the idea that longing, érōs, or the like underlies organic processes. The Egyptian notion of the self-copulation of the original god shows that beginnings of this kind are never more than relative. Natural processes, of course, suggest forces of order that are in conflict with chaos, and inasmuch as humanity sides with such forces a transcendent goal arises for the human race, though not without the recognition that chaos finally triumphs in the form of fate. In Greek and Indian thought another notion is that matter is the original principle of all life. Thus the world is for Stoicism a harmonious circular movement into which the task of humanity is to integrate itself, although here again it seems that things will ineluctably take their course no matter what may be the human response. A certain ambivalence arises with the references to creator-gods. These are sometimes given precedence, receive the supreme attributes that elsewhere are given to chaos, and have unlimited power over nature, humanity, and the world of the gods (cf. Aristides' "Hymn to Zeus"). Along the same lines are attempts to construe creation as a miracle or act of power, whether by word or ecstasy. Such views move in the direction of a personal Creator, but are prevented from reaching this goal either through magical conceptions, through abstractions whereby the world owes its origin to the idea of the good or supreme being, or through the concept of emanations. Where emanations are presupposed, a dualism may result between the original deity (negatively conceived) and the material creation. Alternatively, Zoroastrian dualism advances the view that the two original forces of good and evil are in conflict.

B. Belief in Creation in the OT.

1. The Development of the OT Belief in Creation. Belief in creation is very old in Israel, but there are few preexilic statements (Gen. 1:1ff.; 2:4ff.; 14:19). References become more common nearer the exile (cf. Jer. 5:22ff.; Ezek. 28:13). Earlier the main stress is on God as the Lord of history and election. The movement is from the God of Israel to the Creator, not vice versa. Israel's God is the true and personal Subject of historical action. He acts with will and purpose. He moves in time and space, so that his action is action in nature too. All nature is the sphere of his operation (Am. 9:2ff.). He has established the order of nature (Jer. 5:22ff.). Thus his absolute power in history and nature may be traced back to the fact that he is the Creator (Jer. 27:5). Indeed, history itself is a creation or fashioning (Is. 22:11; 27:11). The word that becomes a technical one for creating can thus occur in the context of God's extraordinary action in history (Ex. 34:10). With this term bārā' and the idea of action by God's almighty word, the concept of creation is fully present.

2. Creation Terminology and Conceptions in the OT. Various terms are used in connection with creation. These carry the senses "to make for oneself" (Ps. 78:54), "to fashion" (e.g., the potter and the clay, though the use is often figurative), "to make," and "to create" in the strict sense that is reserved for God. Various poetic expressions also occur relative to God's creative work, e.g., stretching out the heavens, making heaven, the earth, the stars, the mountains, etc. fast, or basing the earth on pillars. Anthropomorphic images are also found, e.g., references to God's right hand or to his calling, but with clear indications that God is not just a giant person (cf. Is. 51:13). Finally, there are mythological allusions, although only in a theological use which assumes that the monsters of myth are mere objects of the divine action (Ps. 89:10). (For details, cf. TDNT, III, 1007-09.)

3. The OT Belief in Creation.

a. All the statements about the Creator relate to the God of Israel.

b. In Gen. 1 creation is creation out of nothing by the word (cf. Ps. 33:9). As in Rom. 4:17, God makes what is out of what is not. His word is not an incantation but a word of command in a personal act of will. Creation of this kind is proper only to God and stresses the distinction between Creator and creature. Creature cannot become Creator as son becomes father. For the basic nature of this distinction cf. Ex. 33:23; 1 Kgs. 19:13; Is. 6:5; 45:15. It is because God is so superior that all nature praises him (Pss. 8; 95; 104; 19). His creation manifests his transcendent majesty. God can destroy as he creates (Pss. 102:26ff.; 104:29). Between creation and its dissolution lies his preserving, i.e., his continuing creativity in nature and history. In nature his power may be revealed in violent activity, but his decrees are also to be seen in the orderliness of natural processes.

c. Creation by the word best expresses the OT view of creation; it is not emanation, but a personal act. Word expresses conscious will and act and at the same time brings out the spiritual and transcendent character of what is done (cf. Is. 41:4; 48:13; Am. 9:6; Pss. 33:6; 148:5, etc.). Creation by the word is creation out of nothing. If Gen. 1:2 begins with chaos, Gen. 1:1 precedes it. God always is; creation comes into being. The beginning, then, is that of creation. God is subject to no prior conditions. Creation displays his wisdom and omniscience (Jer. 10:12; Ps. 104:24). It establishes his right to the creature (Ps. 24:1-2). It is the basis of his historical action (Jer. 27:5), and of the human duties of trust and obedience (Is. 17:7; Ps. 119:73). By reason of it the creature cannot escape God (Ps. 33:14). Creation distinguishes Israel's God from idols (Jer. 10:12ff.). It insures that all his works are right (Job 34:12-13). It gives purpose and meaning to all things (Is. 44:6; 48:12). Human creatures in particular have a divinely willed task. This includes work (Ps. 104) but it comes to its climax in praise (Is. 43:21; 45:23).

d. The creation stories move on to the fall and a relapse into disorder with the expulsion from the garden and the deluge. God's creative action then takes the form of restoration with the promise of Gen. 9:2-3 and the call of Abraham. The idea of a fallen creation is implied with the hopes of Is. 11 and 66:22 but not clearly stated. The distinction of foods does not teach dualism. Yet the praise of creation can be loud and clear because it is the Creator who is glorified, not the creature.

e. The OT view of creation fixes the role of humanity as both part of creation and yet distinct from it because of a special relation to God (Gen. 1:26ff.; 2:7). Being in the divine image is not lost at the fall (cf. Gen. 9:6), and no matter how it is understood it involves a particular relation to God whereby people are constituted persons who both confront nature and transcend it in a manner analogous to God. As animals should know humans as their masters, so humans should know God (Is. 1:3). That they do not is unnatural. This mystery of sin has its root in the heart (Jer. 17:9; Gen. 6:5). Restoration promises a new heart (Ezek. 36:26ff.; cf. Jer. 31:33ff.; Ps. 51:10). Even in the changed situation after the flood, however, God's blessing still rests on his works (Gen. 9:1 ff.; Ps. 8).

C. The Doctrine of Creation in Later Judaism.

1. Terminology. The rabbis use the same terms for God's creative work as the OT. A common metaphor is that of building a palace or city. The term "creation" is found both for all creatures and specifically for humanity. Greek works have ktízein and poiéin for "to create" or "to make," ktísis for "creation," and ktístēs (or ho ktísas) for "Creator."

2. God as Creator of the World. God is often stated to be the sole Creator by his word. Sometimes, though not always, it is clear, or at least implied, that this is a creation out of nothing. The rabbis reject speculation that seeks to go behind creation. Even preexistent things like the throne of God or the law of God are created. As in the OT, creation and preservation go hand in hand. The God who has commanded still commands. Although God rests, he still renews creation each day. He does not entrust the keys of rain, birth, and resurrection to anyone else. There is much reference to the Creator in petitions and thanksgivings. The thought of creation gives confidence in affliction and establishes the duty of obedience. Creation distinguishes the living God from dead idols. The Creator is, of course, the God of the fathers. As such, he protects and avenges his people. In later conflicts refuge is sought in his transcendent power.

3. The World as God's Creation. The world depends on God, is directed by him, and owes him obedience. God's will (expressed in the law) constitutes its meaning. It is created for the fathers in the sense that Israel is to receive the law. Creation provides the setting for the doing of God's will. Sin has brought no ontic change but a state of sickness, e.g., shorter life for humans, less fertility for the earth, a diminished intensity of light in the sun and moon. The pseudepigrapha, however, offer a darker view of the fall with their stress on the distinction of the aeons, the activity of Satan, and the totally new form of being in the coming aeon. Yet this does not mean an identification of the world with sin.

4. Humanity as God's Creation. The divine likeness is a decisive determination of humanity. A proof of God's love, it finds expression in speech. It means that all people are confronted with God's demands. By free decision Israel accepts the law, and some Israelites fulfil it. The divine likeness provides a motive for respecting others. If an evil impulse is present, this does not represent an ontic change. Indeed, the impulse consists of natural strivings that must be held in check, and God has given the law to make this possible. In the pseudepigrapha there is greater stress on the fall and the resultant judgment. Only a few will painfully find their way to final restoration. The promise of a renewed creation runs through all the writings. Renewal of the relation to God (e.g., by circumcision, conversion, or forgiveness) means a new creation, although the word in this case is not necessarily to be taken in its literal sense.

D. dēmiourgéō and ktízō in Greek and the Linguistic Contribution of the LXX. In Greek the main words for God's creative work are poieín, plássein, and themelioún. The LXX uses these words but avoids the dēmiourgéō group. dēmiourgós is a general word in Greek for a doctor, builder, or any kind of craftsman. The suggestion is that of action on something already there. The movements of the sun and moon are the dēmiourgói of day and night. The dēmiourgoí of feasts are those who win the victories that are the occasion for them. Later the term is used mainly for artisans, who are not highly regarded. When applied to the Creator, it implies that God makes the world out of existing materials. The LXX avoids it for this reason. ktízō, which the LXX adopts, is put to varied use for settling a land, establishing groves or temples, instituting festivals, etc. It expresses the resolve to take the action, and hence is often followed by dēmiourgeín. Other uses are for invention and the founding of philosophical schools, but in NT days the main use is for the founding of cities or the settling of countries, with an emphasis on the personal resolve (e.g., that of rulers in the founding of cities) which initiates the actual work. It is probably because of the reference to resolve, and to avoid the association of dēmiourgeín with artisans, that the LXX prefers the ktízō group to the more obvious dēmiourgéō group. At the same time, the LXX uses ktízō in only 17 out of the 46 instances in which it reads bārā' as "to create," and the only such use in the Pentateuch is in Dt. 4:32. Indeed, there are only four (or five) instances in the Pentateuch, none in the historical books, 15 in the prophets, and nine in the writings, with 36 in the apocryphal books. The findings suggest that the term takes on theological significance only gradually and has not yet done so when the first works are translated. ktísis means the settling or founding of cities, but does not have this sense in the LXX, where it means "creature" or "creation." ktísma is what is founded, and it, too, means a creature in the LXX. The ktístēs is the founder, e.g., of a city; the LXX uses it as a divine attribute in 2 Sam. 22:32 to show God's power and to differentiate him from idols.

E. Creation in the NT.

l. Terminology. The most common group in the NT is the ktízō group, then poiéō and plássō. We find dēmiourgós only with technítēs in Heb. 11:10. The ktízō group in the NT applies only to God's creation. ktístēs occurs only in 1 Pet. 4:19. ktísma means "creature," "the creature," or "creation" as the totality of created things, sometimes humanity as in Mk. 16:15, sometimes nature as in Rom. 1:25.

2. God as the Creator of the World. Many verses in the NT state that God is the Creator of all things. Some of these refer back to the beginning (e.g., Mk. 10:6; Rom. 1:20; 2 Pet. 3:4; Jn. 8:44; Lk. 11:50); these imply that there is no preexistent matter, but that creation means an absolute beginning by God's word (cf. Rom. 4:17; 2 Cor. 4:6). Again, it is affirmed that God created all things (cf. Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:16; Acts 17:24). This excludes emanation. Heaven as well as earth is part of creation. God's will is done there and its creatures worship God (cf. Rev. 4:8ff.) in voluntary, personal expression. The Son himself gives thanks to his Father as Lord of heaven and earth (Mt. 11:25-26). God has willed the existence of all creatures with a divine purpose in view. All things are from and through and to him (Rom. 11:36), and the final goal is that he should be all in all (1 Cor. 15:28). Thus the vision of God the Creator, enthroned in his majesty and surrounded by the living creatures and the elders, precedes the revelation of his historical acts (Rev. 4-5). God's Spirit permeates and sustains all things (4:5), although the lightnings, voices, and thunders remind us of fallen creation (4:5).

3. Fallen Creation. The NT makes a distinction between what is made with hands and the place of God's presence (Heb. 9:11, 24), or between what is in the flesh and what is in the spirit (Eph. 2:11), or between the transitoriness of this world and the eternity of the world to come (Heb. 1:12). Heaven is used both for God's dwelling and for a part of this world. Similarly, the angels are creatures but do not belong to this creation (cf. the song in Rev. 5:8ff. with its widening circles). Nor does Satan belong to this creation. This creation, according to Rom. 8:19-20, is that which, in some connection with the human fall, is subject to decay, revolving in a gigantic circle of futility. The futility takes the form of temporality which offers both space for repentance and the possibility of offense. Creation displays God's deity but it also tempts us as cosmos. It is the place of revelation but its form is that of the flesh, so that only in Christ can one truly see God in nature. In and for itself the revelation in nature leads on ineluctably to the exposition of human guilt (Acts 14:17; Rom. 1:19-20). In Rev. 5 only the Lamb can open the sealed book which contains God's will for the world. This implies that the world lies in Satan's power and that the Lamb has freed it. The opening of the book means a new heaven and earth when the orders imposed with time and space will be lifted (cf. Mk. 12:25; 1 Cor. 15:26, 42ff.). As the world was created in Christ (1 Cor. 8:6), so its meaning lies in its redemption through him. All God's counsel is epitomized in him (Eph. 1:4; 1 Pet. 1:20). The form of this world is determined by the fall of humanity but also by its calling to glory. In it we have all that we need, and since all that is necessary to life is good (Mk. 7:14ff.; Rom. 14:14; 1 Cor. 7ff.), we are to use it with thanksgiving to God (1 Tim. 4:4), neither honoring the creature instead of the Creator nor dishonoring the Creator by rejecting or despising the creature.

4. Humanity as Creature and New Creation. Humanity is creation's goal, yet also the starting point of evil. The human creature is a living being (1 Cor. 15:45), and its natural life involves the tension of a being in God's image that is accompanied by subjection to sinful impulses. As God's creatures, people have no claim on God. They belong to this creation, with psyché̄, not pneúma, as their life's principle. With the gospel there is a new creation (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15; cf. Eph. 2:10, 15; 4:24; Col. 3:10). This is creation by the Word and Spirit (cf. Jms. 1:18) to new life in the Spirit (Rom. 6:1ff.). The entry of the Spirit through Christ's word and work (Mt. 12:28) means that the new aeon breaks into the course of this aeon in a creative work of God which unites divided humanity into one new humanity (Eph. 2:15). The goal is the totally new creation, the new heaven and earth, in which death will be abolished, Christ will be fully manifested as the pneumatic man, and the glorious liberty of God’s children will be fulfilled with the redemption of the body (Rom. 8:21). (The use of ktísis in 1 Pet. 2:13 poses a special problem. The word is usually rendered “order” or “institution,” with special reference to the state. There are, however, no real parallels for this, and another possibility is that with “human” the word simply refers to “humanity,” i.e., that we should be subject for the Lord’s sake to all kinds of people.) [W. FOERSTER, III, 1000-1032]

kybérnēsis [government]

1. kybernáō means “to steer,” then “to rule,” and the kybernḗtēs is the “helmsman” (Acts 27:11), then the “statesman.” God is sometimes called the kybernḗtēs as the one who directs the world. kybérnēsis means literally “steering” and figuratively “government” and “divine direction.”

2. In the LXX kybérnēsis occurs three times in Proverbs for right or wise direction (1:5; 11:14; 24:6).

3. In 1 Cor. 12:28 the reference is plainly to the special gifts that qualify a Christian to give good direction to the community. The bishops and deacons are probably the bearers of the gift. It may be noted that the questions of v. 29 do not apply to this gift. This seems to suggest that the offices are elective, although they cannot be discharged properly without the divine charism.

4. In the fathers the church is often depicted as a ship and Christ as the Helmsman or Pilot. The stilling of the storm and the ark provide a starting point. The symbolism is that Christ steers his church safely to port through the storms of life or across the sea of sin. [H. W. BEYER, III, 1035-37]

kýmbalon [cymbal]

kýmbalon, found in the NT only in 1 Cor. 13:1, denotes the shallow metallic basin which gives a resounding note when struck against another. The LXX has it frequently in Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah (cf. 1 Chr. 13:8). In 1 Sam. 18:6 the reference may be to a plucking instrument or triangle, in 1 Chr. 15:19 striking instruments are denoted, and bells is possibly the meaning in Zech. 14:20 (or perhaps bosses). Paul would be familiar with the cultic instruments of Judaism, although in writing to Corinth he might have had pagan instruments in mind. The clanging cymbal also seems to have been a term for an empty prattler. The point is that the gifts favored at Corinth can only produce empty noise unless there is within them the inner force of agápē. [K. L. SCHMIDT, III, 1037-39]

kyránion → kýōn

kýrios [Lord, lord], kyría [lady], kyriakós [the Lord’s], kyriótēs [lordship, dominion], kyrieúō [to be (come) lord], katakyrieúō [to lord it] kýrios. Historically the concept of lordship combines the two elements of power and authority. A true realization of the unity of the two arises only in encounter with God, who creates us with absolute power but is also the absolute authority before which it is freedom rather than bondage to bow. In the biblical revelation the humanity that rejects subordination to its Creator meets the one who with the authority of God’s ministering and forgiving love woos its obedience and reconstructs and reestablishes the relations of lordship.

A. The Meaning of the Word kýrios.

1. The adjective kýrios, from a root “to swell,” “to be strong,” means a. “having power,” “empowered,” “authorized,” “valid.” The power denoted is a power of control rather than physical strength. Laws are valid, persons are authorized or competent, and rulers may have a powerful impact. A second meaning b. is "important," "decisive," or "principal."

2. The noun kýrios, rare at first, takes on two fixed senses: first, the owner, e.g., of slaves, a house,; or a subject people, and second, the legal guardian of a wife or girl. Both senses carry the implication of what is legitimate. In Attic, however, despótēs is a much more common word. In the Koine the two become almost interchangeable, although kýrios has a stronger element of legality and suggests more the power of disposal than of possession. The closer we come to NT times, the more emphatic the legal element becomes and the more kýrios tends to replace despótēs. At first officials are not called kýrioi, but gradually the habit develops of attaching the word as a title, and the term is then used for philosophers, doctors, members of an audience, husbands (by wives), fathers (by sons), and finally even sons (by fathers). In the early period neither kings nor gods are called kýrioi; the first use of kýrios for God is to be found in the LXX.

B. Gods and Rulers as kýrioi. The concept of God necessarily contains an element of legitimate power. If legitimacy is lacking, religion yields to fear of capricious spirits, whereas if power is lacking, the deity is a mere idea. The combination of might and right, however, involves personality. The Greek use of despótēs for deity bears witness to a personal element, but the Greeks do not fundamentally regard their gods as lords, primarily because their view of God allows no place for the personal act of creation.

1. kýrios for Gods and Rulers in Classical Antiquity. The word kýrios is first applied to the gods as an adjective to describe their spheres of control. But the gods are not, as in Egypt or Babylon, the lords of these spheres. They are the forms of reality, not its creators or designers. With humans, they are organically related members of the same reality. For this reason, there is no personal responsibility to them; even prayer is fundamentally illogical. Religious disintegration results, therefore, when the gods are viewed in this way. The political implication is democracy, in which individuals freely give themselves to the night. Since, however, the right stands above them, and is not merely that which they decree, an impulse toward monarchy is present. The ruler has a special measure of virtue. As such he is inspired law, although not kýrios.

2. Gods and Rulers in the Near East and Egypt. In the Near East the gods are the lords of reality. They control destiny, and individuals, created by them, are responsible to, and may be punished by them. Rightly, then, they may be called lords. It is they who give the laws which rulers declare to their subjects and which subjects must simply obey. The Near East has a strong sense that laws need personal authorization. This leads to the cult of the ruler as the administrator of law who is closer to the gods and who may thus make unconditional demands on others. Personal confrontation with the gods stands at the heart of this understanding.

3. The Hellenistic kýrios.

a. Chronology. The use of kýrios for gods and rulers develops in the first century B.C. At this time the phrases kýrios basileús, kýrios theós, and kýrios stratēgós come into common use. The available data from Egypt and Syria show that all this seems to happen within a single life span. It is probably the adaptation of an older Egyptian and Syrian development.

b. Location. In Egypt kýrios is used for various gods, and this usage spreads to Asia Minor, Crete, Italy, Rome, and Spain. In Syria a similar use develops for which there are parallels in Arabia and Spain. Other deities are called kýrios or kýria in Asia Minor and Italy (e.g., the Ephesian Artemis). It may be noted that the usage never becomes widespread. It is common only where it corresponds to native usage, and in Syria kýrios is comparatively much less common than its Semitic equivalent.

c. Tendency. While indigenous usage fixes the main content, a certain tendency may be discerned in the Greek examples. The term kýrios is not used for outstanding gods, nor only for those that are particularly venerated. It denotes a personal relationship, e.g., in petitionary prayer, votive dedication, or thanksgiving. kýrios denotes an order under which people stand and which is connected with the idea of dominion over nature and destiny. Correlative to kýrios is the term doúlos ("slave"), which implies personal authority as well as relationship, but with a strong guarantee of protection as well (cf. Semitic names which contain the names of gods). In Egypt the concept of lordship gives stronger linguistic expression to the dominion of deity over nature, but there is no doubt that the transfer of kýrios to the gods on the basis of existing native usage takes place independently in Egypt and Syria.

d. Rulers. As regards rulers, phrases like kýrios basileús are adaptations of native usage which always seem alien to the Greeks and later drop away. In the imperial period kýrios becomes a brief summary of the emperor's position, mostly for the purpose of dating. We find it a few times under Nero but it is more common later, and after Trajan gradually finds its way into the full imperial style. It also occurs in the absolute (cf. Acts 25:26), although at first the Latin dominus is shunned because of its obvious suggestion of absolute monarchy (cf. Augustus). Under the cover of democracy, however, a Near Eastern style of autocracy triumphs. This explains why the term kýrios establishes itself. Initially it has no connection with the emperor cult, but if the emperor is not kýrios as god, he can easily be god as kýrios, i.e., in virtue of his universal rule. Sometimes, then, we find the phrase dominus et deus. Nevertheless, this is not the main emphasis. Hence Tertullian can accept dominus in one sense and not another, and whereas the Zealots, for political reasons, cannot accept either, the Jews in general do not find it difficult to call civil rulers their kýrio. [W. FOERSTER, III, 1039-58]

C. The OT Name for God.

1. The Name for God in the LXX.

a. The LXX uses kýrios for the divine name Yahweh in an effort to bring out its meaning. Since the term has to be used for human lords too, or even as a respectful form of address, the effort is perhaps not wholly successful. Yet in the religious sphere kýrios is reserved for God. In this sense it is used regularly, i.e., over 6,000 times, and except in a few instances always for Yahweh in such forms as kýrios theós, kýrios ho theós, and ho kýios theós.

b. Although a little capricious, the use or nonuse of the article seems to be meant to relate to the significance of the name. Whether or not kýrios is a creative attempt of the translators or the rendering of a Hebrew substitute like Adonai cannot be determined. Its justification derives less from ordinary Hebrew originals than from the divine name itself.

2. "Lord" as a Designation for Yahweh. In the history of the Bible the use of "Lord" has been no less influential than that of Yahweh. Like the usual Hebrew terms, it carries a recognition of the power of the divine will. The title corresponds to the divine nature. God is Lord of the land and people, but also of all things (Mic. 4:13). In replacement of the divine name, or in addition to it, the term implies the divine majesty (cf. Is. 6:11; Ezek. 2:4, etc.). Why the term for Lord is completely substituted for Yahweh in later Judaism is not wholly clear, nor is it clear whether the LXX kýrios comes first or is a translation. It certainly has important missionary implications, for the witness to God as Lord shows that, as the Creator, God is the exclusive holder of power over humanity and the cosmos. The term Lord states in practice who God is and what he means for us as the one whose personal will intervenes with all the force that is the distinctive mark of the name Yahweh.

3. The Name Yahweh as a Concept of Experience. The OT belief in God is grounded in historical experience and develops in constant contact with history. The name Yahweh is thus distinguished by a specific content. God is not just any deity but a distinct divine person. This still applies even when he is more generally called Lord. Behind statements like "the Lord is God" (1 Kgs. 18:39) or "the Lord is his name" (Ex. 15:3) stand the more specific expressions "Yahweh (or Yahweh of hosts) is his name." There is encounter here with the definite person of God. Only Gentiles can make nothing of his name. While Yahweh may have been used in different ways before, in the OT it always has reference to a specific encounter. It is the name of the revealed God and leaves no room for speculation. Use of the name suggests the essential and indelible features of the picture of God which the biblical tradition paints in the inner history of his people.

4. The Mosaic Institution. Yahweh religion is an instituted religion. It is not a reformation of Canaanite animism but a new beginning. There is a prehistory in the stories of the patriarchs but Moses is the virtual founder of Yahweh religion. With him it truly enters the state of history and becomes a norm of conduct and a spur to political action. On the basis of God's revelation to him, the tribes come into a relation of covenant obligation. Their life is dominated by trust in the guiding will and power of the God who knows no natural restraint and who has proved his majesty at the exodus. A tradition of common worship begins at this time. Theophorous personal names come into use and the wars of Yahweh begin with the invasion of Canaan. With acceptance of the name Yahweh Israel makes an exclusive confession of God and puts itself under active obedience to his will (Ex. 15:11; cf. Josh. 24: 16ff.).

5. The Origin of the Divine Name. The name Yahweh is given by God himself in Ex. 3. Whether Moses is the first to use it or it has been taken from tradition is hard to say. Parallels have been sought (cf. Ras Shamra and Egypt), and an original home of Yahweh has been postulated among the Kenites or in Edom. The only thing that is certain is that from the time of Moses the name has a new and specific content.

6. The Form and Manner of the Name Yahweh. a. The form of the name presents problems even regarding the consonants, let alone the vowels, for variations exist in the tradition. b. Attempts to interpret the name philologically produce no certain results. On the basis of the longer form we are possibly led to a root that might mean either "to fall" or "to be." On the basis of the shorter form we perhaps have an interjection, a cry to God. We are not even certain that the two forms are originally the same word, and in any case it is difficult either to relate them or to derive any definite meaning from them.

7. The Reasons for Reticence in Relation to the Name. a. Interpretation is made harder by the fence that the tradition builds around the name. This reticence is due in part to the power that is associated with the name. The name epitomizes the person (cf. 1 Sam. 25:25). It is thus feared as God himself is feared (Dt. 28:58). b. On the other hand, the biblical authors, freely using the name, have a positive sense of the divine reality and power that protect them, so that it is only later, in redaction and translation, that the sense of distance grows. c. Another contributory factor is the sense that the divine person is so unique that one cannot distinguish him from other persons by the simple method of using names.

8. The Name of God in the Account of Yahweh's Revelation to Moses (Ex. 3:14). a. In Ex. 3:14, when Moses asks God his name, a puzzling answer is given which either tries to explain the name by alliterative paraphrase or seeks to avoid its use by close approximation to its form. b. If it is an explanation, the name bears some reference to existence, although in what sense is not wholly clear. c. The Hebrew certainly does not have the speculative profundity of the LXX rendering (egṓ eimi ho ṓn). There are also various linguistic arguments against etymological explanation, and the style of revelation is the least adapted for etymology. d. The other possibility is that God is refusing to give a name that would make him merely one among the many gods of the period, although cf. 3:14b.

9. The Name Yahweh as the Basic Form of the OT Declaration about God. a. OT statements about God take different forms and the constant link to history works out in different ways. The theme that God is Lord, however, is always the same. One can neither invoke him by magic nor influence him except as a servant. The revelation is that of the vital power of God oriented to salvation. Hence the name Yahweh is the sum of all that the OT says about God, and the figure of Yahweh is the original form of biblical revelation. If the name does in fact set Yahweh among the gods, so that under mythical pressure there is a felt difficulty in serving God or singing his songs in a foreign land (1 Sam. 26:19; Ps. 137), and the rivalry of other gods causes recurrent crises of faith (1 Kgs. 18: 17ff.; 2 Kgs. 21:3; Jer. 2:28), nevertheless there is a strong sense of the uniqueness of Yahweh and a sharp rejection of the reality of false gods (Pss. 58; 82; Am. 5:26; Ex. 20:3ff.). b. The receptivity to alien myths, which is particularly marked in Northern Israel (Hos. 11:2 etc.), is accompanied by, or finds expression in, a widespread bourgeois complacency that does not sense the true reality or power of God (cf. Jer. 48:11; Zeph. 1:12; Is. 5:12; Jer. 29:26). The prophets fight against this limited view of God, however, with the assertion of God's unconditional authority in every sphere of life. Am. 5:4 sums up the demands and promises of God in a way that allows no place for mythical forms of thinking. c. For the prophets God is no abstract concept but the personal God who lays hold of them with compelling force (Ezek. 1). Although anthropomorphic expressions have to be used to describe him, the resolution of the prophets and the fervor of the psalmists have their root in personal encounter with Yahweh and his will. This is why their messages convey the grandeur, power, and reality of God with imperious force. d. Attempts to discern God's rule in time (Ps. 90) and space (Ps. 139) push us to the limits of the concept of personality but do not surrender it. These thoughts arise out of a sense of responsibility that leads to anxiety, guilt, and panic (cf. Am. 9:2; Job 7:16ff.) but finally leads back to confident praise and prayer (Ps. 139:24). e. Naive conceptions may be present in the we-style of Gen. 1:26-27 etc., or in the idea of creation in the divine image, but these are set in a context of demythologization. f. The same applies to the depiction of God as a warrior (Ex. 15:3 etc.), in which the stress lies, not on divine savagery, but on the loyalty and love of God in protecting his people and providing for it. In much the same way the jealousy of God (Ex. 20:5) carries the implication that the people owes him unconditional love and loyalty in return. What comes out in such statements, then, is the personal nature of the whole relationship. Yahweh is no static Baal. Loving, he may be wounded and provoked. He puts feeling into his actions and directions, a man, as it were, and yet no man but God. The imponderable element of the dynamic is thus restructured as the imponderable element of the divine person to whose wrath one might fall victim but whose mercies are great (2 Sam. 24:14). g. Yahweh is the Lord in his directions. These are total. The divine I addresses the Thou of the community or the individual with a demand for the practical exclusion of other gods which implies the decisive reality of the one God and a compulsion to bow to his will. The lordship of God means that God gives direction which imparts meaning to life and demands loyal and obedient action. Recognition of this (Ex. 24:7) is perhaps the most valuable legacy of the OT inasmuch as the universal validity of this knowledge of Yahweh comes clearly to light in the moral requirement (cf. Mic. 6:8). The dynamic of the divine commission suggests that the demand of Yahweh refers not merely to Israel but to humanity in general. Amos calls the nations to account precisely because they, like Israel, are responsible to the one transcendent God whose voice he hears from Zion (1:2; cf. 9:12).

10. The Confession of Yahweh in Dt. 6:4. Yahweh religion is not monotheistic in a speculative sense. It is monotheistic in its energizing of the will of those who confess him. This is true in the Shema, where love for Yahweh is expressed in order to strengthen love for him. The four words in Dt. 6:4 are thus introduced by the formula: "Hear, O Israel" (cf. 5:1; 9:1, etc.). Possibly hymnic, they perhaps consist of two clauses: "Yahweh is our God," and "Yahweh is one." If so, the repetition of the name suggests that the point is that in Yahweh all that he is is exhaustively and exclusively present (cf. 4:35; 7:9; Is. 45:6). The difficulty in postulating two clauses is that the second clause seems to be a trite mathematical one which is less far-reaching than the first and can hardly be justified as a protest against the view that there might be many Yahwehs as there are many Baals. On the other hand, to take the words as one clause adds little to the sense: "Yahweh, our God, Yahweh is one," or, in a paraphrase: "Yahweh is our God, Yahweh as the only one." Analysis shows that the words defy precise interpretation but for that reason, in their very sweep and majesty, are an eloquent testimony to the power of faith in Yahweh. The active dynamic of the national religion comes up against the problem of adequate expression, but the confession makes it plain that Yahweh as the sum and center of religious experience is the source of a single historical revelation. [G. QUELL, III, 1058-81]

D. Lord in Later Judaism.

I. The Choice of the Word kýrios in the LXX. Why the LXX chose kýrios is debated. One theory is that it really means "superior" rather than "one who has power or control." But this is not the Greek usage of the time. The LXX probably chooses kýrios because it stresses the fact that as the Liberator from Egypt, or as the Creator, God has a valid right to control over his people and the universe. He is sovereign in the absolute sense.

2. Lord in the Pseudepigrapha. Whether the use of Adonai for Yahweh is older than the LXX is also debated. Other renderings of the OT follow different courses, as do the pseudepigrapha, which offer several substitute terms. In circles open to Hellenism kýrios is avoided, as it might lead to misunderstanding. Philo, finding kýrios in the LXX, allegorizes it by discerning in it a reference to royal power.

3. Lord in Rabbinic Judaism. By the time of the rabbis Yahweh is seldom pronounced literally and Adonai is little used in ordinary speech. The rabbis use various terms for Lord in such senses as the master of slaves, the owner of goods, or the master of passions, and also in polite address. rb denotes the teacher but also the master of slaves. In the Hebrew and Aramaic use of lord we never find the absolute without a dependent noun, and there is occasional doubling in address. As regards God, he is for later Judaism both Lord and Governor of the world and Lord and Judge of the individual. Creation provides the final basis for this lordship. The election of Israel is seen as its creation by God.

E. kýrios in the NT.

1. Secular Usage. In the NT kýrios is used for the owner of the vineyard (Mk. 12:9) or of animals (Lk. 19:33; Mt. 15:27), and for the master of the steward (Lk. 16:3) and slaves (Eph. 6:5-6). It also refers to the one who controls something, e.g., the harvest (Mt. 9:38) or the sabbath (Mk. 2:28). Polite usage occurs in Lk. 1:43, but superiority is suggested in 1 Pet. 3:6; Mk. 12:36-37; Acts 25:26. Slaves and workers use the address kýrie (cf. Lk. 13:8). The Jews use the same address to Pilate in Mt. 27:63, Mary to the gardener in Jn. 20:15, the jailer to Paul and Silas in Acts 16:30 (cf. also Mt. 21:29; Acts 10:4). The double form occurs in Mt. 7:21-22; 25:11; Lk. 6:46. We find genitive combinations in 1 Cor. 2:8 (glory) and 2 Th. 3:16 (peace). despótēs is used only in prayer or for the master of slaves or owner of a house (1 Tim. 6:1-2; 2 Tim. 2:21).

2. God as Lord. God is called kýrios in the NT mostly in OT quotations or allusions (Mk. 1:3; 12:11, etc.; for a full list see TDNT, III, 1086-87). In the basic Synoptic material God is ho kýrios only in Mk. 5:19. kýrios is very common in the prologue to Luke (cf. also the epilogue to Matthew). LXX influence may be seen in expressions like the hand, name, angel, spirit, or word of the Lord (Lk. 1:66; Jms. 5:10; Mt. 1:20; Acts 5:9; 8:25). kýrios also means God in 1 Cor. 10:9; 1 Tim. 6:15; Heb. 7:21, etc., and Revelation has such formulas as kýrios ho theós (1:8 etc.; cf. 11:15; 22:6). The data suggest that kýrios is not a common term for God apart from OT use, but that its content can at any time be given full weight (cf. Mt. 11:25, which implies free assent to the free divine decision; Mt. 9:38, where the lord of the harvest is the Lord of world history; 1 Tim. 6:15, which ascribes total sovereignty to God; and Acts 17:24, where God is Lord as Creator). In Revelation God is Lord as the Almighty (1:8 etc.), but the elders call him "our Lord" (4:11). Lord has a special emphasis in the prayer of Acts 1:24 and it underlies the obligation of worship in Jms. 3:9.

3. Jesus as Lord.

a. Paul in 1 Cor. 12:3 contrasts anáthema Iēsoús and kýrios Iēsoús. The parallel is not exact, for anáthema may be pronounced against many persons or things but kýrios applies to Jesus alone. In Phil. 2;6ff. the name kýrios is given to Jesus as the response of God to his obedient suffering. It implies a position equal to that of God. That the risen Jesus is Lord is stated also in Rom. 10:9; Acts 2:36, and for parallels cf. Heb. 2:6ff.; Mt. 28:18, and the use of Ps. 110:1 (Acts 5:31; Rom. 8:34; 1 Cor. 15:25ff.; Col. 3:1; Eph. 1:20-21). In 1 Cor. 11:3 the world is related to God only indirectly through Christ its Head. In Col. 2:6, 10 Christ the Lord is the Head of all authority and power. In 1 Cor. 15:28 the Son exercises the lordship of God the Father in order to subject all things to him. In Rom. 14:9 lordship over humanity is central as the lordship of the crucified and risen Lord (5:6; 6:4, 9; 1 Cor. 1:23-24; Gal. 3:13, etc.). The gospel is the gospel of Christ and involves being crucified with him or baptized into him. Paul comes to Rome with the blessing of Christ, and the church is one body in Christ. Believers serve the Lord (Rom. 12:11), stand or fa11 before him (14:4ff.), and are to walk worthy of him (cf. 1 Cor. 11:27). It is the Lord who comes (1 Th. 4:15ff.), from whom Paul is absent (2 Cor. 5:6ff.), who gives powers to his servants (2 Cor. 10:8), and whose work is being done (1 Cor. 15:58). This Lord is the Spirit (2 Cor. 3:17). As there is one God, the Father, so there is one Lord, Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 8:6). It is through him that all things are, and that Christians exist as such. There is no set pattern for the alternation of Christós and kýrios. Often we find combinations such as ho kýrios Iēsoús or ho kýrios hēmōn Iēsoús (Christós). The use of the name Jesus gives emphasis and solemnity to the formula, and the personal pronoun stresses the personal relationship, which as that of the whole church implies the interrelationship of Christians (Rom. 15:30; 1 Cor. 1:2) but also their separation from others (Rom. 16:18).

b. kýrios may also be used for the historical Jesus (cf. 1 Cor. 7:10, 12; 1 Th. 4:15; 1 Cor. 9:5; Heb. 2:3; Acts 11:16; 20:35). Luke has kýrios for Jesus 13 times, John has it five times, and cf. Mk. 11:3; Jn. 21:7 (though in Mk. 11:3 the reference might be to God). In address to Jesus we find didáskale, rhabbí, and rhabbouní as well as kýrie. In Mark kýrie is used only once by a Gentile woman, but the doubling in Lk. 6:46; Mt. 7:21-22 suggests a Semitic original. If didáskalos is more commonly used by Jesus himself as well as others (cf. Mk. 14:14; Mt. 10:24-25), kýrios in Luke and John has its roots in the life and work of Jesus. The resurrection is decisive, for it shows that Jesus is still the Lord and casts a new light on his teaching (cf. the use of Ps. 110:1 in Mk. 12:35ff.). The word kýrios is thus seen to be a proper one for the comprehensive lordship of Jesus. In him God acts as the kýrios does in the OT.

4. Earthly kýrios Relationships. Earthly relationships take on a new aspect in the NT. Slaves will render wholehearted service because they are now serving the Lord and not men (Col. 3:23-24). The whole problem of earthly relationships finds its solution in the transcendent lordship of Christ (cf. Col. 4:1).

kyría. The only NT use of the feminine kyría is in 2 John. The reference to vv. 1 and 5 is a symbolical one to the church (cf. the plural in v. 6). John does not simply call the church kyría as the bride of the kýrios; he does so in respectful address, perhaps because this is not a church that he himself has founded. On this view the churches are sisters and the members are their children (v. 13).

kyriakós. This adjective, meaning "of the lord or owner," occurs in the NT in 1 Cor. 11:20 and Rev. 1:10 for the Lord's Supper and the Lord's Day. As regards the former cf. the kyríou (genitive) of 1 Cor. 10:21. As regards the latter, the day of Christ's resurrection takes on special significance (cf. Jn. 20:1; Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2). Already the first day is important in Judaism as the day when creation began, and it becomes a special day of Christian assembly as the beginning of the new aeon.

kyriótēs. Meaning "power or position as lord," this word is used in Col. 1:16 for the members of a class of angels. In Jude 8 (cf. 2 Pet. 2:10) the reference seems to be, not to angels, but to the divine majesty (i.e., God himself), whom the false teachers despise with their libertinism.

kyrieúō. Meaning "to act as kýrios," then "to be or become kýrios," this word occurs in Lk. 22:25 for the use of power by rulers, in Rom. 6:9, 14 for the broken rule of death and sin, in Rom. 7:1 for the validity of the law, and in Rom. 14:9 for the lordship of Christ. In 1 Tim. 6:15 God is the Lord of lords (kyrieúontes), and in 2 Cor. 1:24 Paul explains that he is not lording it over the Corinthians.

katakyrieúō. Although the force of the katá is mostly lost in ordinary usage, it conveys the sense of rule to one's own advantage in Mk. 10:42 (Gentile rulers), Acts 19:16 (the evil spirit), and 1 Pet. 5:2-3 (the admonition to the elders). [W. FOERSTER, III, 1081-98]

kyróō [to validate], akyróō [to invalidate], prokyróō [to make valid in advance]

kyróō. This word means a. "to enforce," "to validate," b. "to resolve," and c. "to bring into force." In Gal. 3:15 the point is that the will is ratified and comes into force, although there is a certain tension in the equation of will and promise. In 2 Cor. 2:8 Paul is begging for a reaffirming of love in an effective linking of a legal term with the basis ethical principle of agápē.

akyróō. This is a legal term for "to invalidate" which is also used more generally for "to render inoperative." It has a legal nuance in Mk. 7:13 (the commands of God invalidated by human traditions) and Gal. 3:17 (the ratified will that cannot be annulled-an illustration of the promise that cannot be made void by the law).

prokyróō. This word, meaning "to make valid in advance," is used in Gal. 3:17 to make the point that the promise is ratified by God prior to the giving of the law and is thus of incontrovertible validity. [J. BEHM, III, 1098-1100]

kýōn [dog], kynárion [house dog]

kýōn.

1. This word, meaning "dog," is mostly used disparagingly in the OT for despicable street dogs (cf. 1 Sam. 17:43; 2 Kgs. 8:13; 1 Kgs. 14:11; Ps. 22:16, 20; Prov. 26:11). The rabbis display similar contempt for dogs when they compare the ungodly or Gentiles to them.

---

vv. verses

2. What distinguishes Israel is possession of the law, which is not to be given to the unclean. Jesus takes up this thought in Mt. 7:6. In view of the majesty of the gospel the disciples must not address it to the wrong people, i.e., where they cannot break through opposition in their own strength. The cultic form of the saying suggests an application in worship too. In Lk. 16:19ff. the licking of the sores of Lazarus by dogs describes the supreme wretchedness of his position.

3. Paul’s warning in Phil. 3:2 has a sharp edge. He is perhaps referring Mt. 7:6 to those who disturb the community, or thinking of the hostility of his opponents in reminiscence of Ps. 22 or Ps. 59:6-7. 2 Pet. 2:22 takes up Prov. 26:11 to describe believers who fall back into sin. The influence of the OT may also be seen in Rev. 22:15 with its exclusion of dogs from the holy city, i.e., those who reject the truth and are hardened against grace (cf. Ignatius Ephesians 7.1).

kynárion. This diminutive of kýōn means “house dog” and is probably chosen by Jesus in Mk. 7:27; Mt. 25:26 to show that there is a distinction between Jews and Gentiles but still to give the Gentiles a place in the house. The woman in her reply accepts the distinction but in so doing takes the place that is offered and finds the help she seeks. [O. MICHEL, III, 1101-04]

λ l

lanchánō [to allot, receive]

1. In Jn. 19:24 lanchánō has the unusual sense “to cast lots.” The soldiers cast lots for the coat of Jesus, thus fulfilling Ps. 22:18 (ébalon klēron).

2. In Lk. 1:9 we find the more common sense “it was his lot.” Offering incense is a special privilege, granted each priest only once, and decided by lot.

3. Acts 1:17 is similar, except that in this instance God makes the decision, and thus the thought is that of the allotment of a share in the apostolic ministry.

4. In 2 Pet. 1:1 the common idea of attainment is present, but with the usual sense of allotment in the background. Attainment to faith is not a human achievement but is by divine allotment (cf. Acts 13:48; 17:31; Rom. 12:3; Jude 3). God does not merely grant the possibility of faith; he effects it (cf. Eph. 2:8). As a divine gift, faith is the epitome of grace; hence attaining to faith is by God’s gracious decision, yet closely linked with his righteousness. [H. HANSE, IV, 1-2]

laktízō [to kick]

laktízō, meaning “to kick,” occurs in the NT only in the proverbial saying in Acts 26:14. [H. HANSE, IV, 3]

laléō → légō

katalaléō [to speak against, speak evil], katalaliá [evil speech, slander], katálalos [slanderer]

katalaléō has such senses as “to importune with speeches,” “to prattle,” “to blurt out,” “to accuse,” and “to calumniate.” In the LXX it is used for hostile speech, especially slander. It does not occur in the ethical lists of the secular world, and is infrequent for malicious gossip even in Psalms and Proverbs. In the NT the main stress is on the malicious nature of the speech; and the importance of resisting this vice, which is a violation of the law (Jms. 4:11) and contrary to the new life in God (1 Pet. 2:3), may be seen from its high placing in lists of vices or its being made the subject of special exhortation (2 Cor. 12:20; Jms. 4:11). Its frequent occurrence in the apostolic fathers shows how seriously it is taken in the early church, but also how rampant it is. [G. KITTEL, IV, 3-5]

lambánō [to take, receive], analambánō [to take up], análēmpsis [death, ascension], epilambánō [to grasp], anepílēmptos [irreproachable], katalambánō [to seize, attain], metalambánō [to take part, change], metálēmpsis [sharing], paralambánō [to take over], prolambánō [to anticipate], proslambánō [to receive], próslēmpsis [acceptance], hypolambánō [to take up, support] lambánō.

1. From the basic sense "to take," lambánō acquires the active senses a. "to take to oneself," "to receive," "to collect," and b. "to seize."

2. It also takes on the more passive sense "to acquire" and middle "to hold or grasp something or someone." Sense 2. is less common in the LXX, which a1so has such special uses as "to take life," "to take a census," "to take guilt," "to fetch," and "to strike up" (a song).

In the NT we find sense 1. in such contexts as taking up one's cross (Mk. 10:38), accepting the witness (Jn. 3:11) or messengers of Jesus (13:20) or Jesus himself (1:12), and collecting what is due (Heb. 7:8). Sense 2. is predominant in theological passages. Thus Jesus takes our infirmities (Mt. 8:17), God receives praise (Rev. 5:12), and even Jesus has only what he receives from God (cf. 1 Cor. 4:7; 2 Pet. 1:17). Believers receive God's Spirit (Jn. 7:39; Acts 10:47) and the gifts of the Spirit (1 Pet. 4:10). They do so by faith (Gal. 3:2) and as a gift (cf. Rom. 1:5). Indeed, they receive even earthly things from God (1 Tim. 4:4), and they are invited to ask in order that they may receive (Jn. 16:24). Beyond this life lies the imperishable crown of life that they are also to receive (1 Cor. 9:25). Receiving may be by way of the church (1 Cor. 4:7), but it is from Christ himself that the gospel is finally received (Gal. 1:12).

analambánō, análēmpsis (→ anabaínō). This word, meaning first "to take up," has in the LXX such senses as "to load," "to set on the feet," "to raise" (a song), "to lift up" (in prayer), "to receive" (instruction), and "to keep upright." It can also become a term for rapture. In the NT we find "to take up" in Acts 10:16, "to take with" in 2 Tim. 4:11, "to take on board" in Acts 20:13-14, and "to put on" (weapons) in Eph. 6:13, 16. For the ascension the term occurs only in Mk. 16:19 and 1 Tim. 3:16, where the focus is not on the process (quickly hidden by a cloud even in Acts 1:2, 11) but on endowment with divine majesty. análēmpsis comes to be used for death in later Judaism, and this is the sense in Lk. 9:51, perhaps with a hint of the taking up or back to God that is completed with the ascension.

epilambánō, anepílēmptos. epilambánō means "to grasp," "to seize," "to lay firm hold," and also "to add to." In Lk. 14:4 it is used of the healing hand of Jesus, while in 1 Tim. 6:12, 19 it refers to the firm grasping of eternal life. anepílēmptos, meaning "inviolable," "unassailable," has the sense "beyond reproach" in 1 Tim. 3:2; 5:7; 6:14.

katalambánō. This term has such senses as "to seize," "to light upon," "to understand," and "to hold fast." One sees from the NT that the katá gives the term the character of intensity or surprise (Mt. 9:18; 1 Th. 5:4). The word is used epistemologically only in Luke and Acts. "To attain definitively" is the point in Rom. 9:30. An important use is in Phil. 3:12-13: the Christian must seek fellowship with Christ but will finally possess it only in the last day (cf. 1 Cor. 9:24). In Jn. 1:5 the sense is negative: the darkness does not overpower the light. For the sense "to perceive," "to comprehend," cf. Acts 10:34; Eph. 3:18.

metalambánō, metálēmpsis. This compound has the two senses "to take part" and "to change." In the NT we find the first sense in 2 Tim. 2:6; Heb. 6:7 (cf. Mt. 13:3ff.). The point in Acts 24:25 is the changing of an unfavorable time for a favorable one. metálēmpsis in 1 Tim. 4:3 forbids rules about foods.

All foods, given by God, are ordained for the glad participation of believers in Christ, who are no longer subject to evil forces.

paralambánō.

A. paralambánein in the Greek and Hellenistic World. This compound has such senses as "to take over," e.g., a position, and "to inherit," especially intellectual things, e.g., a student from a teacher. It is important in philosophy, for most knowledge is handed down orally, and since it is practical, the teacher is an authoritative leader whose goal is the formation of character and who will still be respected even should the students strike out on their own (cf. Socrates). The handing down of questions, and of certain religious doctrines, is also significant, and we also find paralambánō in the mysteries for the inheriting of special rites and secrets, although with a stress on oral impartation rather than supernatural revelation.

B. The Question of Tradition in Judaism. In Judaism the material rather than the teacher is the binding link. Students may be grateful to teachers, but the authority rests with the law (as handed down by the prophets and exegeted by the rabbis). If there is an esoteric element, it relates to the withholding of some doctrines from the immature.

C. paralambánō in the NT.

1. With a personal object the term is used for the reception of Christ by the world (Jn. 1:11) and for acceptance into the kingdom of Christ (Jn. 14:3; Mt. 24:40-41).

2. With a material object we find "to take over" an office in Col. 4:17, "to inherit" the kingdom in Heb. 12:28, "to adopt" traditions in Mk. 7:4, and "to receive" Christian teachings in 1 Cor. 11:23; 1 Th. 4:1, but always with a close attachment in personal life and faith to Christ himself as their Author (cf. Gal. 1:12). Only in the light of the ultimate relationship to Christ, not of the historical or doctrinal content, can one understand the exclusive claim of what is received (cf. Gal. 1:9) and the final attributing of paralambámō to God himself (1 Th. 2:13). Christian understanding is at root a receiving of Christ himself (Col. 2:6).

prolambánō.

1. In 1 Cor. 11:21 this means "to anticipate" (cf. also Mk. 14:8, where the anointing is an intimation of Jesus' death).

2. In Gal. 6:1 the point is surprise, i.e., being betrayed into a fault unawares. In this case loving restoration is demanded, not unloving censure.

proslambánō, próslēmpsis. In the NT proslambánō occurs only in the middle (as in the LXX) in the sense "to take to oneself" (Acts 17:5; 18:26), "to take aside" (Mk. 8:32), or "to receive" (Rom. 14:lff.). As God has received us, so we are to receive one another. The noun, not found in the LXX, occurs in Rom. 11:15 for "drawing to oneself."

hypolambánō.

1. With the basic sense "to take up," this means "to support" in 3 Jn. 8.

2. The idea in Lk. 10:30 is "to take up the words," i.e., to reply.

3. In Lk. 7:43 the meaning is "to suppose." The supposition is right here, but false in Acts 2:15.

4. In Acts 1:9 Jesus is taken up out of the disciples' sight. [G. DELLING, IV, 5-15]

lámpō [to shine, light up], eklámpō [to shine out, blaze up], perilámpō [to shine around], lampás [torch, lamp], lamprós [bright, shining]

A. Meaning. lámpō has the primary sense "to shine," or transitively "to light up." The compounds are stronger forms. lampás means a "torch" or "lamp," and lamprós "bright," "shining."

B. The Moral and Religious Sense of the Words outside the NT.

1. The Greek and Hellenistic World.

a. Used with a human reference, lámpō may denote fighting power or an ideal, e.g., right.

b. Theologically the Greek world does not specifically associate light with deity, although light has a numinous character (e.g., in Homer). Torches are first used cultically in connection with chthonic deities. This explains their presence at birth, marriage, and burial. They seem also to have had purifying significance. A connection may perhaps be seen between protection against danger and the promotion of life. Because the torch symbolizes life, the torchbearer is especially close to the deity in the mysteries. The worship of light is more common in Egypt and the Near East, where light is the substance of deity and is related to life and knowledge. Along with the Persian cult of fire, the religious exalting of light in the Near East has an impact on such movements as Mithraism with its extensive use of lamps and torches and its stress on the stars, and on Manicheism with its dualism of light and darkness and its hope for a reconcentration of scattered light in the victorious consummation.

2. "To Shine" in the OT. The OT has many references to light, both natural and religious, yet it nowhere deifies light. God is the Creator of light (Gen. 1:3), he wraps himself in it (Ps. 104:2), he causes his glory to shine in the starry heaven (Is. 40:12), he makes the people like a flaming torch (Zech. 12:6), he seals the covenant with a torch (Gen. 15:17), he shines in the cloud at night (Ex. 13:21), he is depicted as a flaming fire (Ex. 24:17), he is (actively) a lamp to the psalmist (Ps. 18:28), he causes his face to shine on his people (Num. 6:25), and in his light they see light (Ps. 36:9), for he is the fountain of life (note life and light together).

3. Judaism. Judaism works out the OT concept of the luminous glory of God. The Shekinah is radiant light illumining the blessed. God's light shines through Adam, the Messiah, Israel, Jerusalem, the law, and its expositors. God will finally make his light visible, and the faces of the righteous will shine as the sun. In Philo one cannot by nature grasp the light of God; the shining of divine knowledge in the human spirit is like the creation of light or the sunrise.

C. lámpein etc. in the NT.

1. General Presuppositions. These correspond to the OT and Judaism with some Hellenistic influence. The NT content gives the terms their specific sense. The world of God is a world of light (cf. the images in Revelation). God's light is unchangeable (Jms. 1:17) and unapproachable (1 Tim. 6:16). But it relates itself to us. In Jesus God's world comes to us as a manifestation of light in antithesis to darkness.

2. The Theological Use of the Words.

a. lámpein and compounds are used of messengers from God's world (Acts 12:7; Lk. 2:9).

b. They are used of the Messiah at his coming (Lk. 17:24). There is an anticipation at the transfiguration (Mt. 17:2), and cf. the appearance to Paul (Acts 26:13).

c. They are used of the dawn of the experience of salvation (2 Cor. 4:6). A new creation of light corresponds to the first creation as the knowledge of God's glory shines in the heart and then shines out into the world. The linking of God, light, and saving knowledge is Hellenistic, but not the relating of knowledge to the historical act of salvation in Jesus Christ.

d. The words are used of the disciples (Mt. 5:15-16); they are to cause the light that they receive from God to shine out in the world to God's glory.

e. They are used of believers eschatologically (Mt. 13:43).

f. In Revelation they are used of the seven torches (Rev. 4:5, an OT phrase; cf. Zech. 4:2), of the star blazing like a torch (8:10), of the bright river (22:1), of Jesus as the bright morning star (22:16), and of the raiment of the angels (15:6) and the bride of Christ (19:8) (cf. Acts 10:30). As regards the clothing, the point is that it is white and radiant in contrast to the bloody finery of the harlot of 19:8. There is also a suggestion of heavenly transfiguration (19:8).

D. The Church.

1. The words are rare in patristic writings but there is a sense of possessing a unique light. The Hellenistic religion of light continues in Gnosticism.

2. The liturgical use of lamps develops by the fourth century, due partly to necessity, partly to contemporary examples and the general symbolism. Lamps are first placed around the altar, then on it. [A. OEPKE, IV, 16-28]

→ phṓs

laós [people, crowd, nation]

laós, common in the Greek poets but not in prose, becomes a very important word in the LXX in a specific sense that recurs in the NT.

A. laós in Nonbiblical Greek.

1. The Form of the Word. The form is Doric-Aeolic. The Ionic form is lēós, the Attic leṓs.

2. The Etymology. This is uncertain. A link has been seen with láas (“stone”), but a connection with Old High German liut (Leute) is doubtful.

3. The Use in Homer. The first use in Homer is for “people” as a plurality (“crowd,” “population,” “group”), especially in distinction from rulers. The laós consists of laoí (the individuals). A special use is for soldiers in the army, sometimes denoted by nationality.

4. The Use in the Post-Homeric Period. The word is still used for “crowd” but may now denote the totality of a population (Pindar). The reference may still be to the public as distinct from rulers, and laoí may be used for ánthropoi.

B. laós in the LXX.

1. Hebrew Equivalents. In the LXX laós occurs some 2,000 times, seldom in the plural, and with a specific reference to Israel as God’s people. In most instances the Hebrew original is ‘am. The LXX inclination is always to use laós when the reference is to Israel and to use éthnos even for ‘am when the reference is to another people, although this is not a consistent principle.

2. The Main and Popular Use of laós in the LXX. The first and decisive point is that laós now refers, not to people in general, but to a people as a unit (cf. Gen. 34:22; a city in Gen. 19:4; a tribe in 49:16; including the dead in 49:19). The laoí are not individuals but peoples. There is still a distinction between laós and rulers (Gen. 41:10; Ex. 1:22). The looser usage for people continues (e.g., “many people” in Num. 2:6; Josh. 17:14; “the oppressed people” in Ps. 18:27; “much people” in Gen. 50:20), and the LXX has laós for soldiers (cf. Ex. 14:6), but not in the plural.

3. The Specific LXX Use of laós for Israel.

a. Israel as laós theoú. While laós may denote any unit, the LXX mostly reserves the term for Israel, just as the Hebrew prefers ‘am for Israel. The stress is on the special position of Israel as God’s people. laós is probably chosen for this purpose because, as a solemn and slightly archaic poetic term, it is more suitable than éthnos to express the distinction between Israel and other peoples.

b. The Nature of the Relation. Passages like Ex. 19:4ff.; Dt. 4; 7:6ff.; Ps. 135 show the nature of the relation. All nations belong to God, but he has allotted other nations to the angels and kept Israel for himself; she is a holy people by reason of this distinction.

c. The Basis of This Relation. God's free choice and act is the basis of the relation (Dt. 4:37; 7:6). It has no special advantages (Dt. 7:7). He has chosen her in love and faithfulness (7:8). He has freed her to serve him (Ex. 7:16, 26). In the plagues he clearly distinguishes her from Pharaoh's people (Ex. 8). This liberation from alien domination by God's mighty act, along with the institution of the covenant at Sinai (Dt. 4:7ff.), is what makes Israel a nation.

d. The Two-Sided Nature of This Relation. The relation is a reciprocal one of love and obligation. As God has separated Israel to himself (Lev. 20:26), he expects her to separate herself for him. She is holy, and is to be holy (Lev. 19:2). Her love for God must be her response to God's initial love for her (Dt. 7:9).

e. The Battle of the Prophets for Its Actualization. Because Israel does not live up to her obligations, the prophets wage their great battle (cf. Hos. 1:9; Is. 1:10). They threaten the judgment which falls at the exile (Dt. 4:27). But God remains faithful (Dt. 4:31). He waits only for repentance to treat Israel, or a remnant of Israel, once more as his people. The remnant represents the true Israel (Is. 10:20ff.). The present of possession becomes the future of promise linked to obedience (Jer. 7:23 etc.). The people is holy only by future sanctification (Is. 62:12). There is also a universalist extension to the nations (Is. 11:10; 62:10; Zech. 2:10-11, etc.) with the development of an eschatological messianic hope.

f. Prophecy as the Climax of the History of the Word laós. Prophecy brings to full expression the unique relation denoted by laós. But since Israel fails to live up to her status, the relation becomes judgment and its certainty can be maintained only by a faith in God's faithfulness that looks beyond present contradictions and extends its sweep beyond Israel's own frontiers.

C. laós in Hellenistic Judaism outside the Bible.

1. Josephus. Josephus in Jewish War uses éthnos for Israel and laós for "people," "population," "crowd." In the Antiquities, however, he often uses laós for Israel, largely because he makes considerable use of the LXX in this work.

2. Philo. Philo, who has leṓs as well as laós, engages in speculative allegorizing of the concept on the basis of its use in the Pentateuch (cf. Gen. 35:29; Dt. 7:7).

3. Inscriptions. Inscriptions, which have both éthnos and laós, apply the term to individual groups of Jews as representative of the whole people. [H. STRATHMANN, IV, 29-39]

D. People and Peoples in Rabbinic Judaism.

I. The People.

1. God's Possession.

a. Israel as laós theoú. The basic motif that Israel is God's people finds expression in the idea that God has given the other nations to angels but kept Israel for himself. In some statements the national angels of the peoples seem to be their gods.

b. The Father-Son Relation between God and Israel. Another concept is that Israel is God's firstborn with special privileges as such. While the sonship is natural, it has ethical implications: Israelites are to behave as sons.

c. The People as the Bride of God. The theme of marital love also occurs in description of the relationship. As yet there is only betrothal, with small gifts, but with the Messiah will come the marriage and the fullness of gifts.

d. The Jews as Friends and Brothers of Their God. Along with marital love we also find the idea of friendship or brotherhood between God and his people. God is a brother in adversity (Prov. 17:17), and he invites his friends to eat with him (Cant. 5:1).

2. The Holy People. As God's people, Israel is holy by reason of her separation from idolaters and the gift of the law.

3. The People as the Center of the World. Judaism has a strong sense of the centrality of God's people. It will rule the world, if not in this aeon, then in the next. The main thought, however, is that the world is created for Israel, and it is only because of God's delight in Israel that the race is kept from perishing.

4. The Meaning and Duration of Suffering.

a. Suffering the Result of Sin. The disastrous situation of Israel after A.D. 70 is interpreted as the result of sinful conduct.

b. Suffering as a Means of Testing. With judgment goes the idea of testing. Only by way of this present world can one enter the future aeon. It is by suffering that Israel enjoys the three special gifts of the law, the land, and the world to come.

c. Suffering with a View to Purification for the Coming Aeon. Another thought is that of the atoning power of suffering. The people falls to temptations but penal suffering purges it for the future aeon.

5. The Eternal Character of the People. The peoples enjoy present success but Israel's great day will come with the Messiah, the final aeon, and world judgment, through which Israel will pass unscathed. Israel may thus hope for collective salvation. Some individuals may be excluded, others may need purgatorial cleansing to participate, and a few righteous pagans may find a place. Hence collective salvation does not necessarily embrace all (or merely) those of patriarchal descent.

II. The Peoples.

1. The Remoteness of the Peoples from God. The relation between Israel and other peoples is especially acute during and after the exile and involves tension between particularism and universalism. The assigning of the nations to guardian angels (or gods), who are, of course, inferior to God, entails a remoteness from God, a deprivation of the honors granted to Israel, and even at times a sense that God is hostile to other peoples.

2. The Sinful Character of the Peoples.

a. Transgression of the Adamic Commands. The conflict between God and the nations is ethical, not mythical. The first charge against them is failure to keep the six commands given to Adam.

b. Violation of the Noachic Commands. More common is the charge of failure to keep the seven commands given to Noah.

c. Rejection of the Law. The main charge is rejection of the law, which the peoples once knew but against which they rebelled, so that their ignorance is culpable.

3. The Success of the Gentiles. The political success of the nations is interpreted as a limited rewarding of transgressors for the good works they have done. In the last judgment it will be replaced by definitive punishment, for then there will be no more claim to reward.

4. The Mass of Perdition. The general thought is that the nations, being sinfully remote from God, are for the most part excluded from the future aeon, and thus constitute a mass of perdition.

III. The Election and Privilege of the People.

1. Universalism. In the struggle between universalism and particularism, universalism assumes that the peoples have some share in God's salvation, and it is thus imbued with missionary zeal. Universalism is most at home in Hellenistic Judaism, which believes that Israel has a priestly and prophetic mission to pray for the human race and to spread the knowledge of the law among it. Balancing the more hopeful view of the nations, however, is a sense of superiority and privilege.

2. Particularism. With the disasters of A. D. 70 and 135 particularism tends to triumph with its view that the nations are God's enemies, that Israel is a privileged people, and that Israel will thus be given her rights as the only nation of the future aeon after the great world judgment. [R. MEYER, IV, 39-50]

E. laós in the NT.

1. Occurrence. The word occurs some 140 times in the NT (only eight in the plural). It is most common in Luke and Acts (36 times in Luke and 48 in Acts), and very rare in John.

2. The Popular Meaning. In the NT the predominant use is for "crowd," "people," "population." This use is rare in Mark and Matthew but common in Luke, where there is also distinction between the Sanhedrin and the Zaós (Lk. 22:2; cf. Acts 6:12), or the leaders and the laós (Acts 13:15).

3. The National Meaning. laós is parallel to éthnē in Lk. 2:30-31 (plural), and cf. Rom. 15:11; Rev. 7:9; 10:11, etc. In Acts 4:25, 27 there is transition to 4.; the plural comes from Ps. 2:1.

4. The Specific Meaning: Israēl. We find this sense where there is antithesis to éthnē (Lk. 2:32) or there are additions like "Israel" (Acts 4:10), or "of the Jews" (Acts 12:11). éthnos may also denote Israel (cf. Lk. 7:5; 23:2; Acts 10:22; 24:10; Jn. 11:48ff.). In Luke-Acts this is mostly used either by or before non-Jews. laós may also denote Israel with no addition (cf. Acts 10:2; 28:17). In contrast, Acts uses óchlos when referring to non-Jewish crowds. It is specifically as God's people that Israel is laós (cf. Mt. 1:21; Lk. 1:68; Rom. 11:1-2; 15:10; Heb. 10:20; Acts 7:34; Lk. 24:19).

5. The Figurative Meaning: The Christian Community. The NT goes beyond the LXX by using laós for the church (cf. Acts 15:14; Rom. 9:25-26; 2 Cor. 6:16; 1 Pet. 2:9-10; Heb. 4:9, etc.). A basis for this lies in Lk. 1:17 (cf. 3:8). The saying of James in Acts 15:14 signifies the revolution whereby the laós has a new center in the gospel, so that it now comprises all believers, both Jewish and Gentile. This concept underlies Paul's mission, e.g., in Corinth (Acts 18:10). A spiritual laós replaces the biological laós; Paul adduces Hos. 2:23 in support (Rom. 9:23ff.). What has previously applied to Israel now applies to the church (1 Cor. 6:14ff.). Tit. 2:14 claims the phrase "a people of his own" for the church, and 1 Pet. 2:9-10 adds to this Israel's other titles of honor. Hebrews finds in the OT laós a type of the Christian community (cf. 2:17; 4:9, etc.). In Rev. 21:3 the church is the laós theoú of the prophecies of Zech. 2:11 and Ezek. 37:27.

6. The Significance of the Metaphorical Use. In the OT tension arises between the national and religious aspects of laós, which are meant to be in harmony (cf. Ex. 19:5; Hos. 1:9). Prophecy announces judgment on the national laós but also additions to the laós from the laoí or éthnē. This finds fulfilment in the church with the rise of a purely spiritual laós which is fashioned by God's saving act in Christ and in which faith is normative. This is one laós; it transcends all the frontiers of the laoí, although not eliminating them. The Judaizing element in the church resists this concept, insisting that Gentile believers must also become members of the older laós by circumcision. But Paul contends for the unity of the new laós simply on the basis of faith in the one Lord. Nationality is not a condition of belonging to God.

7. Related Transfers. As the true laós of God, the church is the true Israel (Gal. 6:16), the true seed of Abraham (Gal. 3:29), the true circumcision (Phil. 3:3), and the true temple (1 Cor. 3:16). These phrases all bind the church to the OT as its true fulfilment.

F. laós in the Usage of the Early Church. In the early church we find laós used for "crowd," "nation," "Israel," and "the church." There is a strong sense of the church as the new people of salvation

(cf. Clement of Alexandria Stromateis 6.5.4.2.2). laós may also be used for the congregation at worship (1.1.5.1). When the congregation is distinguished from the leaders, this gives rise to the later idea of the "laity." [H. STRATHMANN, IV, 50-57][9]

lárynx [larynx, throat]

lárynx, meaning "throat," occurs in Rom. 3:13 (quoting Ps. 5:9). The point here is that words uttered through the throat express inner depravity just as the breath of corruption issues from the entrance to a tomb (cf. Mk. 7:15, 18ff.). [H. HANSE, IV, 57-58]

latreúō [to serve], latreía [service]

A. In Nonbiblical Greek.

1. latreúō.

a. Etymology. From látron, "reward," "wages," latreúō means "to work for reward," then "to serve."

b. Use. The word is used literally for bodily service (e.g., workers on the land, or slaves), and figuratively for "to cherish." We also find it for the service of the gods, but not in a technical sense.

2. latreía. The noun is more common than the verb and has such connotations as "service for reward," "labor," "bodily care," and "service of the gods."

B. In the LXX.

1. latreúō.

a. Occurrence. The verb, unevenly distributed, occurs some 90 times in the LXX, mostly in Exodus, Deuteronomy, Joshua, and Judges. The Hebrew original is 'bd, which is usually rendered douleúein when human relations are at issue and latreúein when the reference is to divine service. latreúein always has a religious sense except in the play on words in Dt. 28:48.

b. Use. The religious use of latreúein is specifically a cultic use (Ex. 3:12; 4:23; 7:6, etc.). Cultic acts are obviously in view in 2 Sam. 15:8. The worship at issue may be worship of idols as well as God (cf. Ex. 20:5; 23:24; Dp. 4:28, etc.). The demand of the OT is that Israel should worship God alone, but the outward act is to express inward commitment (cf. Dt. 10:12ff.). The term has the same implications in Josh. 24:19. Unlike leitourgeín, latreúein does not refer only to priestly functions but to the religious and moral conduct of the whole people.

---

[9]Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (475). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

cf. confer, compare

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

LXX Septuagint

OT Old Testament

*2. latreía. This occurs only nine times in the LXX and refers generally to cultic worship (Josh. 22:27) or to a single cultic act (Ex. 12:25: the Passover). In Maccabees it has the sense of religion except in 3 Macc. 4:14 (forced labor).

3. Comparison with Nonbiblical Usage. The LXX focuses on the cultic sense but with no restriction to priestly ministry. Secular Greek prefers therapeúein for cultic worship, but the LXX usually has this for healing or cherishing (except in Is. 54:17; Dan. 7:10), and it reserves douleúein for service in a general sense.

4. Philo's Usage. Philo uses the verb only once and the noun only six times. The verb denotes cultic worship but the noun embraces the ministry of virtue and spiritual service of God.

C. In the NT.

*1. latreúō.

a. Occurrence. The verb occurs in the NT 21 times, eight of which are in Luke and Acts, six in Hebrews, four in Paul, two in Revelation, and one in Matthew. Three of the verses come from the OT.

b. LXX Influence. The service denoted by the verb is always rendered to God (or to the gods) (cf. Rom. 1:25; Acts 7:42).

c. The Sacrificial Ministry. As in the LXX, latreúein refers to the sacrificial ministry in Acts 7:7, 42; Heb. 8:5; 9:9; 10:2; 13:10. Hebrews, however, departs from the LXX by using the term for the ministry of the priests, thus equating latreúein and leitourgeín.

d. The Ministry of Prayer. Elsewhere the reference of latreúein is to the general ministry of prayer and praise, e.g., adoration in Mt. 4:10; Rev. 7:15; 22:3, prayer and supplication in Lk. 2:37; Acts 26:7.

e. The Generalized Figurative Sense. The verb has the general sense of righteous conduct in Lk. 1:74; Acts 24:14; Heb. 12:28; perhaps Heb. 9:14. Paul's missionary work comes under the heading of latreúein in Rom. 1:9; 2 Cor. 8:18; it is an act of religious service with an inward ("with my spirit") as well as an outward dimension. The Christian life in the Spirit is also a serving of God in Phil. 3:3. This more spiritualized rather than cultic latreúein is the main point in the NT.

*2. latreía. Three of the five NT instances of latreía refer to the sacrificial ministry, i.e., Rom. 9:4; Heb. 9:1, 6. In each case the OT is in view. In Jn. 16:2, too, the word carries a hint of sacrifice. The same applies in Rom. 12:1, although here it is the living sacrifice of inner life and outer conduct that constitutes the logikḗ latreía, i.e., a service of God which conforms to human reason, and in which the divine reason is also at work. This statement is the climax of the process of internalizing and more comprehensive externalizing which begins with Dt. 10:12ff. [H. Strathmann, IV, 58-65]

láchanon [edible plant, vegetable]

In Mk. 4:32 the mustard seed becomes the greatest of plants (a parable of the divine rule). In Lk. 11:42 the tithe on all garden plants goes beyond the demands of the law (Dt. 14:22-23), although Jesus does not forbid it as such. In Rom. 14:2 Paul describes the "weak" as vegetarians; he probably has some Jewish group in view (cf. v. 5; 15:8ff.), but we know nothing of the details of the group or of its reasons for

---

NT New Testament

i.e. id est, that is

v. verse

vegetarianism. Paul does not argue the rights or wrongs of the practice but contends for freedom, love, edification, and concern for the conscience of others. [G. BORNKAMM, IV, 65-67]

legiṓn [legion]

Borrowed from Lat. legio, legiṓn is used for the Roman legion, which consists of about 6,000 infantry, 120 cavalry, and supporting special troops. The only NT instances are in Mk. 5:9 (referring to demons) and Mt. 26:53 (referring to angels). The underlying idea is that of extremely powerful demonic or angelic forces. But Jesus, as the Son of God, can drive out the demonic legion and has the angelic legions at his command. [H. PREISKER, IV, 68-69]

légō [to speak], lógos [word, Logos], rhḗma [statement], laléō [to babble, prattle], lógios [eloquent, learned], lógion [saying], álogos [without speech, reason], logikós [rational, spiritual], logomachéō [to dispute about words], logomachía [dispute about words], eklégomai [to choose, elect], eklogḗ [chosen, elected], eklektós [chosen, elect] légō, lógos, rhḗma, laléō.

A. In the Greek World.

1. légō.

a. The basic sense of légō is "to gather" with the twofold nuance of repetition and separation.

b. The meaning "to gather" is often present, as is the middle "to assemble."

c. "To count" is a derived sense as the mental gathering of similar things.

d. Along similar lines we find "to enumerate," "to draw up," "to enter on a list."

e. From enumeration we move on to narration, which then yields the sense "to say," with such various nuances as "to speak," "to mean," and in compounds "to contradict," "to foretell," "to proclaim." There is approximation here to eipeín and the root rhē.

2. lógos.

a. Like légō, lógos has first the sense of "collection."

b. A second sense is "counting" with the nuances (i) calculation, (ii) account, (iii) consideration, or evaluation, and (iv) reflection, or, in philosophy, ground or reason.

c. Counting also gives the sense of "list" or "catalogue."

d. We then find "narrative," "word," "speech." In this sense, supplanting épos and mýthos, lógos acquires the most varied nuances, e.g., legend, proverb, command, promise, tradition, written account, conversation, sentence, prose, even thing.

3. rhḗma. The root of rhḗma has durative significance. What is denoted is something definitely or expressly stated, i.e., "statement." This may be an announcement or even a treaty. While distinguished as word from deed, rhḗma as active word later comes to be used in grammar for the verb, and it lives on only in this sense.

4. laléō, laliá.

a. This word, like "lull," imitates childish babbling, and thus means "to prattle," "to babble." It is also used for the sounds of animals and musical instruments. As regards speech, it may denote sound rather than meaning, but also the ability to speak. In compounds the meaning is always "to prattle."

b. laliá. The point here is excessive speech, i.e., chatter or garrulity. [A. DEBRUNNER, IV, 69-77]

B. The Logos in the Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. The Meaning of the Word lógos in Its Multiplicity. Although little used in epic, lógos becomes important with the rise of Greek rationality. As mental activity, it still has the basic sense “to reckon” or “to explain.” It can thus be a. “an account” as narrative, speech, or saying, b. the result of reckoning as a principle, argument, or explanation (commercially an account), c. mathematically “proportion,” “relation,” then more generally “measure” or “order,” and d. subjectively human reason, mind, or thought. For Socrates it combines the ideas of expression, enumeration, and definition. It necessarily stands related to such words as truth, knowledge, virtue, law, life, nature, and spirit. While it has a wealth of meanings, it nowhere has the sense of a word or address of creative power. The stress is on the rational element in speech; rhḗma carries the emotional and volitional emphasis. For Aristotle lógos denotes the showing of something for what it is, and orientation thereto. Only in magic does the term become a technical one for incantation.

2. The Development of the lógos Concept in the Greek World.

a. The Two Sides. On the one side lógos means speech or revelation as the clarification or explanation of something. It is the content of a thing in terms of its law, meaning, basis, and structure. On the other side is a metaphysical reality, the primary and intelligible law of things,; which makes clarification possible and determines life. In this sense lógos can later be a cosmological hypostasis.

b. Heraclitas. As that which constitutes the being of both cosmos and humanity, lógos connects humanity with cosmos, with itself, and with deity. It thus establishes humanity in its true being. lógos here is both word and meaning evoking human words and works. As the law or principle of things, it transcends human opinion, grounds the psychḗ, and poses a claim which we see to be our own claim.

c. The Sophists. The lógos now becomes predominantly human reason, i.e., the power of thought and speech, and in politics the power of persuasion. It is the basis of pedagogy and culture as well as political life.

d. Socrates and Plato. With Socrates and Plato the thought develops that the lógos, through a common tongue, has the power to establish fellowship by way of agreement on the reality of things. Presupposed is a harmony between the lógos of reason and the lógos of reality. Truth is achieved when the lógos interprets things, but the lógos must proceed from them. The lógos makes philosophy possible because it is linked to being. lógos interrelates thought, word, matter, nature, being, and norm.

e. Aristotle. For Aristotle the lógos is the source of human virtue and piety, for actions are determined by the understanding, and we come to understanding by speech.

3. The lógos in Hellenism.

a. Stoicism. In Stoicism lógos expresses the ordered and teleologically oriented nature of the cosmos. It can thus be equated with God and with the cosmic power of reason of which the material world is a vast unfolding. Human lógos is a particular part of the universal lógos. The latter achieves awareness in us, thus combining God and humanity into a great cosmos. A later development is the equation of lógos and phýsis (nature) in a fusing of rational and vital force.

b. Neo-Platonism. Here, too, lógos is shaping power, whether in art or nature. The whole world is lógos as the pure power of form, while things in the world are also lógos in admixture with matter. The one lógos may thus divide into antitheses, but humanity, by its lógos, may attain to true lógos, i.e., the truth of being.

c. The Mysteries. In relation to deities of revelation lógos takes on a special sense as sacred history, or holy doctrine, or revelation. Gods like Osiris and Hermes are personifications of the lógos or the son of God. The sacred lógos leads to union with deity in which the initiate is also lógos theoú. Another use of lógos is for prayer, the only way whereby one may enter into relation with God.

d. The Hermes-Logos Theology. In the personification of lógos as Hermes (also Pan, Isis, etc.), there is no incarnation but an equation of the revelatory and cosmogonic principle with a deity, i.e., its hypostatizing as a god. Hermes serves as a mediator or herald of the divine will but also as the great force of conception. Thus lógos is creative potency, the guide and agent of knowledge, increasingly represented as a doctrine of revelation. We see this in the speculations of Hermeticism on creation and revelation, in which lógos is the son of God, the demiurge, which plays the role of an intermediary as an image of deity of which humanity is itself an image, and which forms a trinity with the divine purpose and the cosmos as the seed which the former fashions into the latter.

4. The lógos of Philo of Alexandria. A common term in Philo, lógos gives evidence of his attempt to unite Jewish religion and Greek philosophy. For Philo the divine lógos is a mediating figure which comes from God, forms a link between the transcendent God and the world, and represents humanity as a high priest and advocate before God. It is the sum and locus of God’s creative power, and as such it orders and governs the visible world. If this conception shows Hellenistic features, it is distinctive inasmuch as the lógos is specifically the lógos theoú (or theíos lógos), it is personal, and its origin and mode of operation are described in figures taken from the sphere of procreation.

5. Hellenistic lógos Speculation and the NT. Differences between the lógos of Hellenistic speculation and the NT lógos are as follows. In the NT concepts like lógos and law are not important in themselves; what counts is what God has to say to us, the lógos theoú. The Greek lógos concept is an attempt to master the world. It is governed by the human lógos, which is found again in the cosmic lógos. To shape life according to the latter is to come to one’s true being. Revelation is simply the perception of the inner law of self and all reality. In the NT, however, lógos expresses the specific divine address with which God comes to us here and now with his outside demand and claim. A related point is that the Greek lógos can divide up into individual lógoi in the phenomena which invest the world with reality. If it is the principle of harmony, it is not a mediator between God and humanity. Nor is it historically unique. It does not come in time but releases and reclaims forces in an eternal process which is not the outworking of a divine resolve but a continuous unfolding of things. Along these lines, it may be called the son of God, but only in equation with the world, not as the only-begotten who becomes one historically unique man, sárx. [H. KLEINKNECHT, IV, 77-91]

C. The Word of God in the OT.

1. The Hebrew Equivalents of the Greek Terms for “Word.” The roots ’mr and dbr are the main equivalents for lógos, lógion, rhḗma, and rhḗsis. The former has a more poetic reference when used for "saying" (cf. Pss. 19:2-3; 68:11; Job 22:28), and the latter offers the classical terms for "word" in history, law, prophecy, and poetry. Etymologically the root sense seems to be "back." The reference, then, is to the background or content or meaning of what is said. In speech the content stands for the thing. The thing thus takes on a historical element in its word. The word (dāḇār) contains a thought. It makes a thing known, so that to grasp the word is to grasp the thought. But the word is also dynamic. It is filled with a power which is felt by those who receive it but which is present independently of such reception. As the prophets see and proclaim, these two aspects are most forcefully to be seen in God's word.

2. The General Use of dāḇār for lógos and rhēma. The LXX treats lógos and rhēma as synonyms and uses both for dāḇār. rhēma is more common in the Pentateuch, Job, Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, but lógos takes the lead in the other historical books and the poetical books, and it occurs eight times more often than rhḗma in the prophets. When it is given such attributes as true, good, right, etc., lógos (or rhḗma) remains readily understandable to Greeks, but other combinations, e.g., hoping in the word in Ps. 119:74, or looking to it for life in Ps. 119:154, give evidence of the dynamic concept of the Hebrew original. Furthermore, since the meaning of a thing is implied in the word, so that word and thing are co-extensive, the most important quality of word is truth. As God's word is truth (2 Sam. 7:28), so ours must be (Gen. 42:16). An Amen must be uttered to give a word validity (Dt. 27:15ff.). The sum of God's word is truth (Ps. 119:160). Relating meaning and reality, and also speaker and hearer, the word belongs to the moral sphere as a witness to something for the persons concerned.

3. The dāḇār of Prophetic Revelation.

a. Revelation in Sign. In 2 Sam. 23:1ff. David is seized by God's Spirit and word, and he himself speaks God's word in an early messianic prophecy (for similar direct speech cf. Balaam in Num. 24:4, 16). In prophetic rapture the speaker has an eye and ear for the suprasensory picture and can thus impart the mystery. There is a relation between image and word. The messianic picture contains the prophetic word; the picture is to be put into words. The later prophets are familiar with a similar relation between picture and word; cf. the calls of Isaiah (ch. 6) and Ezekiel (ch. 1), the visions of Amos (chs. 7ff.), and the visions of Zechariah (chs. 4-5), although sometimes even the prophet needs an interpreter who can translate the picture into words (cf. Zech. 1:9; 2:4; 4:4; 6:4).

b. Revelation in Sign and Word. In the writing prophets, however, the pictorial revelation is less significant. The voice that speaks is not their own but God's. Puns (cf. Am. 8:2; Jer. 1:11-12) bring out the relation of image and word, but the word does not have to be combined with an image. Whether long or short, the speech finds its vital nerve in the word received from God, so that the complete address can itself be called God's word. Reception of the word is a spiritual process. This is implicit, although there are few express references to the Spirit (cf. 2 Sam. 23:2; Num. 24:2; Hos. 9:7).

c. Dissolution of the Sign. The word increasingly frees itself from the sign and becomes a pure expression of revelation. As in the call of Samuel (1 Sam. 3), God himself speaks, and this speech is a summons which empowers Samuel himself to speak God's word (1 Sam. 9:27) with its promise, its demand, and its judgment (1 Sam. 15:23, 26). The word thus becomes a force in Israel's history. Made known by the prophets, it comes to pass (1 Kgs. 2:27; Judg. 13:12), it is irresistible (2 Kgs. 1:17), and it stands forever (Is. 40:8).

d. The Writing Prophets. The formula "The word of the Lord came" at the head of prophetical books (Hos. 1:1; Mic. 1:1; Zeph. 1:1) implies that the whole book is God's word, with no distinction between the divine voice in the prophet and its written expression. The idea of revelation is present in the concept, and there is a transition to the understanding of the entire OT as God's word. If this word is teaching, it has a dynamic aspect as blessing (Is. 2:3; Am. 8:11-12) and constraint (Am. 3:8). The word is put on Jeremiah's lips (Jer. 1:9). It is his joy and delight (15:16), but it also puts him under compulsion (20:7ff.). It is no idle dream, for even when clothed in vision, it is an irresistible force (23:29) which is known because it infallibly comes to pass (28:9). Clarity concerning it comes only with prayer either as self-subjection (15: 10ff.) or intercession (42:7ff.). In Is. 40ff. the word endures forever (40:8) and carries its fulfilment within itself, accomplishing its mission no less than the rain and snow (55:10-11). Coming from God, it is the effectual force which epitomizes all true prophecy.

4. The Word as the Revelation of the Law. As revelation, the word establishes a personal relation between God and the prophet which reorients the prophet's life and work. But the law as revelation may also be called word (often in the plural), and while the prophetic word is more topical, the legal word has permanent validity for the people. Thus the commandments are the words of the covenant in Ex. 34:28 (cf. Dt. 4:13) and the words of the book of the covenant (Deuteronomy) are read to the people in 2 Kgs. 23:2. Indeed, the commandment of Dt. 30:11 is equated with the word of 30:14; the reference in both cases is to the sum of the book. This word may be easily grasped, it is present revelation, and it carries within it the power of performance as the mouth speaks it and the heart receives it.

5. The Divine Word of Creation. Since the word always contains revelation, denoting the revealed will of God, it also applies in the sphere of revelation in creation. Thus in Gen. 1 the world has its origin in the divine word. The same concept of the creative power of the word occurs in Ezek. 37:4; Is. 40:26 etc.; Ps. 147:15ff. "By the word of the Lord the heavens were made" (Ps. 33:6ff.) is an apt summary.

6. The Word in Poetry. In poetry, too, revelation is by the word (Job 4:12). Ps. 119 is a treasury in this respect with its many nuances. The word stands in heaven, is truth, is a light, gives life, grants understanding, carries power, evokes trust and obedience, and is the object of hope. Here again the word has both a poetic and a dynamic aspect. [O. PROCKSCH, IV, 91-100]

D. Word and Speech in the NT.

*1. Basic and General Aspects of the Use of légō /lógos. The NT stress on hearing presupposes speaking. The main Greek word for speech is thus the vehicle of many important statements. Even at the baptism and transfiguration the word gives the event its theme and content. Yet légō and lógos carry various senses ranging from the everyday to the most pregnant. Indeed, one can even read of empty words (Eph. 5:6), or evil words (3 Jn. 10), or false words (2 Pet. 2:3), or flattering words (1 Th. 2:5). Human words are full of error (Jms. 3:2), and the words of human wisdom are impotent for all their eloquence and plausibility (1 Cor. 1ff.). The terms can also be used in a neutral sense, as in Mt. 7:28; Mk. 7:29; 2 Th. 2:2. lógos may denote a letter, address, account, or rumor (cf. 2 Cor. 10:11; Acts 2:41; 1:22; Lk. 5:15), or the partial record in a book (Acts 1:1). In tongue-speaking it may even be inarticulate (1 Cor. 14:19), for wherever there is légein there is lógos. It is because the stress is on saying something that the same term may be put to such varied use, e.g., for the word of knowledge or the opposite, or for the word of power or the empty word. Even in the pregnant use for the word of the gospel the same sentence may contain the term in a looser or opposing sense (cf. 1 Cor. 2:4). The context provides the specific content, but the basic meaning is the same, namely, a spoken word. This is true even in John 1 with its reference to God's revealing word, for the word is no independent entity but points to him who in living reality speaks it. Jesus' use of légō in the emphatic egṓ légō hymín, which may also be used by the Baptist (Mt. 3:9), Paul (Gal. 5:2), and even Gamaliel (Acts 5:38), carries an authoritative note, not because of the légō, but because of the person of the speaker.

2. More Specific and Technical Meanings.

a. In the NT lógos may mean an "account" or "reckoning." The use is secular in Acts 19:40 but contains the idea of eschatological responsibility and judgment in the parables of Jesus (Mt. 18:23; 25:19; Lk. 16:2) and in the general stress on Christian accountability (1 Pet. 3:15; Mt. 12:36; Heb. 13:17). Paul plays on the commercial sense in Phlm. 15ff. “Having to do” with God in Heb. 4:13 carries a sense of relationship involving responsibility.

b. “Ground” or “reason” is the sense in Acts 10:29; 18:14.

c. “Matter” or “subject” is the point in Acts 8:21; 15:6.

d. In the Hebraic phrases in Mt. 5:32; Lk. 4:36 we find a similar meaning to b. and c. The reference in Mt. 5:32 is probably to a form of licentiousness, and in Lk. 4:36 the substance of what is said is at issue.

3. The Sayings of Jesus.

a. The Quotation of the Sayings. Since Jesus himself did not write down his sayings, the record refers constantly to his speaking or his lógoi or rhḗmata. The reference may be to a single saying (Mk. 10:42), a group of sayings (Mt. 26:1), or his total message (Mt. 24:35). Various formulas are used (cf. Mt. 26:75; Mk. 14:72; Jn. 18:9; Acts 11:16; Lk. 22:61: 1 Th. 4:15, etc.). Although there is no fixed formula, and differing versions of the same sayings may be freely given, the sayings of Jesus clearly have an authoritative character (cf. 1 Cor. 7:10). The authority is that of genuine words that are spoken, heard, and recounted; it is in the word made flesh that the glory is seen.

b. The Authority of the Sayings of Jesus. In the Gospels the sayings of Jesus often arouse displeasure (Mk. 10:22) and offense (Mt. 15:12), not just because they are hard (Jn. 6:60), but because they carry such an unheard-of claim (Mk. 2:7). Yet they also cause astonishment by reason of their authority (Mt. 7:28). The reaction to his word is eternally decisive (Mk. 8:38), for it demands faith in him. His word, however, goes hand in hand with his work. It is an active word which effects healing (cf. Mt. 8:8), exorcism (Mt. 8:16), raising the dead (Lk. 7:14-15), and ruling the elements (Mk. 4:39). The preservation of the Aramaic (cf. Mk. 5:41; 7:34) shows that power is seen in this word, not in the sense of a magical formula, but in virtue of its efficacious authority (cf. Acts 3:6; 1 Cor. 7:10). Similar data occur in John (cf. 4:41ff.; 6:60ff.; 8:51; 12:48; 14:24; 15:3, etc.). It is because Jesus is the Christ and the Son that his word has this authority (Jn. 14:24; 6:63, 68). It may thus be put on the same footing as Scripture (2:22). To grasp it is to be grasped by it (Jn. 6:65; cf. Mt. 19:11;, Mk. 4:11; Lk. 9:45), although this does not absolve from responsibility when there is failure to do so.

c. The Appeal to Jesus’ Word outside the Gospels. Outside the Gospels there are only a few direct quotations, but there are many allusions, and in any case the words are seen as part of the total christological reality. They are thus viewed with the works, related to the cross and resurrection, and set in the context of Christ’s present ministry (cf. Heb. 1:3; Rom. 10:17).

4. The OT Word in the NT.

a. The NT quotes the OT as both Scripture and word. In verbal forms we find several words, including légein, in both the active and the passive. The speakers may be human (Moses, David, etc.), superhuman (Scripture, the preexistent Christ), divine, or indefinite. Sometimes God himself is called the speaker when we have sayings from the prophets or Psalms (Mt. 1:22 etc.). But this implies no elimination of the human subjects. No antithesis is seen between divine and human speaking. The indefinite and passive often imply divine speech (cf. Mt. 5:21ff.).

b. Both lógos and rhēma may be used for human words, whether individual or collective, and also for divine sayings, usually with reference to OT verses or passages, although God’s word comprises the totality of his revelation in Col. 1:25 and Heb. 4:12. Oddly, “word of the Lord” is not used in NT quotations from the OT, and “the Lord spoke” occurs only within quotations, though cf. Mt. 1:22; 2:15.

c. Sometimes it is hard to say whether the divine word is the OT or the Christian message (cf. Heb. 4:12; Eph. 6:17; Heb. 13:7). There are not, of course, two words, but one (cf. Heb. 1:1 -2).

5. The Special Word of God to Individuals in the NT.

a. Simeon and the Baptist. Both Simeon and John are put in the category of OT prophets when it is said that God’s rhḗma came to them (Lk. 2:29; 3:2).

b. The Apostolic Period. While the phrases lógos theoú and lógos (or rhḗma) toú theoú are common, they are not used again for special directions. These are now given by the Spirit, or Christ, or an angel, or the divine voice. The reason for the change is that there has been a definitive coming in the incarnate Word.

c. Jesus. The word of God is never said to come to Jesus himself, not even at the baptism or transfiguration. While we have a voice from heaven at these events, the words spoken are not words of direction but of ratification to the hearers. To speak of God's word coming to Jesus is inappropriate in view of the unity with the Father that is implied in, e.g., Mt. 11:27.

6. The Early Christian Message as God's Word (outside John).

a. Statistics. Word of God, word of the Lord, and word are all used for the Christian message with no discernible difference apart from statistical distribution. The first term occurs 30 times, the second eight, and the third 40.

b. Content. The content is apparent when we compare Acts 6:1ff. and 1:21ff. The word is witness to Jesus. Lk. 1:2 confirms this, and cf. Acts 17:11; 18:5, etc. To receive the word is not just to receive the OT but to receive the message of Jesus which is the fulfilment of the OT. The usage of Paul is the same (1 Th. 1:6; 1 Cor. 14:36; Gal. 6:6; Col. 4:3-4). Tit. 1:2-3 plainly states the content of the Pauline lógos. Similarly it is the message of Jesus that gives life in 1 Pet. 1:23, 25 and Jms. 1:21. rhḗma is much less common in this sense (Heb. 6:5; Eph. 5:26; 1 Pet. 1:25).

7. The Character and Efficacy of the Early Christian Word (outside John).

a. As the gospel, the word is the word of the cross, reconciliation, grace, life, and truth. It is so because the speaker is God. Explicitly or implicitly toú theoú controls the lógos statements of the NT (cf. 1 Th. 2:13). Paul is its minister, and must guard it against corruption (2 Cor. 2:17), but it is God who speaks through him (cf. 2 Cor. 5:19-20). This insures its efficacy (Jms. 1:18). Because it is the power of God (1 Cor. 1:18), it cannot be bound (2 Tim. 2:9). Prayer must be made that God give it free course (2 Tim. 3:1) or open a door for it (Col. 4:3; cf. Acts 6:4 for the relating of the word and prayer). Not magical, its efficacy is concrete, overriding obstacles and human opinions, and grasping and sanctifying believers. As the word of grace, life, or salvation, it does not just preach these things but effects them.

b. Initially, then, the human response to the word is passive, as in a new birth (1 Pet. 1:23). God's choice precedes its hearing (cf. Acts 15:7), and the Holy Spirit seals those who hear and believe (Eph. 1:13), not by intellectual agreement alone, but by appropriation in faith (Acts 4:4). Receiving the word, when authentic, involves doing (Jms. 1:22). Disobedience blasphemes it (Tit. 2:5); obedience glorifies it (Acts 13:48).

c. The lógos is always, concretely, a spoken word, not a mere concept. There is no word, and hence no reception, faith, or Christian life, without proclamation (Rom. 10:17). The norm of teaching is faithfulness in transmitting the word spoken in the Christ event (cf. Lk. 1:1 ff.; Tit. 1:9).

8. The Word in the Synoptic Account of Jesus.

a. In the Synoptists the word is plainly linked to the person of Jesus. It is the word of Jesus himself, and also the word about him.

b. Jesus himself preaches the word (Mk. 2:2; 4:33; Lk. 5:1). Yet this is said only rarely, for Jesus is no mere teacher or prophet. The whole work of Jesus is the word which others are to speak (cf. Mk. 11:4).

9. The Word in the Synoptic Sayings of Jesus.

a. The term lógos is infrequent in Jesus' own sayings. In Lk. 8:21 Jesus says that his mother and brethren are those who hear the word of God and do it, while in Lk. 11:28 he pronounces blessing on those who hear the word of God and keep it. Matthew and Mark have "will" for "word" in the first case.

b. “Word” is used in all three gospels in the interpretation of the parable of the sower (Mk. 4:13ff. and par.). Some scholars doubt whether Jesus offered the interpretation himself, but the use corresponds to what we find elsewhere in the NT.

c. In this light the term is legitimate in this context, whether or not it is authentically used by Jesus himself.

10. lógos/lógoi (toú theoú) in Revelation.

a. The use of lógoi at the beginning and end of Revelation (words of the prophecy, 1:3; of this book, 22:9; etc.) shows it to be authentic revelation. lógoi toú theoú is used relative to the promise in 19:9 and to prophecies about the beast in 17:7.

b. Apart from 19:13 the singular ho lógos toú theoú is always linked with witness (cf. 1:2, 9; 6:9; 12:11; 20:4). This is the witness of Christ himself, and it entails suffering. The word, then, may be apostolic preaching, the testimony of martyrs, or the revelation itself, which is an elucidation and illustration of the lógos that is spoken by God and by the witness of Jesus. Only in the light of 19:13 can one say whether lógos and martyría are two things or one.

II. Jesus Christ the lógos toú theoú.

a. Preaching the Christ event is preaching the word, and to receive it is to have faith in Christ. The ministers of the word are eyewitnesses (Lk. 1:2). The word is not just what Jesus said but the mystery of God disclosed in Christ (Col. 1:25ff.). An event, not a concept, underlies this use. Christ is God’s “Yes” in his historical person (2 Cor. 1:19; cf. Rev. 3:14). This shows that Rev. 19:13 is expressing something integral to the whole Christian message when it says that his name is the Word of God.

b. We have here the filling out of an old term with a new content that catches up rather than negates the old; cf. for parallels such terms as ktísis, entolḗ, and diathḗkē (2 Cor. 5:17; Jn. 13:34; Lk. 22:20). One sees from 1 Jn. 1:1 that the use of “word” for Jesus is dynamic. A real word is spoken; hence the use of the neuter “that which” along with the masculine lógos. This protects the equation of Jesus and lógos from mythological personification.

c. Rev. 19:13 declares the name that no one knows, relating the lógos to the King of kings but still linking the historical and eschatological Christ (cf. 1:7).

12. 1 Jn. 1:1ff.

a. The lógos here is the historical Christ in a dynamic equation that preserves the idea of a real word; avoiding mythical personification.

b. Yet 1 Jn. 1:1ff. introduces new elements, comparable to Jn. 1:1, with the phrases “from the beginning” (v. 1) and “with the Father” (v. 2).

13. The Distinctiveness of the lógos Saying in Jn. 1:1.

a. John uses lógos in many combinations, e.g., “of God” in 10:35, “of Isaiah” in 12:38, “of Jesus” in 18:32, “my” in 5:24, etc. Only in the Prologue do we find ho lógos in the absolute.

b. There is in John no hesitation to present Jesus as a teacher of the lógos, for the basis of the whole gospel is the unity of Christ’s speech and action. Jesus gives the lógos, but he also is the lógos. This fact controls the use.

---

par. paragraph

c. Yet after the Prologue Jesus is never again called lógos, for the preexistent lógos (1:1) has now become flesh (1:14), i.e., Jesus.

d. The identity of Jesus and lógos emerges here as the kernel of all the NT sayings that use lógos in a specific sense; the new thing is the preexistence of the lógos and its transition to history. This appears at several points in the Gospel (cf. 1:30; 6:33ff., 46, 50ff., 62; 8:23, 38, etc.). Preexistence is stated by Paul too (Rom. 1:4; Phil. 2:6ff.; Col. 1:16; cf. 1 Cor. 8:6). What it expresses is a manifest reality that is of ethical or soteriological concern. It is the necessary presupposition of Jesus' awareness of his sonship and his adoption of the title Son of Man. The distinctive thing in Jn. 1:1ff. is that preexistence is now put thematically at the head and expressed in the term lógos.

14. The Concern and Derivation of the lógos Sayings in John: I.

a. Lack of Speculative Concern. While the sayings have a speculative ring, they arise out of the historical figure of Jesus and the historical process of seeing and hearing him. Hence we do not have the personifying of a concept. The interest is not in ideas but in an event, which is now given its eternal context. Basic is seeing the eternal glory in this sárx, i.e., in the historical Jesus.

b. Allusion to Gen. 1:1. Since the word goes back to the beginning with God, a link naturally arises with the creative word in the beginning which is the origin of all things. The en archē is intentional (Jn. 1:1); it leads on to the truth of v. 3 that the word and "God spoke" of Gen. 1:1ff. are the same. The word cannot be detached from God; it always goes forth as God's word. Yet the word is no mere function; it is personal, identical with the person in whom it was made flesh. The preexistence of the lógos is that of Christ himself.

c. Other Connections. While messianic teaching contributes to Jn. 1:1ff., this does not contain preexistence statements. We find these, however, in relation to such concepts as the Gnostic lógos, the Gnostic primal man, the Hellenistic Jewish sophía, and the Palestinian Jewish law. Attempts have thus been made to find parallels in Jn. 1:1 to all four of these. The "primal man" parallel is too indirect to be considered seriously, but lógos calls for discussion even though there might be an Aramaic original for Jn. 1:1 ff.

d. Relations to Contemporary "Word" Speculations. The author may well be adapting a concept common in contemporary speculation, but he relates it specifically to the preexistent word which is uttered in creation and which becomes a historical and personal event in Jesus. Nor does he do this polemically or apologetically. Only the term itself forms a connection; the concern and the context are quite different.

15. The Interest and Derivation of the lógos Sayings in Jn. 1:1ff.: II: Logos and Law. In view of the antithesis of word and law (cf. 1:17), there is a more direct relation to the Palestinian concept of the law. Unlike contemporary lógos speculation, this is a basic question throughout John. The law, too, is a word (cf. Ps. 119). To it, too, preexistence and majesty are ascribed. But what the rabbis say about the law is now said about Christ, in whom God's word is not just transmitted but enacted. Jesus does not merely teach the law; he is the law. In him the disciples see the true and final law. As Jesus Christ, the personal word, is the new temple, or the new covenant, so, as the eternal word that has become an event, he is the new law. Similarly, he might be described as true wisdom, although wisdom speculations bear no direct relation to Jn. 1:1ff.

lógios. This word has two meanings, a. "eloquent" and b. "educated" or "learned." Sense b. is more common in Philo and Josephus. The only NT instance is in Acts 18:24, where Apollos is called lógios. In the light of v. 25 and 1 Cor. 1:12 "eloquent" is often preferred here, but the accompanying clause would also justify "learned."

lógion.

A. The Pre-Christian Use.

1. This word means "saying," "pronouncement," "oracle."

2. The LXX uses it for God's word in, e.g., Num. 24:4; Dt. 33:9; Is. 5:24; Ps. 19:14. It is more or less equivalent to lógos in this use.

B. lógion in the NT.

1. In Acts 7:38 the reference is plainly to the revelation at Sinai, i.e., to the law which Moses received and was to pass on to the people.

2. In Rom. 3:2 the divine lógia are specifically but not exclusively God's promises to Israel (cf. the promises of Rom. 15:8).

3. In Heb. 5:12 the main emphasis is on the revelation of God in Christ, although God's prior revelation in the OT is included (cf. 1:1-2). The readers have become so hard of hearing that they need to be taught the first principles of this afresh.

4. In 1 Pet. 4:10-11 the good steward, bearing a divine charisma, utters Spirit-filled pronouncements. The usage here is closest to the nonbiblical (A.1.), but the,"as" makes it plain that strictly only God can speak lógia theoú.

In the NT, then, the term may refer to past sayings but it may also be used for the proclamation of what God has said in Jesus Christ, which will, of course, include the individual sayings of Jesus.

C. lógion in the Usage of the Early Church.

1. The term may still denote an individual saying (cf. 2 Clem. 13.3-4; Justin Apology 32.14).

2. It is also used, however, for a number of such sayings, or for the sum of them (cf. 1 Clem. 13.4; 19.1; 62.3; Clement of Alexandria Stromateis 1.31.124.2, etc.).

3. In some passages which refer to the lógia toú Kyríou, there is thus doubt whether individual sayings are meant or the whole gospel (cf. Pol. 7.1; Irenaeus Against Heresies 1, Preface 1).

4. The title of Papias' work (logíōn kyriakṓn exergēseis) is obviously not meant to refer only to sayings. Similarly, when Papias speaks about the composition of Mark, tá kyriaká lógia is obviously equivalent to "what the Lord said and did." The same applies to tá lógia in connection with Matthew. This plainly includes dominical sayings, but a more comprehensive meaning is also possible. The passage offers no support, then, for the argument that Papias is a witness in favor of a special book of sayings (Q).

álogos. This word means a. "without speech," "dumb," and b. "without reason or basis." Sense b. occurs in Acts 25:27, but the meaning in 2 Pet. 2:12; Jude 10 might be either a. or b. ("dumb" or "irrational" animals).

logikós. This means either a. "belonging to speech" or b. "belonging to reason." Sense a. does not occur in the NT but we find sense b. in 1 Pet. 2:2 ("spiritual"). Perhaps logikós is used here rather than pneumatikós (cf. v. 5) because, like milk, it is a familiar term in philosophy and mysticism. Parallels show that it may express the spiritualizing of the cultic, and this is its function in Rom. 12:1, where our bodies are to be offered, not in immolation, but in spiritual worship (cf. 1 Pet. 2:5). In Judaism, too, one finds moral spiritualizing of the cultus. In Paul, however, this is christological as well as ethical. It is based on the mercies of God in Christ (Rom. 12:1), and the norm of conformity to the lógos lies in the Spirit of Jesus Christ.

logomachéō, logomachía. The verb occurs in 2 Tim. 2:14, which says that "disputing about words" is of no profit. The noun is used in 1 Tim. 6:4, which issues the warning that those who do not keep to sound words have a liking for "disputes about words," which can have only harmful results. [G. KITTEL, IV, 100-143] eklégomai.

A. The Common Greek Meaning. In the middle eklégō means "to make a choice," with various objects, e.g., slaves, payments, or abstract things. The perfect passive means "choice" or "chosen." [G. SCHRENK, IV, 144]

B. Election in the OT.

1. The LXX Rendering of the Hebrew. The verb is mostly used in the LXX (108 times) for the Hebrew root bḥr. Where it translates other roots this is for the sake of variety or theological association. Greater caprice may be seen in the use of the verbal adjective eklektós, which may carry such meanings as "choice," "desirable," "costly," etc. The root bḥr may itself be rendered by other Greek words. (For details cf. TDNT, IV, 144-46.)

2. bḥr and Related Expressions. The verb bḥr ("to choose," "to elect") occurs 164 times in the OT. In 92 cases God is the subject, and divine election is also the theme in 13 instances of the passive. Human choice may be of God or his law, will, etc., although naturally the word also has a common use. When God is the subject, the term has very definite doctrinal significance. It expresses a resolve of the divine will with an element of insistence (cf. 1 Sam. 12:22). Related terms bring out the implied element of taking, separating, appointing, and knowing. Congruent with election are the concepts of redeeming, liberating, and delivering, or, from another angle, those of people and inheritance, although such terms are either historically oriented or refer more specifically to the covenant than to election. The belief in election is bound up closely with bḥr, which is well adapted to provide an interpretation of historical revelation.

3. bḥr in Current Usage. Like the word "to choose," bḥr denotes choice among possibilities. When objects are chosen, purpose is implied, e.g., land, stones, wood, animals, etc. for specific ends (cf. Is. 7:15-16; Ps. 118:22). The same applies in the choice of persons (Gen. 6:2; Ex. 18:25), which also carries an element of approval. While emotion has a part in the choice, intelligence is a more important factor.

4. bḥr as an Act of Religious Confession. The rational element is present when the choice is of God or false gods (Josh. 24:15, 22), of God's law or way (Ps. 119:30, 173), of the fear of God (Prov. 1:29), or of the sanctuary (Ps. 84:10). God shows the way (Ps. 25:12), and instruction brings the conviction that it is right. Yet choosing what is pleasing to God means keeping the covenant and is thus an act of confession (Josh. 24:22). A rationally grounded act of will underlies the commitment to the covenant God. In Josh. 24 only those who leave Yahweh can choose among other gods (v. 15). But this is plainly regarded as an absurdity. Hence it may be that there is some sarcasm in the idea of "choosing" God in v. 22. To be sure, it is not unprofitable to do so, but there is no real thought here of the establishment of a contract, for God has called Abraham and liberated the people, so that there is no real choice but to serve him. In this regard the element of selection plays only a minor role and has little influence in the rest of the OT. One possible explanation of the story of Josh. 24 is that it represents an act of political resolve whereby the tribes bind themselves to unity on a sacral basis, i.e., on the common confession of Yahweh. There is perhaps allusion to something similar in Dt. 33:5.

5. The Election of Individuals by God.

a. Only rarely does the divine choice refer to individuals (apart from kings). One of David's sons in 2 Sam. 5:15 bears the name Ibhar, which means "God elects" or "May God elect." The idea is probably that the bearer of the name, or his family or people, is the recipient of divine favor.

b. Surprisingly the prophets do not specifically equate their calling with election. In Is. 49:7 the Holy One has "chosen" the servant of rulers, and in 42:1 the servant is "elect" ("called" in v. 6). Here election is linked to calling in connection with a mission that is divinely given to the people (42:6). In general, however, election and calling are regarded as distinct; the former stresses the subject, the latter the action. Thus the call of Amos is a summons to go and prophesy (7:15). The call of Jeremiah is close to Is. 49:1ff., but the prophet says that he is "known" rather than "chosen." As in the case of Isaiah (Is. 6) or Amos (7:14), the point is that the idea of selection by God is meaningless for the prophets. It is not as though he were choosing among many possibilities.

c. National heroes such as Abraham (Neh. 9:7), Moses (Ps. 106:23), and David (Ps. 78:70) are sometimes said to be chosen, but these references are few and late.

d. The same applies to election to the priestly office. The choice of Eli is earlier (1 Sam. 2:28) but has little independent theological significance.

e. In general the election of individuals occurs in the context of the election of the community. Those who pray (cf. Ps. 65:4) are conscious of their election, which they experience as divine grace that is renewed in the cultus. If in this experience they are marked off from the wicked among the people (Ps. 5:5ff.), it is as personal representatives of the elect nation. What is said about individuals exemplifies the one concept that derives from the common heritage of faith.

6. The Choice of the king. The same applies to the king. He is not a divine ruler in pagan style but is elected by God to guarantee the divine direction of the people's destiny on a religious basis. It is for the sake of Israel that God establishes David (2 Sam. 5:12); the king's people is God's people (Ps. 28:8). There are, of course, more direct references to anointing than to election, and there is a political element in the making of a king which means that the people can also be said to choose their ruler (1 Sam. 8:18; 12:13). Note, however, that there is a skeptical element in these references. If a popular element cannot be avoided, it is disapproved except insofar as God himself makes a decision in favor of the one whom the people chooses, so that the bearer of the kingly office may be regarded as the elect of Yahweh. This explains why a secular monarchy without sacral sanction is impossible in Israel (cf. Eshbaal in 2 Sam. 2:8-9 and Adonijah in 1 Kgs. 1:38ff.). Even though Saul is chosen by the people, and gains his victory over the Ammonites, there has to be the ratification by the divine choice in 1 Sam. 10:17ff. and by the anointing in 1 Sam. 10:1, in which Samuel serves as a representative of nabiism with its charismatic emphasis (cf. 10:5ff.). The law of monarchy in Dt. 17: 14ff. thus distinguishes between divine choice and human institution. The stress lies on God's decision. God appoints, the anointing ratifies the divine choice, and the people adds its own ratification (2 Kgs. 10:5), although this ratification may also at times be called the choice of the people (2 Sam. 16:18).

7. The Election of the People.

a. The thought of national election finds clear formulation in Dt. 14:2 but it is implicit in the basic idea that Israel is God's people (cf. Judg. 5:11). In secular terms this idea expresses a sense of nationality strengthened by common experience. Belief in God, however, is the impulse behind the development of nationality and can sustain it even when political identity is lost (Jer. 31:10). God's supremacy is linked to Israel's power and loyalty but it also confers uniqueness on this people (Num. 23:9). Only on the basis of faith in God's omnipotence can the people maintain itself among alien cultures and their resources.

b. The encounter between national election and the universal rule of God poses the question of God's purpose in choosing Israel. A clash thus arises in which the prophets oppose unconditional ethical commitment to nationalistic self-awareness, and even propose the concept of a mission of the elect people to the nations.

c. In Israel particularly (as distinct from Judah) a religious nationalism is fostered which evades the unconditional authority of the ethical and finds easy assurance in the thought of God's cultic presence (Mic. 3:11). The cry "Peace, peace" (Jer. 6:14) when there is no political peace except in the balance of the great powers serves only to blind this theologically perverted nationalism to the inner moral crises which, in spite of temporary military successes, will finally bring disaster.

d. The prophetic message does not dispute the election of Israel but shows that it involves special responsibility rather than primacy or privilege. Thus Amos points out that the elect nation is subject to special scrutiny and judgment (Am. 2:4ff.; 4:12), for God's interest in his people is in its righteousness (5:24), not its greatness.

e. In Deuteronomy (cf. 4:37; 7:6; 10:15) the election of the people rests on the love of God, not on any national qualities, and it carries with it a commitment to holiness. Rational thought blends here with the certainty of faith. The idea of election, like that of the covenant, is both logically clear and theologically fruitful. Love and faithfulness determine the divine choice.

f. From one standpoint election establishes the special status of the elect as a holy people that must serve God's purposes. From another standpoint the concept sustains the idea of history as the place of God's revelation. The Lord of the earth makes his will known in a historical process which encompasses all people.

g. This raises the problem of the Gentiles. Election means rejection. A judgment on false religions is pronounced (Dt. 7:5, 25). Israel can have no part in the worship of idols, which gives rise to unworthy customs (Dt. 9:5). This implies that God alone is the true Lord of the world. But it must not lead to arrogance (Dt. 9:6ff.), for the covenant is an ongoing thing (5:2-3), and the sense of election must rise above emotional nationalism and serve the observance of covenant demands.

h. An emotional element may still be found in Deuteronomy in the form of love. God elects Israel because he loves her, not for her greatness (7:7) or purity (9:5), but as a free gift. Deuteronomy does not draw the inference that this love of Israel means lack of love for the nations. The reference is to his love of Israel as a fact.

i. Election means education. Israel is to be what she is by God's will (Dt. 8:5). God's action in election is purposeful. The education, however, is not abstractly pedagogical but personal. In this regard, then, election uniquely intertwines theology and faith in statements of distinctive charm and didactic value.

j. The patriarchs are embraced by election both as the fathers of the people and as the bearers of blessing to all peoples (Gen. 22:18; 26:4). Abraham bears the promise because he follows the call of God in simple trust and obedience through all the crises of his history from his alien status to the unexpected gift of a son and the adventures in Egypt. The way of God is a way of salvation, for he wills by Abraham to lead to righteousness and judgment (Is. 51:2).

k. Understanding the national history by means of the concept of election does not come easily, for election as prerogative comes into collision with election as responsibility (cf. Am. 7:10ff.; Jer. 7:26; 28; 37-38). Political and religious leaders find it hard to accept that God may judge his elect people. They are thus ready to fight to the last for Israel's national interests in the belief that these are identical with the divine purposes.

l. Election as responsibility develops into the concept of election as mission. The elect people is to bear witness to the nations that God is God (Is. 42:1; 43:10). Israel is to be restored but only in order that through her a light may shine to the Gentiles. Indeed, even in suffering the chosen witness carries the truth of divine love to the world. The love of God is the heart of election, the power of God is seen in the mystery of it, the experience of the people derives from it, and in its light the nations shall walk (Is. 60:3). [G. QUELL, IV, 145-68]

C. eklégomai in the LXX and Jewish Hellenistic Writings.

1. General. In the LXX eklégesthai occurs with the genitive, dative, and more commonly the accusative, and also with en. In the middle an emphatic heautṓ is often used. To stress the preferring of one thing over another we find hypér plus the accusative, and ek or apó denotes selection from.

2. The Nature of the Selection. Selection may be of articles (wood, stone, etc.), persons, or abstract things (e.g., light and darkness). It may be between two or three things (cf. David in 2 Sam. 24:12).

3. Religious Election.

a. This may be the selection of a place, e.g., Jerusalem (2 Kgs. 21:7 etc.) or the temple (Dt. 12:5ff.).

b. It may also be the choice of individuals, e.g., Abraham, Moses, the king, the priest, and the elect servant of Is. 43:10.

c. Commonly it is the election of the people, although not in Josephus.

d. Only a minor part is played by rejection as its opposite. Ps. 78:67 simply means that God does not choose the king from Ephraim.

e. The thought of purpose is often added with an eís ti or hína and infinitive (cf. 1 Kgs. 8:16; 1 Chr. 28:4).

f. The word may sometimes have the sense of "picking out" or "sifting," of "trying" the heart (Prov. 17:3), of "being pleased" (2 Sam. 19:39), of "deciding" (Josh. 24:22), or of "determining" (Job 29:25).

D. The Idea of Election in Apocalyptic and the Damascus Document.

1. Eschatology promotes the sense of election in times of conflict, rallying resistance but also fostering the pride of privilege and submerging the concept of mission in a spirit of revenge.

2. The Damascus Document takes an even narrower view by confining election to a righteous remnant that will inherit eternal life and all human glory. In contrast, God knows the works of sinners even before their creation.

E. eklégomai in the NT.

1. The Synoptists. In Lk. 14:7 and 10:42 the word has the general sense of choosing among two or more possibilities. In Mk. 13:20 the verb supports the noun eklektós. Elsewhere the use is for the choosing of the apostles. This is selection from a larger number (ap'autṓn) in Lk. 6:13.

2. The eklégesthai of the Disciples in John. The use in John resembles that of the Synoptists. A special problem is how Judas can be chosen (cf. Jn. 6:70). His inclusion is for the fulfilment of Scripture (13:18-19). When Judas has left, election is given fuller weight (15:16ff.). It is Jesus who elects (6:70 etc.), but the Father stands behind the choice (6:65). Election is worked out in the sphere of faith and obedience (6:63ff., 68). If Judas is not given by the Father, this is shown by his failure to do what Jesus says (13:17). The goal is bringing forth fruit in love (15:16-17). It should be noted that Judas is nowhere said to be foreordained as diábolos, although the betrayal itself is divinely foreseen and determined. It is only after the departure of Judas that the true purpose of election emerges. Because election is from the world, the world will hate and fight the disciples (15:18ff.). Only as election originates with Christ is fruitbearing possible. Election is the basis and source of fruitful service. What applies specifically to the apostles in these passages has a wider reference to the community as a whole. From Judas it learns that even the severest conflicts find their solution in the Lord's decision. The worst that can happen is perfectly apprehended by Jesus in judgment and grace.

3. eklégesthai in Acts. Acts uses the term (1) for selection, whether of the apostles (1:24), the Seven (6:5), or the delegates to Antioch (15:22), (2) for the election of the patriarchs (13:17), and (3) for the choice of Peter to initiate the Gentile mission (15:7).

4. eklégesthai in Paul and James: The Election of the Community. In 1 Cor. 1:27ff. the threefold use expresses the fact that the members of the community, in all their human weakness, serve the purpose of manifesting the divine strength. In Eph. 1:4 the accent is on eternal choice, the purpose is adoption in Christ, and the result is a consecrated walk, not in selfishness, but in love. Jms. 2:5 is parallel to 1 Cor. 1:26ff. but in the context of a polemic against discrimination. The needy become rich by election; the two accusatives express the gift bound up with election (cf. Eph. 1:5-6).

5. The Idea of Reprobation. The NT does not expressly bring eklégesthai into contrast with reprobation. In Rom. 9:13 the "love" and "hate" come from the quotation (Mal. 1:2-3) and seem to refer to historical role rather than eternal destiny. eklégesthai is more closely related to words of calling than to words of foreknowing or foreordaining.

eklogḗ.

A. General Greek Usage. The idea of "selection" is predominant in Greek usage, e.g., of rulers, guardians, officials, etc. The stress is on the act, not the result, and the basis is aptness for a specific purpose. The principle of selection may be added, e.g., by birth, income, etc., although this is left out when it is obvious. In papyri and inscriptions we read of the selection of a bride, field, gift, etc. In Stoicism the reference may be to a choice in practical life. Epictetus lays down the rule that one should choose what is in accordance with nature.

B. Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. eklogḗ does not occur in the LXX, but the other renderings of the OT have it in a few cases, e.g., Is. 27:7; 37:24.

C. Other Jewish Hellenistic Writings. The element of free choice is predominant in these works. In Ps. Sol. 18:6 eklogḗ is God's sifting choice within Israel, while in 9:4 it is the free choice of the human will. Josephus has the term for the choice that Abraham gives Lot (Antiquities 1.169) and for the choice that David must make between famine, plague, and war (7.322). Free human decision is the point in Jewish War 2.165.

D. The NT.

1. Acts. In Acts 8:15 the Lord tells Ananias that Paul is a chosen instrument (in Hebraic fashion the genitive is used adjectively here). The choice is for the apostolic task of carrying Christ's name to Gentiles, kings, and the people of Israel.

2. Paul.

a. Paul first uses eklogḗ for divine selection in the history of the patriarchs (Rom. 9:11). The choice is not for salvation as such but for historical mission. Similarly, God has now chosen the Gentile church to fulfill his purpose. The stress is on God's free decision but not to the exclusion of human responsibility.

b. In Rom. 11:28 eklogḗ denotes the election of the whole people in the patriarchs. c. In 1 Th. 1:4 the reference is to the choice of the Christian community. This takes place in the power of the Spirit (v. 5) and is equivalent to being loved by God.

d. Another use (Rom. 11:5) is for the gracious selection of a believing remnant out of the totality of Israel. The NT does not speak of a similar selection out of the church, and the OT concept of the remnant controls the application to Israel.

e. eklogḗ is used in a passive sense in Rom. 11:7 for those who are selected according to 11:5. The chosen number has attained what Israel as a whole was seeking.

3. eklogḗ in Peter. 2 Pet. 1:10 refers to the election and calling of the community (cf. Rev. 17:14). eklogḗ is only apparently a more dogmatic term, for the word is used in a movement of responsibility with regard to teleological ordination. Believers must confirm their election; their action is thus to be taken with full seriousness relative to the divine rule (cf. the promises and the corresponding acts in 1:3ff.).

E. The Early Church.

1. Apostolic Fathers and Apologists. Diog. 4.4 says that circumcision is for the Jews a witness to eklogḗ. 1 Clem. 29. 1 says that God has made the church his chosen portion. Mart. Pol. 20. 1 applies the term specifically to martyrs in a way which suggests selection within the community, i.e., an elite.

2. Origen and Gnosticism. Origen follows Paul's use in Romans. Expounding Eph. 1:4 he makes of eklogḗ almost a dogmatic term in a static sense not found in the NT. But for him it may also be the future goal. In Gnosticism we find a sectarian use for an elite, e.g., the pneumatikoí as distinct from the psychikoí.

eklektós.

A. Ordinary Greek Use. The ordinary use of the adjective is for "choice," "select (ed).'' It refers in the papyri to things of the best quality.

B. The Greek Bible and Jewish Hellenistic Writings.

1. In the LXX the general meaning is for choice products, e.g., plants, animals, or minerals. With reference to persons we find it for select troops. The term becomes more prominent in Ezekiel with a figurative reference to Israel in ch. 19.

2. The religious use takes three forms. a. The term may refer to what is sacred or pure (cf. 1 Sam. 10:3). It can even be used for God in the sense of pure (Ps. 18:26). b. Cultically the term has the sense of "consecrated" and is used for the sacred vessels, for people dedicated to judgment (2 Sam. 21:6), and for the stones used in building the temple (cf. Is. 28:16; 54:12). c. In its use for the election of Israel, we find the term for Abraham (Philo), Moses, Joshua, David, etc., as well as for the land (Zech. 7:14), for the city of Jerusalem (Tob. 13:13), and, of course, for the people (cf. Is. 43:20; Ps. 106:5).

3. There is a marked growth in the use of eklektós as compared with the Hebrew equivalent. This is not necessarily due to a liking for the religious concept of election, yet there is an increasing inclination to stress the fact that Israel is the elect or chosen people.

C. Apocalyptic.

1. Israel or Her Elite as the Elect. In a further extension of use, mostly with an eschatological thrust, eklektós often occurs in apocalyptic either for Israel or for the righteous within it. The struggle against Hellenism strengthens the tendency to restrict the term to those who keep the law. The idea of a definite and divinely predetermined number appears.

2. The Messiah as the Elect. In the OT the only basis for a reference to the Messiah is the description of the servant as elect in Isaiah. Apocalyptic, however, relates the one elect to the many elect. As the elect the Messiah is righteous, kept by God, sent out with power, and set on the throne of glory, where he makes a final choice of the elect to share his glory to all eternity.

3. The Angels as Elect. In a few instances the angels are God's holy and elect children.

D. Mandaean Writings.

1. In the Mandaean literature the adjective elect is applied to such concepts as life and light.

2. From elect life comes the elect messenger or helper who joins himself to the elect.

3. The process of redemption produces elect persons, i.e., the perfect who are chosen from the world, roused from sleep, and illumined by the mysteries, so that their liberated souls go to the house of life.

4. In the battle for the title of elect the idea of rejection also seems to be present.

E. The NT.

1. The Synoptists.

a. In the Synoptists the term always has an eschatological reference. The cryptic saying in Mt. 22:14 is to be seen in the light of the parables in Mt. 21-22, where an invitation is issued to many, but those who reject it in disobedience (cf. 21:31, 43) are not chosen. Here is a dynamic view of election in which God's eternal pronouncement does not enslave history fatalistically but establishes responsible decision. The reading which has the same saying in Lk. 14:24 is in keeping with the thrust of 14:7ff., which uses the kaleín group eight times. The different forms of the parable, which seem to derive from independent sources, do not affect the meaning of eklektós in Matthew.

b. The use in Lk. 18:7 is equally practical, for it leads to trust on the one side and obedience on the other. The elect can have an effect on history by their prayers, but this is no ground for self-confidence, for the final question whether the Son of Man will find faith when he comes poses the issue of responsibility while not conflicting with faith's looking to God and his goal. Election is set in the context of exhortation. An appeal to the conscience accompanies the confidence it gives.

c. The term occurs again in Mk. 13: 19ff.; Mt. 24:21ff. Here it has an eschatological content but with no sectarian slant. The elect that are gathered from the four winds are believers from all lands. The theme is the final threat that confronts them, their preservation, and their final salvation. The preservation comes only through the shortening of the days, the threat is that of unprecedented thlípsis, false messianism, and false prophecy (Mk. 13:19ff.), and the final salvation is by grace. If election is a basis of confidence, it again carries with it a warning.

2. Christ as the Elect in Luke. In Lk. 9:35 and 23:35 the term elect is applied to Christ himself, first by God at the transfiguration, then by those who deride him at the crucifixion. It is by the cross that he enters into his glory, so that he is elect not merely in or in spite of the passion but by his ordination thereto. His claim to election does not rest on outward success. Although Luke has both eklektós and eklektoí, he does not expressly relate them as Paul does in the case of huiós, e.g., in Gal. 3:26.

3. eklektós in Paul. Paul makes little use of the term. At the climax in Rom. 8:33 it sums up all that he says in 8:14-15 about the bearers of the Spirit. There is no condemnation for the elect, for they have a salvation that begins and ends in eternity with the love of God. Similarly in Col. 3:12 the elect are holy and beloved, and as such they should and can show love. That each believer is elect appears in Rom. 16:13 (Rufus). The relation of election to the final goal is the point in 2 Tim. 2:10, while 1 Tim. 5:21 carries a reference to elect angels.

4. eklektós and syneklektós in 1 Peter and the Johannine Epistles. The word has thematic significance in 1 Peter. The readers, who are called exiles of the dispersion, are chosen, destined, and sanctified (1:1-2) in a work of Father, Spirit, and Christ. Predestination (cf. 1:20) is the basis of election, while en denotes the means (sanctification by the Spirit) and eis denotes the goal (obedience to Christ). The theme is developed in 2:4ff. with the transfer of the OT promises and predicates from Israel to the community. This passage links the choice stone (Christ) to the chosen community (cf. Eph. 1:6). What marks the elect people is faith in contrast to unbelief and disobedience. Thus, even though faith has an eternal basis and unbelief displays God's judicial action (v. 8), responsibility is presupposed. The aim of election is ministry; foreordination is an ordination to declare God's gracious acts (2:10). As the whole church is a génos eklektón consisting of eklektoí, so the local congregation is an eklektḗ, and that at Babylon is thus syneklektḗ (5:13). The usage in 2 Jn. 1, 13 is similar if, as seems likely, the elect lady and the elect sister are here personified churches.

5. Summary.

a. The NT gives a new turn to the concept as it finds the basis in Christ and has in view a worldwide community.

b. It discerns in election the eternal foundation of salvation but without eliminating responsibility.

c. Far from viewing election as preferential treatment it relates it strictly to mission in the service of the divine teleology.

F. eklektós in the Apostolic Fathers. There is a great growth in the use of eklektós in the apostolic fathers, especially in 1 Clement and Hermas, with a rather greater interest in the number of the elect in 1 Clement. [G. SCHRENK, IV, 168-92]

leíos [smooth, level]

leíos has such varied meanings as "smooth," "level," "fine," "tender," and "sweet." The only instance in the NT is in Lk. 3;5 (quoting Is. 40:3), which says that the rough ways will be made smooth. The express quotation identifies the Baptist as the messenger of joy, intimates a reversal of human standards, declares the universal scope of salvation, and fixes the place of the Baptist in its enactment. [G. BORNKAMM, IV, 193]

leímma [remnant], hypóleimma [remnant], kataleípō [to leave behind], (katá- [descendant, remnant], perí- [fragment], diáleimma [intermission (of fever)])

A. Greek Usage.

1.a. With the general sense of "what is left over," leímma may be used for human remains, for fragments left over at a meal, etc. b. It also denotes an interval in music. c. In the LXX it is used for survivors, and more specifically for the remnant of the people.

2. The compounds display a similar usage. hypóleimma denotes what is left on the sale of wine, the remains of food, burned wood, etc., the remnants of rebellion, and in the LXX the prophetic remnant. katáleimma may be used for descendants, but also for what is left of Jerusalem, or the remnants of the house of Ahab, or the prophetic remnant. períleimma is found for the fragments of an oration. diáleimma occurs in medicine for arrest in growth or the intermission of fever. [G. SCHRENK, IV, 194-96]

B. The Remnant in the OT.

1. Usage. a. The OT uses four roots for remnant, especially š'r and ytr. It often uses these in combination or in parallelism.

b. For the š'r group, which is theologically the most important, the LXX has forms of kata- or hypoleípein.

c. The main use of the terms is secular, e.g., for wood left over, land still to be taken, remaining nations. That nothing remains can denote the greatness of judgment (2 Kgs. 13:7 etc.), but remnant may also be used positively for those who escape (Gen. 14:10 etc.). The remnant of the people, historically, is the portion that survives a national disaster (cf. Is. 37:4; 2 Kgs. 25:11, 22). The term may also be used for those that return from exile (Hag. 1:12, 14).

d. Since historical disasters may signify eschatological judgment, the term sometimes has for the prophets a fluid sense in which it may denote those who survive either the disaster or the judgment (cf. Am. 5:15; Mic. 2:12; Jer. 6:9).

e. The idea of the remnant clearly belongs at times to the context of expectation of judgment and salvation (Is. 1:8-9; 4:2ff.; 7:3; Jer. 23:3; Joel 2:32; Zeph. 2:9; Zech. 14:16). It becomes a fixed term in this sense, and has a double reference to sifting and deliverance with an implied stress on the greatness of the judgment but also a comforting orientation to salvation.

2. The Rise of the Remnant Concept. The concept develops with the eschatological message of the prophets, which has (cf. Amos) the three elements of destruction, salvation, and responsibility. Some scholars believe that the remnant is a bridge between the organically unrelated factors of judgment and deliverance, although the prophets clearly adjust their message to the shifting historical scene. Others find a basis for it in the idea of Israel herself as the remnant that is saved from hostile attacks—an idea which is modified when it is God himself who brings disaster to Israel and a converted remnant is delivered. In the OT itself, however, the concept stands in the context of three acts of divine revelation: the election of the people, the calling of the prophets, and the promise of the Messiah. Is. 6 (cf. 8:16ff.) plainly relates the calling of the prophet to the fashioning of a remnant. With this calling God himself comes into history as the Holy One. This means destruction for sin, but on the far side of destruction lies salvation for those who are called and believe (Is. 6:8; 7:9). Retrospectively, it may be seen that the basis of the remnant is the election of Israel (Is. 46:3). From the very first, God has carried the house of Jacob, and he has eternally set up his rule over it in Zion (Mic. 4:7). The connection with the Messiah occurs in the Servant concept of Is. 53 and the son of man concept of Dan. 7. Chronologically the concept occurs already when 1 Kgs. 19:18 states that God has left 7,000 worshippers for himself in Israel. Amos has it both in dialectical passages in which he opposes a false remnant belief (9:1) and in the debated verse 5:15, which may be using "remnant of Joseph" for the northern kingdom, and may thus have in view a possible national repentance, but which also has an eschatological thrust whereby the remnant is the group that God preserves when judgment falls. The core of the concept occurs in Gen. 7:23 with the preservation of Noah and in Gen. 45:7 with the gracious preservation through Joseph.

3. The Remnant Established by God.

a. The survival of the remnant is not due to its virtue but to divine grace. This is very clear in Mic. 2:12; 4:7; 5:6-7. Again, God gives the prophet his disciples in Is. 8:16ff. The Lord of hosts leaves the people a remnant in Is. 1:8-9 (cf. 7:3). It is God who gathers the people (11:1), who makes the highway (11:16), who will be the crown of the remnant (28:5), who lays a foundation for it (28:16). The only question concerns membership of the remnant, and since faith is the answer to this question, the message of the remnant is a summons to believe (7:2, 9; 28:16). The teaching of Zephaniah is similar (3:12-13), and in Ezekiel the remnant exists by an act of God which displays the justice of his judgment (8:6; 14:21ff.). The zeal (2 Kgs. 19:31), righteousness (Is. 10:20ff.), grace (Jer. 31:2), mercy (Jer. 31:7), and forgiveness of God (Jer. 50:20) are the basis.

b. That there is a remnant only by divine action is set in relief by the totality of judgment (Ezek. 7:7; Am. 3:12, etc.). It is also implied in the comparison with the exodus (Is. 4:2ff.; 11:16; Jer. 23:5ff.; 31:31ff.).

c. Since the remnant is preserved by God's act, it does not have to be small. In Mic. 4:7 it is to be made a strong people, and in Jer. 23:3 the regathered remnant has the promise that it will be fruitful and multiply.

d. The eschatological orientation of the prophets means that the remnant is both a present and a future entity. It is a present entity in Am. 5:15; Is. 8:16ff.; Ezek. 9:8; 11:13. After the exile it may thus be equated with those who come back from exile (Zech. 8:6; Ezr. 9:8, 13).

e. As a present entity, the remnant may be linked to Zion or Jerusalem (Is. 1:8; 28:16-17; Mic. 4:1ff.; Zeph. 3:11ff.; Jer. 31:6-7; Zech. 14:2). Yet the concept resists too strict an equation. Its use in the absolute (cf. Is. 7:3) shows that it transcends every restriction. The promise is to believers, who cannot be limited to historical entities like Judah or Jerusalem. The individualizing of the concept also means its extension (Is. 1:9; 4:2ff.; 7:2ff., etc.). The Servant of Is. 40ff. may bring an exclusive relation between the deliverer and the community, but by its very nature this restriction entails extension (Is. 52:13ff.).

4. The Conversion of the Remnant. Since the remnant rests on God's gracious action, conversion is not a precondition. Deliverance comes first; the call to conversion follows (cf. Is. 10:20-21; even 2 Chr. 30:6). Faith and holiness are the other side of God's establishment of the remnant (cf. Is. 28:16-17; Zeph. 3:12-13). This point is aptly summarized in Joel 2:32. Indeed, there can be no remnant without divine pardon and cleansing (Mic. 7:18; Jer. 50:20). The remnant, too, is sinful in itself; God saves it only by forgiving, sanctifying, and creating anew (cf. Zech. 13:8-9). Conversion is the response to God's act (Zeph. 3:12-13). The renewal of the remnant is the work of the divinely imparted Spirit (Ezek. 36:24ff.; 37:23-24; Joel 2:28ff.).

5. The Remnant and the Nations. As an entity in the world the remnant stands in relation to the nations. It will rule over them (Mic. 5:6) but the nations will go to it to receive instruction (4:1ff.). With the judgment of the nations, there will also be a Gentile remnant (Is. 45:20ff.). The remnant of Israel has a mission to declare God's glory and to bring Gentiles, too, into God's service (Is. 66:19ff.). In this light we are to construe the remnant of the Philistines in Zech. 9:7, the worshipping remnant of the nations in Zech. 14:16, and perhaps the more formal references to the rest of the nations in Ezek. 36:3, 5, 36.

6. The Remnant Community and the Messiah. Although the relation is not worked out in detail, a link between the Messiah and the remnant is implied in the name Immanuel, in the "us" of Is. 9:6, in the statement of Is. 10:21 (cf. 9:6), and in the promises of Jer. 23:3ff. and Mic. 5:1ff. The lines here lead up to Is. 28:16ff., with its hint that the stone is the Messiah on which the remnant with its faith is built, and more especially to Is. 40ff. and the message of the Servant who bears the sins of many, so that the remnant community has its life in him. [V. HERNTRICH, IV, 196-209]

C. The Remnant Concept in Paul in Comparison with Apocalyptic and the Rabbis.

1. The Remmant in Rom. 9-11.

a. In Rom. 9ff. Paul adapts the prophetic concept of the remnant so as to show its present fulfilment. The obduracy of Israel confirms the distinction between carnal and spiritual Israel. As seen in Jacob and Moses, the latter exists by God's gracious calling. It now consists of believing Jews and Gentiles.

b. Believing Israel within the new community is the remnant. The cutting away of merely natural Israel displays God's judgment, but the preservation of a remnant of Jews among believing Gentiles displays his mercy and faithfulness. The focus is on God's free action, but in view of the general unbelief of Israel a place is also found for the responsibility of Israel (9:30-10:21).

c. This responsibility consists of the stubborn attempt to establish self-righteousness in spite of the message of divinely given justification by faith. In contrast, the remnant attains to true righteousness by responding to the gospel. The existence of this remnant is a message of hope to Israel. Jewish Christians resemble the 7,000 of the days of Elijah and are thus in a special sense a remnant of Israel.

d. This remnant carries a promise of the future salvation of all Israel when the fullness of the Gentiles has come in. It may be small now, but it is not an unchangeable minority. At the end it will become the totality.

2. Comparison and Summary.

a. Israel. In apocalyptic the remnant is what will finally be left of the whole people. In rabbinic theology the emphasis is on total salvation; only a few Jews are rejected and only a few Gentiles saved. In Paul the remnant consists of believing Jews of his own time, which is, proleptically, an eschatological fulfilment of remnant prophecies.

b. Election. In apocalyptic the election involves a restriction of salvation to a sectarian remnant. In Paul faith in God's salvation through Christ leaps sectarian boundaries. The remnant confirms the inviolable election of Israel, but in such a way as to embrace the Gentiles as well.

c. The Messiah. Apocalyptic assigns an important place to the Messiah in its hope for the salvation of the remnant. The new turn in Paul is that the Messiah has already come in Christ, that the remnant has its whole life in him, and that it consists of those who find in him the righteousness of faith.

d. Faith. Apocalyptic stresses foreordination, but still has too strong a stress on work-righteousness. The same is true of rabbinic theology with its concern for study and observance of the law. What matters for Paul, however, is conversion to Christ and the new life which comes therewith. God brings us to faith, but faith is then our own act by grace. Faith is not a meritorious work, yet it is still a human act. God does the grafting in, but it is those who do not persist in unbelief who will be grafted in (Rom. 11:23).

e. The Nations. Apocalyptic tends to see the destruction of the nations as parallel to the preservation of the remnant. Paul, however, discerns a divine teleology whereby the general hardening of Israel serves the salvation of both the Gentiles and Israel (Rom. 11:13ff.). For Paul, then, the remnant concept involves no narrow sectarianism. It has a place in the mission which summons all people under the dominion of grace. The remnant is the root of a perfected community, and the judgment which it displays is for the purpose of a broader mercy. [G. SCHRENK, IV, 209-14]

leitourgéō [to serve, minister], leitourgía [service, ministry], leitourgós [servant, minister], leitourgikós [in service, ministry] leitourgéō, leitourgía.

A. Nonbiblical Greek.

1. Form of the Word. The older form is lēitourgeín; the shift comes about 300 B.C.

2. The Basic Meaning. Etymologically the word carries the sense of doing things for the body politic, or discharging a task for society.

3. Usage.

a. Technical Political. Politically the term refers to the rendering of specific social services at one's own expense, either out of patriotism or vainglory, or under compulsion. According to Aristotle many democratic states fleece the wealthy by means of "liturgies."

b. Extended Political. Later, especially under imperial government, the term covers all kinds of compulsory services and official tasks. There are many discussions of the relevant obligations and many complaints about the associated burdens.

c. Popular. A weaker sense develops whereby the group simply applies to any rendering of service, e.g., slaves to masters, friends to friends, mothers to young, members to the body, courtesans to patrons, etc.

d. Special Cultic. The group also comes into use in a cultic sense for the performance of various cultic actions. While this is another form of communal service, there is here no particular idea of serving the body politic through the cultus. The main concept is that of rendering service to the deity.

B. The LXX and Hellenistic Judaism.

1. leitourgéō.

a. Occurrence and Equivalents. The term occurs some 100 times in the LXX, mainly in cultic passages (Ex. 28ff.; Ezek. 40ff., etc.). It is mostly used for šērēṯ when this occurs in cultic contexts; in other cases other Greek terms are used. The LXX thus reserves leitourgeín for divine service (including the service of idols; cf. Ezek. 44:12); there are few exceptions to this rule (cf. 1 Kgs. 19:21; 1 Chr. 27:1). The reference is nearly always to the worship of God by the priests and Levites in the tent or temple.

b. As a Technical Cultic Term. The term may be used in various combinations (cf. Num. 8:22; 2 Chr. 11:14; Joel 1:13), but there is also a common use in the absolute (Ex. 28:35; 35:19; 36:33, etc.). A spiritualizing trend appears in Sirach when it speaks of serving wisdom (4:14), and angelic service is at issue in one rendering of Dan. 7:10.

2. leitourgía. The noun, too, becomes a technical term for priestly ministry. The only secular use is in 2 Sam. 19:19. The reference is either to priestly functions and actions (Num. 16:9 etc.) or to cultic vessels (1 Chr. 9:28).

3. The LXX and Nonbiblical Usage. There is in the LXX no trace of the political use and only a relic of the popular use. The LXX has chosen the group almost exclusively for priestly ministry. Why the translators fixed on this group for the purpose is debatable. Perhaps it is an expansion of cultic use elsewhere, or perhaps there is some thought of a legally ordained and solemn service that is rendered on behalf of the whole people.

4. Greek-Speaking Judaism. Josephus has the words only for the cultus, although he also has latreía and hierourgía for this. Philo, too, uses the words for the cultus, but he has an extended use for the spiritual worship of God, and he also mentions leitourgíai in the sense of official public functions. [H. STRATHMANN, IV, 215-22]

C. Cultic Ministry in Rabbinic Judaism.

1. Lexical Survey. The rabbis use various roots, some of which seem to come into later Hebrew by way of Aramaic. (For details see TDNT, IV, 222-23.)

2. The Idea of Cultic Ministry.

a. Verbs. These may be used for the priestly ministry but also for the cultic actions of the laity.

b. Nouns. The reference is mainly to the temple worship, or the worship of God, although we also find expressions for pagan worship.

c. Spiritualization. The rabbis speak of ethical as well as cultic service of God. Synagogue worship extends the use to the ministry of the word and of prayer. With the destruction of the temple, expiatory significance may be ascribed to prayer. Study of the law is also divine service for the rabbis. [R. MEYER, IV, 222-25]

D. The NT.

1. Occurrence and Use. leitourgeín occurs only three times in the NT (Acts 13:2; Rom. 15:27; Heb. 10:11), and leitourgía only six times (Lk. 1:23; 2 Cor. 9:12; Phil. 2:17, 30; Heb. 8:6; 9:21). leitourgós and leitourgikós add another six instances, three in Hebrews. The predominance of use in Hebrews is natural in view of its christological interpretation of the OT cultus. Thus Christ has a more excellent ministry in 8:6, the liturgical vessels are sprinkled in 9:21, and the OT priests have to offer daily service in 10:11. The use in Lk. 1:23 is also within an OT context. In Acts 13:2, however, the term seems to have a more spiritualized reference to prayer (cf. v. 3). It is the first instance of a use for specifically Christian worship. Rom. 15:27 and 2 Cor. 9:12 both refer to the collection, and cf. Phil. 2:30. It may be that monetary gifts here are seen as public service or are given a cultic significance, but the use is more likely the popular one of A.3.c. There is, however, a plain cultic nuance in Phil. 2:17 in view of the associated reference to libation. The point is either that the Philippians' faith is the offering (to which Paul will add the libation of his martyrdom), or that Paul's work in establishing their faith is the offering. Either way, the term leitourgía has here the sense of a cultic or priestly ministry.

2. Findings. The sparse use in the NT is connected partly with OT and partly with popular use. Movement toward a new Christian use occurs only in Acts 13:2 with reference to prayer. The end of the OT cultus with Christ means that the terms are not suitable for the functions of Christian ministers, whose task is to proclaim the leitourgía that has been fulfilled once and for all in Christ. The new community has no priests; it consists of priests, for all can enter the sanctuary through Christ's blood (Heb. 10:19).

E. Transition to Later Ecclesiastical Use. The position is similar in the apostolic fathers, who use the group for the ministry of OT priests, or for righteous conduct. The comparison of Christian ministry with that of the OT opens the door for a more specific use of the terms for the ministry of bishops and presbyters (1 Clem. 40ff.). In this way the terms finally come to be used for the Christian cultus, especially the eucharist; hence the common meaning of "liturgy" today.

leítourgós. This term is rare in Greek. It occurs occasionally in the papyri and inscriptions for liturgical officials, for workers, and for cultic ministers. It is also uncommon in the LXX, and has a cultic sense only in Is. 61:6. Of the five NT instances only Heb. 8:2 and Rom. 15:16 have cultic significance. In the one Christ is a minister of the true sanctuary, in the other Paul has a priestly ministry inasmuch as by his missionary work he presents the Gentiles an acceptable offering to God. In other NT verses the angels are servants of God in Heb. 1:7, rulers are servants of God in the execution of justice in Rom. 13:6 (cf. diákonos in v. 4), and Epaphroditas is a minister to Paul's need in Phil. 2:25. If there is a religious coloring in Heb. 1:7 and Rom. 13:6, it is because the service is rendered to God. 1 Clement has the term for OT priests (41.2), prophets (8.1), and angels (36.3).

leitourgikós. This rare term is used in the papyri with reference to cultic taxes and services, and in the LXX with reference to cultic vessels and vestments. The only NT use is in Heb. 1:14, which calls the angels ministering spirits that are sent to render diakonía to believers. This use is obviously noncultic. [H. STRATHMANN, IV, 226-31]

lepís [shell, scale]

lepís has two meanings: a. "shell" (e.g., of a nut) and b. "scale" (e.g., of fish, snakes, or, figuratively, metal plates). The only NT use is in the story of Paul's conversion, when Ananias lays hands on the blinded Saul and "something like scales fell from his eyes" (Acts 9:18). The term comes from the medical world of the day which speaks of descaling the eyes, i.e., removing a growth of skin that causes blindness. The author needs no special medical knowledge to use the term, and the passage must not be thought to support the view that Paul suffered from an eye affliction (cf. Gal. 4:15). The metaphor suggests that, as the Lord has overcome Paul's enmity, so he has given him the witness that he is to go to the Gentiles "to open their eyes" and turn them from darkness to light (Acts 26:18). [G. BORNKAMM, IV, 232-33]

lépra [skin ailment], leprós [scaly, scabby]

leprós means "scaly," "scabby," and with lépra is used for various skin ailments. Whether these are always (or ever) the same as what we call "leprosy" is debated, but Jesus' public healing of lepers (Mt. 11:15; Mk. 1:40ff.; Lk. 17:12ff.) is an effective sign that the age of messianic salvation has come. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 233-34]

Leu (e)í [Levi], Leu(e)ís [of Levi]

1. This name occurs in the genealogy of Jesus for the great-grandfather of Joseph and then again between David and Zerubbabel (Lk. 3:24, 29).

2. In Lk. 5:27, 29 a tax collector named Levi is called to be a disciple and holds a great supper to which he invites Jesus. In Mk. 2:14 this Levi is said to be the son of Alphaeus, which has led some to identify him with the James of Mk. 3:18, although another suggestion is that he is the Matthew of Mt. 9:9. The story shows that even hated tax collectors may have a place among the disciples of Jesus and that there is no need to hide their shameful past, since faith does not look to the greatness of believers but to the greatness of the Lord to whom all believers own their life and pardon.

3. The three other NT passages (Heb. 7:5, 9; Rev. 7:7) all refer to the son of Jacob and Leah.

a. Many questions have been raised about the development of the priestly status of the tribe of Levi, but according to the dominant OT view it is plainly charged with the priesthood (Ex. 2:1ff.; 6:20; 32:25ff.; Dt. 33:9ff.).

b. Later Judaism evinces a strong interest in the tribe, giving it a princely as well as a priestly and prophetic role. The basis of this evaluation is the fact that the Hasmonean dynasty is of Levitical descent. For Philo Levi is the type of a lover of God who leaves everything to cleave to God.

c. The NT verses, however, simply follow the OT tradition. In Rev. 7:7 Levi has no special position among the tribes. In Heb. 7 the priesthood of Jesus is shown to be superior to that of Levi on the ground that he is a priest after the order of Melchizedek, who is without genealogy and to whom even Abraham pays a tithe. The perfect priesthood of Jesus, notwithstanding his descent from Judah, replaces the imperfect and transitory priesthood of Levi.

4. In the early church we find some efforts to trace a descent of Jesus from Levi by way of Mary (cf. the relationship to Elizabeth in Lk. 1:36). The NT, however, establishes no such descent and attaches no importance to the point. [H. STRATHMANN, IV, 234-39]

Leu*(e)*ítēs [Levite]

This word occurs in the LXX, Philo, and Josephus, and denotes both a member of the tribe of Levi and a subordinate cultic officer serving with the Zadokite priesthood (cf. Ezek. 44:6ff.). According to the account in Chronicles the Levites play an important liturgical role (as singers etc.), and rivalry develops with the more exclusive priestly caste in which the Levites secure the right to wear the same linen garments but lose their tithes. Their duties include 1. singing (for which they are divided into 24 classes), 2. policing (for which there are 24 posts, the three in the inner court being manned by priests), 3. keeping the doors, and 4. helping in the sacrifices. In the synagogue they read the law—a reflection of their teaching office. In the NT a Levite passes by the wounded man in Lk. 10:32, Levites are among those who come to John the Baptist in Jn. 1:19, and Barnabas, the Cypriot Christian who befriends Paul, is of the tribe of Levi. [R. MEYER, IV, 239-41]

leukós [white], leukaínō [to make white]

1. leukós, whose root means “bright,” is used for various shades of “white.” It commonly describes such things as milk or snow, and occurs in the phrase “as white as.” On inscriptions it is the color of sacrificial animals and priestly garments. The verb leukaínō means “to make white”; thus time makes the hair white. White is the color of joy or victory, and is regarded as pleasing to the gods; helpful deities are themselves called white.

2. In the Hebrew world, too, white is an important color, due partly to the importance of light but more to the prominence of the concept of holiness. The Hebrew terms, like the Greek, are not precise, and leukós may be used for various words (cf. TDNT, IV, 243 for details).

3. Philo often has white and black as antitheses along with life and death, good and bad, etc. In allegories it is the color of truth. Josephus tells us that the Levites secured the right to wear white linen clothes and that the Essenes always went about clothed in white.

4. Rabbinic sources display a fondness for white clothes. They are a mark of joy or distinction. They also denote purity. From the first century A.D. the dead are buried in white linen; the main thought seems to be that of transfiguration to heavenly glory (cf. Dan. 7:9).

5. The eschatological use dominates the field in the NT.

a. Other possibilities hardly arise; indeed, the NT shows little interest in color of any kind. Jesus must have worn the ordinary garb of the people, for only at the transfiguration does he have a brightness in keeping with his heavenly dignity, and there is nothing distinctive about his robe to prevent its being diced away by the soldiers. The only noneschatological references in the NT are in Jn. 4:35, where the ripe ears are white or golden, and Mt. 5:36, where the fact that God alone can make the hair white or black shows how limited human power is.

b. In Rev. 1:14 (cf. Dan. 7:9) the whiteness of the head and hair of the risen Lord denotes, not his age, but his heavenly glory. The garment of v. 13 seems to be a priestly one, and if so, it, too, will be white. The same point applies at the transfiguration, where the clothing becomes, not pale, but radiant, so that we have here an anticipation of the resurrection of Christ and his heavenly glory (cf. Mk. 9:1; Lk. 9:31-32; Mt. 17:2). Implied is a transfiguring of the whole nature, as in other NT references to new and heavenly clothing (cf. 2 Cor. 5:2ff.; Phil. 3:21).

c. The closest parallel to the transfiguration accounts is to be found in the references to the angel or angels at the tomb whose faces and clothes shine with heavenly radiance (see Mt. 28:3; Mk. 16:5; Lk. 24:4; Jn. 20:12; Acts 1:10). The white clothes alone are enough here to indicate the transcendental character of their glory. But the implication is not that Jesus is shown to be an angel at the transfiguration, for the elders of Rev. 4:4 are also clothed in white, and so are the overcomers of 3:4 etc. In the case of Christ the radiance signifies his unique position, in the case of the angels it denotes their heavenly character, and in the case of the overcomers it symbolizes the gift of eternal fellowship with the exalted Lord (3:4-5) by way of his cleansing work (cf. 6:11; 7:13-14). White is also significant in Revelation; cf. the white stone of 2:17, the white horse of 6:2 and 19:11 (cf. 19:14), the white cloud of 14:14, and the great white throne of 20:11. In all these verses the reference is plainly eschatological. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 241-50]

léōn [lion]

léōn is used both literally and figuratively, e.g., for the constellation, the sign of the Zodiac, or a brave or violent person. The lion plays a role in religion; thus in the OT lions are depicted on the temple stands (1 Kgs. 7:9) and the cherubim have lions' heads (Ezek. 1:10ff.). The word occurs some 150 times in the LXX, often in comparisons. In all the NT instances we find OT allusions. Thus Heb. 11:33 is based on Dan. 6: 17ff. Again, Rev. 4:7 reflects Ezek. 1: 10ff. (and cf. Rev. 9:17; 13:2). A messianic understanding of Gen. 49:9 underlies Rev. 5:5, and one may compare 10:3 with Hos. 11:10 and Am. 3:8. For the warning against apostasy in 1 Pet. 5:8 cf. Ps. 22:13, and for 2 Tim. 4:17 cf. Ps. 22:21. The promise that lions will be peaceful in the last time (Is. 11:6-7) finds no echo in the NT. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 251-53]

lēnós [vat, press], hypolḗnion [trough]

1. lēnós means a "vat" or "press," usually for oil or wine. Grapes are pressed with great jubilation (Is. 16:9-10; Joel 2:24). The contrast is all the sharper, then, when God treads the press in judgment (Jer. 25:30; Lam. 1:15; Is. 63:1ff.). In Joel 3:13 a call goes out for helpers to join with God in treading the overflowing press of retribution.

2. The NT references to the press all stand under OT influence. Thus the parable of Mk. 12:1 (Mt. 21:33) is based on Is. 5:2 and has allegorical features.

3. Similarly Rev. 14:19-20 and 19:15 use prophetic images in their depiction of divine judgment. The first vision raises some problems by giving a role to the "other" angel, by mentioning the city, by mixing the motifs of winepress and battle, and by its seeming finality. It is probably meant to point forward to the definitive depiction in 19:15, where it is the Messiah Judge who treads the winepress of divine wrath. The location is in keeping with the OT message (cf. Joel 3:2), and the reference to the angel of fire may be in harmony with the idea that the mouth of Gehinnom is at the holy city. If some of the details in ch. 14 and ch. 19 seem to vary, it may be noted that 19:15 combines the motifs of 14:8, 10, 19-20, that the mention of the beast in 19:20 correspond, and that in 14:9ff. and 20:15 worship the beast are consigned to the lake of fire as the beast and the false prophet are in 19:17ff. [G. BORNKAMM, IV, 254-57]

lēstḗs [robber, revolutionary]

A. Outside the NT.

1. From a root meaning “to win,” “to seize,” come words for “prey,” and “to seize as prey,” and hence lēstḗs for “one who seizes prey.” This word is used in antiquity for a soldier or mercenary who has an implicit right to booty (cf. in the LXX Jer. 18:22). But it usually has a bad sense, e.g., for undisciplined troops, then for robbers, bandits, etc., with an implied use of force (cf. Jer. 7:11).

2. Josephus uses the term for the Zealots, who under such leaders as Hezekiah and Judas of Galilee revolt against Roman rule, perhaps with messianic pretensions. For many Jews the Zealots are patriots rather than bandits, even though they often take what they need from their own people. But Josephus takes the Roman view, for although the Romans execute the Zealots as political offenders (by crucifixion), they contemptuously describe them as bandits. It is interesting that Josephus does not use lēstaí for the Jews as a whole when they rebel in A.D. 66, but reserves the term for Zealot individuals and factions that in his view misuse the religious cause.

3. Rabbinic Judaism adopted the terms lēstḗs and lēsteía from the Greek and used them both for robbers and originally, perhaps, for the Zealots, which suggests that the Zealots themselves regarded the term of reproach as a title of honor, but also that the rabbis to some degree repudiated them.

B. In the NT.

1. In 2 Cor. 11:26 Paul uses the term when listing the perils to which he was subject; he has bandits in mind.

2. In Mt. 21:13 Jesus accuses the priestly aristocracy of turning the house of prayer into a den of robbers. He has in view the temple trade which serves personal enrichment and satisfies cupidity. The saying brings the priesthood under the threatened judgment of Jer. 7:8ff.

3. In Lk. 10:30, 35 the lēstaí are probably bandits but they could also be Zealots, who preyed on the population in self-support. If they are Zealots, the parable perhaps contains an indirect criticism of the Zealot movement.

4. The use of the term is similar in Jn. 10:1ff., where it covers those, including Zealots, who try to bring in the kingdom without regard for Jesus, and who thus bring the flock into serious danger (cf. Mt. 24:4ff.).

5. The saying of Jesus to those who arrest him in Mt. 26:55 carries a clear messianic reference. To reject the claim of Jesus is to rank him with Zealot leaders. Pilate, indeed, lets the people choose between the freedom fighter Barabbas, whose first name was probably Jesus, and Jesus of Nazareth, as though they are both men of the same stamp (Mt. 27:15ff.; cf. Jn. 18:40, where Barabbas is called a lēstḗs, or, in some versions, an archilēstḗs). Two lēstaí are also crucified with Jesus. The title on the cross identifies Jesus as a Zealot leader, although, handed over by his own people, he is one whom the people rejects. This explains why Celsus later calls Jesus a lēstḗs, i.e., a false Messiah (Origen Against Celsus 3.59). [K. H. RENGSTORF, IV, 257-62]

líbanos [incense], libanōtós [censer]

Incense, made from the resin of various trees, is widely used in antiquity both generally and cultically. In Mt. 2:11 it is one of the costly gifts brought by the Wise Men to the infant Jesus, and in Rev. 18:13 it is an important item in the trade with fallen Babylon. libanōtós has in Rev. 8 the unusual meaning “censer”; it is associated with the prayers of saints in v. 3 and filled with fire from the altar (which is cast down as a sign of divine wrath) in v. 5. The normal word for censer is thymiatḗrion, though this means “altar of incense” in Heb. 9:4. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 263-64]

Libertínoi [Libertines]

Among Stephen's opponents in Acts 6:9 are those of the synagogue of the so-called Libertínoi. The double tṓn divides the opponents into two groups, and to the first group belong the Cyrenians and Alexandrians along with the Libertines. Libertínoi is a term borrowed from Roman law and denotes slaves who have gained their freedom, or the descendants of such slaves. The reference here might well be to the descendants of Jewish prisoners whom Pompey had taken to Rome. Persecution of the infant church begins, then, with Hellenistic groups settled in Jerusalem (cf. Acts 8:1ff.). This agrees with the divisive attitude of Hellenistic Judaism and with what we know of its ideal of piety. [H. STRATHMANN, IV, 265-66]

litházō [to stone], katalitházō [to stone to death], lithoboléō [to stone to death]

The reference of these terms is to stoning, which is a common penalty in antiquity, associated with expulsion as well as execution. In Mt. 21:35 lithoboleín, and in Lk. 20:6 katalitházein, carry the sense of "killing." In Jn. 10:31ff. and 11:8 attempts are made to stone (litházein) Jesus for blasphemy (cf. also Jn. 8:5). In Acts 5:26 "throwing stones" is the point of litházein, but stoning is meant in 7:58 and 14:5 (both lithoboleín). The stoning of Paul in 14:19 (litházein; cf. 2 Cor. 11:25) seems to be due to mob action without trial Hebrews has litházein in the list in 11:37 and lithoboleín (quoting Ex 19.13) in 12:20 [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 267-68]

líthos [stone], líthinos [stony]

A. The Literal Sense. In the NT líthos means a. "stone" (hewn or not), b. "rock" (cf. Mk. 15:46), and c. "stone image" (Acts 17:29). As an enduring material, stone is used for writing (the tablets of the law, 2 Cor. 3:3, 7). It is also used to block up sepulchres (Jn. 11:38-39). Not being subject to impurity, it is also suitable as a ritual vessel (Jn. 2:6). As something inert, it may be contrasted with God (Acts 17:29), humans (Mt. 3:9), flesh (2 Cor. 3:3), and bread (Mt. 4:3). Precious stones symbolize wealth (Rev. 17:4; 21:18ff.). The saying about Christ being in the wood and stone may mean that he is immanent in all things, but it may also mean that his presence sanctifies manual labor with wood and stone.

B. Living Stones.

1. Lk. 19:40 refers to the stones crying out. This might mean that inorganic nature will praise Christ if humans do not, but more probably it means that the stones will accuse the disciples if they withhold their praise (for other lifeless objects that demand retribution see Gen. 4:10; Job 31:38; Jms. 5:4).

2. The striking saying in Mt. 3:9 is to the effect that God can give even stones the power to raise up progeny (cf. Is. 51:1-2, which is understood by the rabbis to refer to Isaac's birth from Abraham when he had lost the power to pass on life). The figure of the rock that produces children rejects the idea that salvation depends on natural descent. God can bring forth spiritual life from the spiritually dead (the Gentiles?).

C. Christ as líthos.

1. The Verses. Several verses compare Jesus to a líthos, e.g., Mk. 12:10; Lk. 20:18; Acts 4:11; 1 Pet. 2:4ff.; Rom. 9:32-33, and cf. Eph. 2:20; 1 Cor. 10:4-5; Jn. 7:37ff.; possibly Lk. 2:34; also the quotations from Is. 28:16 in Rom. 10:11 and 1 Tim. 1:16, though the image of the stone has faded from view in these verses.

2. The Reference of OT líthos Statements to the Messiah in Later Judaism. The NT verses mentioned above come almost entirely from the OT. Many of the OT originals are also linked to the Messiah in later Judaism (cf. the LXX addition to Is. 28:16, rabbinic references to the stone of Dan. 2:34ff., and rabbinic interpretation of the stone of Gen. 28:18). The OT use of "Rock" for God prepares the ground for the messianic understanding of the OT líthos.

3. Christ the Stone.

a. The Keystone and Foundation Stone of the True Temple. Primary in the description of Christ as the stone is the thought of the true temple of which he is the cornerstone or foundation stone. Jesus himself uses the figure in Mt. 12:10 and Lk. 20:18; according to these verses he will be rejected but God will then exalt him as the keystone, i.e., the Head of his community. The setting of the saying is eschatological. Acts 4:11 takes up the same thought but finds the exaltation of Christ as the keystone already fulfilled in the resurrection. Eph. 2:20ff. links the idea with that of the ongoing upbuilding of the community until it reaches completion in the final stone that is Christ. But Christ is ultimately the foundation stone as well. Thus 1 Pet. 2:4ff. refers Is. 28:16 to Christ. God has laid this foundation, and those who build on it in faith will not be put to shame.

b. The Stone Which Crushes and the Stone of Offense. Lk. 20:18 adds to Ps. 118:22 an eschatological threat which is based on Dan. 2:31ff. (which the rabbis view messianically) and possibly on Is. 8:14 and on the proverbial saying about the pot which is broken whether it falls on the stone or the stone on it. The point of the saying is that those who run up against the stone will be shattered, but so, too, will those on whom it falls in judgment. A decision has to be made regarding Christ the stone, for his ultimate supremacy is guaranteed.

c. The Significance of Christ the Stone for Salvation or Perdition. The stone metaphor contains both promise and threat, for in Christ both divine goodness and divine wrath are revealed. Rom. 9:32-33 brings out the double significance. Those who seek self-righteousness stumble on the stone, but those who believe will be saved. 1 Pet. 2:4-5 is to the same effect. Christ the stone means salvation for the community of faith Ps. 28:1), but unbelievers will stumble and fall over him (Ps. 118:22; Is. 8:14). The lesson of Lk. 2:34 is similar.

d. The Dispenser of Living Water. 1 Cor. 10:4 finds the preexistent Christ in the rock that provides water for Israel. Jn. 7:37-38 carries the same thought in connection with the pouring out of water at the Feast of Tabernacles, which is taken to symbolize both the provision of rain and the outpouring of messianic blessings. Jesus seizes on the ritual of the feast (and its meaning) to point to himself as the one who gives the water of life to needy believers.

e. Christ as Stone in Post-NT Writings. The stone sayings quoted in the NT are often combined in later works as part of the christological proof from Scripture. Thus Barn. 6.2ff. combines Is. 28:16; 50:7; Ps. 118:22, Justin Dialogue 70.1; 76:1; 114.4 refer Dan. 2:34; Gen. 28:18; Ex. 17:12, etc. to Christ, and Cyprian has a collection of stone passages in Testimonies 2:16-17.

D. Christians as Living Stones. As Christ is líthos zṓn in 1 Pet. 2:4, Christians are líthoi zṓntes in 2:5. As such they form a spiritual house (cf. Eph. 2:20). The term "living" suggests that they owe their life to Christ, the living stone. Ignatius in Ephesians 9.1 develops the metaphor rather fancifully by comparing Christ (the cross) to the lifting beam and the Spirit to the rope. Hermas in Visions 3 and Similitudes 9 works out the comparison in exhaustive detail. He finds two types of stones, the serviceable and the unserviceable. His concern is with the latter, which can become serviceable by repentance. [J. JEREMIAS, IV, 268-80]

→ gōnía (akrogōniaíos, kephalḗ gōnías), pétra

likmáō [to winnow, pulverize]

likmáō means a. “to winnow,” b. “to scatter,” and c. “to pulverize.” In the OT winnowing is a common figure for temporary (Ezek. 36:19ff.) or final (Jer. 15:7) judgment. The only NT instance is in Lk. 20:18 par. Mt. 21:44, where the meaning is “to pulverize” and the point is the ineluctability of the judgment which the rejected stone will bring on unbelief (cf. Dan. 2:34-35; Is. 8:14). [G. BORNKAMM, IV, 280-81]

logeía [collection]

logeía (like logeúō) is a popular term meaning “collection” (sometimes sacral). It occurs in the NT only in 1 Cor. 16:1-2, where Paul asks for an orderly gathering of the gift for the Jerusalem church so that there need be no special effort when he comes. While the word can denote an extraordinary tax, there is here no thought of an assessment. Accompanying terms such as ministry and fellowship show that it is a gift comparable to the voluntary love offerings of the diaspora to Jerusalem rather than to the obligatory temple tax (cf. Rom. 15:26, 31; 2 Cor. 8:4ff.; 9:1ff.). [G. KITTEL, IV, 282-83]

logízomai [to calculate, deliberate], logismós [calculation, reasoning]

A. The Word Group Outside the NT.

1. logízomai. In secular Greek this word is used a. commercially for “to reckon,” “to charge,” and b. more generally for “to deliberate,” “to conclude.” In the LXX it takes on the nuance a. of an emotional and even volitional act, e.g., devising, or counting in the subjective sense (see TDNT, IV, 284-85 for details). It also b. enters the religious sphere for God’s purposing of evil against a sinful people, or for the purposing of evil against the Lord (cf. Jer. 18:8; Nah. 1:9, 11). Rather different is the reckoning of faith as righteousness in Gen. 15:6, the imputing of sin in Ps. 32:2, and cultic crediting in Lev. 7:18 and 17:4. In cultic imputing the basis is God’s will but there is also something of the commercial sense of charging.

2. logismós. The noun has the same basic senses as the verb but finds special applications in mathematics and logic. It thus comes to denote the supreme human function, with an ethical orientation in Stoicism. It is reason in its concrete form in the consciousness and as worked out in action. The law is its basis in 4 Maccabees. In the LXX the word also has the common sense of “plan,” good when it is God’s plan to save, but usually bad (Ezek. 38:10). In Wisdom it is self-vaunting reason apart from God (1:3).

B. The Word Group in the NT. Paul uses logízesthai in all its nuances, though bending it to his own purposes. logismós occurs only twice in Paul. In the rest of the NT logízesthai is rare and weak, and logismós is never used at all.

1. Thought Taken Captive to Christ. Paul expresses the popular philosophical idea of thought in his use of logismós. In Rom. 2:15, where he stands on common ground with the diatribe, he has logismós in a positive sense for the thoughts which, on the basis of moral law, either accuse or excuse. Its function, however, is only judicial. In 2 Cor. 10:4, where the logízesthai of v. 2 is hostile to Paul and reflects an overestimation of reason, the situation is different. The logismoí are the thoughts of arrogant reason which can be subdued, not by reason’s own weapons, but only by God’s power as this is set forth at the cross (cf. Lk. 22:37 quoting Is. 53:12). The logismoí are not destroyed but reoriented to divine reality. Hence logízesthai can become a term for the judgment of faith in Rom. 3:28; Phil. 3:13. This is an obedient logízesthai in which we judge on the basis of the justifying efficacy of Christ’s work (Rom. 3:28) or consider that present suffering is not to be compared with future glory (8:18). It is also unconditionally valid; there can be no objection when Paul thinks he is not inferior as an apostle (2 Cor. 11:5), or when he considers that he has not yet achieved perfection (Phil. 3:13), or when he calls us to consider that we are dead to sin and should act accordingly (Rom. 6:11), or even when the weak think things to be unclean (14:14).

2. logízesthai in the Apostle's Ministry. In the estimation of his work in 2 Cor. 3:5 Paul uses logízesthai in a broader sense than that of thought. As in 1 Cor. 13:11 and 2 Cor. 10:2, judgment involves commitment to action.

3. logízesthai in the Community's Life. In Phil. 4:8 Paul is not asking for mere reflection but for the practical consideration that leads to action. The same applies in 1 Cor. 13:5, where what is at issue in this very un-Greek combination is not reflecting on a principle but living according to the fact of salvation (Phil. 2:5ff.). When Christ is normative, logízesthai involves the power to live. It is not arbitrarily or aimlessly impelled to action, but unfolds in the community and comes to fulfilment in the edification of the community (1 Cor. 12 and 14).

4. logízesthai as God's Saving Act.

a. God imputes faith (cf. Jms. 2:23; Rom. 4:3ff.; Gal. 3:6). This imputing sets up a relation between salvation and faith and raises the question of merit. In Gen. 15:6 God reckons faith as righteousness because he is pleased to do so and not because it has intrinsic worth. Yet a tendency develops, especially among the rabbis, to remove the judgment from God's personal will and turn it into general recognition. The Greek term logízesthai fits in with this trend, for while it embraces the idea of imputation, it also carries with it the idea of recognition, which implies that faith is also a merit. Jms. 2:23 breaks with this trend by stressing, not the meritoriousness of faith, but its commitment to action. Paul makes an even more decisive break in Rom. 4:3ff., where he is plainly playing off the Hebraic logízesthai of the LXX against the Greek use, as may be seen by his contrasting of gift and debt (v. 4). The presupposition here is that the very question why faith should be reckoned for righteousness is a false one unless an answer is sought in the grace of the cross. The point of faith is that in it believers subject themselves to divine judgment and mercy and are ready to live by divine grace. On the basis of the cross righteousness is now the true reality, so that this imputation is no fiction. The reality of God's assessment thus serves as a norm of action. Believers become new creatures by God's logízesthai, which carries with it the imparting of the Spirit (Gal. 3:2ff.). Paul, then, restores Gen. 15:6 to its true sense, corrects the trend supported by the Greek sense of logízesthai, and presents dikaioún and logízesthai as complementary terms whereby God the Judge is also God the Father.

b. The reverse side of the imputing of faith is the nonimputing of sin (Rom. 4:7-8; 2 Cor. 5:19; cf. Ps. 32:2). The intrusion of grace into divine justice offends the Greeks linguistically and the Jews materially. The cross is the point of union, for if God does not impute sin to us, it is because Christ has been made sin for us. logízesthai is here again a judgment of grace, but it is the only connecting point between Gen. 15:6 and Ps. 32:2, for the imputing of faith obviously embraces much more than the nonimputing of sin. Justin Dialogue 141.2-3 rather misses the point when he suggests that repentance is the ground of nonimputation (cf. faith in 1 Clem. 10.6). [H. W. HEIDLAND, IV, 284-92]

logikós, lógios, logomachéō, lógion, lógos → légō

loidoréo [to revile, abuse], loidoría [abuse], loídoros [reviler], antiloidoréō [to revile in return]

This common word group has the secular sense of reproach, insult, calumny, and even blasphemy. In the LXX it carries the nuance of wrangling, angry remonstrance, or chiding as well as thee usual calumny.

Philo has it for mockery or invective. In the NT the verb occurs four times and the noun and adjective twice each.

1. loídoros occurs in lists of vices in 1 Cor. 5:11 and 6:10. In Acts 23:4 Paul is asked why he reviles the high priest, and in his reply he recognizes a religious duty not to do so. In Mart. Pol. 9.3 the aged Polyearp cannot revile Christ; to do so would be blasphemy.

2. Christians should try to avoid calumny (1 Tim. 5:14), but when exposed to it (cf. Mt. 5:11) they should follow Christ's example (1 Pet. 2:23; cf. Mt. 26:63; Jn. 18:23), repaying railing with blessing (1 Pet. 3:9). This is the apostolic way of 1 Cor. 4:12: "When reviled, we bless" (cf. Diog. 5. 15). By this answer to calumny the reality of the new creation is manifested. [H. HANSE, IV, 293-94]

→ blasphēméō, oneidízō

loúō [to wash, bathe], apoloúō [to wash oneself, loutrón [bath, place for bathing]

A. The Terms in Hellenlsm.

1. General Usage. Bathing in Antiquity and the Church's Attitude. loúein normally refers to washing or bathing the body, middle "to take a bath." A loutrón is a place for bathing. From early days the Greeks bathe in the sea, in rivers, and in swimming pools. Baths are an established feature, more for nursing and strengthening than for cleansing. The Romans adopt the Greek habit and make bathing a luxury with their heating systems. Bathing includes successive warm and cold baths and various anointings. The church does not oppose the practice but protests against its excesses.

2. Sacral Baths and Purifications. In primitive times such processes as birth and death are thought to involve impurity through demonic action or a material míasma. Those affected are a danger to themselves and others and thus need purification. At first the notions are purely physical, but moral judgments develop too. Cultic purifications play a big part in religious life in Egypt, Greece, etc. Lustrations are important in cases of birth, marriage, madness, homicide, death, cultic participation, and private devotion. Even the gods need purification; cf. the washing of idols, and in Egypt the idea that the progress of the sun through the ocean is a purifying and vivifying bath. Later there is a growing demand for moral purity rather than external purification, but this can easily fall into the error of moralization.

B. The Group in the OT and Judaism.

1. In the OT loúein is commonly the rendering of Heb. rāḥas, which means "to wash," "to bathe." Bodily care is the first reference, but ritual purification is also important (cf. Lev. 11:40; Dt. 23:12, etc.). In the OT, however, recognition of the moral element rules out purification for, e.g., intentional homicide. The prophets make it plain that there can be no easy washing away of guilt. Hence purifications for moral faults are given figurative significance. True washing is by repentance (Is. 1:16). It is the promised, saving act of God himself (Is. 4:4; Ps. 51:7). This act embraces human repentance even as it transcends it (cf. Is. 43:25). The prophets thus maintain the moral demand and yet avoid moralization.

---

cf. confer, compare

OT Old Testament

Heb. Hebrew

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

2. Judaism lays stress on ritual washings but uses other terms. It remains aware that washing with water does not result in remission. Yet concern for the law brings great scrupulosity, so much so that even God is said to bathe after burying Moses, not, of course, because he contracts impurity, but because he observes the law. Philo uses the group in the everyday sense, but also uses it for both OT and Gentile purifications. He allegorizes outward washing as inward cleansing. The latter is a favorite theme, and he distinguishes those who are being purified from those who are fully purified.

C. The Group in the NT.

1. The Secular Sense. Only loúein bears the secular sense in the NT, e.g., in Acts 9:37 (semi-sacral?) and Acts 16:33. The use in 2 Pet. 2:22 is figurative. All the other references are to freeing from sin (in baptism) (cf. loutrón in Eph. 5:26; Tit. 3:5).

2. Theological Reflection. Jesus protests sharply against confusing ritual and moral purify and against trust in external observances (Mk. 7). The rest of the NT develops this insight. Even a moral break with the past does not itself purify. The proper starting point is the forgiveness of sins by a merciful God. If full cleansing comes only with the consummation, eschatological fulfilment is already a reality in Christ (1 Pet. 1:2). Entrance into this is at baptism, which is thus a loutrón, not in the old sense of a ritual cleansing, but in a new and distinctive sense that derives its content from the saving work of Christ.

3. Pertinent Passages.

a. If loúsanti is the correct reading in Rev. 1:5, this gives a true NT thought indirectly related to baptism. But lýsanti (“freed”) is better attested.

b. In many verses there is a clear reference to baptism. In Acts 22:16 Ananias tells Paul to be baptized and wash away his sins. In 1 Cor. 6:11 Paul reminds his readers that, being washed, they are to avoid fresh defilement. In Eph. 5:26 Christ purifies the church for bridal union by the washing of water with the word (i.e., the divine word of the gospel). In Heb. 10:22 the outward washing is related to the inner purifying. In Tit. 3:5 the washing of regeneration is on the basis, not of our own works, but of God’s mercy. In 2 Pet. 2:22 the point of the proverb (Prov. 26:11) is that the false teachers, after baptism, return to sin and incur unforgivable guilt (Heb. 6:4ff.; 1 Jn. 5:16).

c. The reference to baptism is less clear in Jn. 13:10. The story of the foot-washing has two points, i.e., cleansing by Jesus and the example of ministering love. In view of the distinction between total and partial washing, the former (leloumémos) probably refers to the baptismal cleansing and the latter (toús pódas nípsasthai) to the renewed cleansing of daily forgiveness. The relation between cleansing and service is that the love of Jesus which covers forgiveness is the source of power for the disciple’s own ministry of love.

D. loúein in the Early Church. In the apostolic fathers we find only loúesthai in the sense “to bathe” (Hermas Visions 1.1.2; 1 Clem. 8.4). The group is uncommon in the Apologists but is favored by Justin, who quotes Is. 1:16 in Apology 1.44.3, refers to pagan washings in 1.62.1, and has direct references to baptism in 1.61.7; Dialogue 12.3, etc. Later, although the church resists the idea that bodily washing is of value without inner cleansing, sacral washing finds a place, e.g., in washing the hands before prayer and the liturgical use of consecrated water.

→ baptízō, katharízō [A. Oepke, IV, 295-307]

NT New Testament

i.e. id est, that is

lýkos [wolf]

A. Outside the NT. The wolf is commonly mentioned in antiquity as a terrible beast of prey. Common themes are its fierceness, its appetite, its cunning, its hostility to sheep, and the terror it inspires by its sudden appearances. The wolf figures largely in mythology and superstition as the symbol of the fugitive or the epitome of demonic power. The main use in the OT is in metaphors (Gen. 49:27; Ezek. 22:27, etc.). The wolf's lying down with the sheep symbolizes the peace of the messianic age in Is. 11:6; 65:25. In rabbinic writings there is a distinctive use of the term in the reported blasphemy when God is called a wolf to his people; this seems to involve a play on the words locus (the place of God's presence) and lýkos.

B. NT Usage. lýkos occurs in the warning of Jesus against false prophets in Mt. 7:15. These teachers might produce notable achievements (the distinction is not merely that of word and deed) but they do not do the one thing that matters, i.e., the Father's will. This is the criterion by which to differentiate appearance and reality. Paul has a similar saying in Acts 20:29, although it is impossible to say what false teachers he has in mind. As distinct from the church's own teachers in v. 30, they come from outside. In Mt. 10:16; Lk. 10:3 Jesus warns his disciples of the dangers they will face on their mission. The contrast between their authority and the persecutions they suffer characterizes their eschatological relation to the world. Jn. 10:12 again shows that the community is under mortal threat, but the focus is on the fact that Jesus, unlike the hireling, sees the threat, protects the flock with his life, and thus averts the danger. Faced with the threat, the flock may thus see to whom it truly belongs. [G. BORNKAMM, IV, 308-11]

lymaínomai [to harm, destroy]

lymaínomai has such senses as "to treat disgracefully," "to injure," "to hurt," "to imperil," and "to destroy." The only NT occurrence is in Acts 8:3, where, in the sense "to ravage," "to lay waste," it describes Saul's relentless persecution of the church (cf. 9:1; 22:4). [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 312] lýpē [pain, sorrow], lypéō [to grieve], álypos [without sorrow], perílypos [profoundly sorrowful], syllypéomai [to sorrow with] lýpē, lypéō.

A. The Greek Understanding of lýpē.

1. lýpē means "pain," "sorrow," lypeín is "to cause pain," and lypeísthai "to experience sorrow." Both physical pain and mental anguish are covered by the words. Physically the pain is especially that caused by hunger, thirst, heat, cold, or sickness, while mentally it is especially the anguish of misfortune, death, annoyance, insult, or outrage.

2. Pain alternates with joy (hēdonḗ) in the Greek view of things. There is a natural desire to live without it, yet life in mere hēdonḗ would be vegetating. The things that bring joy also bring pain (e.g., children). We also bring sorrow on ourselves by our deeds. Carousing offers brief hēdonaí and many lýpai.

3. Dealing with lýpē only in relation to hēdonḗ, philosophy sees that there can be no hēdonḗ without it. Plato thinks hēdonaí and lýpai belong to the lower part of the soul but differentiates true and spiritual hēdonaí from others. Yet even here there is the possibility of deception by a false evaluation of things or by trying to have joy by the concealment of pain. True hēdonḗ comes with the perception of goodness, truth, and beauty. But this poses a limitation for lýpē and raises the question of its purpose. For Aristotle hēdonḗ is a good, but not absolutely so. Stoicism groups lýpē with the passions (including hēdonḗ, fear, etc.) from which sages free themselves. It really arises from within as an emotion based on error, and it serves no positive purpose.

v. verse

4. At the same time, there are some beginnings of a positive view in the Greek world. Thus lýpē leads to sympathy, to knowledge, and in that sense to salvation. Some circles also see in lýpē a divine punishment which leads to penitence, although the prevailing belief in ineluctable fate hampers true self-accusation. Some forms of Gnosticism find a place for lýpē as a valuable means of discipline for the imprisoned soul. Plotinus, too, suggests that through lýpē one might learn the alienation of the soul and its relationship to deity.

B. The Understanding of Sorrow in the OT and Judaism.

1. In the LXX lýpē is the rendering of various Hebrew terms. Its meaning varies, covering such things as physical exertion, trouble, pain, sorrow, anxiety, and annoyance.

2. Proverbs (14:13) accepts the fact that joy and pain intermingle in human life (cf. Eccl. 3:4). But one is not to surrender to sorrow (Prov. 31:6; Eccl. 9:7). The real focus of the OT, however, is not psychological but practical, i.e., on the things that cause joy or grief. God imposes pain (Gen. 3:16-17), but in the last age it will vanish (Is. 35:10; 51:11). Pain is not merely a penalty but also a means of divine instruction, so that faith sees in it a firm relation to joy (Ps. 126:5).

3. Philo adopts to a large extent a Stoic view of lýpē. Although full joy belongs to God alone, pain should have no place for the righteous, since God does not will that we be just tormented by lypaí. The lýpē of remorse can serve a more positive purpose.

C. Christian Writings.

1. The NT contrasts lýpē and chará (Jn. 16:20ff. etc.) rather than lýpē and hēdonḗ (cf. also lypeín and euphraínein in 2 Cor. 2;2). The main sense of lýpē is sorrow or grief (cf. Jn. 16:6; Rom. 9:2; Phil. 2:27).

2. The NT does not discuss whether lýpē is good or bad. The desire to be spared it is right (cf. 2 Cor. 2:11ff.), and at the end it will be done away (Rev. 7:17). We are not to cause lýpē to others (Rom. 14:15) except it be in love and with a view to repentance (2 Cor. 2:4). Divine correction is perceived in it (Heb. 12:4ff.; 1 Pet. 1:6).

3. In another sense, however, lýpē is an integral part of the Christian life. Conversion involves a godly lýpē which is essential to the ongoing life of faith (2 Cor. 7:9ff.). The consequent break with the world exposes Christians to lýpē which they now regard, not as a hindrance, but as an opportunity for growth in the power of Christ's death and resurrection. Acceptance of lýpē is acceptance of the cross (Gal. 6:14; Phil. 3:10-11; 2 Cor. 4:8-9). In John Christ's departure plunges the disciples into the lýpē not merely of mental sorrow but of vulnerability in the world (Jn. 16:6-7, 20ff.). They must experience this if they are to know the true meaning of belonging to Jesus. Yet this lýpē is the source of their joy (16:21-22). The very isolation from Jesus brings out the significance of fellowship with him and the resultant victory over the world (Jn. 16:33).

---

LXX Septuagint

4. 1 Pet. 2:19 develops a similar thought. The pain of unjust suffering carries a rich reward when accepted in commitment to God and separation from the world, with Christ again as a model (v. 21). Eph. 4:30, however, has the rather different warning that believers are not to grieve the Spirit, presumably in a strengthening of the admonition against evil talk in v. 29.

5. Among the apostolic fathers Hermas uses lýpē for sorrow over sin in Visions 1.2.1-2. At the same time lýpē is one of the twelve vices of Similitudes 9.15.3, and the lypērós person wounds the Spirit. There is little of note in the Apologists apart from a Stoicizing reference in Tatian Address to the Greeks 11.1.

álypos. This word, meaning "without sorrow or care," is common in the papyri and plays an important role in Stoicism. It occurs in the NT only in Phil. 2:28.

perílypos. This word means "extremely afflicted" or "profoundly sorrowful." The NT uses it of the rich young ruler in Lk. 18:23, Herod in Mk. 6:26, and Jesus in Gethsemane in Mk. 14:34.

syllypéomai. Having the common sense "to sorrow with," "to feel sympathy," this word (used by the LXX in Is. 51:19) occurs in the NT only in Mk. 3:5 to express the strong grief of Jesus at the hardness of heart of his opponents. [R. BULTMANN, IV, 313-24]

lýtron etc. → lýō

lýchnos [lamp], lychnía [lampstand]

The lýchnos is a lamp, originally an open bowl, then a closed lamp in various forms, usually put on a stand to give better light, the lychnía being the stand. Both words are common in the LXX (cf. the seven-branched candelabra, a lychnía with seven lýchnoi). The lamp is a common metaphor in the OT. It denotes length of life (2 Sam. 21:17), the source of divine help (Job 29:3), and the law (Ps. 119:105). The lamp of the wicked will be put out (Job 18:6). In the NT Jesus makes figurative use of the fact that to give its light a lamp must be put on a stand. In Mt. 5:15 this seems to suggest that the disciples must give open witness, although a reference to Jesus' own ministry is not excluded. In Lk. 11:34 Jesus calls the eye the lamp of the body; we must be open to the light of the gospel if we are to know full health. The exhortation in Lk. 12:35 presents the burning lamp as a symbol of readiness. The woman in Lk. 15:8 lights a lamp in her search for the lost coin, a token of her great anxiety to find it. In Jn. 5:35 Jesus honors the Baptist by calling him a burning and shining lamp; he cannot be called the light itself (cf. 1:8) but he has given faithful witness to it. Rev. 11:4 describes the two witnesses as lychníai (cf. Zech. 4:2, 11), while the seven churches are seven golden lychníai in 1:12-13 etc. (cf. Zech. 4 and Mt. 5:15), and the Lamb himself is the lamp of the heavenly city in 21:23. Heb. 9:2 refers to the temple lampstand, and 2 Pet. 1:19 calls the prophetic word a lamp shining in a dark place until the day dawns. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 324-27]

lýō [to loose, destroy], analýō [to depart, return], análysis [departing], epilýō [to release, explain], epílysis [explanation], katalýō [to put down, destroy], katályma [inn, guestroom], akatálytos [indestructible], lýtron [ransom], antílytron [ransom], lytróō [to ransom, redeem], lýtrōsis [redemption, liberation], lytrōtḗs [liberator, redeemer], apolýtrōsis [release, redemption]

A. The Word Group in the OT.

1. lýō and Compounds. The simple lýō, “to loose,” is rich in compounds that add nuances to the meaning. In the LXX we find apo-, dia-, ek-, epi-, kata-, para-, peri-, syl-, and hypo-; all but the last three of these occur in the NT. lýō is used for release from prison, the opening of what is closed, the destroying of foundations, and the putting off of fetters. The compounds carry such senses as “to leave,” “to loosen,” “to relax,” “to become slack,” “to break off,” “to untie,” and “to part,” i.e., those engaged in a struggle.

2. lýtron.

a. Theologically more important than lýō, lýtron has three Hebrew originals, of which the first is kpr. Derived by some from an Assyrian word meaning “to wash away,” this more likely has the basic sense “to cover,” and it then denotes “to atone.” As a cover, kpr carries the idea of an equivalent, so that when a fault is covered it is not by cancellation but by a vicarious offering. What is at forfeit is human life, and for this a lýtron is presented which may be accepted or refused. There can be no lýtron, e.g., for willful murder (Num. 35:31-32).

b. A second term is g’l. This belongs to family law. The g’l must redeem family lives or goods that have fallen into bondage (Lev. 25:48; Jer. 32:7; Ruth 2:20), and must also be the avenger of blood (Num. 35:12 etc.). In virtue of the bond between God and his people, God himself is the g’l for Israel (Is. 41:14; 43:14, etc.). As Creator, he is also Redeemer. He has sold Israel into bondage because of her sin, yet her redemption is assured because of his status as her g’l. The same thought occurs in Job 19:25. God has smitten Job, but the same God is Job’s g’l and will thus enter the lists against himself when he causes Job to see him after death. The slain and risen Job is in the hands of the same God.

c. A third Hebrew term is pdy, which lays the stress on payment, although again for animate, not inanimate objects. Thus in sacral law the Levites are a payment for the firsthorn of Israel (Num. 3:12 etc.), and cf. the payment for Jonathan (1 Sam. 14:45). In the story of David God himself functions as the Redeemer (2 Sam. 4:9); this thought is prominent in Dt. 7:8; 13:6; 15:15, etc., and it is given a personal turn again in Jeremiah (e.g., 15:16). As distinct from g’l, pdy carries a stress on the action rather than the subject.

3. lytroústhai and Derivatives.

a. From lýtron comes lytroún, “to free for ransom.” Since kpr involves expiation by sacrifice, lytroústhai is used mostly for the other two terms. The main use for g’l is in Is. 40ff. The idea is first suggested that God gives Egypt etc. as a ransom for Israel (45:13), but then the bolder thought emerges that God need give no ransom to Cyrus but gives alien peoples to Israel as a voluntary acquisition. Redemption is thus an act of free grace with no ransom price. When used for pdy, lytroústhai denotes either the redeeming of the firsthorn by a vicarious offering or liberation from bondage, especially at the exodus (Dt. 7:8 etc.). As in Isaiah, so in Deuteronomy God pays no ransom when he frees Israel from Egypt, so that lytroústhai can adequately cover the two different Hebrew terms. It does duty for both in Psalms, which speaks a great deal about the redemption of both Israel and righteous individuals (Pss. 144:10; 26:11; 31:5, etc.), although mostly from affliction, not from sin. Death is the last emergency, and redemption from it may have the sense of being kept from it (Ps. 103:4), but it may also be redemption out of it (Ps. 49:7ff.). No ransom avails here, but God can snatch the soul from the underworld. The sparseness of the idea of redemption from sin is due to the fact that the kpr group applies in this field with the added factor of sacral expiation.

b. lýtrōsis. Various nouns and adjectives develop from lytróō. The rare lýtrōsis, which is active outside the Bible, is passive in the LXX and NT and has the sense “release.” It is connected with the Year of Jubilee in Is. 63:4 and with substitution for the firstborn in Num. 18:16 (cf. Ps. 49:8).

c. lytrōtḗs. This word, meaning “redeemer,” is twice used of God in the Psalms (19:14; 78:35). The passive lytrōtós means “redeemable” in Lev. 25:31-32.

d. apolýtrōsis, which means “ransom” or “ransom payment” in nonbiblical Greek, becomes a significant term for “redemption” in the NT. [O. PROCKSCH, IV, 328-35] lýō (→ déō). This common Greek word, which can denote the redemption granted by deity, has two main senses in the NT: a. “to loosen,” “release,” or “free,” in various connections, and b. “to dissolve,” “to destroy,” “to break up,” “to invalidate.” Sense b. can be an important one; cf. relaxing or invalidating the law in Mt. 5:19; Jn. 5:18; 7:23, dismissing Jesus as the Christ in 1 Jn. 4:3, and destroying the works of the devil in 1 Jn. 3:8. Theologically important instances of a. are in Rev. 1:5 (redeeming from sin) and Acts 2:24 (loosing the pangs of death).

analýō, análysis. From the literal sense “to undo again” develops the sense “to leave,” which is a euphemism for “to die” in Phil. 1:23. análysis means departing in the same sense of death in 2 Tim. 4:6. In Lk. 12:36 analýō has the special sense “to return.”

epilýō, epílysis. Literally meaning “to release,” epilýō means “to resolve” (an issue) in Acts 19:39 and “to explain” in Mk. 4:34. epílysis means “exposition” or “interpretation” in 2 Pet. 1:20.

katalýō, katályma.

a. From the basic sense “to put down,” katalýō means “to destroy” in various contexts (Mk. 14:58; 2 Cor. 5:1; Gal. 2:18). It can also have the nuance “to frustrate,” as in Acts 5:38-39.

b. A second meaning is then “to invalidate,” e.g., the law in Mt. 5:17.

c. A third meaning is “to unyoke,” “to rest,” “to lodge” (Lk. 9:12; 19:7). Hence katályma means “place of lodging” or “inn” (Lk. 2:7), although it may also be used freely for a guestroom (Mk. 14:14; Lk. 22:11).

akatálytos. This word, meaning “indissoluble,” “indestructible,” occurs in the NT only in Heb. 7:16, where it carries the nuance of “eternal.” The risen Jesus (vv. 25ff.) is superior to the Levitical priest because he now has in fullness the indestructible life that he has already as the historical man Jesus. As 9:14 points out, the eternal Spirit is at work in him, so that even in his mortal humanity he enjoys a fellowship with God that means eternal life. In his death, then, he is upheld by the same Spirit. Under no compulsion to die, he offers himself in priestly sacrifice, and in so doing he remains above death. In virtue of this indestructible power, his sacrifice, too, is of eternal validity.

lýtron.

A. lýtron and Ideas of Ransom outside the NT.

1. Formed with -tron, which usually denotes a means of doing something, lýtron has the sense of releasing by payment. It refers to money paid to ransom prisoners of war, to release slaves, to redeem a bond, or, infrequently, to cover a debt to deity. The cultic use is more common in the LXX and Philo. Josephus has it often for ransom for prisoners of war or war booty.

---

vv. verses

2. The payment in a ransom is a matter of agreement, either by law (Ex. 30:12) or by negotiation. In negotiations, law tends to protect the purchaser, but fixing an equivalent is a subjective matter. A legal form is needed to make sure that the person ransomed is truly freed. In the cultus the deity or the tradition of the sanctuary can fix the price, although changes are always possible, and since acceptance of a ransom is an act of grace the payment may be refused (cf. Num. 35:31-32; Ps. 49:7).

3. The Jews share the general view but move easily from the thought of ransom to that of expiation.

B. The lýtron Sayings in the NT.

1. In the NT lýtron occurs only in Mk. 10:45 and Mt. 20:28.

2. In Mk. 10:45 Jesus is the Son of Man, and his messianic work is a service in which he finally gives himself (cf. Jn. 10:11, 15, 17). He does this in willing obedience and for the sake of the many, an indefinite number with at least a suggestion of universality. The liberation is fairly obviously from sin, although this is not stated; there is no mention of any recipient of the ransom.

3. The saying clearly gives the work of Jesus a vicarious dimension. The antí ("for") means "in place of" as well as "to the advantage of." Jesus does for the many what they cannot do for themselves and what no other can do for them. Yet one cannot interpret the saying exclusively in the light of any single OT passage (e.g., Is. 53) nor detach it from the history narrated in the Gospels. Accepting the Father's gracious will, Jesus vicariously suffers death on behalf of the many who have fallen victim to death, and thereby initiates the new covenant with his blood (Mk. 14:24). His vicarious ministry involves the necessity of dying.

4. Since it is God who demands that this vicarious offering be made, the ransom is obviously paid to God, not Satan. If God is not mentioned, it is out of reverence for his name. The God of this saying is the God of Ps. 90 whose judgment is the reality of our being as sinners and with whom we can speak only out of the depths (Ps. 130).

5. The saying does not explain why God requires a ransom instead of liberating us freely. God owes explanations to no one but follows his own wise and righteous will. Jesus accepts this, and in so doing discloses to us that his death is the obedient service to God on the one side and the vicarious service for us on the other whereby freedom from sin is secured.

6. Jesus himself, of course, has previously forgiven sin (Mk. 2:5). But he has done so as one who accepts God's holy judgment on it (cf. Mk. 9:42ff.), who sees that forgiveness is a divine miracle (Mk. 10:27), and who demonstrates the seriousness of sin, the full reach of obedience, and the true reality of forgiveness by his atoning death. By his death he fulfils the condition of forgiveness by lifting sinners out of disobedience into his own obedience and thus bringing renewal instead of merely lulling a feeble sense of guilt. To see that the willing acceptance of death by Jesus is the inner condition of his right to forgive is to understand why a ransom is demanded. It is also to understand why this cannot be explained in advance but is evident only in the light of his death.

7. While Jesus expects to find Gentiles in the kingdom (Mt. 8:11; cf. 5:45), he sees no other valid forgiveness than that which he himself dispenses as Christ and Judge (Mt. 25:31ff.). The Father's grace is grace through him (Lk. 15:11ff.). There is joy in heaven over one sinner repenting, but Jesus is the one who pronounces pardon. Even those who may enter the kingdom without knowing him (Mt. 25:37ff.) will do so only in his name and in virtue of his forgiving work.

8. Speculative constructions, both objective and subjective, tend to miss the decisive significance of the relation between God and us in the atonement. This relation is grounded in the living unity of God's judgment and blessing. In Christ God has shown himself to be the reality of this unity by the self-sacrificial obedience that combines the divine justice and the divine grace. This ransom opens up forgiveness for believers and frees them for obedience on their part in genuine love for both God and others.

antílytron. This rare and late word occurs in the NT only in 1 Tim. 2:6. Based on Mk. 10:45, this verse has heautón for psychḗn, pántōn for pollṓn, and the elegant compound for the simple lýtron. Tit. 2:14 contains the same thought.

lytróō. This word means “to free by ransom,” “to let free for ransom,” middle “to purchase for ransom,” and passive “to be set free by ransom.” Rabbinic equivalents are used for the exodus, for deliverance from Antiochus Epiphanes, and for the final redemption for which prayer is made. There is no thought of redemption from sin. In the NT only the middle occurs; it is used for the redeeming act of God or Christ. There is no idea of an actual ransom in Lk. 24:21, but ransom is plainly at issue in Tit. 2:14 and 1 Pet. 1:18-19, where the understanding of Christ’s death as a ransom (Mk. 10:45) obviously has an impact.

lýtrōsis. This word means “redemption,” or “release from an obligation.” In Lk. 1:68; 2:38 it means “liberation” from the yoke of enemies (cf. Lk. 24:21). In Heb. 9:12 it means redemption in a more general sense, including redemption from sin. The idea is more cultic than legal, so that one should not press the idea of ransom.

lytrōtḗs. Meaning “liberator,” this word is used to describe Moses in Acts 7:35.

apolýtrōsis. Sparsely attested elsewhere, this noun is common in the NT. It means “freeing for ransom,” but it may also have the more general sense of “release.” In Lk. 21:28 it means the definitive eschatological redemption of the new aeon for which the disciples are to watch expectantly. This is also the point in Eph. 1:14 and Rom. 8:23. In the latter verse it is specifically the redemption of (not from) the body, i.e., its transformation after the model of the risen Lord (Phil. 3:21; cf. 1 Cor. 15:42-43). In the former (cf. Eph. 4:30) it is entry into the full inheritance of which we now have a first instalment by the Spirit. Yet redemption is also itself a present possession (Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14). It consists of forgiveness as the act of God which is now enjoyed by promise but which will bring full renewal at the last day. The historical reality of redemption is that of the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ, who as the second Adam, divine Son, and human Brother is the middle point of God’s history with us. Now hidden with him in God, our redemption will come to consummation when we attain to union (1 Th. 4:17) and glorification (1 Cor. 15:49) with him. He himself is made apolýtrōsis for us (1 Cor. 1:30). Hence it may be had only in fellowship with him, i.e., in virtue of his work (Gal. 2:20), and in the sphere of his lordship (Col. 1:13). It is not won from God, for God himself has made him our redemption. It is a gift of grace (Rom. 3:24). In Hebrews the word has the common Greek sense of “release” in 11:35, but the meaning is “remission” in 9:15. It may be noted that in none of the NT passages is the idea of an actual “ransom” expressly present. The closest to a direct reference is Rom. 3:24, but in 3:25 the thought is cultic rather than commercial, and if justification is a legal concept in 3:24, law does not demand payment for release from a penalty. apolýtrōsis is not, in fact, a key term in the NT. It does not occur in many books, and is less important than, e.g., dikaiosýnē in Paul. It has become a more general term which has to be given its specific content by other facts or concepts. Its most significant use is eschatological, as in Lk. 21:28; Eph. 1:14; 4:30; Rom. 8:23. [F. BÜSCHEL, IV, 335-56]

μ m mágos [magician, Magus], mageía [magic], mageúō [to practice magic] mágos.

1. The Greek World. This word has four consistent senses: a. “member of the Persian priestly caste,” b. “possessor and user of supernatural knowledge and power,” c. “magician,” and d. (figuratively) “deceiver.”

2. Judaism. For Philo the mágos is subreligious. Philo accepts the Persian mágoi only as they do mageía as scientific research. The rabbis adopt mágos as a loanword for “magician”; Jews must avoid mágoi. The LXX has the term only in Dan. 2:2 for those who have magical and religious arts in Babylon.

3. The NT. In Mt. 2:1, 7, 16 the reference seems to be to those who have special wisdom in reading the stars. In Acts 13:6, 8 mágos is parallel to pseudoprophḗtēs (cf. the Jewish exorcists of 19:13). The reference seems to be to a house philosopher, who is possibly tempted to use the name of God magically, but who is confounded when he encounters Christian truth.

mageía, mageúō. mageía is the activity of a mágos, and mageúō means either “to belong to the order” or “to do the work of a mágos.” The words occur in the NT only in connection with Simon Magus (Acts 8:9, 11). Simon started a movement in Samaria (perhaps as a supposed predecessor of the Messiah) by the use of extraordinary powers but not in the power of the the Spirit of God. His rapid conversion points to a messianic interest but his subsequent offer (vv. 18-19) shows that he views the operation of the Spirit as a higher (and hence desirable) form of magic.

→ góēs [G. DELLING, IV, 356-59]

Magṓg* → Gṓg kaí Magṓg; mathēteúō, mathētēs → *manthánō

maínomai [to rage, be furious]

maínomai, meaning “to rage,” “to be furious,” is used of warriors, strong drink, sorrow, desire, rapture, etc. In the LXX it denotes the raging of the nations under the terror of the divine judgment of war. In 4 Macc. 8:5; 10:13 the fidelity of Eleazar and his sons seems to be madness to the king. Philo uses the word only for delusion, and in Josephus (Antiquities 1.116) the building of the tower of Babel is madness to God. In the NT Jesus seems to be out of his mind to those who reject his message (Jn. 10:19ff.), Rhoda is thought to be mad when she says that Peter is at the door (Acts 12:15), Festus tells Paul that his learning is making him mad (Acts 26:24), Paul in his reply states that he is not mad but speaking sober truth (v. 25), and divinely inspired glossolalia necessarily appears to be madness to those who do not understand the gift (1 Cor. 14:23). Consistently, then, the NT uses the term for the judgment of unbelief on the divine work of salvation and Christian witness to it. [H. PREISKER, IV, 360-61]

makários [blessed, happy], makarízō [to consider blessed], makarismós [blessing]

A. Greek Usage. makários is at first a poetic word and refers to the blessedness of the gods. Later it comes to be used for the freedom of the rich from normal cares and worries. The verb makarízō means “to extol as, or declare to be, blessed,” while makarismós means “extolling as blessed,” and is first used by Aristotle as a technical term for “beatitude” (macarism).

B. The Stylistic Form of the Beatitude. A set form develops in Greek to extol the good fortune that accrues to a person. Using makários (or trismakários), it takes on a gnomic quality, and is often found, e.g., on epitaphs. Themes are varied, e.g., material goods, children, a marriage partner, bachelorhood, riches, a good understanding, fame, righteousness, the release of death, and mystic initiation. Happy are those who enjoy such things. [F. HAUCK, IV, 362-64]

C. The LXX and Judaism. The main Hebrew term is ’ašrê, but the LXX extends the range by using makários for various other terms. The predicative makários is most common, with the content in a relative clause, participle, or hóti clause. makarízein as a finite verb is rare. In the OT macarisms always refer to persons, never to things or states. God is not called makários (though in the NT cf. 1 Tim. 1:11; 6:15). Blessedness is fullness of life and relates to such things as a wife, beauty, honor, wisdom, and piety. The OT contains many warnings against purely external judgment, so that the true blessedness is that of trust in God, forgiveness of sins, righteousness even in affliction, and final deliverance. Formal beatitudes are not common in Philo. For him God alone is truly blessed, and humans can know blessedness only as they share the divine nature in their bearing of earthly sorrows and their philosophical endeavors. Rabbinic Judaism, however, stays closer to the usage of the OT. [G. BERTRAM, IV, 364-67]

D. The Word Group in the NT.

1. The special feature in the NT is use of the term for the distinctive joy which comes through participation in the divine kingdom. The verb makarízō occurs only twice, first in Lk. 1:48 for the blessing of the mother of the Messiah by all generations, and second in Jms. 5:11 with reference to those who endure. The noun makarismós occurs three times—in Gal. 4:15 for the blessing of receiving the gospel, and in Rom. 4:6, 9 for that of forgiveness of sins. makários is very common, usually in direct beatitudes. The reference is to persons, and the macarism, in the third person, consists of a predicative makários, then the person, and finally the reason in a subsidiary clause. Set in the context of eschatological salvation, the NT macarisms have great emotional force. Often there is a contrast with false happiness, but now all secular values are secondary to the one supreme good of the kingdom. Often, then, we find sacred paradoxes (Mt. 5:3ff.; Lk. 6:20ff.). God effects a reversal of all human values. True happiness is not for the rich and secure, but for the poor and oppressed who are rich only in pity, purity, and peace. Blessing is also for the persecuted, for those who hear the message of the kingdom (Mt. 13:16), for those who meet it with faith (Lk. 1:45), for those who make no false demands (Jn. 20:29), for those who watch (Lk. 12:37) and stand fast (of Jesus (Jn. 13:17). The mother of the Messiah is blessed (Lk. 11:27), but childless women are also blessed in an age of impending judgment (Lk. 23:29). Paul in Rom. 4:7-8 calls those who know forgiveness blessed, while in Rom. 14:22 he refers to the blessedness of those who see their way clearly in ethical decisions, and in 1 Cor. 7:40 he thinks widows who do not marry again are more blessed. Revelation contains seven macarisms (and fourteen woes). Five are pronounced authoritatively from heavenly lips (14:13; 16:15; 19:9; 22:7, 14) and refer to the blessedness of martyrs, of those who persevere, of those who are invited to the feast, of those who share in the first resurrection, and of those who may enter the holy city.

2. The secular concept of counting someone fortunate occurs in Acts 26:2 (Paul). 3. In 1 Tim. 1:11; 6:15 makários describes the blessed transcendence of God. Eschatological hope belongs to this sphere, and may thus be called blessed in Tit. 2:13. [F. HAUCK, IV, 367-70]

mákellon [market]

mákellon means “enclosure,” then “market.” Markets are rectangular courts with a dome-shaped roof, a fountain in the middle, booths at the side, and perhaps a room for sacrificial repasts. In 1 Cor. 10:25 Paul uses the word when he tells the Christians at Corinth how to act relative to meat sold on the market, which might well come from pagan temples but might also be the only meat readily available. Paul’s advice is that one is to eat without asking questions, for everything is the Lord’s. Only when unbelievers say that the meat has been offered in pagan sacrifice should one refrain for their sake. [J. SCHNEIDER, IV, 370-72]

makrán [far off, long], makróthen [from a distance]

makrán means "far off" in space or "long" in time. God is sometimes said to be not mákran. makróthen is an adverb of place only. The LXX uses both words spatially. Theologically they may denote the remoteness of God (Ps. 10:1) or his salvation (Is. 59:11) or righteousness (Is. 59:14), or they may denote human distance from God (Jer. 2:5). Aloofness from sin may often be the theme (cf. Prov. 4:24; Ps. 119:155; Prov. 15:29). makrán refers to length of time in 2 Sam. 7:19; Ezek. 12:22. makrán is used as a preposition with genitive in Sir. 15:8, and Josephus has it both for space (God's presence) and time (ouk eis makrán, "in brief").

1. The NT has both words in the spatial sense in Mt. 8:30; Jn. 21:8; Acts 22:21; Mk. 5:6; 8:3; 11:13; 14:54.

2. The use of apó makróthen in Mk. 14:50 and parallels has a figurative aspect. The women at the cross stand "afar off" in pious awe and in aloofness from the scoffing. In Lk. 16:23 the apó makróthen depicts the great gulf between the rich man and Lazarus. In Rev. 18:10, 15, 17 it expresses horror at the sight of the judgment on Babylon. This sense of distance is also strong in Lk. 18:13, where the publican, conscious of his unworthiness, stands afar off. ou makrán is common in the NT to denote the overcoming of the gulf between God and us. The scribe is "not far" from the kingdom in Mk. 12:34, God is "not far" from each of us in Acts 17:27, Gentiles who were "far off" are brought near in Eph. 2:17 (cf. Is. 57:19), and if the father sees the prodigal "afar off," it is only to run quickly to him (Lk. 15:20). [H. PREISKER, IV, 372-74]

makrothymía [patience, forbearance], makrothyméō [to have patience], makróthymos [patient, forbearing], makrothýmos [patiently]

A. Nonbiblical Greek. At first makrothymía means "resignation" or "forced acceptance." It then takes on such nuances as "desperate acceptance," "procrastination," and "endurance."

B. The OT (LXX) and Later Judaism. The group has theological depth in the OT when it is used for God's "longsuffering" or "forbearance" (Heb. 'ereḵ 'ap̱). The majestic God graciously restrains his righteous wrath, as in his saving work for Israel (cf. Ex. 34:6 etc.). He does so in covenant faithfulness but also out of regard for human frailty. Divine forbearance imposes a demand for human forbearance too. Forbearance, of course, is not renunciation but postponement with a view to repentance (cf. Nah. 1:2ff.). In this light God's makrothymía is a gift. Nor is it confined to Israel or the righteous; this is why it can arouse complaints in, e.g., Jeremiah (15:15) and Jonah (4:2). In some passages, however, forbearance with the Gentiles is merely postponement until they fill up the measure of their sins (2 Macc. 6:14ff.). In the divine makrothymía there is always the tension of grace and wrath.

C. The Rabbis. Various considerations are found in rabbinic writings. Thus forbearance is distinguished from indulgence. Its purpose for the wicked is that they might repent or at least produce righteous children. It might vary according to the measure of guilt or merit. It imposes an obligation of forbearance on us.

D. The NT.

1. Synoptic Gospels. In the parable of Mt. 18:23ff. an appeal is made for the forbearance, first of the king, then of the servant. The parable presupposes a wrathful judgment with full exaction of a debt that can never be repaid. Disregarding the amount, the kýrios cancels the whole debt, not in indulgence or postponement, but in the generosity of grace. Forbearance of this kind demands an answering forbearance in the servant. The absence of this response will call it into question. The divine forgiveness does not become a law which one may then plead against God; it is always God's free grace, and it may be withdrawn if the overflowing love of God does not evoke the response of a pardoning love of neighbor. An echo of the same point may be heard in Lk. 18:7. The righteous may be sure of their vindication by God. Why, then, does God delay? Not, of course, because God is like the unjust judge of the parable (18:1ff.), but because the elect themselves need an interval of grace for the faith and prayer with which alone they can move into the day of reckoning (cf. v. 8).

2. Paul.

a. God's Longsuffering. Paul relates God's forbearance to his wrath (Rom. 2:4; 9:22). Already manifest, divine wrath will reach a climax only on the day of wrath (2:5). Longsuffering obviously does not mean irresolution or compliance. It is not swayed by emotion but has the end in view. The delay may allow time for repentance but it also increases the wrath. It leaves no room for a claim on God's goodness but makes God's purpose plain in its eschatological dimension. The goal, however, is not just passive, for even vessels of wrath serve to bring into relief the mercy of God displayed in vessels of mercy (9:22ff.).

b. The Christian's Longsuffering. God's forbearance pledges Christians to a similar forbearance (1 Th. 5:14) which, as a fruit of the Spirit controlled by love (Gal. 5:22), issues in mutual correction. Love itself is forbearing (1 Cor. 13:4). Forbearance is a necessary quality in the service of God (2 Cor. 6:6), linking knowledge and kindness. It is a spiritual force that has its origin in the divine glory and works itself out in joyful endurance (Col. 1:11). The elect put it on as their new garment in Christ (Col. 3:12-13). It corresponds to their calling to the one body of Christ (Eph. 4:1ff.).

c. The Pastorals. In 1 Tim. 1:16 Christ himself exercises forbearance toward Paul. He thus offers a model for us in dealing with opponents. No one is to be given up easily. The divine forbearance leads naturally to praise (v. 17). It imposes an obligation in missionary service (2 Tim. 3:10). The best way to meet error is by the longsuffering which, while not retreating, leaves the decision with all confidence to the divine Judge (4:1-2).

3. The Catholic Epistles.

a. James. In unjust suffering, makrothymía is perseverance in expectation of Christ's coming (5:7ff.). Awareness of the nearness of Christ quenches angry feelings, produces triumphant steadfastness, and confers the certainty of fruit.

b. Hebrews. The emphasis here lies on the connection with faith (6:11-12). makrothymía is the steadfastness of faith and hope which is not vexed by waiting. Its basis is the promise of the righteous God.

c. 1 Peter. In 1 Pet. 3:20ff. God's forbearance in Noah's day allows for the development of the obedience and disobedience that will be manifested in deliverance and destruction. It is characterized today by the work of Christ through proclamation and baptism.

d. 2 Peter. In this epistle God's makrothymía is a central concept. It explains why the parousia has not yet come (3:4). Its purpose is wholly positive, namely to allow space for repentance. Judgment will finally fall on the wicked (v. 7), and Chrisrians must be zealous to be found without spot (v. 14). Yet we are to count the Lord's forbearance as salvation (v. 5).

makrothýmōs. This adverb occurs in the NT only in Acts 26:3 in the secular sense of "patiently." [J. HORST, IV, 374-87]

mamōnás [wealth, mammon]

1. The Gk. mamōmás seems to come from an Aramaic noun which most probably derives from the root ʼmn (“that in which one trusts”).

2. The word does not occur in the OT but is used in Jewish writings in the senses a. “resources,” b. “gain” (especially dishonest), and c. “compensation” or “ransom,” but also “bribe.” In general it has an ignoble sense, is often called unrighteous, and is a target of ethical censure and admonition.

3. In the NT the word occurs only on the lips of Jesus. It denotes “earthly goods,” but always with a stress on their materialistic character. When people trust in it (Lk. 12:15ff.) or give their hearts to it (Mt. 6:21), they cannot love God. Believers, then, must break out of enslavement to it and learn to depend on God (Mt. 6:24). From the unjust steward they must learn to use it in the service of love for others (Lk. 16:1ff.). Faithfulness with even a modest amount of mammon is the presupposition of God’s entrusting the true riches to them (Lk. 16:10-11). [F. HAUCK, IV, 388-90]

manthánō [to learn], katamanthánō [to examine, consider], mathētḗs [pupil, disciple], symmathētḗs [fellow disciple], mathḗtria [woman disciple], mathēteúō [to become a pupil, to make disciples] manthánō.

A. The Greeks.

1. Ordinary Use.

a. From the basic sense “to direct one’s mind to something,” manthánō comes to be used for (1) “to accustom oneself to something,” (2) “to experience,” (3) “to learn to know,” (4) “to understand,” (5) “to learn under instruction,” and (6) “to receive direction from a deity by oracle.” In the phrase tí mathṓn (7) it means “why?” (often with an ironical note).

b. The use consistently implies an intellectual process that always has external effects and involves a conscious or unconscious intellectual initiative. Hence other terms may elucidate it but cannot replace it.

2. Philosophical Use.

a. Beginnings. As the intellectual element in Greek life develops, manthánō is well adapted to serve in theories of knowledge. Already before Socrates, and to some extent in tragedy, it is part of the process by which knowledge arises. Knowledge comes by learning. manthánein, of course, is not the only way. Indeed, it may become purely mechanical reception. Yet this does not rule out its necessity. In tragedy manthánein is used for those who seek to live in harmony with the whole. The point of events is that men and even gods should learn from them to see themselves in all their limitation as part of cosmic reality.

b. The Metaphysics of Learning in Socrates/Plato.

(1) The transition to a speculative use takes place in Socrates. Learning is for him essential to moral development. Traditional forms of education do not prepare citizens to deal with the issues of the day, as the Sophists believe. Instead of gathering around him a paying group, Socrates uses dialectical conversation to kindle a moral sense. Learning has a suprapersonal accent. He himself is always learning, and in so doing becoming, and in becoming fulfilling his divinely ordained destiny. Plato sees the value of formal education. He thus proposes compulsory education for both sexes from the years 10 to 18. This will include reading, writing, music, mathematics, and astronomy, along with physical education. But as in Socrates, this is all secondary or rudimentary.

(2) On the basis of the preexistence of the soul, Plato thinks all learning is recollection. The point of the teacher is to bring his pupils from unconscious to conscious knowledge, and in this way to kindle in them a moral sense. The Socratic dialectic serves this purpose by bringing to light what is already latent in the soul. For this reason Plato insists that we are always active in learning, that it is more demanding than gymnastics since it engages the whole being, and that we ought to learn by play so as the better to establish our aptitudes. Mathematics (tá mathḗmata) is especially important for Plato.

c. The Intellectualizing of the Learning Process. Later philosophers intellectualize and rationalize manthánein. Xenophon again speaks of mathētaí and thinks there should be restriction of some subjects. Aristotle posits the importance of the noús in the reception of knowledge; its receptive part is for him an empty slate. Epictetus uses manthánein for mastering technical skills, for learning to think, and for adopting philosophical insights. The best way for him to learn is from others, especially in ethics, in which example is important.

3. manthánō as a Special Cultic Term in Hellenism. A special use of manthánō is for reception of the "holy word" by initiates. One may see here a clear trend toward the intellectualizing of piety. The mysteries contain symbolical formulas which can hardly be understood or used without thorough instruction. Hence teaching and learning necessarily have a place when the mystery cults lead to the formation of proselytizing religious societies.

B. manthánō in the OT and Judaism.

1. The OT (LXX).

a. manthánō occurs in the LXX and other translations of the OT some 55 times, almost 30 of which are for the root lmd.

b. The usage, however, is by no means uniform. This is partly due to the character of lmd and partly due to the penetration of the ordinary use of manthánō into the LXX. Yet the divine revelation, as the declaration of the divine will, gives a special nuance to manthánō. Thus in Deuteronomy the fear of God is its object (4:10 etc.). Learning the commandments involves obeying them (Ps. 119:71, 73). What is learned is righteousness (Is. 26:9). The will as well as the intellect is engaged, and since it is God who wills what is to be learned, all learning revolves around him.

2. The Rabbis.

a. The rabbis sometimes use lmd in a secular sense, e.g., for learning a trade, or getting information about something, or drawing knowledge from a book.

b. Mostly, however, learning means study of the law with a view to knowing and doing God's will. The OT is the basic text, then its traditional exposition. In view of the exegetical task this poses, the word can also be used for learning hermeneutical method. Learning is a mark of the righteous. Members of the people are ordained to learn the law, and as learners are a holy people.

c. Under Greek influence a certain intellectualizing takes place in rabbinic Judaism, e.g., in the opinion that learning is of higher rank than doing. This is disputed, of course, especially with reference to moral rather than ritual observance. There is also the distinctive point that for the Greeks learning and teaching are different things, whereas the same Hebrew term covers both. Furthermore, the basic feature remains that in Judaism, as in the OT, the revealed will of God in the law is the content and goal of all learning.

3. Josephus. The formal aspect is to the fore in Josephus. manthánō can mean "to experience," but primarily it is "to appropriate intellectually." This applies even in relation to the law, which one learns in the same way as human laws.

4. Philo. manthánō is rare in Philo and shows no special features. Philo personalizes Plato's view that learning is anámnēsis and puts it in the context of a philosophy of revelation. With Scripture as its basis, manthánein is the perception of ultimate reality in God. Direction is given by persons, words, or objects. máthēsis leads to knowledge and faith, and in the process discipline and example play a part. Scripture is the normative text.

C. The NT.

1. The General Situation. In the NT mantháno̅ occurs only 25 times and is far less prominent than didáskō. We find it only three times in Matthew, once in Mark, two times in John, and none at all in Luke (once only in Acts). mathētḗs, of course, is a fundamental term, but akoloutheín rather than manthánein is the true mark of the mathētḗs. Jesus does not seek to impart information but to awaken commitment to himself. That this involves manthánein, too, may be seen in Mt. 11:29, but true manthánein means continuing in his word (Jn. 8:31).

2. Ordinary Use.

a. In the one instance in Acts (23:27) the tribune in his letter says that he had “learned,” i.e., “found out,” that Paul was a Roman citizen.

b. In Rev. 14:3 it is possible that the learning of the new song is simply learning in the ordinary sense, but certain passages (cf. 2 Cor. 12:4) suggest that this is learning of a higher kind, especially since none but the 144,000 can learn the song.

3. Learning From Scripture.

a. The word occurs twice in disputations. In Mt. 9:13 Jesus tells the Pharisees to learn from Hos. 6:6 why he ranges himself with sinners. [Mt. 12:7 shows us what such manthánein involves.] In Jn. 6:45 hearing means learning, and learning from God necessarily means accepting Jesus. As in the OT, learning has the will of God as its object, but God’s will is one great reference to Jesus as the Christ.

b. In Jn. 7:15 manthánein denotes the academic study of Scripture. The Jews question the right of Jesus to teach in view of his lack of formal training. He replies that the will of God is done in his person and teaching. Paul uses the term in a somewhat similar way in Gal. 3:2, where he is not seeking information but wants to learn from the Galatians the saving will of God as the law itself, to which they make appeal, proclaims it. Only through the life and death of Christ does matheín cease to be a purely human affair. Yet it is from Scripture, as it thus testifies to Christ, that we must learn to live (1 Cor. 4:6).

4. The New Learning.

a. In Mt. 11:29 Jesus sets his own authority over against that of the scribes. We are to learn ap’ emoú. Jesus is no mere teacher, but a sign of the coming of God’s kingdom in which God’s holy will is done. From him one can learn that fulfilling this will is no burden but brings joy and rest to those who come to him.

b. Mt. 24:32 rests on the truth that for the disciples everyday things express the eternal law of God declared in the prophets. Paul in 1 Cor. 14:31 finds a similar principle in the gift of prophecy, by which the Spirit gives guidance in specific situations.

c. Eph. 4:20 uses manthánein in the full sense of accepting Christ and his work with all its implications for life. True manthánein is not just by the law but by the gospel, i.e., by Christ himself. A similar use may be seen in 2 Tim. 3:14; Rom. 16:17; Phil. 4:11 (where Paul has learned to be content because he has learned Christ; cf. vv. 10, 13).

5. The Pastorals. In the Pastorals mantháno̅ is more common. It is used in answer to a threat that is presented to faith through false teaching of an intellectualistic and legalistic type. Thus warnings are issued to women to learn in silence (1 Tim. 2:11) and to children to learn family obligations at home (5:4). True learning means applications to good deeds, genuinely following in the spirit of Christ (Tit. 3:14).

6. Heb. 5:8. There is here a play on the words émathen and épathen. The suffering of Jesus is not due to outside forces but to his own acceptance of the righteous will of the Father. It is from Scripture that he learns that this suffering is grounded in God's will and cannot be divorced from his calling. The saying bears witness, then, to the conscious demonstration of total obedience which is a mark of the Son in his saving ministry. Explanations which refer to increasing capacity for obedience, or to developing maturity in it, miss the point that learning in the OT and the NT is through the study of Scripture as God's revealed will. The new thing in Hebrews is not the learning of obedience but the learning of its nature and manner as denoted by the reference to the passion. This is where the accent lies. The context of the sonship of Jesus supports this (cf. v. 7). Formally, "although he was a Son" may go with what precedes, but materially it prepares the way for what follows, and comes to completion with the perfecting of v. 9, which refers to God's validating of his filial attitude and his associated designation as a high priest. Formally, again, learning may seem to go with perfecting, but materially it is the suffering that leads to this goal (cf. 2:10). For this reason there is no need of a conjectured "not" in v. 7. The contrast is not between sonship and not being heard, but between sonship and the paradoxical course of suffering that it entails. Since Jesus suffers according to God's word, God's ear is open to him even in this suffering.

D. The Early Church. A certain intellectualizing takes place in the church. A moral attitude is the object of manthánein in Ignatius Romans 4.3. Learning through allegorical exegesis or special revelation is the point in Barn. 6.9; 9.7ff., etc. Christianity itself becomes the object in Diog. 1.1. Learning saving truths is at issue in Justin Apology 1.13.3. The term can then be used for the imparting of truths to catechumens (Hippolytus Against Noetus 1). Finally máthēma becomes a common term (with pístis and sýmbolon) for the baptismal confession.

katamanthánō. This intensive form means "to examine," "to learn," "to grasp," "to note." It may be used in various ways, e.g., for the probing of wounds or the watching of spies. In the LXX it is used for words of seeing or scrutinizing, often in respect of moral conduct. The only NT instance is in Mt. 6:28, where Jesus invites the anxious, not merely to contemplate, but to "consider" the lilies, because in them they will see the fullness of the Creator's resources and realize that they may have unbounded confidence in his ability to provide.

mathētḗs.

A. The Greek World.

1. General Use.

a. mathētḗs is used for those who direct their minds to something. It then denotes the "pupil," not as a tyro, but as one engaged in learning.

b. In the sense of "pupil," mathētḗs implies relationship to a teacher. It may thus be used in various ways, e.g., for the apprentice to a weaver, a student physician, or the disciple of a philosophical school.

c. In a broader sense mathētḗs denotes an intellectual link between those who are distant in time, e.g., Socrates as a true mathētḗs of Homer. The emphasis here is not on formal relationship but on inner fellowship.

2. Pupil or Disciple?

a. When the stress is on the more formal or technical side, mathētḗs carries no more than the sense of gaining knowledge or skill under expert direction. Because of this restriction, Socrates dislikes the term for his own followers. The philosophical schools, however, favor the word in view of their cultivation of mímēsis of the master.

b. Various words, e.g., gnṓrimos, akólouthos, hetaíros, are used along with mathētḗs to suggest the independence and dignity of the student. Of these gnṓrimos is the most widespread in later writers. Socrates likes syngignómenoi, and Xenophon synóntes.

c. While Xenophon avoids mathētḗs, his occasional use of manthánontes shows that he does not fully grasp the concern of Socrates to get beyond the commitment of the hearer to the teacher and to emphasize the commitment of both to the object of study.

3. Master and Disciple.

a. Socrates, Plato, and the Academy. We first meet the master/disciple relation in the philosophical sphere when Socrates fosters it to replace the teacher/pupil relation of the Sophists. Plato and the Academy develop it as an ideal fellowship between those who give and those who receive. In contrast to Protagoras, who imparts information for a fee, Socrates refuses payment and offers himself rather than his knowledge. Common meals are an expression of the resultant fellowship. This becomes a feature of Plato's Academy, in which each member is called hetaíros, and the director is viewed as the first among equals.

b. The Mystery Religions. The mystery religions need a master/disciple relation in order that the initiate may learn the secrets and become a member of the cultic society. In this case, however, the master is a functionary and remains anonymous. Learning is also secondary; the goal is fellowship with the deity. Thus the society is regarded as a family rather than a school, and the term mathētḗs is not used.

c. The Master/Disciple Relation with a Religious Aspect. The relation has a religious side in such cases as Pythagoras, Epicurus, and Apollonius. The followers of Pythagoras constitute a religious and moral community. The heart of this is the word and person of the philosopher, who thus takes on a divine aspect. Epicurus, too, binds his disciples to his own person and is honored as the founder of a religion and even as a god. Apollonius makes a strong impression by his personality. He is said to have performed many miracles, and his disciples, who regard him as more than human, proclaim his fame when he goes on his great journeys.

4. The Fellowship of Disciples and the Principle of Tradition.

a. The Fellowship of Disciples. The solid groups associated with great teachers continue when the teachers die, with the concerns of the teachers as their point of unity and the added responsibility of presenting these concerns as the impelling motive. The oldest schools are religious unions. Sometimes the original teachers appoint their own successors, but the schools, too, may appoint future leaders, since the emphasis is on the schools as such rather than their directors.

b. The Principle of Tradition. Loyalty to the teaching of the master finds expression in the principle of tradition, i.e., the desire to fulfil his intentions and preserve his sayings. This principle operates dynamically rather than statically. If the school lives by its tradition, the school itself is the soil in which the tradition is renewed. The strongest orientation to the master is among the Epicureans, who very carefully hand down the sayings supposedly formulated by Epicurus. Things are similar in Stoicism, in which Chrysippus presents his own teaching as a development of that of Zeno, so that the Stoics are often simply called the school of Zeno. The actual word parádosis is rarely used in connection with the philosophical schools, but the principle of tradition is generally accepted in practice.

B. The OT and Judaism.

1. mathētḗs in the OT (LXX).

a. The LXX. mathētḗs does not occur in the established LXX tradition.

b. The OT. The Hebrew equivalent talmîḏ occurs only in 1 Chr. 25:8 (LXX manthánontes).

2. The Material Problem in the OT.

a. Reason for Absence of the Terms. As seen previously, the OT relates the group lmd to the revealed will of God; other terms are used for human instruction (Gk. paideía). Again, God has chosen the whole people to learn his will and serve him. Individuals are chosen only in order that they may perform special tasks on behalf of the whole. It is thus inappropriate to use a word of the lmd group (or mathētḗs) to differentiate a special group from the whole people.

b. Absence of the Relation. (a) Individual relations in the OT, e.g., that between Moses and Joshua, differ from the relations found in the Greek and Hellenistic world. Thus Joshua is the servant of Moses, succeeds him only by divine proclamation (Num. 27:15ff.), and thus enjoys full authority in his own right (Josh. 1:2ff.). (b) The OT prophets have no disciples. The seers are organized in guilds, but charismatic endowment rather than devotion to a leader is the focus of their unity. Elisha is more an assistant of Elijah than a disciple (cf. Gehazi and Elisha). When Elijah casts his mantle over him, this is more an appropriation for service than a designation to succession. Like Joshua, Elisha receives his appointment directly from God and hence has his own authority, not that inherited from Elijah (2 Kgs. 2:9ff.; 3:11). Baruch, too, serves as an assistant of Jeremiah, especially as a scribe and interpreter (Jer. 36:4ff.). He works with him very closely (cf. 43:3), but in no sense does he succeed him. In fact, he disappears from the scene along with Jeremiah. (c) Scribes. The presence of scribes in the OT (1 Chr. 2:55) possibly gives some impulse to the formation of schools, but the most that we can say with confidence is that there are scribal guilds.

c. Absence of the Principle of Tradition. The OT gives no evidence of a principle of tradition similar to that found in the Greek world. The OT is consciously Mosaic. All who follow stand on the shoulders of Moses. The life of the people is rooted in his work. Yet Moses is never venerated as a liberator or as the founder of a religion. He is, indeed, seldom mentioned in the prophets. Tradition in the form of orientation to a person is alien to the OT. It is no surprise, then, that no religious or moral traditions are linked to individual prophets. Even Is. 8:16 seems to refer, not to a group of disciples, but to a new community gathered around the prophet.

3. The Reason for These Absences. The religion of Israel is a religion of revelation. Human speakers are the agents by which God proclaims himself and his will. They do not speak for themselves or champion their own causes. They are stewards passing on God’s word to God’s people. The commitment they seek is commitment to God. No place remains for the authority of a great personality or for the resultant master/disciple relation. What counts is God’s continuous and dynamic speaking, whether by Moses or by those who follow him. Moses himself is presented as God’s minister (Ex. 4:10ff.) whose concern is the declaration of God’s will (Ex. 5) and whose legislation comes from God after God’s own act of liberation (Ex. 19:20ff.). When the prophets seek to win back the people, they do not appeal to Moses himself but to the days of Moses. God, not Moses, is the Master or Teacher in whose name they speak, so that they can have no desire to pose as masters for others.

4. The Rabbinic Use of talmîḏ*.*

a. Meaning. The rabbis do not use talmîḏ for “apprentice” but solely for “student” of Scripture and its interpretation.

b. Different Groups. The rabbis distinguish two groups of biblical students. First come beginners who are under the tutelage of accepted rabbis. Ideally all Israelites should be qualified students of the law with God himself as the Teacher. For the moment, however, rabbis are needed to instruct the rest, and under their immediate guidance are those preparing for the office. The second group consists of those who are demonstrably successful in their initial studies. These form a kind of guild to which admission is by ordination and which can give authoritative decisions in disputed matters.

c. Men. Only males can be students at either level. Women are not allowed to do the work of teaching or learning in the law.

d. High Honor. Students of the law share the glory of the law and are thus highly regarded. Many statements and rulings bear witness to this.

e. Targumic Usage. In the Targum the Aramaic equivalent of talmîḏ can be used for terms which denote one who receives, or is influenced, in a personal relation.

5. The talmîḏ as the Member of a School or Tradition.

a. As Pupil. There is no student without a teacher; independent study is not enough. The student is under external submission to the teacher, even to the point of doing menial tasks for him, which express reverence for the law and offer practical training.

b. As Listener. Learning is by listening to what is said and appropriating it. The teacher sits and lectures, with opportunity for questions that serve to open up discussion and promote critical reflection, since the law, not the teacher, is the final authority.

c. The School. The prominence of the teacher means that groups develop under the influence of individual teachers. These may take opposing views (cf. the famous schools of Hillel and Shammai). Within the larger schools subgroups may also form around particular rabbis.

d. Tradition. The individual rabbi represents the tradition of his school and is a link in the teaching chain. Oral teaching enhances the role of tradition. Yet the great teachers earn respect in their own right and not merely as voices of the past. In particular, they teach by example, for life and not mere learning is the goal.

e. The Rabbinate as the School of Moses. The dominating element beyond every school is always the law, so that Moses is the absolute teacher. The law limits the authority of individual rabbis. Agreement with it is the decisive point.

6. The Origin of Rabbinic Views.

a. The OT. The main contribution of the OT is belief in the supremacy of the law (as the revelation of God's will) to those who teach it. Detailed derivation of, e.g., a school or tradition is hardly possible.

b. Hellenistic Influences. (a) The rabbinic tradition derives from the Maccabean period of conflict with Hellenism when Judaism has to insure its survival in the traditional form. (b) Hellenism influences the forms in which instruction is given (e.g., the dialectic) even in the apologetic against it. (c) The appeal to authoritative sayings is parallel to what we find in, e.g., Stoicism. (d) The new focus on Moses is in line with the treatment of the founders of the philosophical schools, although it is still recognized that Moses is a hero only as the mediator of the divine will. (e) The acceptance of fees, at least in some instances, is another possible token of Hellenistic influence.

c. The Adoption of talmîḏ from Hellenistic Teaching. (a) Linguistically the use of talmîḏ corresponds to that of mathētḗs in the Greek world. Josephus calls Joshua the mathētḗs of Moses and Elisha the mathētḗs of Elijah. Elisha himself then has mathētaí. Furthermore Josephus describes the three trends in Judaism as philosophical schools. (b) Materially, we find that one of Hillel's teachers came from a Greek background; he might well have brought Greek elements into Jewish teaching.

*7. The Theology Implied in the Later Jewish talmîḏ.

a. Dependence on Hellenism may be taken as certain.

b. The Greek form is integrated into the central concern for the law, so that the rabbinic talmîḏ always stands within the community and seeks to serve it.

c. The rabbinate makes an absolute claim over against all schools insofar as the will of God laid down in the law contains the answer to all questions.

d. This claim finds expression in the assertion of a chain of tradition going back to Moses and the inclusion in it of the great figures in the national history.

8. Philo. Philo uses mathētḗs in the ordinary Greek senses. He often associates the term with gnṓrimos, and sometimes distinguishes mathētḗs (the ripe scholar) from manthánōn (the beginner). In general, however, he is in the main scholastic tradition of Judaism.

C. The NT.

1. Usage.

a. Statistical Data. In the NT mathētḗs occurs only in the Gospels and Acts. It is attested some 250 times, almost always for those who follow Jesus. Acts has it in the absolute for a disciple of Jesus. Occasionally we read of the disciples of the Baptist and of Paul. In Mk. 2:18; Mt. 22:16 we read of mathētaí of the Pharisees and in Jn. 9:28 of mathētaí of Moses.

b. Uniformity of Usage. In each instance we find attachment to a person. Jesus as the head of the group is expected to give the ruling in Mk. 2:18ff., 23ff. It is he who, like the Baptist, teaches his disciples to pray (Lk. 11:1ff.). The destiny of the disciples is bound up with his.

c. Relation to talmîḏ. NT usage manifests a close linguistic relation to the rabbinic use of talmîḏ.

d. Peculiarities of Usage. Luke commonly has mathētaí for the personal disciples of Jesus but never uses the term in the Gospel after 22:45. He starts using the term again in Acts 6:1, but this time for all believers.

2. Jewish mathētaí in the NT.

a. The phrase "disciples of the Pharisees" (Mk. 2:18 and par.) causes some difficulty in view of the fact that the Pharisees are practical exponents of the law (as distinct from the scribes). The point, perhaps, is that many scribes might be Pharisaic leaders, for the boundaries between the theoretical and the practical are fluid. It may be noted, too, that the rabbis teach by example as well as word.

b. In Jn. 9:28 the opponents of Jesus, by calling themselves the disciples of Moses, argue that they belong to the chain of tradition that stretches back to Moses, whereas Jesus is a new and unknown teacher whom they cannot accept merely on his personal authority.

3. The Disciples of Jesus.

a. The Call. (a) The Initiative of Jesus. A basic feature of NT discipleship is that it begins with a call in which Jesus takes the initiative (Mk. 1:17; Mt. 4:19; Lk. 9:49; Jn. 1:43). This differs sharply from rabbinic practice, in which it is the student's duty to find a teacher. A further point is that Jesus calls those who seem to lack the necessary qualifications (Mk. 2:13ff.). (b) Exceptions? Some passages suggest, of course, that the wider circle of mathētaí included many who simply began to follow with no specific call. A few names are given with no corresponding stories of calling, e.g., Cleopas in Lk. 24:18. Jesus also seems to be ready to accept people into fellowship without a summons if there is true readiness to follow (Lk. 9:57, 61). On the other hand, the larger group in, e.g., Jn. 6:60, 66 seems to consist of a great number who were only interested and not fully committed.

b. The Disciples in Their Relation to Jesus. (a) Commitment to His Person. A unique aspect of NT discipleship is that it is commitment to the person of Jesus. His teaching has force only when there is first this commitment to his person. Peter probably knows Jesus, and has heard him speak, prior to the incident

---

par. paragraph

in Lk. 5:1ff., but it is the impact of the person of Jesus that makes him a mathētḗs (cf. Nathanael in Jn. 1:45ff.). This personal commitment explains the deep depression of the disciples after the crucifixion (Lk. 24:19ff.). It is not enough that they have the legacy of his word. They have lost Jesus himself. The crucial importance of the resurrection reinforces this. Jesus himself reinstitutes the group (in spite of initial resistance, Lk. 24:36ff.; Jn. 20:24ff.), restores personal fellowship, and sends the disciples out, not to transmit his teaching, but to bear witness to his resurrection (Lk. 24:48). To mark the break in fellowship Luke ceases to use mathētḗs after Gethsemane and begins to use it again only for the wider community in Acts. John after 6:66 prefers to speak of the dṓdeka (mathētaí) in order to show that faith in Jesus (cf. 6:64) is an essential mark of the true disciple. As distinct from the customary rabbi, or indeed the Greek teacher, Jesus offers himself rather than his outstanding gifts, and claims allegiance to himself rather than to a cause that he represents. (b) Obedience to Jesus. Many rabbis give up a great deal to study the law, but later they enjoy fame and authority in the strength of the law that they study and teach. Jesus, however, requires that his disciples leave all things for his sake alone (Mt. 10:37ff.). In so doing, they are not merely to believe in him; they are to obey him as doúloi obey their kýrios (Mt. 24:45ff.). The services they perform go beyond those that students perform for their teachers (cf. Mk. 14:12ff.). They obey him because they see in him the Messiah. Whereas rabbinic students will one day be rabbis themselves, the disciples of Jesus are simply his disciples. Their lives are permanently stamped and fashioned by him. Jesus himself follows the normal course of a teacher, but the disciples are simply listeners who ask questions only for clarification and for whom the decisive thing is not just to appropriate intellectually but to obey. The true disciple in John (8:31) is the one who abides in the words of Jesus and keeps his commands (13:34-35 etc.). This disciple is not just a doúlos. But he is also not a gnṓrimos or hetaíros, terms which imply equality. By Jesus' own gift, he is his phílos (15:14ff.). (c) The Obligation to Suffer. Drawn into fellowship with Jesus, the disciples are set on the way of the cross. Suffering is unavoidable for the apostles (Mt. 10:17ff.; Jn. 15:18ff.). It also applies, more generally, to all disciples (cf. Mk. 8:34ff.; Lk. 14:26-27).

c. The Disciples, the Twelve, and the Apostles. The relation between these terms in the NT is a complicated one. If not all disciples are apostles, all apostles are disciples, and the Twelve are the inner circle as compared to wider groups.

d. The Band of (Twelve) Disciples. (a) Failure to Understand. By choosing the Twelve, Jesus manifests his claim to be divinely sent to save his people. The disciples, however, fail to understand either his mission or his message. This is shown by their fears (Mt. 8:23ff.), their quarrels (Mt. 20:20ff.), their protests against the passion (Mt. 16:22-23), their eventual flight (Mt. 26:55-56), and their doubts about the resurrection (Lk. 24:11). Only When they recognize the risen Lord do they finally achieve the understanding that sends them out as his primary witnesses. Jesus himself obviously feels this lack of understanding as a severe burden (Jn. 14:9), but he handles it with matchless patience (Lk. 22:31-32) in his concern to bring the disciples to salvation and service. (b) Composition. Jesus chooses men of all types to make up a representative inner group. We find Zealots, a publican, a Judean, Galileans, and men with Greek as well as Semitic names. The selection shows that he has a realistic understanding of the contemporary situation and seeks to serve the people as it is, with all the inherent tensions as well as the possibilities.

e. The Disciples' Share in Jesus' Work. The call to discipleship is a call to partnership in service (Lk. 5:1ff.). This comes out in sayings (Mt. 5:13ff.; Jn. 17:13ff.), parables (Mt. 25:14ff.), and specific directions (Mt. 10:5ff.). The sending out of the disciples two by two (Mk. 6:7ff.; cf. Lk. 10:1ff.) is for the purpose of doing the work of Jesus on his authority and according to the principle that, as they have freely received, so they should freely give (Mt. 10:8). In Jn. 3:22, 26; 4:1-2 this ministry includes baptizing on his behalf.

f. The Principle of Tradition in Jesus’ Band of Disciples. (a) Lack of a Principle. Obviously there are similarities in Christianity to the principle of tradition that one finds in Greek and Jewish teaching. Paul refers to tradition in 1 Cor. 15:3ff., and the gospel material clearly derives from tradition. Yet it is debatable whether there is any true principle of tradition. Recollection of Jesus as a teacher is always secondary. The story of the cross and the resurrection is the heart of the message, and the sayings of Jesus are handed down with considerable freedom. For the disciples Jesus is not the head of a school but the living Lord. Again, the primary emphasis is on witness (Acts 1:21-22). To support his apostleship Paul has to argue that he has in fact seen the Lord (1 Cor. 9:1). Furthermore, Jesus plainly takes a different course from that of rabbinism, for he chooses ordinary people, and warns them that they will always be mathētaí, never rabbis (Mt. 23:8). Love is to be a sign of the mathētḗs to the world (Jn. 13:34-35). (b) Reasons for the Lack. The disciples are witnesses rather than bearers of a tradition because their attachment is to Jesus and because Jesus himself brings tradition to a definitive end. As the fulfilment of his people’s hope, who is the truth itself (Jn. 14:6), Jesus cuts across all traditions (cf. Mk. 3:1ff.). He calls his disciples, not to the mediation of insights, but to the obedient giving of testimony (cf. Lk. 24:48; Acts 1:8; Jn. 19:35; 21:24).

g. Summary. (a) For all the formal similarities, there is no inner relation between the talmîḏ of the rabbis and the mathētḗs of Jesus. Jesus is kýrios, not rabbi. (b) Witness to Jesus rather than transmission of his teachings or imitation of his life is the primary task of the mathētḗs.

4. The mathētaí of John the Baptist.

a. In John’s Lifetime. John, too, has a solid band of disciples who must have been fairly numerous (Jn. 4:1), who have a rule of fasting and prayer (Mt. 9:14; Lk. 11:1), who engage in discussions (Jn. 3:25), and who visit John in prison, come to Jesus with his question, and finally bury him (Mt. 11:2; 14:12). Jesus’ own first disciples seem to come from this group, but it is highly doubtful whether Jesus himself does so. One might ask why all John’s disciples do not become followers of Jesus. Possibly John consolidates his group more than he first intends.

b. After John’s Death. The group goes on after John’s execution. In Acts 18:24 and 19:7 we read of conversions from among those who know only John’s baptism. The transition to faith in Jesus presents little difficulty but has not taken place en bloc. What finally happens to the remaining disciples of John is not known. There is no direct link with the Mandaeans.

5. mathētḗs as a Term for Christians in Acts.

a. The Linguistic Problem. The term occurs in Acts only in specific sections and according to no systematic principle. The textual tradition tends to increase the use. It is found in the “we” passages only in 21:4, 16. Normally it has no explanatory addition (toú kyríou in 9:1); this suggests that it derives from the term used for Christians by Palestinian believers. It applies to all believers, e.g., Timothy in 16:1, converts in 13:52; 14:20ff. This usage is peculiar to Acts but mathētḗs is not the only term Acts uses for Christians (cf. believers, brethren, saints, etc.).

b. The Material Problem. Materially the primary point is that Acts uses mathētaí for those who come to believe in Jesus (cf. Jn. 8:31). True faith means abiding in the word of Jesus and thus enjoying personal fellowship with him even across the generations. The presence and operation of the Holy Spirit makes this possible (cf. Acts 19:1ff.). The Greek communities, however, do not continue to use mathētḗs in this sense, probably because it tends to suggest that Christianity is simply a philosophical movement rather than personal fellowship with Christ as Lord.

6. mathētaí of Paul in Acts 9:25? The reference to Paul's mathētaí in Acts 9:25 might mean that Paul as a recognized rabbi has a group of his own disciples, but it is more likely that these mathētaí are either Christians whom he brought to faith in Damascus or those who were in his party on the way to Damascus and who were converted through his witness.

D. Early Church Usage. Hellenistic influences strengthen the use of mathētḗs for intellectual adherence or imitation of Christ, so that Ignatius can say that only the martyr is a true disciple (Romans 4.2; 5.3). symmathētḗs. This word, rare outside the NT, occurs in Jn. 11:16 for "fellow disciple" (of Jesus). The context stresses the element of fellowship with Christ and one another.

mathḗtria. This feminine form is rare, for women are outside organized education, both in Greece and among the rabbis. The one NT instance is in Acts 9:36 (Tabitha). The meaning is either that Tabitha is one of the disciples (which is possible though not probable; cf. Mk. 15:40-41), or that she is a Christian (cf. the use of mathētḗs in Acts).

mathēteúō. Intransitively this word means "to be or become a pupil." One reading of Mt. 27:57 has it with reference to Joseph of Arimathea; he is said to be a disciple of Jesus. In a distinctive transitive use (Mt. 13:52; 28:19; Acts 14:21) the NT also uses the term for "to make disciples." Behind this sense possibly stands the NT belief that a call is the basis of discipleship of Jesus. [K. H. RENGSTORF, IV, 390-461]

Mánna [manna]

1. Linguistic Data. mān is the OT term for the food by which Israel is fed in the desert (Ex. 16:31 etc.). Other terms for the food are "heavenly bread" (Ps. 105:40), "bread from heaven" (Ex. 16:4), "grain from heaven" (Ps. 78:24), and "angels' bread" (Ps. 78:25). hē mánna in Greek is used for "morsel," "grain," and especially "grain of incense." The LXX uses manna in Num. 11:6-7, Philo adopts the term, and the NT has tó mánna in Jn. 6:31, 49.

2. Manna in the OT. With water and quails, manna is part of God's provision for Israel in the desert. In Ex. 16:4 it falls like dew, is a granular deposit like frost, resembles coriander seed, tastes like honey, and must be gathered each day. It may be baked after being ground down (Ex. 16; Num. 11), and becomes uneatable if kept (Ex. 16).

3. Manna in Later Literature. The rabbis believe that God created manna just before the seventh day. As the people owes the well to Miriam and the pillar of cloud to Aaron, it owes the gift of manna to Moses. Another view sees manna as a reward for keeping the law. With water, it accompanies Israel on her wanderings. The ark contains a little basket with manna which disappears when the ark is hidden and which Elijah will restore. Manna is now the heavenly food of the righteous. Although not needed, it will again fall from heaven in the age of messianic salvation. The messianic generation will enjoy the same food and drink as the wilderness generation.

4. NT Views of Manna.

a. The manna motif occurs in Jn. 6:31, 49. The term alternates with "bread from heaven." After the feeding of the 5,000, the Jews want Jesus to give a sign which will accredit him as the Messiah as manna accredited Moses. Jesus, in his reply, points out that the messianic age transcends the wilderness age. Moses could not give true bread from heaven, for the people who ate manna still died. In contrast, the bread that Jesus gives confers eternal life. Jesus himself is this living bread (6:35, 48).

b. Heb. 9:4 refers to the manna which is contained in a golden urn in the ark along with Aaron's rod and the tables of the law. This agrees with rabbinic tradition, but cf. 1 Kgs. 8:9.

c. Rev. 2:17 also reflects rabbinic tradition with its promise of hidden manna to those who triumph (cf. also the living water of Rev. 7:17).

[R. MEYER, IV, 462-66]

maranathá [Lord, come; Our Lord is (has) come]

1. maranathá occurs in the NT only in 1 Cor. 16:22 in Paul's greeting. It also appears at the end of the eucharistic prayers in Did. 10.6. It is more common in later ecclesiastical use, often to give added weight to anáthema.

2. The term is undoubtedly Aramaic but the exact meaning is debatable. Linguistic research suggests three equally possible meanings: a. "Lord, come," as a prayer for Christ's return; b. "Our Lord has come," as a confession of his coming in humility, and c. "Our Lord is come," i.e., is present in worship. (For linguistic details see TDNT, IV, 467-68.)

3. Paul uses the Aramaic term most probably because it has already become a recognized formula in the first Palestinian community. As such it shows that Jesus is confessed as Lord and that petition is made to him as such. The idea that maranathá comes from bilingual Antioch rather than Jerusalem hardly explains why it spreads into Greek-speaking churches.

4. In Did. 10.6, where maranathá does not come directly in the eucharistic prayer, it seems to carry the sense "Our Lord is present" as a warning against participation by the unholy. The context of 1 Cor. 16:22 supports this understanding. Yet Rev. 22:20 strongly suggests that "Lord, come" is the real point, for érchou kýrie 'Iēsoú seems to be a translation of maranathá. If this is Paul's meaning in 1 Cor. 16:22, he is impressing on the church the urgency of its hope. Either way, there is a link to the eucharist, which carries the certainty of the Lord's presence but also the expectation of his return (1 Cor. 11:26). Confession of Christ's coming in the incarnation is less likely in context. We may thus conclude that maranathá is either a confession of the presence of the exalted Christ or a fervent and expectant cry for his coming again in glory. [K. G. KUHN, IV, 466-72]

margarítēs [pearl]

Pearls are usually regarded as precious stones in antiquity. They come from the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and the Indian Ocean. They are brought into the west through Alexander's conquests, and are used for necklaces and other ornaments. The word for pearl becomes a figure of speech for what is of supreme worth. The word margarítēs does not occur in the LXX, but Judaism uses "pearl" figuratively for a valuable saying. Thus a series of biblical verses is compared to a string of pearls. Eschatology refers to great pearls that serve as gates for the celestial city. The NT has the term a. for the incomparable saving benefits of the kingdom (Mt. 7:6; 13:45-46), b. for costly ornaments (1 Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4; 18:16), and c. for the twelve gates of the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:21). Gnosticism calls Christ himself the pearl, and Mandaean writings use the pearl as a figure for the soul that comes down into the vile body from the divine world. [F. HAUCK, IV, 472-73]

mártys [witness], martyréō [to bear witness], martyría [witness, testimony], martýrion [testimony, proof], epimartyréō [to attest], symmartyréō [to bear witness with], synepimartyréō [to confirm], katamartyréō [to bear witness against], martýromai [to affirm], diamartýromai [to charge], promartýromai [to bear witness beforehand], pseudómartys [false witness], pseudomartyréō [to bear false witness], pseudomartyría [false testimony] mártys, martyréō, martyría, martýrion.

A. Form and Etymology.

1. Form. The ancient epic form is mártyros, and we also find mártyr. ho or hē mártys takes the genitive mártyros, the accusative mártyra (or mártyn), and the dative plural mártysi.

2. Etymology. The root would seem to be smer, "to bear in mind," "to be concerned." The mártys would thus be one who remembers and can tell about something, i.e., a witness. The verb martyreín means "to be a witness," martyría means "bearing witness" or "the witness borne," and martýrion means "witness" as proof.

B. Use in Nonbiblical Greek.

1. Legal Witness to Facts. The proper sphere of the terms is the legal one, e.g., in trials or legal transactions. What is signified is personal testimony to events, relations, persons, etc. The verb may mean "to come forward as a witness," but with the dative it can mean testifying for somebody, and with the accusative, perí and genitive, or a hóti clause, it may denote giving witness to something specific. martyría signifies both the act and the actual witness. The more objective martýrion comes into more general use for anything that may be adduced to confirm a fact or statement.

2. Witness to Facts, Truths, and Views. The whole group finds a more general use. In so doing, it may still refer to facts of which there is direct personal knowledge. But it may also refer to truths or views which are proclaimed with conviction but cannot be verified empirically. Aristotle makes this distinction between witness as objective statement and witness as personal conviction. He also refers to witness to future events, which by its very nature is based on faith rather than fact.

3. Application of the General Use in the Sense of Witness to Facts. Along these lines appeal is made to the gods as witnesses to oaths, treaties, etc. Another common use is for the witness of the senses. We also find instances of the citing of impersonal witnesses. The poverty of Socrates is a witness that he is not a philosopher for gain.

4. Application of the General Use in the Sense of Witness to Truths or Views. Plato offer many instances of this kind of witness in respect of such matters as happiness, homosexuality, etc. The life of Socrates in particular is a witness to the truth of his teaching. In Epictetus the philosopher is the divinely called witness to practical wisdom not only by his teaching but above all by his equanimity in misfortune and affliction. The use is not technical, however, for health bears witness to the truth of the Stoic lifestyle, and while death may be a witness to truth, it does not have to be, for Epictetus does not call Socrates a mártys.

C. The LXX.

1. Hebrew Terms.

a. mártys occurs some 60 times, almost always for Heb. 'ēḏ.

b. martýrion is more common (some 250 times) and more complex, since it stands for various Hebrew terms, and is at times a very mechanical rendering.

2. The Use.

a. Legal. The first use in the LXX is legal. The mártys is the witness (for the prosecution) (Num. 5:13 etc.). False witness is severely punished (Dt. 19:16ff.). martyreín means judicial witness in Num. 35:30 and witness to an agreement in Ruth 4:9-10. God himself is a witness in the pact between David and Jonathan (1 Sam. 20:23, 42). He is also a witness to the integrity of Samuel in 1 Sam. 12:5-6 and to the innocence of Job in Job 16:19. The people are witnesses against themselves in Josh. 24:22, and the song of Moses bears witness against Israel in Dt. 31:19, 21.

b. Religious. Of particular significance are the passages in Is. 43:9ff. and 44:7ff. Here God arranges a trial which will show who is truly God. The nations are spectators but they are also witnesses on behalf of their various candidates. Idols, however, are impotent and will thus be put to shame. In contrast, the people of Israel are God's witnesses (43:10, 12; 44:8). On the basis of God's acts of calling and redemption Israel will declare the reality and uniqueness of her God. The content of this witness is God's saving work; this may not be demonstrable to unbelief (Is. 43:8) but it is an incontestable certainty to faith. If there is some similarity here to the concept of Epictetus, there are also decisive differences. The witness is primarily given by word, and it is witness to the self-manifestation of the living God, not to a philosophical code. At the same time, there is no developed witness theology in Isaiah. The goal of evangelizing the nations shines before the prophet (42:4; 49:6), but the idea of witness is here a figurative rather than a technical one. In particular, one cannot connect it too closely with the picture of the Suffering Servant in Is. 53.

3. martýrion. As objective witness, the act in Ruth 4:7 confirms the transaction. The seven lambs in Gen. 21:30 serve a similar purpose of martýrion, as does the cairn of 31:44 (Jacob and Laban). The altar of Josh. 22 is a martýrion to the agreement between the tribes (vv. 26-27), and David is a martýrion to God's grace and power in Is. 55:4. God himself may be a martýrion against the people in Mic. 1:2; the meaning here is that his judgment will irrefutably establish the people's guilt. The tent of meeting is a tent of witness inasmuch as the law is kept in it (cf. Ex. 25:15-16, 22). The plural tá martyría occurs in Ex. 30:6, 36 etc.; it refers to the concrete statutes of the divine attestation which are the basis of the law. God himself is here the subject of the martyreín contained in martýrion. This martyreín consists of God's self-revelation to Moses, of which the commandments are the content.

D. The Martyr in Later Judaism; Josephus and Philo. Judaism is a religion of martyrdom, born out of the sufferings of the Maccabean age. Indeed, even prior to this time, the figure of the prophet or righteous person who suffers calumny and even death is familiar in Israel (cf. Elijah [1 Kgs. 19:10] or Uriah [Jer. 26:20ff.]). The prophets have to preach whether they are heard or not, and the righteous maintain their integrity even in persecution (Ps. 44:22). This experience comes to a climax in the Maccabean period. 4 Maccabees reads the whole of the OT as a series of examples of the martyr spirit. Later, Josephus extols the Essenes for their patient acceptance of suffering, and various rabbis display the same loyalty to the faith in persecution or death. Yet the group mártys is nowhere used in this connection, for the suffering of persecution is a work of piety rather than a work of witness, except, of course, in the most general sense. In this regard it may be noted that both Josephus and Philo use the mártys group in the normal way for legal witness or for the attestation or proof of facts, events, or ideas. There is in them not the slightest impulse toward the specific Christian use.

E. The NT.

1. Occurrence. mártys occurs 34 times in the NT, 13 of which are in Acts and nine in Paul (none in John). There are 76 instances of martyreín, 33 of which are in John, eleven in Acts, eight each in Paul and Hebrews, and ten in 1 and 3 John. martyría is found 37 times, 14 of which are in John, seven in 1 and 3

John, and nine in Revelation. martýrion occurs 20 times, nine of which are in the Synoptics and six in Paul. A noteworthy fact is that martyreín occurs 47 times in the Johannine writings, and martyría 30 times, but mártys and martýrion not at all in the Gospel.

2. mártys.

a. General Use: Witness to Facts. This use occurs in Mk. 14:63 when the high priest finds no need of any other witnesses after Jesus' confession. The sense is the same in Acts 6:13; 7:58, and cf. Heb. 10:28 and Mt. 18:16, where the demand of Dt. 17:6 and 19:15 for more than one witness is cited or adopted. The accusation of an elder must be in accordance with the same principle in 1 Tim. 5:19, and Paul appeals to it also in 2 Cor. 13:1, in which he compares his two visits to two witnesses that have plainly established the facts. A slightly different use is when Paul calls on God as a witness to his unceasing prayers etc. (Rom. 1:9), or when he calls upon the Thessalonians (and God) as witnesses to his blameless conduct (1 Th. 2:10). In 2 Cor. 1:23 he makes this appeal a call on God to witness against him if he is not telling the truth. Human witness to facts is the point in Lk. 11:48, where the cult of the graves of the prophets bears witness to their persecution. mártys bears a similar sense in 1 Tim. 6:12: Timothy's confession is made before many witnesses (cf. 2 Tim. 2:2). In Heb. 12:1 the witnesses watching the race seem to be confessing witnesses (cf. 11:2), but this does not exclude the element of factual witness.

b. Special Lukan Use. Luke's usage in Lk. 24:48 and Acts embraces witness to facts concerning Jesus that are directly known. But this witness can be given only if the meaning of the facts is appreciated, so that the witness takes the form of believing, evangelistic confession. Since the gospel is a historical revelation, the witness to facts and the witness to truth are the same. Facts, not ideas or myths, are at issue. Those who bear witness to these facts have lived through them (Lk. 24:47; Acts 1:8). They have also understood them. When endowed with the Spirit, they are thus equipped to go out as witnesses to the world. Those who have seen the risen Lord are in a special sense his witnesses (Acts 13:31) as compared to the evangelists Paul and Barnabas (v. 32).

c. Incipient Separation of Factual and Confessional Witness in Luke. Luke, however, can still call Paul (Acts 22:15) and Stephen (22:20) witnesses. Paul in his missionary work is a witness to facts, even if not in the precise sense of Acts 1:8 (except insofar as he meets the risen Lord in 9:3ff.). Above all, he is a witness to the meaning of the facts, namely, as a witness for Jesus rather than to him (22:15). The confessional element is now stronger than the factual element, although naturally the confession itself embraces the historical facts of Christ's life, death, and resurrection. Stephen, too, is predominantly a confessional witness, and he is so in a distinctive way because he proves the seriousness of his confession by his death. Thus the usage in 22:20 prepares the ground for the later use of mártys for the one who is a witness by blood, i.e., the martyr.

d. 1 Pet. 5:1. There is a distinctive and ambivalent use in 1 Pet. 5:1. The first and obvious sense is eyewitness, but the continuation suggests participation as well. The author knows from his own experience what the sufferings of Christ entail (cf. 4:13).

e. mártys in the Johannine Writings. Of the Johannine writings, only Revelation uses mártys. Jesus himself is the mártys in 1:5 and 3:14, the two prophets are witnesses in 11:3, Antipas is a witness in 2:13, and there is reference to the blood of "martyrs" in 17:6. In all these instances death is involved, but "martyrdom" here clearly involves bearing witness to the truth as well as dying (cf. Acts 22:20). Jesus is the faithful and true witness not simply as the one who is crucified but as the one who passes on his martyría or testimony (Rev. 1:2) and who has borne witness to the truth (Jn. 18:37).

3. martyréō.

a. The Human Declaration of Facts. martyreín is not used in the NT for legal witness, but it often connotes the declaration or confirmation of facts or events (cf. Mt. 23:31; Rom. 10:2; Gal. 4:15; 1 Cor. 15:15; Acts 22:5; Jn. 2:25; 2 Cor. 8:3, etc.). The event is a future one in Jn. 13:21, and the fact is a general fact of experience in Jn. 4:44.

b. The Good Report. In the absolute, martyreín means "to give (or receive) a good report" (Lk. 4:22; Acts 6:3; 1 Tim. 5:10). The thought is always that the person (s) can be vouched for on the basis of direct observation.

c. The Witness of God, the Spirit, or Sripture. In a special group, God, the Spirit, or Scripture guarantees judgments or statements (Acts 13:22; Heb. 11:2; 7:8, 17). In Acts 14:3 the confirmatory witness of miracles supports apostolic proclamation.

d. Religious Witness. A special use develops when the facts to which witness is given are divinely established facts, and the witness is thus also witness to revealed truth. Acts 23:11 is a good example.

e. Special Johannine Use. In John witness is especially the witness that is given, not specifically to the facts of Jesus' history, but to the person of Jesus (Jn. 1:15; 5:31ff.; 8:13ff.) as the eternal Son of God (1:15, 34). Thus the Baptist has come to bear witness to the incarnate Logos as the light (1:8; cf. 8:12). As the Son, Jesus is the truth, so that to witness to the truth is to witness to him (3:26; 5:32-33). Witness is given to him by the Baptist (1:7-8), by Scripture (5:39), by God (5:32), by his works (5:36), by himself (8:13-14), and later by the Spirit (15:26) and by his disciples (15:27). The three that bear witness in 1 Jn. 5:7 seem to be baptism, the Lord's Supper, and the Spirit, though possibly with an allusion to Jn. 19:34-35. Witness in John is confession. To be sure, the author of John and 1 John stresses eyewitness (1 Jn. 1:1-2). But the witness is also a witness of Christ's glory (Jn. 1:14; 1 Jn. 5:9-10). Hence witness can still be given even by those who are not eyewitnesses, i.e., by those who confess who Jesus was and what he signified. The term is in no way reserved for those who are put to death for their witness. Nor is this true of martyreín in the four instances in Revelation, in which martyreín means bearing witness to the prophetic word (1:2; 22:20) or bearing witness to the threat which protects the prophecy (22:18).

f. 1 Tim. 6:13. In 1 Tim. 6:13 Timothy is admonished in the presence of Christ, who himself made a good confession in his witness to Pilate. At issue is Jesus' acknowledgment of his messianic mission by his declaration, or his death, or both.

4. martyría.

a. Outside the Johannine Writings. Of the seven instances outside the Johannine writings, six are religiously neutral, e.g., for court witness in Mk. 14:55, a good report in 1 Tim. 3:7, and the witness of the pagan poet in Tit. 1:13. The exception is Acts 22:18, where Paul's martyría is evangelistic witness.

b. In the Johannine Writings. In contrast, a Christian use dominates the 30 instances in the Johannine material. Human witness is at issue in Jn. 8:17, a good report in 3 Jn. 12, and the testimony of men in 1 Jn. 5:9, but elsewhere the reference is to evangelistic witness to the nature and significance of Christ. This is the active bearing of witness in Jn. 1:7 and Rev. 11:7, but in all the other instances it is the witness that is given, e.g., by the Baptist (Jn. 1:19), by Jesus (3:11 etc.), by God (5:32), or by the author (19:35). God's witness is also the point in 1 Jn. 5:9ff. "Having the witness" is a distinctive phrase in 1 Jn. 5:10 and Rev. 6:9; 12:17; 19:10. Revelation also speaks about the witness of Jesus (1:2, 9; 12:17; 19:10; 20:4), which is identical to the word of God. In 1:2 the testimony of Jesus refers to the book, and this is perhaps the point in 19:10 as well: the testimony of Jesus is their witness as Christian prophets. Elsewhere this testimony is revelation in general. Because of this witness the author is exiled (1:9), the martyrs are slain (6:9), and the dragon fights against them (12:17). The special use of martyría 'Iēsoú as a formula for the gospel is perhaps linked with the fact that Jesus is the faithful witness even to the point of death (cf. 1 Tim. 6:13).

The term “witness” is thus beginning to take on a martyrological nuance. “Having the witness” in Revelation supports this, for it always applies to those who suffer for their testimony. Similarly, the witness of the two prophets is oral testimony sealed by death (and cf. 12:11). martyría undoubtedly means evangelistic confession and not just the testimony of blood. But it is the specific evangelistic confession that culminates in death.

5. martýrion.

a. Occurrence. This word, which is less common than the other three (20 times), occurs in the Johannine material only in Rev. 15:5 (“the tent of witness”), and is found most often in parallel passages in the Synoptics.

b. Witness for the Prosecution. In the NT, as in common Greek usage, martýrion means objective proof. This may be seen in the phrase “for a testimony (or evidence) against” in Jms. 5:3; Mk. 6:11, and cf. Mk. 1:44-45. In Mk. 13:9 the disciples will bear testimony as they are whipped in the synagogues and arraigned before rulers, and in Mt. 24:14 the gospel will be preached as a testimony to all nations. In these instances a chance to believe may be offered, but the preaching will also be evidence in case of unbelief.

c. Witness to Something. martýrion may also denote witness to something with a genitive of subject (2 Cor. 1:12) or object (Acts 4:33). In such instances martýrion is equivalent to gospel, message, or teaching (cf. 1 Tim. 2:6).

d. Active Witness. martýrion has the active sense of attestation in Heb. 3:5, in which Moses is said to be a faithful servant in the attesting of what he receives from God and has then to speak to the people. Neither here nor elsewhere does martýrion move in a martyrological direction.

F. Specific Martyrological Use in the Early Church.

1. Survey. The second century, under persecution, develops certain impulses in NT usage. The ordinary use lives on, as does the NT use for evangelistic witness. But full witness is now witness under threat. Witness, then, becomes a special term that is reserved for the one who seals the seriousness of witness by death.

2. Usage. The usage is still fluid in 1 Clem. 5.4, 7, and neither Hermas nor Ignatius uses the mártys group technically for martyrdom. It is in the Martyrdom of Polycarp that we first find all four words used in this special sense. Interestingly, this work comes from the area that is the home of Revelation. Other writers also use the terms for those who risk their lives without actually suffering death (cf. Hippolytus). Hegesippus uses the term martyreín for the death of James, the Lord’s brother, but he also has martyría for oral witness to the faith. In South Gaul the victims clearly reserve mártyres for those who suffer death; the rest, even though they suffer terrible tortures, are confessors. The account itself is not so precise in its usage, for martyreín refers to all who suffer, whether killed or not. Gradually, however, the distinction gains ground. Thus Clement of Alexandria says that mártyres are perfect in confession (Stromateis 4.21. 133. 1), and Tertullian calls those who are not yet condemned martyres designati (To the Martyrs 1). It is in this specialized sense that Latin adopts the Greek term instead of using its own word for the witness (testis).

3. Understanding. Into the idea of martyrdom comes the concept of a struggle with the devil in an imitation and continuation of Christ’s sufferings in which Christ himself grants support and in which some may even have a vision of his glory. Such thoughts go back to the NT (cf. Mt. 5:11-12; 10:17ff.; Acts 5:41; Col. 1:24; Rom. 5:3; 8:17; 1 Pet. 2:21ff.; 4:13). The difference is that the NT does not associate these factors with the concept of the mártys. The martyrological sense is in fact a consequence of the suffering which the church actually experiences in bearing its witness.

epi-, sym-, synepi-, katamartyréō. All these compounds stand in close relation to the popular sense of martyréō. epimartyreín occurs in the NT only in 1 Pet. 5:12, where it means "to attest (a preceding assertion)." Witness or proof in the strict sense is not at issue. symmartyreín is a common term for "to bear witness with" others, and then, more generally, "to confirm," or, with the dative, "to agree." Paul has the term in Rom. 2:15 for the confirmatory witness of conscience. The same usage occurs in Rom. 9:1: Paul's conscience, in the Spirit, confirms his concern for Israel. In Rom. 8:16 it is the Holy Spirit who adds his confirmatory witness to our spirit that we are children of God. In this last verse "our spirit" is probably not just the soul but the ego as it is shaped already by God's Spirit, so that the statement of faith that this ego makes is confirmed by God's Spirit. synepimartyreín occurs in the NT only in Heb. 2:4, which says that the salvation declared by the Lord and attested by his hearers is confirmed by God through signs etc. katamartyreín carries the sense of bearing hostile witness. It occurs in the NT in Mk. 14:60 and Mt. 27:13, where first the high priest, then Pilate, asks Jesus about the things that are testified against him.

martýromai, dia-, promartýromai. martýresthai first means "to invoke as a witness," then "to affirm," "to attest." In the NT it occurs twice in Acts and three times in Paul. In 1 Th. 2:11-12 and Eph. 4:17 it is used to suggest an emphatic demand. In Gal. 5:3; Acts 20:26; Acts 26:22 the sense is that of emphatic affirmation, whether in relation to a truth, a fact, or the gospel. diamartýresthai has much of the same meaning. Ten of the 15 NT instances are in Luke's works (nine in Luke). "To declare emphatically" (in admonition) is the point in Lk. 16:28; 1 Tim. 5:21; 2 Tim. 4:1; "to charge" brings out the sense. Elsewhere what is meant is "affirmation" (cf. Acts 20:23; Heb. 2:6; 1 Th. 4:6). In Acts 2:40 the context supplies the content, while in 10:42 we have a hóti clause, and in 18:5 the phrase "that the Christ was Jesus." promartýresthai occurs in the NT only in 1 Pet. 1:11 in the sense "to attest something in advance as a fact." The Spirit of Christ in the prophets predicts the sufferings and the subsequent glory of Christ.

pseudómartys, pseudomartyréō, pseudomartyría. The pseudómartys is a "false witness," i.e., a witness who declares something that is untrue. Mt. 26:60 employs the term for those who give false evidence against Jesus at his trial. Paul has it in 1 Cor. 15:15 in his argument that if Christ is not risen the apostles are false witnesses. The "of God" which he then adds is not a subjective genitive (witnesses whom God has appointed), but an objective genitive (witnesses who misrepresent God, claiming that he has done something which he has not, i.e., raised Jesus from the dead). pseudomartyreín occurs in Mt. 19:18 and parallels (quoting the ninth commandment from Ex. 20:16 and Dt. 5:20 LXX). Some MSS include the commandment in Rom. 13:9 as well. The only other NT instance is in connection with the trial of Jesus in Mk. 14:56-57. pseudomartyría, which is not found in the LXX, occurs in the list of vices in Mt. 15:19 and then again in the trial of Jesus in Mt. 26:59. The meaning is "false witness" (which is usually pseudomartýrion in a legal context). [H. STRATHMANN, IV, 474-514]

masáomai [to bite]

masáomai means “to bite,” “to chew,” “to eat.” The one LXX instance is in a free rendering of Job 30:4. In the NT we find it only in Rev. 16:10. Men “gnaw” their tongues for pain when the angel pours out the fifth vial and the kingdom of the beast is in darkness. The mixed imagery reflects the confusion and anguish. [C. SCHNEIDER, IV, 514-15]

mastigóō [to whip, lash, torment], mastízō [to scourge], mástix [whip, lash, torment] mastigóō, mastízō. mastigóō means “to whip,” “to beat with a lash,” then figuratively a. “to lash with words,” and b. “to torment.” In the LXX it occurs literally in Ex. 5:14; Dt. 25:2-3; Prov. 27:22, and figuratively in, e.g., Job 15:11; Prov. 3:12.

1. Mt. 10:17 and 23:34 say that the disciples will face whippings in the synagogues. This punishment is prescribed for various offenses and follows an established procedure. The number of strokes is not to exceed thirty-nine and may be reduced in case of physical weakness. The instrument is the mástix, “the lash.” Women may be whipped as well as men. The synagogue servant does the whipping.

2. The scourging of Jesus in Jn. 19:1 is the Roman punishment which precedes execution and which is of far greater severity. In the prediction in Mt. 27:26 and Mk. 15:15 the loanword phragellóō is used instead of mastigóō. Lk. 23:16 has the milder paideúsas.

3. The whipping of Paul in Acts 16:22ff. is perhaps a primary punishment, but that with which he is threatened in Acts 22:24-25 is for the purpose of examination, i.e., in order to wrest a confession. Roman law protects citizens from beating, but exceptions are found.

4. We find a figurative use in Heb. 12:6 (quoting Prov. 3:12): “to impart corrective punishment.” As parents may correct children whom they love, so God corrects by means of sufferings.

mástix. This word first means “horsewhip,” then any “whip” or “lash,” and figuratively “trouble” or “suffering.” It is used especially in the LXX for God’s scourge (Job 21:8) or punishment (Ps. 89:32), and cf. afflictions in Ps. 32:10.

1. In the NT it occurs literally in Acts 22:24 (the Roman scourge) and Heb. 11:36 (the synagogue strap of four thongs).

2. A figurative use may be found in Mk. 3:10 for the diseases that Jesus cures (cf. Lk. 7:21) and in Mk. 5:29, 34 for the specific ailment of the woman with a hemorrhage. [C. SCHNEIDER, IV, 515-19]

→ mṓlōps, plēgḗ*, *rhabdízō

mátaios [vain, deceptive], mataiótēs [vanity, deception], mataióō [to deceive, be delivered to vanity], mátēn [in vain], mataiología [empty prattle], mataiológos [empty prattler] mátaios.

LXX Septuagint

NT New Testament

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

i.e. id est, that is

cf. confer, compare

A. Outside the NT.

1. The word mátaios carries the senses of "vain," "deceptive," "pointless," "futile." While kenós means "worthless," mátaios means "worthless because deceptive or ineffectual." mátaios implies antithesis to the norm, which may at times be liberating but is more often harmful. Tragedy raises the ultimate question whether everything is not mátaios. Religion offers a partial answer by pointing to the divine world, but the plurality and mutability of the gods undermine this answer. Later Greek thought makes little use of the group, perhaps because it raises so unsettling a question, and involves such practical self-contradiction.

2. The OT, however, does not evade the question. Many Hebrew words pour their negative content into Gk. mátaios. Ps. 60:11 states baldly that human help is vain (mátaios), Ps. 62:9 describes the children of men as vain, and Prov. 31:30 characterizes beauty as vain. Above all, the OT points out that the gods of the nations are vain. Only the one true and living God, who is known as he makes himself known, can save us from futility. It is faith in God, however, which enables the OT bluntly to extend the sphere of the mátaios to all values, not in a spirit of negativism, but with positive confidence. It may be pointed out that the sayings of false prophets are also called mátaia in Ezek. 13:6ff., and that "taking in vain" is a phrase for misuse of the name of God in Ex. 20:7.

B. The NT. The NT accepts the ruthless judgment of the OT on the human sphere. The thoughts of the wise are empty (1 Cor. 3:20), and so are controversies and dissensions (Tit. 3:9). Indeed, even Christian faith itself is futile if it does not rest on the historical fact of the resurrection. Idols and idolatry are vain things (Acts 14:15), and pagan ways as a whole are described as futile (1 Pet. 1:18) even though they may be valued because they are inherited from the fathers. As Christian faith is vain if it does not accept the reality of the resurrection, so Christian religion is vain if it ignores the divine command in arrogant self-deception (Jms. 1:26).

mataiótēs. This rare word is used in Greek for human nothingness. The LXX has it more often, e.g., in Pss. 39:6; 144:4. Eccl. 1:2 calls everything vanity; for this reason we must look to God, with whom alone is no mataiótēs. Rom. 8:20 takes up the thought of Eccl. 1:2. Creation is subject to futility, but God lies before and after it, so that the subjection is in hope of final glory. Eph. 4:17 describes the effect of vanity in human society (cf. 2 Pet. 2:18).

mataióō. This biblical word is used once in the active in the LXX ("to deceive") but mostly in the passive ("to be delivered up to vanity"). The meaning in Rom. 1:26 is that those who do not honor and thank God are betrayed into futile thinking (cf. 1 Cor. 3:20).

mátēn. This adverb means a. "in vain," b. "pointlessly," and c. "deceitfully." It has sense a. in Mt. 15:9 and Mk. 7:7, which quote Is. 29:13.

mataiología. This word, meaning "empty prattle," is used in 1 Tim. 1:6 for those who forsake sincere faith.

mataiológos. This word occurs in the plural in Tit. 1:10 for "empty prattlers." [O. BAUERNFEIND, IV, 519-24]

máchaira [sword]

OT Old Testament

máchaira means the “knife” used in sacrifice, cooking, gardening, etc., then the “small sword,” e.g., the saber or dagger. In the LXX it is the knife in Gen. 22:6; Josh. 5:2-3, but mostly the dagger or small sword.

In the NT the word is used 1. for the swords at the arrest of Jesus (Mt. 26:47, 55). When one of the disciples draws his máchaira, Jesus tells him to put it back, for those who take the máchaira will perish by it (Mt. 26:51-52). In Heb. 11:34, 37 some of the heroes of faith escape the sword but others are killed with it (cf. 1 Kgs. 19:10), while in Lk. 21:24 the people of Judea will fall by the edge of the sword, and in Acts 12:2 James is killed with the sword. A great máchaira is given to the rider on the red horse in Rev. 6:4.

2. In Mt. 10:34 the use is obviously figurative. Those who follow Jesus must be prepared for hostility even in their own families. Figurative, too, is the use in Lk. 22:35ff., where Jesus is not asking for armed defense but warning his disciples to be ready for final sacrifice.

3. In Eph. 6:17 the máchaira is part of the spiritual armor of Christians. The sword is God’s word.

4. A similar thought occurs in Heb. 4:12, except that here the máchaira is more likely the knife of the priest, butcher, or surgeon, since the function is not that of destroying or punishing but of piercing and disclosing. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 524-27]

máchomai [to fight, quarrel], máchē [fighting, quarreling], ámachos [not quarrelsome], theomáchos [fighting against God], theomachéō [to fight against God] máchomai, máchē, ámachos. This group is used for physical combat, especially of a military kind. The military use predominates in the LXX. In the NT, however, only Acts 7:26 relates for certain to physical conflict. Strife of words is the point in Jn. 6:52. Physical threats are perhaps involved in 2 Cor. 7:5, and Jms. 4:1-2 is debatable. Strife is wrong for Christians (2 Tim. 2:23; Tit. 3:9: legal disputes). Bishops (1 Tim. 3:3), and indeed all Christians (Tit. 3:2), are not to be quarrelsome (ámachos). Where there is strife, it is due to passions. Hence other words are used for the necessary spiritual warfare of believers, e.g., agōnízesthai.

theomáchos, theomachéō. These rare words denote striving against God. In Acts 5:39 Gamaliel warns the council to proceed cautiously lest they be found opposing God. Luke follows Euripides in this usage, although without suggesting that the march of the gospel is in any way similar to that of Dionysus (whom it is fatal to oppose). [O. BAUERNFEIND, IV, 527-28]

mégas [great], megaleíon [greatness], megaleiótēs [greatness], megaloprepḗs [greatness], megalýnō [to magnify], megalōsýnē [majesty], mégethos [greatness]

mégas.

A. Outside the NT.

1. The basic sense of mégas is “great” or “big” (either people or inanimate objects). We then find such nuances as “high,” “wide,” or, figuratively, “powerful” (gods, rulers, natural forces, dangers, emotional states, impressions, etc.). The word is used in epiphanies and also in courtly style. It may at times have a censorious ring, i.e., “arrogant.”

2. In the LXX mégas is mostly used for the root gdl, which covers much the same range as the Greek term. Other Hebrew terms for which mégas is used express particular aspects of greatness. In Isaiah mégas is used for gdl only 13 out of 32 times. In the other passages we have free renderings or interpretations.

B. The NT.

1. General Use. In the NT mégas conforms to the usual Greek and Hellenistic usage. Worth noting is its use for the great supper of Rev. 19:17 and the great faith of the Canaanite woman in Mt. 15:28. God is the great king in Mt. 5:35. Greater judgment awaits the teacher in Jms. 3:1. The Baptist is to be great before God in Lk. 1:15 (cf. Jesus in 1:32). The mighty God (dynatós) has done great things (megála) for Mary in 1:49. Love is for Paul the greatest of the triad in 1 Cor. 13:13. Prophecy is a greater gift than tongues because it does more to edify the church (1 Cor. 14:4-5). The relation between Christ and the church is a great mystery in Eph. 5:32. In 1 Timothy the mystery of our religion is great (3:16), and godliness is great gain (6:6). Cf. the great reward of confidence in Heb. 10:35. The day of eschatological judgment is the great day in Jude 6 and Rev. 6:17 (cf. Zeph. 1:14).

2. Great and Small in the kingdom of Heaven. Among the disciples of Jesus there is a struggle for rank (Lk. 9:46) which is even projected into the kingdom of God (Mt. 18:1). They obviously think of the kingdom after the model of an earthly state with its distinctions. Judaism underlies this concept with its conviction that there will be small and great in the future world. Those who make themselves small for the law will be great in the world to come. Jesus, however, takes a child as an example. The answer to the question of greatness is the simple trust which marks the children of God as they accept their heavenly Father's gifts. Mt. 20:26 brings out another aspect of the true greatness that is required in disciples. Answering the request of the sons of Zebedee, Jesus points out that loving service is the order of life for his disciples. To ask about greatness is to ask about ministry. Lk. 22:26 adds the nuance that the greatest is to act as the youngest. Mk. 10:43ff. offers the example of Jesus himself, who is obviously the greatest, but has come to serve rather than to be served. In Mt. 5:19, of course, Jesus himself does talk about the greatest and the least in the kingdom. The point here, however, is that position in the kingdom is bound up with the total fulfilment of God's will in its embracing of the whole person and its orientation to truth and trust. Those who erode the law while supposedly protecting it will not even enter the kingdom (5:20). A similar issue arises in Mt. 11:11, where John the Baptist is among the greatest born of women, but the least in the kingdom is greater than he. Since the kingdom is open to the patriarchs and prophets (cf. Mt. 8:11), this can hardly be meant to exclude John from the kingdom (the one who is more than a prophet, v. 9). The probability is, then, that Jesus has himself in mind when he refers to the least in the kingdom who is still greater than John. If this is so, the saying may be compared to Mt. 12:6, in which Jesus says that something greater than the temple is here, and 12:41-42, in which he says someone greater than Jonah or Solomon is here.

3. The Greatest Commandment. In the disputes preceding the passion, a scribe raises the question of the greatest commandment. In reply Jesus combines Dt. 6:5 and Lev. 19:18 to give the commandment of twofold love for God and neighbor. This inseparable love embraces all else. Palestinian piety distinguishes weightier and lighter commandments among the 248 commands and 365 prohibitions of the law. Rabbis also raise the question of a principle of the law. Thus Hillel finds it in a negative form of the golden rule. The general insistence, however, is that observance of the whole law is obligatory. Jesus, then, takes an independent course in finding the sum of the law in the twofold love of God and neighbor. Love is the commitment to God in divine sonship which comes to expression in commitment to others. It is the one essential thing, embracing in itself both law and sacrifice. It finds its fullest illustration in the cross, which is the almost unavoidable outcome of Jesus' challenge to more nomistic views.

---

v. verse

4. The Johannine Use. In Jn. 1:50 Jesus tells Nathanael that he will see greater things, namely, the glory of Jesus (v. 51) into which he, too, will be drawn. In 5:20 Jesus says to the disciples that the Father will show the Son even greater works for their sake, i.e., giving life to the dead (v. 21). Indeed, even believers themselves will do greater works when Jesus goes to the Father (14:12). Jesus is greater than all who precede him (cf. the questions of 4:12 and 8:53, and the confession of 5:36, where Jesus has the greater witness of God and Scripture; cf. 1 Jn. 5:9). A textual question arises in Jn. 10:29, where it is either the Father who is greater than all or Jesus himself in virtue of the power that the Father has given him. While Jesus is one with the Father, direct equation is avoided, so that Jesus can say that the Father is greater than he (14:28). The same God is greater than the accusing heart (1 Jn. 3:20) and greater than he who is in the world (4:4). Not being greater than their master, the disciples must love and serve as he does (Jn. 13:16); this will involve similar persecution (15:20). The greatness of God is that with forgiveness he grants the needed power for this.

5. Tit. 2:13. The question posed in Tit. 2:13 is whether Jesus is the great God and Savior, or the great God is distinguished from the Savior Jesus, or God is the great God and Savior and Jesus is in apposition to glory. Elsewhere in the NT the goddess Artemis is called great (Acts 19:27-28). God is great in the OT (cf. Ex. 18:11; 2 Chr. 2:4). Other religions in the Near East also call their gods great, and the phrase "the great god" occurs everywhere in Hellenism, often in acclamation and without the clear monotheistic thrust of the OT. The statement in Tit. 2:13 obviously belongs to this total context, but who is the great God of the statement? Since Jesus is called Savior elsewhere in Titus, this term plainly refers to him, and the position of the article, the reference to the epipháneia (the return of Jesus), and the stereotyped nature of the expression support the view that Jesus is here the great God as well.

6. Acts 8:10. Acts 8:10 calls Simon the power of God that is called great. "Great power" and "great god" commonly go together. Even in Judaism God is called Power (cf. Mt. 26:64). Thus when Simon is called the great power of God he is characterized as a divine man, a mediator of revelation, an embodiment of divine power. He himself makes the same claim when he calls himself "somebody great" (v. 9).

megaleíon. This word, meaning "greatness," is used in the plural for "mighty acts" (Dt. 11:2). In Acts 2:11 tá megaleía are the mighty acts of God in the story of Christ.

megaleiótēs. This word means "greatness," "majesty," or "glory." In Jer. 33:9 God's work for Jerusalem is to the glory of his people (LXX; the Hebrew has "to his glory among the peoples"). Some versions have the Greek term in Ps. 130:1 (wicked pomp) and Ps. 71:21 (the greatness of the righteous). In the NT the expulsion of the demon in Lk. 9:42-43 results in astonishment at God's majesty, while the majesty of Jesus at the transfiguration is the point in 2 Pet. 1:16, and in Acts 19:27 Demetrius refers to the magnificence of Artemis of Ephesus.

megaloprepḗs. This world has the sense of "greatness," "magnanimity," or "nobility." It is used for God in Dt. 33:26. The only NT instance is in 2 Pet. 1:17, which refers to God as the "excellent glory."

megalýnō. This word means "to make great," "to magnify." In the NT it means "to make great" in Mt. 23:5 and Lk. 1:58 and "to extol" in Lk. 1:46; Acts 10:46; 19:17. In Phil. 1:20 Paul's whole aim is the magnifying of Christ by life or death. In 2 Cor. 10:15 he hopes to be magnified with the increase of the Corinthians' faith.

megalōsýnē. This word, meaning "majesty," is used for the divine name in Heb. 1:3. It also occurs with glory etc. in the great doxology of Jude 24-25.

mégethos. The noun of mégas, this word means physical or spiritual "greatness." In the LXX it usually means "height" or "growth." The only NT instance is in the petition of Eph. 1:19 that the recipients may know the incomparable "greatness" of God's power. [W. GRUNDMANN, IV, 529-44]

méthē [drunkenness], methýō [to be drunk], méthysos [drunkard], mesthýskomai [to get drunk]

A. Outside the NT. In the literal sense this group denotes intoxication. methýō is "to be drunk," methýskō "to make drunk" or passive "to be drunk," méthysos "drunkard," méthē "drinking," "drunkenness." Figuratively the words are used for being drunk with sleep, frenzied with fear, etc. (although méthysos is not used figuratively). The LXX uses the group literally in, e.g., Gen. 9:21; Prov. 23:21; Is. 28:7. Figurative use of methýskō occurs in Is. 34:5; Cant. 5:1; Nah. 3:11; blood is the drink in Is. 34:5ff., love in Cant. 5:1, divine wrath in Nah. 3:11. methýskō may also denote a refreshing drink. Philo has the literal sense; he links drunkenness to ignorance, but commends moderate drinking for the relaxation and cheerfulness that it brings. In a figurative use he refers to the beautiful intoxication of the ascetic and the sober intoxication of union with deity.

B. The NT.

1. In the literal sense méthysos and méthē occur in the lists of vices in 1 Cor. 5:11; 6:10; Rom. 13:13.

2. methýō and methýskomai mostly have the literal sense "to drink" (cf. Jn. 2:10) or "to be or get drunk." In 1 Th. 5:6 Paul warns believers, as those who belong to the new aeon, to be vigilant and sober; drunkenness belongs to the night. In the parable in Mt. 24:45ff. the bad steward, not living in eschatological tension, gives way to selfishness and hedonism, drinking with the drunkards. In 1 Cor. 11:21 the Corinthians disrupt the fellowship of the Lord's Supper; some are hungry while the wealthy are drunk. Unlike the feasts of Dionysus, the Lord's Supper is no place for intoxication. Intoxication is the direct opposite of spiritual drink. Thus Peter in Acts 2:15 resists strongly the accusation of drunkenness, and Paul in Eph. 5:18 contrasts orgiastic enthusiasm with the infilling of the Spirit that comes to expression in praise, thanksgiving, and love (vv. 19ff.).

3. A figurative use occurs in Rev. 17:2, 6. In 17:2 the dwellers on earth are drunk with the wine of fornication (idolatry); in 17:6 the woman (who epitomizes the ungodly world) is drunk with the blood of saints and martyrs. [H. PREISKER, IV, 545-48]

methodía → hodós

mélas [black]

mélas means "black" or "dark," dark blue, red, grey, etc. It suggests what is sinister or unlucky, and in the pagan world finds a cultic use in mourning. The LXX uses the term similarly apart from the cultic side. Philo often has the antithesis of black and white. Josephus mentions dyeing the hair black, and he also refers to the black clothing of accused persons, debtors, and mourners. mélas is rare in the NT. In Mt. 5:36 the black hair of youth is contrasted with the white hair of age. One of the horses in Rev. 6:1ff. is black (v. 5; cf. Zech. 6:2, 6). In Rev. 6:12 the sun is said to become as black as sackcloth when it is darkened. In the apostolic fathers 1 Clem. 8.3 describes sins in the same image, while Hermas treats black as an apocalyptic color (cf. the black beast of Visions 4.1.10, the black hill of Similitudes 9.1.5, the black stones of Similitudes 9.6.4, etc.). The devil is black in Barn. 4.9. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 549-51]

---

vv. verses

méli [honey]

The ancients use honey as a preservative, for sweetening, and also in medicine and cosmetics. Comparison with honey (for sweetness) is common. With milk, honey is offered to the dead and to deities, and it is said to be the food of the gods. The LXX mentions méli some 60 times. The promised land is a land flowing with milk and honey (Ex. 3:8 etc.); the honey is that of wild bees, or sometimes perhaps of grapes or fruit, since beekeeping comes only later. Philo compares the divine wisdom to honey. In his exposition of the prohibition of honey as an offering, however, he equates it with excessive and unholy joy. In the NT the scroll that the divine eats in Rev. 10:9-10 is bitter and yet as sweet as honey (cf. Ezek. 3:1ff.). John the Baptist eats wild honey (Mk. 1:6), which is here the honey from wild bees, not the sweet exudations from certain trees. Some MSS add "and of a honeycomb" in Lk. 24:42. This is hardly an original reading that was dropped because of the Gnostic use of honey, nor is it an addition for cultic reasons. It reflects the contemporary custom of adding a sweet dessert to the main fish course. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 552-54]

mélos [member, part, song]

A. Secular Greek.

1. This word has the senses a. "member of the body," and b. "song." In Parmenides it takes on an abstract sense akin to "elements." Plato relates it to méros ("part") and also uses it in the singular for "melody" or "song" (cf. Pindar). Prior to Aristotle it is always in the plural for bodily members, but Aristotle also uses it in the singular in this sense, while Epictetus uses both singular and plural for songs. In the singular mélos takes on the nuance of an organism which may be compared, e.g., to an integrated pólis. In inscriptions the plural may denote the whole body from which the life departs at death.

2. In Orphic myth the consumed members of Dionysus are found in humans as the most noble legacy at creation. In Gnosticism individuals are members of the primal man which the redeemer gathers from dispersion and which receive from him a new form.

B. Jewish Use.

1. The LXX uses the term for bodily members (both human and animal, Job 9:28; Ex. 29:17), and also for songs or melodies (Ezek. 2:10). melízō is used for cutting up offerings into parts (Lev. 1:6). The body is made by God and is subject to death. The stress is on the function of the individual members, which serve the will, not on the whole body as an integrated organism.

2. Philo begins with concrete functions but gives these allegorical significance in an attempt to show that philosophical thought is already present in the OT. For him, as for the LXX, the head is the chief member; it denotes the ruler of a society. God himself has neither parts nor passions. Like Plato, Philo uses the phrase mélē kaí mérē for members of the body. He also has métra kaí mélē for verse and melody. Josephus compares the suffering of all Judea with Jerusalem in the Jewish war to the effect of the inflammation of an important member on the whole body.

3. Rabbinic theology relates the 248 commands of the law to the 248 members of the body (and the 365 prohibitions to the 365 days of the year). As regards the most important member, it suggests the head, but also the heart or reins. The tongue may also be the mistress of all others (cf. Ps. 39:1). Supernatural powers strive for mastery over the members, but these, albeit few, may be saved by the good impulse. The hands, feet, and mouth are contrasted with the eyes, ears, and nose as particularly under God's power.

C. The NT.

1. The Synoptists. In Mt. 5:29-30 Jesus contrasts the single members and the whole body. The eye and hand are members with very important functions. They are treated here as the subjects of actions, and if the actions are bad, then the right member (the privileged one) should be sacrificed. The actions are not just adulterous glances etc. (v. 28) but anything that might run counter to the demands of the kingdom or of faith in Jesus (cf. Mk. 9:43ff. and Mt. 18:8-9). Obviously Jesus is not demanding self-mutilation (cf. the general demand for self-sacrifice). What he demands is that these members be renounced as regards sinful actions or functions. Judgment rests on the body, but it is saved from hell when there is this radical metánoia. The juxtaposition of the members and the body shows that life is more than the perfection of the members; the whole body has an eternal destiny even though individual members perish. Yet Jesus heals individual members as a sign that in the coming aeon there will be a renewed existence in the resurrection body.

2. Pauline Epistles.

a. In Paul the members are not under our autonomous control but are responsible to the Creator. We are set in a conflict which involves the members, since they may be instruments of either iniquity or righteousness (Rom. 6:11-12, 19). Sin needs the members of the mortal body in order to actualize itself. The members are its slaves. Christ, however, has brought liberation and set them in a new service. It may be noted that the reference here is to all the members; Paul makes no ascetic differentiation. The slavery of the members to sin brings no profit; it issues in death, which is the heavy destiny of being in the flesh (6:21; 7:5). Sin imposes its will on our members even against our better knowledge (7:23). The reference to the mélē shows that it is the real person who is sinning in concrete acts of sin. Yet the new sanctification in Christ also consists of concrete acts of righteousness by the members which demonstrate the justifying faith that gives the members a new master. In Rom. 12:4-5 and 1 Cor. 12:12 Paul compares the community to a body and its members. The underlying thought here is not that of an integrated organism, as in Greek thinking; the stress is on the functions of the members, as in the OT. The unity of body and members is the ongoing act of God's creative will (1 Cor. 12:18). Because God confers this unity, no member can argue that it does not belong (vv. 15ff.). Each has its own function, thus giving richness to the body. From the very first, the body at issue here is the body of Christ. Along with national, religious, or social differences, there are functional differences according to the charisms, but the creative Spirit permeates the whole as life does the body and unites the different members, so that they suffer and rejoice together (v. 26). In virtue of their common life in the Spirit, the members are Christ's body. Yet individuality remains: "You are the body of Christ, and individually members of it" (v. 27). Unity is already present, so that the great need is not to achieve integration but to avoid arrogance (Rom. 12:3). We belong together as we belong to Christ (12:5). We are to work this out in our different functions (12:4). It is not that Christ is one body of which we are members, but that we are one body in Christ and hence members of one another. As persons, the members themselves have bodies, so that these can be called Christ's members in 1 Cor. 6:15. Christ does his work through the bodies of Christians. As natural bodies, these will be destroyed, but as bodies that are meant for the Lord (and the Lord for them) they are appointed to resurrection (6:13-14). To give the body to a harlot is to take it from the Lord and make it a member of the harlot in a carnal relation that stands in sharp contrast to the spiritual relation to Christ (vv. 16-17). The fact that believers are one spirit with Christ shows that what is said transcends the limits of the comparison to the body and its members. On the other hand, this comparison serves a useful purpose and cannot be arbitrarily replaced.

b. In Col. 3:5 the reference is again to members that constitute active corporeality under sin (cf. deeds of the body in Rom. 8:13). The "seeking" of 3:1 and the "putting off" of 3:9 show what is meant by "putting to death" in 3:5. The example of the tongue adds clarification; we are to renounce lying (3:8). In Eph. 4:25, as in Rom. 12:5 and 1 Cor. 12:25, the stress is on reciprocal ministry. In Eph. 5:30 we have the reverse of 1 Cor. 6:15. As the members become members of a harlot in fornication, so the members are members of Christ in the lawful marriage of Christ and his church. In Eph. 4:16 the complex metaphor has some new features. Yet it is Christ who gives unity to the whole by his creative lordship, for Christ is head as well as body in a headship that transcends what can be ascribed to the merely physical head. In Colossians and Ephesians, probably in conflict with incipient Gnostic trends, Christ plays an increasing role. As Christ is before all things, so he is the head of his body, the church (Col. 1:18). Yet the starting point is still the older Pauline use and the realistic biblical view of the members. Being a member of Christ means being saved by his death and resurrection (Col. 1:7, 20) and brought into the community that stands obediently and actively at his disposal for service to others (3:12ff.).

3. James. Jms. 3:5ff. discusses the harmful working of a powerful member, the tongue, which affects the whole body (vv. 3, 6). As in Paul, other forces control the member and initiate division by it (cf. 4:1). The use of mélē here is similar to that of later Judaism.

D. Apostolic Fathers. 1 Clem. 37.5 shows dependence on 1 Cor. 12:12ff. The comparison in Diog. 6.2ff. reflects Greek dualism with its distinction between the soul and the body with its individual members. Ignatius reduces the creative role of God by introducing works (in the context of agreement with the bishop) as a basis for acknowledgment as a member of Christ (Ephesians 4.1ff.). He uses the term for the physical members at martyrdom in Romans 5.3. [J. HORST, IV, 555-68]

Melchisedék [Melchizedek]

1. Melchizedek is the priest-king of Salem, the contemporary of Abraham, in Gen. 14:18. Ps. 110:4 refers to this story in relating kingship to priesthood. The idea of the priest-king is important (Simon) in the Maccabean period. Apocalyptic awaits a priestly monarchy with the overcoming of sin and the opening of paradise. Rabbinic interest shifts the interest to Abraham, to whom the priestly dignity is supposedly transferred. Melchizedek is seen as a link between Noah and Aaron. Josephus calls him the founder and first priest of Jerusalem. Philo thinks he is a type of the kingly mind or lógos and an example of one who is taught by God.

2. On the basis of Ps. 110, the NT finds in Christ fulfilment of the high priesthood of Melchizedek (Heb. 5:6, 10; 6:20; 7:1ff.). Melchizedek's name and dignity point to the messianic gifts of righteousness and peace. His mysterious appearance indicates the eternity of Christ. The fact that Abraham pays him tithes shows his superiority to Levi. Ps. 110 predicts the beginning of a new order which ends the legal covenant and cultus. The account in Hebrews is marked by great vividness, christological depth, and acceptance of the offense of nonintegration with the Aaronic ministry.

3. Both in the church and in Gnosticism there is much later speculation about Melchizedek. He figures as one of the Gnostic redeemers, and the sect named after him seems to have put him above Christ and paid him cultic homage. [O. MICHEL, IV, 568-71]

mémphomai [to blame], mempsímoiros [grumbler], ámemptos [blameless], momphḗ [blame] mémphomai means "to blame, scold, upbraid, chide." mempsímoiros denotes "one who bemoans his fate," a "grumbler." ámemptos means "blameless," mémpsis means "censure," and momphḗ "blame" or "reproach." In the NT we find memphómenos in Heb. 8:8, where God finds fault with Israel for breaking the covenant, and for this reason gives promise of a new covenant. In Rom. 9:19 Paul raises the question why God finds fault if God is sovereign, all things serve his purpose, and no one can resist his will. But Paul rejects the question; we have no right to dispute with God. In Phil. 3:6 Paul says that he was blameless touching the law (cf. Gal. 1:14). But his very zeal for the law leads him into the sin of persecuting the church, thereby showing that righteousness is not possible by the law. Phil. 2:15 and 1 Th. 3:13 show that it is God's will that his people should be blameless at the judgment. This is possible by reason of justification and the sanctifying work of the Spirit. It is a motive in admonition and sums up the purpose of Christian life. Paul displays this blamelessness in his apostolic ministry (1 Th. 2:10), and it is his prayer that body, soul, and spirit may be kept blameless at the coming of Christ (5:23). momphḗ means a "reproach" or "complaint" in Col. 3:13, and in Jude 16 the false teachers are mempsímoiroi, i.e., they are dissatisfied with God, with his guidance, with his purpose for them. [W. GRUNDMANN, IV, 571-74]

ménō [to stay, await], em- [to persevere], para- [to remain, endure], peri- [to await], prosménō [to stay on, with] monḗ [staying, place to stay], hypoménō [to hold out, wait on], hypomonḗ [patience, endurance] ménō.

1. This word means a. "to stay in a place," figuratively "to remain in a sphere," b. "to stand against opposition," "to hold out," "to stand fast," c. "to stay still," and d. "to remain," "to endure," "to stay in force."

2. There is also a transitive use "to expect someone."

